acquainted with the history of his country, since he takes no notice of the present a war. Valens, being bent upon war, and well apprifed of the strength and power of the enemy, made vast preparations during the winter, with a design to fall upon the enemy early in the spring. Before he set out on so dangerous an expedition, in order He is baptized to render heaven propitious to his undertaking, he received the facrament of baptism, by the Arians. but, out of complaifance to the empress, at the hands of Eudoxius, then bishop of Constantinople, a leading man among the Arians, who, in administering to him that facrament, obliged him to swear, that, to his death, he would adhere to the doctrine of Arius, and look upon those who opposed it as enemies to truth; which oath he but too strictly observed, as the reader may find in the ecclesiastic writers of those b times. He had before shewed no small partiality to the Arians; but thenceforth he became their great patron, and a cruel persecutor of the catholics. But to return to the war: the emperor being informed, that the Goths, apprised of his design, were affembling a mighty army, in order to attack him the first, took the field before the winter was over; and having fent strong detachments to guard the banks of the Danube, he encamped with the rest of the army in the neighbourhood of Marcianopolis, the metropolis of Lower Massia, where he raised Auxonius to the dignity of pretect, in the room of Salustius Secundus, no longer able to discharge that office, on account of his great age. He was still at Marcianopolis on the thirtieth of May, as appears from the dates of some laws P; which we will not take upon us to reconcile with what we read in Ammianus 9 and Zosimus, viz. that in the beginning of the spring he lest that city, and having assembled his troops, he passed the Danube at a place called Daphne, and spent the whole summer in ravaging and laying waste the lays waste the enemy's country, without meeting with the least opposition, the Goths having fled, upon the approach of the Roman army, to the neighbouring mountains, called Serri, inaccessible to those who were not well acquainted with the country. In the beginning of the autumn he led back his army to the Roman territories, and was on the twenty-fifth of September at Dorosterum in Masia, and on the thirty-first of January of the enfuing year 368. at Marcianopolis's, where, without all doubt, he passed the Great disorders winter. This year the Isaurians, who had continued quiet ever since the year 359. over-ran the neighbouring countries, plundering not only villages, but towns, and d advancing as far as Pamphylia and Cilicia, where they amassed an immense booty. Mujonius, vicar of Afia, endeavoured to restrain them; but, as he was quite unacquainted with the art of war, he was cut in pieces, with all his men. Musonius had taught rhetoric at Athens, from which employment he was raifed to the dignity of proconful of Achaia, and afterwards to that of vicar of Asia. However, the Isaurians were in the end furrounded by the inhabitants of the countries which they had plundered, and, their retreat being cut off, obliged to submit, and quit the booty they had taken. Their lives were spared, upon their promising to give no molestation to their neighbours for the future; and accordingly they kept their word till the year 376. that is, for the space of ten years . Germanicopolis was their chief city, and in the fifth century an episcopal see; but not at this time, for a bishop could find no employment among persons who were robbers by profession. The following year 368. Valens was still at Marcianopolis on the ninth of March ", and heard there his panegyric pronounced by Themistius, upon his entering the fifth year of his reign. The orator mentions in his speech an eastern prince, who had quitted the dominions of his father, tho' very confiderable, to have the honour of ferving under Valens w. Some writers conjecture this prince to have been Para, the son of Arfaces king of Armenia, who came to implore the affiftance of Valens against the Persians, and continued some time at Neocasarea in Pontus; but he cannot be said to have served under f Valens. One Bacurus, styled king of Iberia, served under Valens at the battle of the Haurian robbers.

He taffes the

Dinube, and country of the

Goths.

Theod. chron. p. 79. 4 Ammian. p. 340. Zos. p. 741. Cod. Theod. Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 248, 349. Eunap. c. 8. p. 125, 126. Cod. Theod. cr. orat. 711. p. 433. Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 460. Ruf. l. i. c. 10. p. 166. P Cod. Theod. chron. p. 79. * Cod. Theod. chron. p. So, " Cod. Theod. chron. p. Sr. w Themese, orat. viii. p. 433.

Adrianople x, as he did afterwards under Theodosius y; and him perhaps Themistius meant. From Marcianopolis the emperor marched early in the spring to Carpi, a village, as is supposed, of Masia, with a design to ravage, as he had done the year before, the enemy's country; but he was obliged to remain encamped in the same place till the beginning of autumn, without ever being able to cross the Danube, which continued swelled beyond measure all that summer. He therefore returned to Marcianoũ

25

ie (

2

οŧ

VC

ud d

Ç,

Ž. u

at

1d

ţ

1.

he c

ad

nd

itl

113

yl.

) d

ď.

II II

ejer i

e of

call.

i, 15

NC.

œi.

j.

a polis, where he took up his winter-quarters?. One of his laws is dated from that place the twelfth of November, and another the thirteenth of December . This year is remarkable for one of the most dreadful earthquakes that had ever been felt, by which the city of Nice was utterly ruined, and in that of Germa in the Hellespont only a few houses left standing b. The following year 369, the emperor was still at Marciano-polis on the third of May; but at Noviodunum in Lesser Scythia on the third and fifth of July, where he passed the Danube on a bridge of boats, and advanced far into the enemy's country, destroying all with fire and sword. Zosimus tells us, that the He invades Goths fallying frequently out of their woods and marshes upon the Romans, the anew the counemperor dispatched against them the servants who attended the army, promising Goths. b them a certain fum for each head they should bring. Hereupon such numbers of the enemy were killed in the woods and marshes where they lurked, that the rest, finding no-where a safe retreat, sent embassadors to sue for peace d. Thus Zosimus. But Ammianus, whose authority is of greater weight, informs us, that Valens, having attacked the Greutbungi, a warlike nation, at a confiderable distance from the Danube, after feveral encounters, gained a great victory over Athanaric, who, at the head of a numerous army, had ventured to engage him . After this victory, Valens returned The Goths deto Marcianopolis, with a design to winter there, and renew the war early in the spring. feated, sue for But in the mean while the Goths, weary of so destructive a war, which had lasted peace, and obalready three years, and reduced them to the utmost distress, sent embassadors to c sue for peace; which Valens at first resused to grant them upon any terms, but was in the end, with much-ado, prevailed upon by the senate of Constantinople to hearken to their proposals. Thus Themistius, who was at the head of the Constantinopolitan deputies f. Valens, having at their request dismissed the embassadors with a favourable answer, approached the Danube, and named Vistor and Arintheus to treat with the Goths. After some conferences, a peace was consuded upon the following terms, highly honourable for the Romans; viz. 1. That the Goths should not for the future Articles of the pass the Danube, nor set soot on the Roman territories. 2. That the trade which treaty. they had been allowed by former treaties to carry on with what cities of the empire they pleased, should be restrained to two only, situated on the Danube. 3. That d they should not for the future claim nor expect the pensions that had been annually paid them by other emperors; but nevertheless, that Athanaric's pension should be continued to him 8. This was the first peace, concludes Themistius, which the Romans had in our memory granted to, and not purchased of, the Goths. When Valens and Athanaric were to meet, in order to ratify and fign the treaty, the latter could not be prevailed upon to pass the Danube, pretending, that his father had obliged him folemnly to swear never to tread on Roman ground. On the other hand, Valens, thinking it below the majesty of the empire to go to him, it was agreed, that the two princes should meet in boats in the middle of the river; which they did accordingly, and ratified the peace to their mutual satisfaction h. Themistius, who was prefent at this interview, describes it much at length, but more like an orator than an historian. He pronounced his speech in all likelihood at Constantinople, whither he retired after the conclusion of the treaty; for, according to the code, he was at Marcianopolis on the second of December, and on the thirtieth of the same month at Constantinople k. This year dreadful disorders were committed in Syria by the inhabitants of a large village near Apamea, called Maratacupris, who, roving about the country, robbed all they met, and had even the boldness to enter some cities in the nighttime, and plunder the houses of the most wealthy inhabitants. Hereupon Valens sent severity of Vaa party of foldiers against them, with orders to set fire to their village, and put them lens to some all to the fword, without distinction of sex or age; which was done accordingly with robbers. f the utmost rigour, the soldiers being in express terms injoined not to spare even the fucking children 1.

THE following year 370. Valens, leaving Constantinople, set out for Antiocb; but he had scarce reached Nicomedia, when he received news of the death of Eudoxius, the Arian bishop of Constantinople, in whose room the Arians, with his approbation, placed one Demophilus. The catholics too chose their bishop, and raised to that see Evagrius; but the emperor sent a party of soldiers from Nicomedia, with orders to b Hier. chron. Socr.l. iv. c. 11. e Ammian. p. 341. f Themist. e Ammian. p. 341. 1 Тнеміят. огат x р. 132, 133.

drive him out. The Arians, thus countenanced by the emperor, raised a cruel per-

Valentinian,

provinces, and Paiciline into three.

fecution against the catholics, who thereupon had recourse to Valens, sending eighty ecclesiastics to lay their grievances before him; but the emperor, instead of redressing them, ordered Modestus, who had been raised this year to the dignity of presect in the room of Auxonius, to put them all to death. Modestus, fearing the public exeeighty orthodox cution of so many ecclesiastics might occasion great disturbances, put them all on be put to death. board a vessel, pretending the emperor had ordered them to be sent into banishment; but when the vessel was at some distance from land, the mariners set fire to it, as had been agreed on before-hand, faving themselves in their boat. The ship was driven by a strong wind into a harbour called by Socrates, Dacidazus, and there confumed, with all who were in it. This cruelty, fays that writer, was punished by b heaven with a dreadful famine, which obliged most of the inhabitants of Phrygia to abandon their country, and fly to other provinces for relief m. Some unforeseen accident must have diverted the emperor from his intended journey to Antioch; for he was, as appears from the dates of feveral laws, on the tenth of June at Cyzicus; on the twelsth of December of this year, and during the months of January, February, and April of the enfuing year, at Constantinople "; which he left after the fifth of Mayo, and let out for Syria, advancing flowly, and administering justice in all the cities through which he pass d; which would have gained him the affections of the inhabitants, had he not at the same time made it his chief study to establish every-where the herefy of Arius, and betrayed an irreconcileable hatred to the catholics P. He c passed the winter at Casarea in Cappadocia, where, to his unspeakable grief, his only fon Valentinian Galata died. Gregory Nazianzen writes, that, during his malady, the his only son, dies emperor had recourse to the prayers of St. Basil, who was then at Casarea, and promised to restore the child to health, provided Valens would suffer him to receive the facrament of baptism at the hands of an orthodox bishop; which condition he not agreeing to, but, on the contrary, ordering him to be baptized by the Arians, the Cappadocia di- young prince immediately died 4. This year the emperor divided Cappadocia into two provinces, appointing Tyana the metropolis of Cappadocia Secunda, as Cafarea was of Cappadocia Prima. At the same time he divided Palestine into three provinces, viz. Palæstina Prima, Palæstina Secunda, and Palæstina Salutaris. Cæsarea was d the metropolis of the first, Scythopolis of the second, and Petra of the third. The latter city, with the greatest part of Palastina Salutaris, was dismembered from Arabia, as were several cities in the two other provinces from Phanicia. The governor of Palæstina Prima was honoured with the title of confular; but those of the other two were only styled presidents. At what time Lycaonia, which had Iconium for its metropolis, was made a separate province, and those of Cilicia, Syria, and Phanicia divided into two, and Arabia into three, we will not take upon us to determine. These divisions of provinces proved very burdensome to the people, and raised quarrels and disputes among the metropolitan bishops, as appears from the ecclesiastic historians, and the letters of St. Basil.

Sapor begins new troubles in Armenia and Iberia.

THE following year 372. Valens left Cæsarea in Cappadocia early in the spring; for he was at Seleucia on the fourth of April, and on the thirteenth of the same month at Antioch . Soon after his arrival in that city, Libanius pronounced in his presence part of a speech composed in his praise, the other part, as it was exceeding long, being put off to another time. The emperor heard him with great pleasure, if the orator himself is to be credited; but the remaining part of his speech was never pronounced. Valens was come to Antioch to watch the motions of the Persians; for Sapor laying claim to Armenia, which had formerly belonged to the kings of Persia, but not caring openly to invade it, lest the Komans should espouse the cause of their allies, after having attempted in vain to allure the nobility over to his party, pretend- f ing great friendship for Arfaces their king, he invited him to a banquet, during which he ordered the unwary prince to be seized; and having put out his eyes, sent him in chains to a castle, called Agabana, where he was soon after put to death ". This in all likelihood is what gave occasion to the long account we read in Processus of the captivity of Arsaces king of Armenia, taken prisoner by one Pacurus king of Persia w; an account which has all the air of a romance. Sapor, having thus trea-

&lt;sup>m</sup> Socr. l. iv. c. 15. p. 226. n Cod. T p. 7+2. q Greg. Naz. orat. xx. p. 351. n Cod. Theod. chron. p. 87-89. o Idem ibid. F Hier. quæft. Hebr. p. 212. Cod. Theod. tit. 4. p 171.
Cod. Theod. chron. p. 90, 91.
PROCOP. bell. Perf. l. i. c. 5. p. 15-17. notice c. 1. p. 3. Noris, epoch. p. 401, 402.

Ammian, l. xxv. p. 300. & l. xxvii, p. 353. Liban. vit. p. 48.

1,6

a cheroufly dispatched Arfaces, gave the government of Armenia to Cylax and Artabanes; both natives of the country, but inviolably attached to his interest. Then, driving out Sauromaces, whom the Romans had created king of Iberia, he put one Appacuras in his place, cousin-german to Sauromaces, honouring him with a diadem, which the Romans had refused to the other x. Olympias, the daughter of Ablavius, one of Constantine's chief officers, and given by that prince in marriage to Arfaces, was no sooner informed of the captivity of her hufband, than she took refuge with her son Paras in a strong fort called Artogerassa, where the king's treasures were lodged. Cylax and Artabanes were immediately ordered by Sapor to lay fiege to the place; which they did accordingly: but pitying the forlorn condition of the queen and the young prince; b they agreed with the befieged to abandon the Persians to their fury; who were accordingly almost all to a man cut off in a fally made by agreement in the night-time, while the guards themselves in the camp were asleep, Cylax and Artahanes having given out, that the befieged had demanded and obtained a truce for two days, in order to confider on the terms that had been offered them. The queen, thus delivered from the present danger, sent her son Paras to implore the affistance of the emperor, who caused him to be entertained for some time at Neocæsarea in Pontus, in a manner fuitable to his rank and condition. However, not daring to affift him openly, at the request of the nobility of Armenia, he charged Terentius, who commanded on the borders of that country, with the title of comes or count, to conduct him into his c father's kingdom, which he fuffered him to govern, but without the title of king, or any of the enligns of royalty, lest the Persians should look upon his appointing him king as a breach of the peace. Sapor was no fooner informed of what had passed in He feixes and Armenia, than, transported with rage, he sent a strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into that king- destroys several strong body of troops into the several strong several strong body of troops into the several strong several several strong several strong several strong several several strong several strong several severa dom, who, committing every-where dreadful ravages, obliged Paras, no-ways in a Armenia. condition to oppose them, to take refuge, with Cylax and Artabanes, among the inaccessible mountains between the Roman territories and Lazica. The Persians in the mean time, after having taken and burnt several strong-holds, sat down at length before Artogerassa, which, after several attacks, they took and destroyed, carrying away with them the wife and treasures of Arsaces. Sapor, finding he could not get d Paras into his power, had recourse to his usual artifices, in which he seldom miscarried; and by private messages to the young prince, whose cause he promised to espouse, prevailed upon him to cut off the heads of Cylax and Artabanes, who, he faid, were rather his governors than ministers, and fend them to him into Persia v. Valens, who had hitherto declined fending troops into Armenia, lest he should be Valens fends charged with a breach of the peace, was no sooner informed of these proceedings, troops to the than he ordered Arintheus, one of the best commanders of his age, with a powerful affiliance of army, into that kingdom, which by that means was preserved, the Persians not the Armenians. daring to fend more troops thither, through fear of being overpowered by the Romans. Hereupon Sapor dispatched embassadors to Valens, complaining of his sende ing troops to the affiftance of the Armenians, which, he said, was a manifest breach of the treaty concluded between him and Jovian. Valens, without regarding the complaints of the Persian king, sent a new reinforcement of troops to Arintheus, and at the same time dispatched Terentius, with twelve legions, into Iberia, to restore Sauromaces, driven out of his kingdom by the Persians. Terentius was met, as he drew near the river Cyrus, by embaffadors from Aspacuras, whom the Persians had created king of Iberia, desiring, that he and his kinsman Sauromaces might reign jointly, fince he could neither refign, nor take part with the Romans, by reason his son was detained as an hostage in the Persian court. The emperor, being acquainted with his proposal, and willing to settle the affairs of Iberia without bloodshed, consented Iberia divided f to a partition of the country, affigning to Sauromaces that part which lay fouth of the into two kingriver Cyrus, and next to Armenia and Lazica, and the remainder, bordering upon "oms. Albania and Persia, to Aspacuras . This highly incensed Sapor, who loudly complained, that the Romans, contrary to the treaty of peace, had fent troops into Armenia, and, despising his embassy, had, without his knowledge or consent, divided Iberia. Being now refolved to make open war upon the Romans, he affembled his forces, concluded alliances with the neighbouring princes, and fpent the winter of this year 372. in vast preparations. However, he could not, it seems, put himself in a condition to act this year; for we do not find, that he attempted any thing, or even appeared in the field. As for Valens, he advanced to the banks of the Euphrates 2 and the Tigris; whence he returned in the latter end of autumn, without undertaking any thing which authors have thought worthy of notice. About this time a conspiracy was, it seems, formed against Valens, but seasonably discovered; and this is all we find in history concerning it. The following year Sapor fent a confiderable army towards the borders of the Roman empire, where they were met by Trajan, an officer of great experience, and Vadomarius, formerly king of the Alemans, at the head of a numerous and chosen body of troops. The Roman generals had orders not to attack the Persians the first, that the emperor might not be charged with a breach of the treaty; but the Persians falling upon them, they gained a complete victory. However, Valens readily consented to a truce; which was no sooner b concluded, than he returned to Antioch, and Sapor to Ctesiphon; for both princes had advanced as far as Mesopotamia, to support their respective generals b.

* Ammian. p. 353-355. y Idem ibid. * Idem, p. 355. THE MIST. orat. xi. p. 143-149. Vol. VI. Nº 5. appeared.

The Perfians defeated.

The constiracy

of Theodorus.

4170 is beheaded.

perions put to death.

THE following year, while Valens was passing the winter at Antioch, many of all ranks and conditions were accused of attempting to learn, by magical practices, and forbidden arts, the name of the person who was to succeed Valens in the empire. Some of them owned the crime laid to their charge, and declared, that Theodorus, the emperor's fecond fecretary, was the man whom the stars feemed to have destined to the empire. Theodorus was descended of an illustrious family in Gaul, or, as others will have it, in Sicily, endowed with extraordinary accomplishments, and in every respect worthy of the empire, if he had not had the ambition of aspiring at it, c and endeavouring to raife himself, by unlawful means, to that high station; for all authors agree, that he was privy to the execrable practices of the magicians. Ammianus, who, it feems, was then at Antioch, or at least in that neighbourhood, gives us a very particular and diffinct account of what passed on that occasion, which it would be too tedious to transcribe. Theodorus was found guilty, not only of magical practices, which were forbidden on pain of death, but of having conspired with others to take away the emperor's life; whereupon he was beheaded, as we read in Ammianus, whose authority is of more weight with us than that of Sozomen, who writes, that he was burnt alive. As Theodorus, and the others concerned in this conspiracy, were pagans, Libanius endeavours to extenuate their crime; pay, d he is not ashamed to tell us, that Theodorus was condemned unjustly, though both Zosimus 8 and Ammianus h own, that he aspired at the empire; that by his own letters he was convicted of treason; and that the emperor narrowly escaped being affaffinated. No one would have complained, if only Theodorus and his Many innocent accomplices had suffered; but innumerable innocent persons were, on that occasion, inhumanly racked, and afterwards either executed, or fent into banishment: a diligent fearch was made, not only after those who had been privy to the conspiracy, but after such as were only suspected of practising magic, or using magical remedies. Such numbers were daily accused and seized, that the public prisons could no longer contain them, and few of those who were apprehended, had the good luck to escape & death or banishment. Diogenes, formerly governor of Bithynia, was publicly executed; and Salia, treasurer of Thrace, sell down dead at the officer's feet who was to examine him, overcome, as was supposed, by an apprehension of the torture he was to undergo. Bassianus, whom some writers suppose to have been the son of Bassianus Casar, brother-in-law to Constantine the Great k, was saved by the powerful intercession of his relations, who were all persons of great distinction; but stript of his estate, and all his effects. The two brothers Eulebius and Hypatius, brothersin-law to Constantius, who had been consuls in 359. were accused of having aspired at the empire; and tho' the charge could not be proved, yet they were banished, and condemned to pay a great fine, but soon after recalled with great honour. f Eutropius, proconful of Afia, was accused of having been privy to the conspiracy of Theodorus; but the philosopher Pasiphilus, who was brought as an evidence against him, having suffered all the torments cruelty itself could invent, without laying any thing to his charge, he was dismissed, but deprived of his employment, which was given to Festus the historian, who discharged it for the space of five years with the utmost cruelty. Alypius, formerly vicar of Britain, and employed by

C AMMIAN. ibid. Sozom. l. vi. c. 35. f Liban. vit. p 69. 8 Zos. p. 74. am. I Ammian. l. xxix. p. 392. 8 Zos. p. 743.

81

1

is le

n,

ud

ged

om-

ooer b

nas

n d

pit.

74,

1.5

Ċer

Yely

it it, t

z all

1

8 113

n'd

mers

'n œi,

ed in

gay, C

oy his tiped

d bis

ω,

di-

acy,

úlő.

nger

Sape e

i cic

的輕

A GIL

r ion

Ti.

trpt

ners-

pired hed

godf. Í

TAT

Linc

17.

Chilling Chilling

if hist

rc. of

, c3

•

a Julian in rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, was accused with his son Hierocles, the disciple of Libanius, as a poisoner; the father was stript of his estate, and banished; and the fon condemned to death, but faved, as Ammianus writes, without explaining himself any farther, by a favourable accident. But the most rigorous inquiries were made after the pagan philosophers, who were, generally speaking, addicted to the study of magic. The most considerable among them were publicly executed, viz. Hilarius, who was burnt alive, Patricius, Andronicus, and Cæranius: Maximus, Miximus and the famous master of Julian, was carried to Antioch to be examined there, and after-other philippowards fent back to Epbesus, where Festus ordered his head to be cut off, tho' he to death. was then so ill, that he must have ended his life in a few days, without the interb vention of the executioner ". Zonaras writes, that the philosopher Iamblichus, by a draught of poison, prevented his falling into the emperor's hands. Valens expected, and greatly defired, to find Libanius in the number of the guilty; but nothing was alledged against him, though, as to magical practices, he was, as he himself owns, not free from all guilt; but as to the conspiracy of Theodorus, he solemnly protests, that he was altogether a stranger to it P. A diligent search was made, not only after magicians, but after all books treating of magic, which, where-ever discovered, were committed to the flames, with those in whose possession they were found. These inquiries extended to all the provinces subject to Valens; and from the most remote parts were daily brought to Antioch numbers of people to be tried as magicians, c because books of magic had been found in their custody. Amnianus tells us, that the officers themselves, out of spite or malice, often conveyed privately among the other writings, fome charm or inchantment; upon which the perfons, to whom they were supposed to belong, were immediately seized and condemned, and their estates confiscated. Hereupon persons of all ranks were seized with such dread and terror; that they burnt their libraries, lest, amongst their other books, any should be found unknown to them, treating of forbidden arts. On this occasion Festus, proconful of Festus practi-Afia, distinguished himself above the other ministers of the emperor's cruelty, tor-fes great cruturing with the utmost inhumanity, and putting to death, without distinction of sex, age, or condition, such as were convicted or only suspected of having used any kind d of charms or inchantments: he tortured the philosopher Caranius till he expired, for no other crime but because in a private letter to his wife he had used a proverbial expression, which looked like a charm: he put to death a woman for pretending to cure agues by a charm, tho' she had before been sent for, with his knowledge and confent, to cure his own daughter, and had been, as we are told, attended therein with fuccess: a young man being observed in a public bath to touch the marble with the fingers of both his hands, the one after the other, and then putting them to his breaft, to repeat the feven vowels, which he fancied was a prefent remedy against a pain in the stomach, Festus caused him to be immediately seized, tortured, and executed 1. At Antioch, a person being accused of having written a book of e magic, found an opportunity of throwing it into the river before he was apprehended: but this did not fave him; for though the book could not be produced against him, yet he was, after a short hearing, condemned and publicly executed. A few days after, St. Chrysoftom, who relates this, and was then a youth, going with a com- st. Chrysopanion to visit a church in the neighbourhood, found the book on the strand: his stomin danger. companion, not knowing what it contained, took it up, and, led by his curiofity, began to read it aloud, when they both perceived it was a book of magic, and at the fame time observed, not without dread and horror, a soldier at a small distance, fo that they neither dared tear it, nor throw it again, as they had defigned at first, into the river, lest the soldier should suspect and seize them. However, Chry-

f fostom's companion concealing the book with great care under his garments, they had both the good luck to escape without being searched, tho' every soldier was impowered to fearch all he met for books of magic and charms. Had the book been discovered, they must both have inevitably perished; but they found means of throwing it again into the river, without being observed r. Socrates writes, that an oracle having answered those, who came to inquire who should succeed Valens, that the first part of his name was Theod, the emperor, acquainted with that answer, caused not only Theodorus to be put to death, but all those whose names began with those letters, such as Theodulus, Theodotus, Theodosius, &c. among these was, according a to that writer, one Theodosiolus or Theodosius, a Spanish lord of great distinction. Ammianus and Zosimus give us a very minute account of the other cruelties of Valens, without taking the least notice of this, which makes us question the truth of what Socrates writes. Be that as it will, the extraordinary severity which Valens exerted on this occasion against magicians, aruspices, astrologers, and diviners of all denominations, is highly blamed, not only by the pagan, but even by the christian writers'. If Valens looked upon magic as a vain imagination, he ought not to have been thus alarmed; if he gave credit to their predictions, he could not, without being inconsistent with himself, strive to prevent their being accomplished: and truly, in spite of all his cruelties, he was succeeded by Theodosius, whose name began B with the letters, which, if Socrates is to be credited, he so much dreaded. This fire, to use the expression of Libanius v, continued raging till the emperor was diverted by another, which the Goths kindled three years after in Thrace. This year is likewife remarkable for the death of two princes, both treacherously murdered by the Romans, viz. of Gabinius, king of the Quadi, in the west; and of Paras, king of Armenia, in the east. Of the former we have spoken in the reign of Valentinian: as to the latter, he had in some degree submitted to the king of Persia, as we have observed above, but afterwards renewed, it feems, his alliance with the Romans, and was by them acknowledged king, fince Ammianus gives him that title; but feveral persons, at the head of whom was count Terentius, having transmitted to court disadvantageous c accounts of his conduct and administration, the emperor sent for him, as if he designed to advise with him about the prosecution of the Persian war. Upon his arrival at Paras, king of Tarjus in Cilicia, he was commanded to wait there till further orders; but being in the Armenia, mean time informed, that the emperor's design was to arrest him, and send another detained at to be king of Armenia in his stead, he resolved to make his escape, with the affist-Tarius. ance of three hundred of his own subjects, who persuaded him to it, and privately provided horses for that purpose. They set out in the dusk of the evening; but were He makes bis foon purfued and overtaken by a whole legion, fent on purpose to prevent their elcape. escape. At their approach, Paras faced about, and charged them with such resolution, that they made more hafte to fly from him, than they had done to overtake d him. After this he travelled night and day till he reached the Eupbrates, which he passed upon barrels joined together, and pursued his journey with extraordinary expedition. But in the mean time the emperor, having notice of his escape, dispatched a thousand archers, under the command of two principal officers, to bring him back. These being well acquainted with the country, to which Paras was altogether a stranger, getting through by-ways before him, divided their forces, and seized on two passes, three miles distant from each other, through one of which they took for granted he would pass. But being informed of his danger by a traveller, and conducted by him through by-paths and thick woods, he escaped the ambuscade, and got safe to his dominions, where he was received with inexpressible joy, while the Roman officers, who had long waited for him, were by all e derided and ridiculed upon their disappointment. This incensed them to such a degree against Paras, that, in order to hasten his ruin, they made the credulous

Is treacherously his house, during which he caused him to be barbarously murdered by a rustian hired murdited.

for that purpose w. The death of Paras gave great uneafiness to Safor, who had hoped to gain him over in the end to his interest. He was therefore no sooner informed of his misfortune, than he dispatched embassadors to Valens with proposals emperor believe, that the young prince was a famous magician, and knew how to consume and waste by degrees a man's body, though at never so great a distance. This so alarmed the emperor, that though Paras, forgetting the late affront, continued faithful to the Romans, yet his death was resolved on, and orders sent to Trajan, who commanded the Roman forces in Armenia, to dispatch him by private treachery, if he could not by open force. The manner which Trajan chose to put this base and inhuman command in execution, was no less base and inhuman, than the command itself; for he having gained the young prince's confidence, by fre-f quenting his table, and producing counterfeit letters from Valens, filled with the most tender expressions of kindness, prevailed upon him to accept of an entertainment at

<sup>5</sup> Socr. 1. iv. c. 15. p. 229. * Soz. 1. vi. c. 35. p. 694. Socr. 1. iv. c. 15. p. 229. * Lib. vit. p. 58. * AMMIAN. l. XXX. p. 412-415.

n'.

115,

hat

ted

10•

111

it to

with-

and

degan b

115

ened

- A

Ŗ,

n init

to the

iri

15 bj

18, 11

8:00 :

gaed

the

thee

Elt-

ely

acte

thair [5]0-

rakt j

W. L.

117 #

bring F25

Œ, ich

7 2

ped

nex-

[교

ü1

J.X

JF 10

βİL

lik i

(0

71[Ĉ

pu:

111

jie j

TH.

1

jrtđ

900

ŭŅ.

The remaining part of this year was spent in negotiations, a for an accommodation. but without success, the emperor, who was then at the head of a numerous and welldisciplined army, being desirous of retrieving the glory of the Roman arms, and recovering the provinces given up by the treaty with Jovian. But in the mean time, Thrace being threatened with a general invalion of the Gothish nation, he was obliged to conclude a peace with the Persians, but upon what terms we know not, The following year, 375. Valens was alarmed by an embaffy from the Goths, who being driven out of their own country by the Hunns, defired leave to fettle in Thrace. But before we speak of that embassy, and the memorable events attending it, we must take a cursory view of what happened in the west after the death of b Valentinian, who, as we have related already, died at Bregetio on the seventeenth of November of this year. He left two fons, viz. Gratian, born in 359. and by his Gratian fuefather created emperor on the twenty-fourth of August 367, and Valentinian born in ceeds his father Valentinian. 371. As Gratian was at a great distance from the army when his father died, having been left, as we have observed above, at Treves, the great officers of the court, uncertain what such an extraordinary and unexpected accident might produce, especially among the Gauls, who served in the army, and were then ravaging the country of the Quadi beyond the Danube, dispatched a messenger with private intelligence of the emperor's death to Merobaudes their leader, who thereupon fent immediately out of the way, pursuant to his instructions, count Sebastian, an officer greatly c beloved by the foldiery, and then marched back to the camp at Bregetio. Upon his arrival, it was resolved in a general council of all the chief officers both civil and military, that Valentinian, the fecond fon of the deceased emperor, then a child but four or five years old, should be declared emperor. He was therefore sent for without delay from a village, named Murocinela, about a hundred miles distant from Bregetio, and upon his arrival proclaimed emperor with the usual solemnity Valentinian II the fixth day after the death of his father. This step they took to prevent any proclaimed em sudden attack from the enemy, or mutiny in the army. They hoped, that Gratian, officers of the who was then but seventeen years old, and had already given proofs of an extraor-army.

dinary mild temper, and an uncommon understanding, would acquiesce to the mo-d tives, which had induced them to prefer his brother to the empire without his knowledge or consent. Gratian at first complained of their taking such an extraordinary step before they had made him privy to it, but immediately confirmed their election, Gratian conand ever after treated young Valentinian more like his child than his brother *. Victor y firms their and Zosimus will have Equitius and Merobaudes to have been the chief authors of election, this election, which by Rusinus is ascribed to Probus 2. Merobaudes was, according to Victor, related to young Valentinian, probably by marriage; for he feems, fo far as we can conjecture from his name, to have been a barbarian. The election being confirmed by Gratian, and foon after by Valens, the western provinces were divided between the two brothers: young Valentinian had for his share Italy, Illyricum, and e Africa; and Gratian, Gaul, Spain, and Britain. This division was made, not by Gratian, who was yet too young, as Zosimus pretends b, but by the great officers of the court. As they did not therein confult Valens, some misunderstanding arose between that prince and his nephews c. Notwithstanding this partition, Gratian alone governed the western provinces to his death, Valentinian not having been capable of acting on account of his age, so long as Gratian lived. The first thing Gratian did after the death of his father, and the promotion of his brother, was to recal to court his mother Severa, who had been divorced and banished by Valentinian, and restore her to her former honours d.

THE following year, 376. Valens was conful the fifth time, and young Valentinian f the first. This year Gratian, being informed of the unheard-of cruelties practifed by the famous Maximinus both in Italy and Gaul, caused him to be publicly executed; Maximinus and named one Antonius, prefect of Gaul, in his room. Simplicius, who had been and his accomvicar of Rome in 374. and Doryphorianus, who had succeeded him in that office, plices put to. underwent the same fate, being accused of the like crimes: the forther was beheaded in Illyricum, and the latter put to a cruel death, at the instigation of Severa, says Ammianus, in Gaul, whither he was conveyed from the Tullian prison in Rome.

ж Амміан. І. ххх. р. 433, 434. Zos. l. iv. р. 746. Socr. l. iv. с. 31. р. 249. У Zos. ibid. « Eunap. legat. р. 19. ех. р. 704. Амміан. І. ххvіії, р. 366. « Амміан. І. ххvіії, р. 357. Alex. p. 704. Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 366.

As these three cruel and bloody magistrates had, with the utmost injustice, put a a ius retires to his native

comstry.

great number of fenators to death, Gratian, by a declaration published this year, established the method of trying senators, which was read by Symmachus in the senate on the thirteenth of August 8. To the above-mentioned executions St. Jerom no doubt alluded, when he wrote, that this year feveral persons of distinction were executed . Maximinus, Simplicius, and Dorypborianus, had long deserved the doom The celebrated which at length overtook them, and died unlamented; but the death of the renowned count Theodo-count Theodofius, one of the greatest officers and best men of his age, is a stain on the character of Gratian never to be effaced. Of his glorious exploits in Britain and Africa, we have spoken at length in the reign of Valentinian; but notwithstanding the eminent services he had rendered the empire, he was this year by an order from court beheaded at Carthage, after he had triumphed over Firmus, and with his prudence and industry restored Africa to its former tranquillity. His death was owing, if St. Jerom', Orosiusk, and St. Ambrose, are to be credited, to the malicious suggestions of certain persons at court, who envying him the mighty reputation he had deservedly acquired, filled the young prince's mind with jealousies and suspicions, and by that means compassed the ruin of a person worthy both for his valour, and unblemished conduct, of the greatest honours the emperor could confer upon him. He was, at his earnest request, baptized just before he died; so that his death was no less exemplary, than his life had been glorious ". Socrates writes, as we have observed above, that, on occasion of the conspiracy of Theodorus, all those were by c Valens put to death, whose names began with Theod; and among the rest of the names one Theodofiolus, who was, fays he, a man of great courage, and descended from an illustrious family in Spain, meaning perhaps count Theodofius; at least Baronius ", Jornandes o, who for the most part follows Socrates, and Flechier, in his life of the emperor Theodosius, are of that opinion. But Theodosius was put to death at Carthage, and not in the east, where Valens reigned. Besides, we cannot help looking upon the whole account of Socrates as a fable, to which he too easily gave credit, fince neither Ammianus nor Zosimus, who seem to take particular pleasure in displaying the cruelties of Valens, make no mention of such a remarkable piece of cruelty as his putting several persons of distinction to death merely for the sake of their names. d Sozomen indeed speaks of it, but as of a thing that was reported, perhaps because he had read it in Socrates P. Be that as it will, statues, and other extraordinary honours, were decreed to Theodosius some years after his death by the senate of Rome; and several inscriptions, setting forth his virtues and exploits, have reached our Young Theodo- times 9. His son, named likewise Theodosius, who being duke of Massia in 374. had, with a courage and conduct above his years, defended that province against the incursions of the barbarians, as we have related above, was obliged to yield to the storm, and retire to Spain, his native country, where he lived in a kind of exile, till he was recalled by Gratian, and raised to the empire. As Ammianus takes no notice of these remarkable executions, we cannot help thinking there is a chasm in e this part of his history, the more because he had promised elsewhere to speak in a more proper place of the death of Maximinus and his accomplices, of which however no mention is made in such of his books as have reached us; nay, we find nothing in them relating to the western provinces, from the death of Valentinian I. that is, from the year 375. to 378. This year Valens fent the celebrated philosopher Themistius, with the character of embassador, to Gratian, then in Gaul; but what was the subject of his embassy, we know not. The philosopher, on his return to the east, came to Rome, complying therein with the request of Gratian, desiring the Romans might have the pleasure and honour of seeing so great a man. It was at Rome, and before the senate of that great metropolis, that Themistius pro- f nounced an oration altogether unworthy of a philosopher, nay, of any person who pretended to the least gravity'. However, he bestows great encomiums upon Gratian; extols his liberality, and generous temper; and observes, among other things, that the avaricious and cruel exactors of the old debts due to the exchequer were in the utmost confusion, because the instruments of their malice and cruelty had, by > f Cod. Theodos. p. 96. 8 Symm. l. x. ep. 2. p. 390, 391. h Hier. in chron. <sup>1</sup> Ambros, div. 3, p. 125. <sup>m</sup> Oros, ibid. <sup>n</sup> I

>
> ** Soz. 1. vi. c. 35, p. 694. <sup>q</sup> Vide Rein
>
> ** P. 366. ** Themist. or. xiii. p. 163—168. * Oros. l. vii. c. 33. p. 219. * BARON. 2d ann. 370. 6 Jor. de reg. fucc. c. 40. p. 652. P. S. p. 412. AMMIAN. l. XXVIII. p. 366. 9 Vide Rein. p. 326. Gruter. 163-168. Idem ibid. p. 178.

I III.

121

:ar,

the

êre

ied

on 113

ing

rom l

M-

rot,

lig.

thid ĊOS,

r, and

bia.

h 1825

1290 te by c

of the

dd

m.

life h at

ing

edit,

ying 17 25

manet, d

nant

day

(30)

ad out

3.4

gani 10

enle,

(5 DO

esk 🗈

100

ne foi

7.7

philoto e'; but return

ciring

ıi. It

z; pto- !

ion who

وتخذارون

i dias

THE WEST

ول المنظم

hia tine

der J. Gira

Jet in

imm :

a the prince's orders been confumed in the flames ", alluding, no doubt, to what we read in Ausonius, viz. that Gratian remitted whatever was due to the exchequer at the An instance of time of his father's death, and caused all the papers relating thereunto to be burnt Gratian's genethroughout the provinces that were subject to him w. Themistius writes, that he found rosing. Gratian not far from the ocean; that is, in Gaul; for he was, as appears from the dates of several laws, during the months of March, April, May and September, at Treves; and we have no proof of his being elsewhere this year. By a law dated from Treves the twenty-third of May, he raises the fularies of all public professors in the metropolitan cities of Gaul, especially in the most illustrious city of Treves, as it is styled v. From this law some pretend to infer, that Spain and Britain were at this b time governed, not by vicars, but proconfuls, independent of the prefect of Gaul. However that be, it is certain, that vicars were foon after re-established in both provinces. By another law dated the feventeenth of the fame month, which was an answer to Artemius vicar of Spain, and several bishops, the emperor declares, that religious matters ought to be judged and decided on the spot by a synod of the diocefe. By a diocefe is meant the district within the jurifdiction of a vicar. By a third law, addressed to Nitentius, Gratian forbids all heretics, especially the Donatists, to He enacts laws hold affemblies; and commands the places where they shall affemble to be confif-against herecated, except the churches, which he orders to be restored to the catholics 2. From 2115. feveral monuments of this year, it appears, that the emperor allowed more liberty to c the pagans, than to the Donatists, Arians, and other heretics. WHILE these things passed in the west, a dreadful storm was raised in the east by the Hunns, a nation till this time quite unknown to the Romans. They dwelt on the east side of the Palus Mæotis, now the sea of Zabache, and were near neighbours to the Goths, as Sozomen styles them a, or rather to the Alans, who inhabited the country bordering on the opposite side of that marsh, which both nations looked upon as a deep fea, and were therefore altogether unacquainted with each other, till a hind, purfued by some hunters, or, as others will have it, an ox stung by a gad-fly, having passed the marsh, some Hunns followed their guide to the opposite side, where they discovered a country far more agreeable and fruitful than their own b. What d we find concerning the Hunns in Ammianus Marcellinus, the most ancient author that speaks of them, and most worthy of credit, is, that they first broke into the country of the Alans, who dwelt on the banks of the Tanais, the boundary between Europe and Asia; and having obliged that nation to enter into an alliance with them, they fell, thus re-enforced, upon the Goths, called by Ammianus, Greuthongi, and by for- The Goths nandes, Oftrogoths, and spread every-where such terror among them, that Ermenric, driven out of or, as fornandes calls him, Ermanaric, their king, the' a martial prince, laid vio-their country lent hands on himself, to avoid by that means the dreadful calamities that threatened by the Hunns. The Hunns were headed, according to Jornandes, by one Balamir, by him styled king, probably because he was the most powerful man of their nation; for, e according to Ammianus, they had no kings, but several chiefs, whose authority was very precarious. Vithimir, created king of the Greuthongi or Oftrogoths, in the room of Ermenric, attempted to make head against the Hunns; but was killed in a battle. Alatheus and Saphrax, governors to his son Vitheric, apprehending all their efforts would prove unsuccessful against the numerous and formidable forces of the enemy, abandoned the country, and withdrew into the plains between the Borystbenes and the Danube; that is, into the present Podelia. Athaniric, king or chief of the Thervingi, who had affisted Procopius in his late usurpation, resolved to stand upon his guard, and prepared for a vigorous defence; but the Hunns, falling upon him before he had the least notice of their approach, obliged him to retire in disorder, after he had lost f great numbers of his men. As the enemy, overloaded with booty, purfued him but flowly, he improved the fhort respite they allowed him, in fortifying himself by a wall, which he carried through the country of the Taifali from the Gerasus, or the Pruth, to the Danube d. The other Goths, who had the good luck to escape the dreadful havock which the Hunns made of their nation, found no other resource, but to abandon their country, and fave themselves within the Roman dominions. They therefore approached the banks of the Danube, to the number of two hundred thouland

W Auson. 2d Grat. proconf. p. 406, 407. * Thi <sup>8</sup> Idem ibid. p. 175. w Auson. ad Grat. Y Cod. Theod. l. xiii. tit. 3. leg. 11. p. 39, 40. p. 696. b Jorn. rer. Goth. p. 644. * Themist. orat. xiii. p. 163. 225. * Soz. l. vi. c. 37. p. 696. b Jorn. r d Ammian. p. 440, 441. c Ammian 1. xxxi. p. 435-440. John. ibid. p. 645.

men, most of them the subjects of king Athanaric, and those whom Jornandes calls a

They demand to Visigoths. From thence they dispatched embassadors to Valens, who was then at Anbe admitted in- tioch, begging, in a most submissive manner, to be admitted into Thrace, where they promised to live peaceably, and to serve, whenever called upon, in the Roman armies c. At the head of this embaffy was their bishop Ulphilas, who, on this occafion, out of complaifance to Valens, became a profelyte to the doctrine of Arius, and infected with the tenets of that herefiarch, not only such of his nation as already professed the christian religion, but those too who promised to embrace it, provided proper persons were sent to instruct them f. The demand of the Goths occasioned great debates in a grand council held at court foon after the arrival of their embaffa- b dors; but Valens in the end resolved to grant them their request, several sycophants

plies with their about him flattering him, and extolling his good fortune, which had unexpectedly request.

brought him a perpetual supply of excellent soldiers, with which he could be furnished at his pleasure, and by that means save the expence of new levies, to the great benefit of his treasury; nay, their demand was thought so advantageous to the empire, that some Roman officers having cut off a party of Goths, who attempted to pass the Danube before the return of the embassadors, whom both their nation and the governor of Thrace had fent to Antioch, they were cashiered as good officers, but bad politicians e. Valens, upon the imaginary prospect of the great advantages that would accrue to the empire from such an increase of people, ordered them to be immediately transported, to be plentifully supplied with provisions, and lands to be affigned c them to cultivate. He took however therein such precautions, as would perhaps have prevented the disturbances which soon followed, had they been duly observed; for, according to the inftructions which he fent to his officers and minifters, the children were to pass the first, and be sent into Asia, where they were to be kept as hostages; and as for the rest, they were not to be suffered to land on the Roman side, till they had quitted their arms. But the heads of the nation, by presenting the Roman officers with sums of money, with beautiful women, and robust slaves, prevailed upon them to neglect both these orders ". Thus the Goths, in this year 376. They enter Thrace. abandoned to the Hunns the country, in which they had dwelt for the space of one hundred and fifty years. We are told, that great numbers of them were drowned d in their passage, the river happening to be greatly swelled at that time . Ammianus writes, that the Roman officers defigned to have counted them as they passed, but could not, by reason of their numbers, which that writer compares to the sparks which at that very time iffued out of mount Æina, and to the fands of the Lybian shore.

They were under the conduct of Alavivus and Fritigern, who are styled kingsk. Vitheric, king of the Greuthongi, with his governors Saphrax and Alatheus, and another chief named Farnobius, being likewise driven out of their country by the Hunns and the Alans, flocked in swarms to the hanks of the Danube, and, encouraged by the reception which their countrymen had met with from Valens, dispatched embassadors e to him, begging, that they too might be admitted within the Roman dominions; but the emperor not thinking it confiltent with the fafety of the state to comply with their request, they continued for some time on the banks of the Danube, which they passed in the end, in spite of the Romans, as we shall relate hereaster. As for Alba-naric, he retired with his people to a place defended by inaccessible rocks, named Caucalanda, having driven from thence the Sarmatians and the Taifali. The latter people followed and joined the Greuthongi. A numerous body of Goths had been admitted some time before, on what occasion we are no-where told, and were at this time encamped in the neighbourhood of Adrianople, under the command of their two chiefs Suerid and Colias: perhaps Valens had fent for them on occasion of his t intended expedition into Persia; for Ammianus assures us, that he hired troops of the Goths 1. The following year 377. when Gratian was conful the fourth time, with Merobaudes, Valens was, as appears from the dates of several laws, at Antioch on the fourth of April; at Hierapolis on the fourth of July and the ninth of August; and again at Antioch on the twenty-fourth of September. The Romans ought in policy to have immediately led the Goths away from the Danube; for by that means they would have got them into their power, and, remaining masters of the river, prevented their receiving any affiftance from their countrymen, encamped in great num-

e Idem ibid. JORN. C. 25. p. 646. legat. p. 19. Sock. l. iv. c. 34. p. 252. 1 Idem, l. xxx. p. 416.

f Soz. l. vi. c. 37. p. 697.

8 Ammian. ibid. Eunap.

h Ammian. ibid.

1 Idat. fast.

k Ammian. p. 443.

ŀ b

2

ď.

ed t

j,

ŀ

Ŀ,

je

ne-

6.

000

sued f

, W

100 but

D251.

d III

Esti

s the

incors c

, čľúr

if with

泊湖

05 .5.53

, catal

I LICE

id been

here M

i littl

of his f

a of the r, with

back

15 18d

a polity

in the s

iti, pre

CAL DICTO

j. Ersil

正序料

a bers on the opposite bank; but, instead of that, Lupicinus and Maximus, who commanded in Thrace, the former with the title of count, and the latter with that of duke, fuffered them to continue long in that neighbourhood, pretending scarcity of provifions, in order to impose upon them, and oblige them to buy necessaries at extravagant rates. The Goths, thus pinched with hunger, and provoked by other outrages, began to mutiny; which Lupicinus perceiving, he ordered them to begin their march, The Goths, and remove from the neighbourhood of the Danube, charging the foldiers who guarded provoked by the the banks of the Danube, to drive them on, and take care that they committed no dif-Romans, muorders in the countries through which they passed. The Greuthongi, finding the tiny. banks of the river unguarded, laid hold of that opportunity to pass it, sollowing at b some distance Fritigern and Ablavivus, who were advancing at the head of the Thervingi to Marcianopolis, the capital of Lower Mæsia. Upon their arrival in the neighbourhood of that city, Lupicinus, who resided there, invited the two chiefs to a banquet; but at the same time placed guards at the gates, to prevent their troops from entering the city, tho' they defired to be admitted as friends, only to buy the necesfary provisions, of which they stood in great need. Hereupon the Thervingi, who were in a starving condition, falling upon the guards, cut most of them in pieces; which Lupicinus no sooner heard, than, by way of retaliation, he commanded the attendants of the two chiefs to be affaffinated in the height of their mirth. The Thervingi without the walls, provoked at the treachery and cruelty of the governor, c vowed revenge; but nevertheless wisely forbore for the present all hostilities, and dissembled their just resentment, lest the Romans should offer any affront to their chiefs, or detain them as hostages. This Fritigern himself apprehended, and theretore begged leave of Lupicinus to go with Ablavivus, and shew himself to his men, who were ready to mutiny, upon a false report, that they had both been killed with the rest. Lupicinus, who by this time was so intoxicated with wine, that he knew not what he did, complied with his request; and the two chiefs, being received with great joy by their countrymen, immediately mounted their horses, declared them- Declarethemselves enemies, and began to plunder the open country. Lupicinus marched out selves enemies, against them the next day, with the few troops he had with him; but the Golbs, and plun d falling upon him with great resolution and intrepidity, cut most of his men in pieces, and obliged him to fly back into the city. We have observed above, that a considerable body of Goths was encamped in the neighbourhood of Adrianople. These, upon the news of the revolt, and the victory gained by Fritigern, continued quiet in their camp, without betraying the least inclination to join him; but when they received orders to pass without delay over into the Hellespont, and the chief magistrate of Adrianople, incensed against them for some damage they had done at his countryseat, instead of supplying them with the necessary provisions for their march, ordered the people of the country to fall upon them, they likewise began to mutiny, put to flight the disorderly multitude that offered to attack them, and joining Fritigern, They are joine e laid siege to Adrianople; but not being able to reduce it, they left a sufficient force by a body of to block it up, and ravaged all Thrace, growing daily stronger by the accession their country. of incredible numbers of Gothish flaves, flocking to them from all quarters; nay, men encamped many Romans, not able to pay the exorbitant taxes with which they were loaded and oppressed, took part with them, and it is not to be doubted but Vitheric with his Greuthongi joined them soon after; for they too sought against the Romans in the memorable battle of Adrianople, of which hereafter. Valens, who was then at Antioch, watching the designs of the king of Persia, upon the first notice of these dangerous commotions, dispatched Vidor to the Persian court, with the character of embassador, charging him to conclude a peace with that king, upon the best terms he f could obtain; and at the fame time ordered the two generals, Trajan and Profuturus, to march with the utmost expedition against the Golps, at the head of the legions that were quartered in Armenia. Gratian, alarmed at the danger that threatened his uncle's dominions, fent to his affiftance Richomeres, with a confiderable reinforcement out of Gaul; but the foldiers deserted in great numbers on their march, solicited to it, as was reported, by Merobaudes, who apprehended the barbarians might take advantage of their ablence to break into Gaul. As Profuturus and Trajan were commanders of more courage than conduct, instead of securing the passes, and shutting up such multitudes in the province of Thrace, where they must inevitably have foon perished with famine, they ventured to engage them at Salices, a city of Leffer Scy- The battle of thia. The battle lasted from morning to night, both armies fighting with such obsti-Salices. Vol. VI. Nos. 5 E hacy and resolution, as can hardly be expressed. Victory continued doubtful to the a

The Romans to the Goths.

ed with great flaughter by Frigerid.

Gratian grants feveral ex. mptions to the clergy.

The Goths block up Con-Stantinople. for that city.

Trajan reproaches the emberor with great freedom.

last; but the Romans having, lost more men in proportion to the small number of their forces, thought it adviteable to retire to Marcianopolis. Thus Ammianus, whom we have all along followed m. But Theodoret n, St. Jerom n, and Orosius p, write, that the Romans were deseated, and put to flight. This battle was sought in the latter end of the summer of this year 377. Trajan and Profuturus, being afterwards reinforced by a considerable body of troops sent by Valens, under the command of Saturninus general of the horse, they attempted to shut up the enemy in certain narrow places, and intercept their provisions; but the Alans and Hunns themselves hastening in great numbers to their relief, the Romans were obliged to retire, and suffer bandon Thrace them to ravage and lay waste all Thrace, without daring to oppose or molest them. b At a place called Dibaltum, they fell upon a tribune, who was stationed there with his own legion, and some other forces. As the tribune, by name Barzimeres, was an old experienced officer, he drew his men up in a close body, and, endeavouring to make his way through the enemy's squadrons, cut great numbers of them in pieces; They cut off a but was at length overpowered, and put to the fword, with all his men q. Ani-Roman leg on; mated with this fuccess, they went in quest of Frigeria, who commanded in Illyricum, and had been ordered by Gratian to march from thence to the affistance of Valens. The Goths, under the command of Farnobius, met him near Berea, a city in Thrace properly so called, and attacked him with great resolution. But Frigerid, who was an officer of great experience, tho' perhaps over-cautious, and thence by c fome reproached with timorousness, stood his ground, and, after a long and obsti-But are defeat- nate dispute, killed their leader on the spot, and put the rest to the sword, excepting a very small number, who, throwing down their arms, were spared, and sent captives into Italy, where they were employed in tilling the ground about Mutina, Rbegium, and Parma. With this battle, which was fought in the latter end of the autumn, ended the campaign of this year 377 r. As for Gratian, he was on the twenty-seventh of February at Treves, where he had passed the winter, and on the twenty-eighth of July at Mayence, perhaps on some expedition against the Germans not mentioned in history; for Ausonius tells us, that he took some Germans prisoners, and brought them with him into Gaul's. He was d returned to Treves on the seventeenth of September. By a law dated the fifth of March, and addressed to Cataphronus vicar of Italy, he grants several exemptions to the clergy, comprising under that name, not only bishops, priests and deacons, but likewise sub-deacons, exorcists, readers, and janitors or door-keepers u. A dreadful plague raged this year in most of the western provinces, and swept off incredible numbers of people w. The following year 378. when Valens was conful the fixth time, and young Valentinian the fecond, the Goths, from Thrace, advanced into Macedon and The state, committing every-where dreadful ravages; nay, they approached Constantinople itself, plundered the suburbs, and kept the city for some time blocked up. Valens therefore, having first sent a body of Saracens to drive them from the neigh-Valens fers out bourhood of that metropolis, fet out from Antioch, in order to head his army in perfon, and arrived at Constantinople on the thirtieth of May, where he found the people highly diffatisfied with his conduct, in admitting the Goths into Thrace, and by that means giving rife to the present war. Soon after his arrival, he displaced Trajan general of the foot, and put count Sebastian, a brave and experienced commander, in his room . Theodoret tells us, that Trajan, who was a professed enemy to the Arians, and a zealous defender of the Nicene faith, hearing himfelf reproached by the emperor with cowardice, as if the loss of the late battle had been owing to want of courage in him, answered boldly, that heaven, justly provoked at his driving out the orthodox bishops, and putting the infamous followers of Arius in their room, had declared f for the Goths; and consequently that he ought to blame not his generals, but himself, for the losses he had hitherto sustained, and for the far greater calamities that would foon overtake him, unless he altered his conduct. The generals Arintheus and Vistor declared, adds Theodoret, that they were of the same opinion, and begged the emperor not to refent their speaking, as his true friends, their fentiments without disguise y. The piety of Trajan is greatly commended by the ecclefiaftic writers, especially by

m Ammian. p. 447—449.

n Theodor. l. iv. c. 30. p. 703.

l. vii. c. 33. p. 219.

q Ammian. p. 452.

Todd. Theod. chron. p. 97, 98.

Cod. Theod. chron. p. 97, 98.

Cod. Theod. chron. p. 97, 98.

Ammian. p. 458.

Theodore. l. iv. c. 30. p. 703.

Theodore. l. iv. c. 30. p. 703.

Theodore:

BOOK beful to the e l number of anus, whom ui, write, ght in the Safterwards command of n certain natnkiveshaftenre, and hotter molest them. ed there with arzimeres, was ideavouring to hem in piers ; men 4. Anianded in Eyis he affithance of Berea, a city in But Frigeria, and thence by c long and obliword, excepting t, ant lien cap-Mars, Roecer and of the , where he had perhaps on lome ias teils us, that Garla. He was I ated the fifth of al exemptions so and deacons, but si. Adrestid increasible nomthe first time, 10 Marie 19d madad Captare ne blocked up. from the neight: ng a my in pafound the people race, and by that displaced from d commender, in ng to the Aries, ed by the empeo mari: of courage g out the orthoon, had declared i erals, bu himfel mities that would inidery and little negged the emperithout distant

rs, especially by

chroni CHONI CONTRA P ANBR. 18 LEC. III.

AXBR. 20 124 2. 32. P. 124 Total 14

Chap. 27.

a Theodoret and St. Bafil, with whom he lived in great intimacy. But it is no eafy task to reconcile with his extraordinary piety the death of Paras king of Armenia, whom, it the account of Ammianus be true, he caused to be murdered with the utmost treachery and barbarity, as we have related above. Valens continued but a very short time at Constantinople; for he left that city on the eleventh of June, highly exasperated against the inhabitants, who had insulted him as the author of the prefent war, and threatening, if he came back fafe, to turn their city into a defert . From Constantinople he marched to Melanthias, an imperial castle, about eighteen Valensmarches miles distant from the city; and thence detached Sebastian with a body of chosen against the troops against Fritigern, who was encamped in the neighbourhood of Adrianople. b Sebastian, coming upon the enemy unawares, cut off feveral of their parties, who were roving about the country, without the least apprehension of danger, and recovered the booty with which they were loaded. Hereupon Fritigern, having fent orders to all the parties that were dispersed about the country, to join him without delay, retired upon their arrival to the city of Catyle, of which geographers can give no account a. Zosimus tells us, that Sebastian engaged to force the Goths either to quit the Roman territories, or submit to Valens, with two thousand men only, by cutting off their parties, and intercepting their provisions; but that Valens, defirous to equal, by some memorable action, the glory acquired this year by Gratian in the samous battle of Argentaria, rejected his proposal, and leaving Melanthias, advanced to the neighc bourhood of Adrianople, with a defign to give the enemy battle. He was at the head of a very numerous and well-disciplined army, commanded by officers of great renown, and among the rest by Trajan, whom he had restored to his former post. While he lay at Adrianople, Richomeres arrived there with letters from Gratian, acquainting him, that he was on full march with his victorious army to join him, and earnestly intreat- Gratian ing him not to hazard a battle till his arrival, nor make that victory doubtful, which marches to the the conjunction of their forces would render certian and indisputable. Hereupon a affiliance of Valens. council of war being immediately fummoned, Vistor, who commanded the horse, and was both a brave and prudent officer, advised him by all means to wait the arrival of his nephew, and the reinforcement of the Gaulish troops; but Sebastian was d for giving battle without delay; and his opinion the emperor preferred to that of Vistor, and almost all the other officers, being induced thereunto by his flatterers, telling him, that he stood in no need of the assistance of his nephew, and therefore ought not to allow him any share in the victory, and the glory attending it. At the same time Fritigern sent deputies to him, at the head of whom was a christian priest, offering to conclude a peace upon very reasonable terms, which most of his officers advifed him by all means to embrace, remonstrating, that an honourable and certain peace was preferable to an uncertain victory; but he, deaf to all their remonstrances, and obstinately bent upon engaging before the arrival of his nephew, leaving the great But Valens reofficers of the court, with his treasures, in Adrianople, and all the baggage of the folvesto give battle before bir e army near that city, with a strong detachment to guard it, set out with the rest in arrival. quest of the enemy, whom he discovered about noon in the neighbourhood of Nice, about fifteen miles from Adrianople. The Goths, commanded by Aletheus and Saphrax, were encamped at a confiderable distance from the rest. Messengers were therefore immediately dispatched to them; and in the mean time, to amuse the emperor till they arrived, embassadors were fent to him, with proposals of peace, to which the emperor gave ear; but infifted upon their delivering up to him some of their chief men as hostages. At the same time Fritigern, further to amuse the emperor, acquainted him by a private letter, that he was ready to bring all his forces over to him, provided fome persons of distinction were sent to him as hostages. Valens, overjoyed at f this proposal, named first Equico his kinsman for one of the hostages; but he, as he had been taken prisoner by the Goths the preceding year, and had made his escape, begging to be excused, Richomeres offered himself of his own accord; but, before he reached the enemy's camp, Bacurius, prince of the Iberians, and one Cassio, who commanded a party of archers, falling upon the Goths, gave beginning to the battle, The battle of which was fought with great obstinacy and resolution on both sides. Ammianus gives Adrianople. us a long but confused account of this memorable engagement. According to him, the foot in the left wing of the Romans, having advanced too far, and separated themselves from the main body of the army, and from the cavalry that was to sup-

* Ammian. l. iii. p. 456. Soor. l. iv. c. 38. p. 255. * Vide Band p. 142.

The Romans utterly defeat-

The death of Valens variously related.

Said to have been portended aigies.

port them, were furrounded by the enemy, which inspired the barbarians with great a courage b. St. Jerom and Socrates write, that the foot was abandoned by the cavalry; and Sozomen e, that Valens, being in too great hafte to engage, did not allow himself time to draw up his men as he ought. Libanius says, that he sought with more courage than prudence or conduct f. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the Romans were utterly defeated; that two thirds of their army were cut in pieces, and the rest forced to save themselves by a precipitous and disorderly slight. The Roman writers themselves own this to have been the greatest overthrow their state had ever received fince the battle of Cannæ. Their foot did all that men, whose native courage was emboldened by despair, could do; but were in the end overpowered with numbers, and obliged, in spite of their utmost efforts, to yield to an b enemy, who was not only infinitely superior to them in numbers, but equalled them in courage and bravery. Among many other eminent persons, fell in this action the brave generals Trajan and Victor, with Valerian the tribunus stabuli, or master of the horse; Equico the emperor's kinsman, and magister palatii, or great steward of the houshold; and Potentius, a youth of extraordinary hopes, and by all greatly respected, in regard of his father Ursicinus, so famous in the reign of Constantius 8. But nothing has rendered this battle more memorable in history, than the unhappy end of Valens himself, who perished on this occasion, as all authors agree, tho' they differ in their accounts of his death; for some write, that he was killed upon the spot; and others, that being wounded in the field, and not in a condition to fly, he was carried to a c countryman's house, which his attendants made good against the barbarians, till they, not suspecting the emperor to be there, set fire to it, which consumed the house, and all who were in it, except a youth, who having made his escape, first out of the flames, and afterwards from the enemy, who had taken him prisoner, gave the Romans an account of the emperor's unhappy end . Both these opinions are related by Ammianus; and the former was adopted by Libanius, as more proper for a panegyric; but the latter, which is generally thought the most probable, by Victor i, St. Jerom k, Rufinus , Orofius m, Zosimus n, and Socrates . Sozomen P and Philostorgius 4 follow the same opinion; but add some circumstances, which seem quite improbable. St. Chrysostom speaks of the death of Valens perishing in the slames, as a memorable instance of the vanity of all human grandeur r. Theodoret follows the fame opinion; but was certainly mistaken in supposing Valens not to have been prefent at the battle's. Ammianus observes, that before Valens lest Antioch, it was become a common curse or imprecation among the inhabitants of that metropolis, May Valens be burnt alive. The fame writer pretends that unhappy end to have been porby several pro. tended by several prodigies, as a punishment inslicted upon him by heaven, for having caused Paras king of Armenia to be inhumanly murdered, and for putting many innocent persons to death, on occasion of the conspiracy of Theodorust. The reader will find in Zosimus the description of a spectre, which, says he, was seen by Valens, and all his court, when he marched out of Constantinople against the Goths ". To this e perhaps Ammianus alludes in a passage, which seems to us very obscure w. Theophanes takes notice of some other prodigies, and affures us, that some of the emperor's officers owned after his death, that he had suffered the aruspices to be consulted concerning the iffue of this war x. Ammianus, and other writers, tell us, that near the place where the emperor died, was discovered, agreeable to a pretended prediction, the tomb of an ancient Macedonian captain, by name Mimantus . All authors agree, that neither his body, nor the least remains of it, were ever found; and that his memory was honoured by no funeral obsequies. Ecclesiastic writers look upon his death as a judgment from heaven, for his perfecuting with great cruelty the catholics, and his encouraging the herefy of Arius, which flourished and increased in his reign, more t than it had done under any of his predecessors. With him perished in the slames, according to the modern Greeks, his great chamberlain, a zealous patron of the Arians, and an avowed enemy to the orthodox believers 2. Such was the end of Valens, after he had lived about fifty years, and reigned fifteen, four months, and > b Ammian. p. 460—462. 703. f Lib. vit. p. 58. d Socr. l. iv. c. 38, p. 255. c Soz h Idem, p. 462. i Vict. epit. e HIER. in chron. e Soz. l. vi. c. 40. * Ammian. p. 463. h Idem, p. 462. Vict. ep 4. m Oros. l. vii. c. 33. p. 219. n Zos. p. 750. HIER. 1 Ruf. l. ii. c. 13. p. 184. O Soca. chron.

> 1. iv. c. 38. p. 255. P. Soz. l. vi. c. 40. p. 705.
> ad vid. p. 464. Theod. l. iv. p. 704. Ammian. p. 435. Zos. i. iv. p. 700.
> b. 435. Theoph. p. 55. Ammian. p. 465. Zonar. p. 27. Cedren. p. 314. P Soz.l. vi. c. 40. p. 703. PHILOST.L. ix. c. 17. p. 131, 132. EOD. l. iv. p. 704. AMMIAN. p. 425. Zos. l. iv. p. 748. r CHRYS. w Ammian. 2 Menas

fome

K III

great a

the

aghr

thic

cces,

The

late

viole.

over-

to an b

tien

on the

Of the

of the petied,

0:L:2g

Time

o their

others, ed to a c

s, oli

houle,

of the t Ro- ared

int-

'n,

107

mpro-5, 35 2 i

us the

o pre-

econi.

; V2

o por-

127-

many

eadel

i.Mig

othis c

njis.

e or's

d con-

ai ibe o, ibe

dit

mory

25 2

d his

more f

ames, of the end of

, 10d

t Hite Socia Central Sucial

MII.

j,

a some days . He was quite a stranger to every branch of literature, and no better His charafter. acquainted with the military art, than with the liberal sciences. He did not so much as understand the Greek tongue, tho' he had reigned so many years in the east among the Greeks. He found out no expedients of himself; but, when they were proposed by others, he had discernment enough to know which was the best and most proper b. He was naturally indolent and inactive, an enemy to all labour, and averse to business, which was owing to the easy life he had led, free from trouble, till he was created emperor. He was timorous to a great degree, and unwilling to expose himself to any danger. To this disposition most authors ascribe the extraordinary deference which he ever paid to his brother Valentinian c. Themistius commends his b chastity d; and Ammianus, a writer no-ways biassed in his favour, does not reproach him with any kind of lewdness or debauchery. He was constant and faithful in his friendship, whereof several instances are related by Ammianus. He raised such only of his relations as were persons of merit, and, generally speaking, had regard to nothing but merit in the disposal of employments. He kept a watchful eye over his ministers, exacted the military discipline with great rigour, not suffering his soldiers to do the least injury to those through whose countries they marched, and shewed himself on all occasions ready to hearken to the complaints of his injured subjects s. He seems to have discharged the foreign guards, who had been employed by other princes as the ministers of their cruelty. He was thoroughly acquainted with c the state of his finances, and therefore did not suffer himself to be imposed upon, as most of his predecessors had done, by those who managed them '. Tho' he was quite unacquainted with the liberal sciences, yet he is said to have composed some speeches, with the affiftance of one Heliodorus, a man of a mean descent, and infamous character, as we read in Ammianus, who complains of the emperor, for obliging persons of the first rank to attend his funeral k. Themistius styles him the father of the provinces, by reason of the great care he took in easing them, by all possible means, of the heavy taxes with which they had been loaded by his predecessors. Ammianus owns, that he could not with more care confult the good of his own family, than he did the welfare of all his subjects; and that the eastern provinces had been under no prince d happier than under him m. However, all authors agree, that he had a strong biass to avarice and cruelty, which, joined to his jealous and suspicious temper, prompted him often to condemn innocent persons, and seize on their estates. The least suspicion of treason rendered him inexorable, says Ammianus, and his ears were open to all manner of accusations ". All the ecclesiastic writers agree, that he allowed to the many sects that then prevailed, nay, even to the Jews and pagans, the free exercise of their religion; but persecuted the catholics with the utmost cruelty, of which we have feen one remarkable instance in the history of his reign; and the reader may find many others in the above-mentioned writers. He left two daughters behind him, Carosa and Anastasia; but all we know of them is, that Procopius, who became e famous in the latter end of the reign of Theodosius, married one of them, he being styled by Zosimus o and Sozomen P, the son-in-law of Valens. What became of the empreis Albia Dominica, after the death of her husband, we are no-where told. St. Chryjojtom, writing about the year 381. observes, that the widow of an emperor, who had been banished by another prince, was then recalled by the mediation of many per-sons of distinction, who with much-ado obtained that favour?. Most writers take the empress, of whom he speaks in that place, to have been the widow of the emperor Valens. But as to the cause of her disgrace and misfortune, we are quite in the dark. With the death of Valens, Ammianus Marcellinus ends his history; but of him, and Eutropius, who wrote his abridgment of the Roman history in the reign of Valens, and

f by that prince's command, we shall speak in note (K).

(K) Ammianus Marcellinus was a native of Antioch, where his family made some figure (1). He terved several years in the army, from the year 350. to 359, under count Ursicinus, partly in Mesopotamia, and partly in Gaul, in quality of domesticus, which was then an honourable post. He attended Julian

Gaul.

in his Persian expedition, and was at Antioch, or in that neighbourhood, when the conspiracy of Theodorus was discovered in the reign of Valens (2). Afterwards he renounced the profession of arms, and retired to Rome, where he wrote his history, as appears both from the history itself (3), and from a letter which Libanius wrote to him from Antioch (4), while he was composing it. His twentyfixth book was not ended before the year 390, and the twenty-second was written the year before (5). His work was divided into thirty-one books, and comprised the reigns of all the emperors, from Domitian, where Suetonius ends, to the death of Valens; but of his thirty-one books, only the last eighteen, beginning after the death of Magnentius in 353. have reached our times. Tho' he was a Greek, he chose to write in Latin; but his Latin, in the opinion of Vossius, speaks him both a Greek and a foldier (6). But his other good qualities make fufficient amends, says the same writer, for these faults; for he writes with great judgment, and feems to have been a great lover of truth (7). However, he plainly betrays a great zeal for the religion of the ancient Romans, and no small partiality for those who countenanced it, especially for his hero Julian. In his history, he frequently makes long and tedious digressions on the comets, and other things, which fall not within the province of an historian. In his accounts he is now-and-then somewhat confused, and often leaves out the most material circumstances of the facts he relates, which has induced some to believe, that his history is in feveral places maimed and imperfect. But, after all, without his history, we should have been quite in the dark with respect to the most remarkable transactions of those times. Some epigrams by one Ammianus have reached our times; but whether they were the work of the historian, is altogether uncertain. The reader will find feveral things relating to Ammianus, and his history, in the prolegomena, which Mr. Valois has prefixed to the last edition of the works of that historian at Paris in 1681. Entropius wrote his abridgment of the Roman hiftory in the reign of Valentinian and Valens, and inicribed it to the latter, having undertaken it at his request. He gives that prince the title of Gothicus, a plain proof that he published his work after the year 369. in which Valens defeated Athanaric, one of the kings or chiefs of the Goths. Mr. Valois styles him a polite and elegant writer; but Vinetus, who published his works in 1553. concludes from his style, that he was not a Roman, but a Greek (8). Vossius too finds fault with his style; but, upon the whole, commends his work, as an abridgment of the Roman history done with great judgment (9). He is often copied by St. Ferom in his chronicle, and quoted by other Laim writers. His work feems to have been in great request among the Greeks; for two translations of it were done into that language, the one by Paanius, and the other by Capito. The latter, who was by birth a Lycian, not only translated into Greek the abridgment of Livy, fays Suidas, done by Eutropius, but wrote besides the history of Isauria in eight books, and likewise that of Lycia and Pamphylia. The translation of Eutropius by Pannius, was published among the other Augustin writers by Sylburgius at Franc-fors in 1590. Sylburgius is of opinion, that Paanius was contemporary with Entropius. However that be, it is certain, that he often deviates both from the meaning of the original, and the truth of history (10). As for Eutropius himself, Suidas styles him an Italian sophist; and adds, that he published several other works (11). From his works it does not appear, whether he professed the christian religion, or no. He was present, according to Codin, at the laying the foundations of Constantinople, and left behind him an account of the origin of that city (12). If what that author writes be true, Entropius must have been very young at that time. He attended Julian in his expedition into Persia (13). He seems to have been of the senatorial order; for, at the head of his work, he is distinguished with the title of clarissimus, which was peculiar to sena-tors. In the reign of Valentinian, and before the year 376. died, according to St. Ferom, Aquilius, or Acilius Severus, a native of Spain, who wrote the history of his own life in prose and verse, under the title of catastrophe. He was descended from another Severus, to whom Lactantius inscribed two books of his letters. St. Jerom places him among the ecclesiastic writers (14); but his work has been long

(2) Idem, l. xxix. p. 387. (3) Idem, l. xxxi. p. 469. (4) Ammian. vit. p. 4—8. (5) Idem, p. 8, 9. (6) Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 9. p. 201. (7) Idem ibid. (8) Eutrop. p. 557. (9) Voss. hist. Lat. c. 8. p. 198. (10) Eutrop. Grac. p. 63. (11) Suid. p. 1099. (12) Codin. antiq. Constantinop. p. 17. (13) Eutrop. p. 589. (14) Hier. vir. illustr. c. 111.

C H A P. XXVIII.

The Roman history, from the death of Valens to the division of the empire.

IRATIAN, alarmed at the danger that threatened the eastern provinces, over- a I run by the barbarians, resolved to march in person to the assistance of his uncle, as foon as the feafon would permit; and in the mean time ordered part of the forces he had with him in Gaul to hasten into Illyricum, and, joining the troops quartered in that province, to enter Thrace, and reinforce the army which Valens had fent The Lentienses thither. This the Germans called Lentienses, whose country bordered upon Rhætia, pass the Rhine, no sooner understood, than, by an open breach of the treaty, which they had but

X III.

10

ieini, Tom

the 10 10

9. Licie,

work

s ano Sipe

other Local Local Local

WIN:

ic ad ordi

ing

Fag.

Section

ne tz

not for the first terms of the f

10 km-

cion che pallas, or wrote the

X. X

2 120°10

ered in an myr

に選

i jii

lies, ores, i hi ores,

1 1000

qualitical bud test

n Restin

y had he

a lately concluded with Gratian, they passed the Rbine upon the ice, to the number of forty thousand men, and upwards; and entering Gaul, began to commit dreadful ravages in the neighbourhood of that river. Hereupon the emperor recalled the troops which he had ordered to march into Illyricum, and fent them reinforced with those that were left in Gaul under the conduct of count Nannianus, and Mallobaudes, king of the Franks, who ferved in the Roman army in quality of comes domesticorum, to drive back the Lentienses, whose numbers increased daily, the Romans, who guarded the banks of the Rhine, having, through fear of the barbarians, abandoned their stations. The two generals, though at the head of a handful of men, gave them battle in the neighbourhood of Argentaria, which most geographers take to b have stood where the present city of Colmar stands. The Romans at first gave ground, being overpowered with numbers; but in the end gained a complete victory, and made such a dreadful havock of the enemy, that, out of such a prodigious multi- They are metude, scarce five thousand had the good luck to make their escape, thirty thousand by the Romans. of them being killed upon the fpot, and the rest either slain in the pursuit, or taken prisoners. Their king Triarius, the chief author of the war, was in the number of the flain . Orosius writes, that Gratian was present at the battle; and that, depending upon the affishance of heaven, he attacked the enemy, tho' greatly superior to him in number'. But Ammianus only writes, that Gratian advanced to support his generals. This battle was not fought before the month of May; for on the twentyc fecond of April the emperor was still at Treves, as appears from a law bearing that date ". After this victory, Gratian passed the Rhine at the head of his army; and, entering the enemy's country, shut them up on all sides among the barren mountains, to which they had fled with their families; and by that means reduced them in a short time to such streights, that they were forced to submit to the terms the They submit to conqueror thought fit to prescribe; one of which was, that they should deliver up Gratian. their youth to serve in the Roman army, which they did accordingly. Thus were the Romans greatly reinforced by this new accession of strength, and at the same time that inconstant and faithless nation put out of a condition of raising new disturbances in the emperor's absence. In this expedition, Gratian gave signal proofs of d his courage, prudence, good-nature, and generolity; which gained him the esteem and affection of all who ferved under him w. He immediately wrote to Valens, acquainting him with his victory, and begging him not to hazard a battle till he had joined him, which he affured him would be very foon. But Valens, now jealous of the reputation of his young nephew, which he thought eclipfed his own, and defirous of equalling his exploits against the Germans, resolved to give battle before his arrival, that he might enjoy, without a rival, the glory of the victory, which he looked upon as certain. In the mean time, Gratian having sufficiently provided for the fecurity of Gaul, began his march, and with great expedition advanced to Gratian Arbor Felix, now Arbon, on the lake of Constance, and from thence to Lauriacum, marches to the e now Lork, in Austria, on the Danube, between the Traun and the Ens. There he uncle. embarqued part of his troops on the Danube, and marched by land with the rest to Bononia in Lower Dacia, and from thence to Sirmium, where he staid but four days, tho' he was then ill of an intermitting fever. From Sirmium he pursued his march along the Danube to a fort in the fame province, called Cajira Martis. In his march, some of his men, who had straggled from the army, were intercepted and cut off by the Alans. From Castra Martis he dispatched Richomeres, his comes domesticorum, to acquaint Valens, that he was at hand, and earnestly intreat him in his name not to engage the numerous forces of the enemy till his arrival. But Valens, Valens gives has name not to engage the numerous forces of the enemy times arrival. Due to battle, that his nephew might have no share in the victory, was utterly hartle, and it hastening the battle, that his nephew might have no share in the victory, was utterly defeated and f defeated, and perished, with two-thirds of his army, in the manner we have related killed before above. The day after the battle, the Goths, informed by a deserter, that Valens his arrival. had left many persons of great distinction in Adrianople, and that the imperial treafure was lodged there, laid fiege to the place; but being repulsed with great slaugh- The Goths ter, as quite strangers to the art of besieging towns, they dropped the enterprize; besiege in vain and marching towards Perintbus or Heraclea, laid waste that fertile country, and and Constantithen advanced to Constantinople, hoping to make themselves masters of that stately nople.

<sup>1</sup> Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 453, 454. Vict. epit. Hier. in chron. Onos. l. vii. c. 33. p. 219. Ammian. ibid. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 98. w Ammian. ibid. p. 455.

metropolis, and of the immense wealth lodged in it. But the Saracens, whom Mavia their

their queen had sent to the assistance of the Romans, and who were more dextrous at a ted by the Goths, and other barbarians.

fudden onsets, than regular engagements, having in several sallies cut off great numbers of the Goths, the rest thought it advisable to break up the siege, and retire from the neighbourhood of that city. The remaining part of this year they spent in ravaging, without opposition, Thrace, Scythia, Massia, and even Illyricum, as far as the Julian Alps, which part that province from Italy s. The neighbouring barbarians, namely the Quadi and Sarmatians, entered the Roman territories at the same Dreadful va- time, putting all to fire and sword, and surpassing the Goths themselves in the unvages commit-heard-of cruelties they practised v. St. Jerom gives us a pathetic account of the calamities suffered at that time by the subjects of the empire. The whole country, fays he, from Constantinople to the Julian Alps, have been swimming these twenty b years in Roman blood: Scythia, Thrace, Macedon, Dardania, Dacia, Theffalonica, (or rather Thessaly) Achaia, both Epirus's, Dalmatia, both Pannonia's, are filled with Goths. Sarmatians, Quadians, Alans, Hunns, Vandals, Marcomans, &c. whose avarice nothing has escaped, whose cruelty has been felt by persons of all ranks, ages, and conditions. How many eminent persons of both sexes, how many sacred virgins, have been outrageously insulted, and hurried into captivity? Bishops have been inhumanly massacred, with their clergy; churches pulled down, the reliques of the holy martyrs dug up, and the facred altars turned into mangers. The downfal of the Roman empire is at hand?. The same saint, writing in the year 406, that is, eight years after the present time, tells us, that Illyricum, Thrace, and Dalmatia, his native c country, looked still like deferts, and that nothing was to be seen in them but briars and thick forests a. The cities of Illyricum, which suffered most on this occasion, were Petavio and Mursia; the former is said to have been betrayed to the barbarians by Valens, whom the Arians had attempted to raise to that see b. As there were great numbers of Goths, who ferved in the Roman armies, quartered in the forts and cities of Asia, Julius, who commanded in that province, apprehending they would rise and join their countrymen, if they should move that way, by private letters All the Goths fent to the governors of the cities where they were quartered, ordered them all to be massacred at the same time. This severe, but perhaps necessary, order was put in execution without the least noise or disturbance, and Asia delivered from the danger d it had just reason to apprehend; for Zosimus assures us, that the Goths only wanted an opportunity to revolt, and treat the Romans as they were treated by them . WE left Gratian on the frontiers of Thrace, ready to enter that province, and join put to the Sword in the east.

Valens; but he no fooner heard the news of his death, and of the great loss the Romans had sustained in the fatal battle of Adrianople, which was brought to him by Victor, who had had the good luck to escape the general slaughter, than he marched back to Sirmium, to deliberate there on the most proper measures to be taken in so critical a conjuncture. After a short stay at Sirmium, he marched at the head of all the forces he could affemble, to Constantinofle, to fecure that metropolis; and in the mean time, confidering with himself how many brave officers had e perished in the present war, and how much he stood in need of an able and faithful Gratian fends general, he fent for young Theodofius, who, after having given fignal proofs of his for Theodosius. courage, conduct and experience in military affairs, had, upon the death of his father, retired to Spain, his native country, to avoid, as we have related above, the storm that threatened him. Theodosius complied with the emperor's command; and quitting his retirement, hastened into Illyricum, where he was received by Gratian with the greatest demonstrations of kindness and esteem, and soon after sent at the head of a confiderable army against the Sarmatians, who were in full march to join the Goths: but Theodofius, falling upon them, cut the greater part of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to repass the Danube. The victory he gained on this occasion f was so complete, that the emperor could not believe the account which Theodosius himself gave him of it upon his return to court, till he was informed of the truth by persons sent on purpose to view the field of battle d. To this victory, and the other which Gratian had gained this year over the Germans before he left Gaul, Ausonius no doubt alluded, when he wrote, that the emperor in one and the same year appealed the troubles on the Rhine and the Danube . From Constantinople the

Who gains a complete victory over the Sarmatians.

epist. 3. p. 26. AMMIAN. P. 469.

00K 11

etrous at a ff great

nd retire

y (pent

, as far

ng bar.

he lame

i the un-

I of the country,

e twenty ?

0575, G

eth Gar,

e notice

હ્યું લહ્યું-

ins, lave

nhumade

10 F 720

it Komii

ght years

his nabre C

but brians occation,

e harrang

at were

orts and bleon r

letters

T. 1.: 10

Was ple

e danger i

y wated

a i

10.C | OM

lois the

: to him

than be

5 to be

ded at metro-

cers had a tarahu

is of his

i father,

k fto:0

nd quit-

FI

he head

oin the ici, and

occ2fion f

0000

d of the

OFF. 201

وعلنونا إل

in lime

担

Oi. j

أأبيري

a emperor returned to Sirmium, and passed the winter there. As he was a zealous catholic, he no sooner saw himself, by the death of Valens, master of the east, than he recalled, and restored to their sees, the orthodox bishops, who had been banished Gratian recalls by Valens; and, by an edict, granted an entire liberty of conscience to christians the banished of all denominations, except the Manichees, the Photinians, and the Eunomians, whom biflions. he would not suffer to have any churches f. This edict put a stop to the perfecution, which the Arians had raised and carried on with great cruelty against the catholics, during the whole reign of Valens. Gratian, notwithstanding his zeal for the orthodox faith, did not think it adviseable for the present to meddle any farther with religious affairs, through fear of raising new disturbances, which, in the present b distracted state of the empire, might have been attended by dangerous consequences. This law, granting liberty of conscience to all christians, seems to have taken place only in the east, where the catholics did not injoy it before; for by another law enacted this very year, and addressed to Flavianus, vicar of Africa, he absolutely condemns the Donatists, orders their churches to be delivered up to the catholics, He condemns and declares, that he will fuffer no other doctrine to be taught or held, except that the Donatiffs. which is agreeable to the gospel, to the faith of the apostles, and to the tradition of the church s. While he refided at Sirmium, furrounded on all fides by the barbarians, he named Ausonius and Olybrius consuls for the ensuing year. He wrote to He raises the Ausonius, who had been his preceptor, a most obliging letter, acquainting him with foet Autonius c his promotion, and at the same time sent him the consular robe, that which the ship. emperors wore when they triumphed h. As Valens died without iffue male, Gratian, by his death, became fole mafter of the empire; but not thinking himfelf, being then only in the twentieth year of his age, equal to fo great a burden, especially at so critical a conjuncture, when the Goths, Hunns, Alans, Sarmatians and Quadians had broken into the empire on one fide, and the Alemans and other German nations were ready to invade it on the other, he refolved to take a collegue capable of eafing He refolves to him of part of his burden, and extricating the state out of the difficulties under take a collegue. which it laboured. Young Valentinian shared indeed with him the title, but not the authority of emperor, he being then but seven, or at most eight years old. d Without any regard therefore to his own relations, or rather looking upon those, to use the expression of Themistius, as his nearest relations, who were best qualified for fo great a truft, he determined to affume Theodofius for his partner in the supreme power; a person of most extraordinary accomplishments, and no less admired by all on account of his exemplary piety, than for his prudence, his experience in war, and the mighty exploits he had already performed. Pursuant to this resolution, he declared him emperor at Sirmium on the nineteenth of January of the enfuing Heraifes Theoyear 379. while Ausonius and Q. Clodius Hermogenianus Olybrius were consuls. It was dosius to the with the utmost difficulty that Gratian prevailed upon him to accept, says Pacatus, empire. what others fought with fo much ambition, and employed the most unlawful means e to attain. He refused, continues the same author, what others looked upon as the greatest happiness, in such manner as evidently shewed, that he accepted it in the end by mere constraint k. After Gratian had, to the general satisfaction both of the people and foldiery, declared him emperor with the usual folemnity, he committed And commits to his care the east, Thrace, and the rest of the provinces, which had been governed the eastern proby Valens, referving for himself only Gaul, Spain, and Britain; for Italy, Illyricum, vinces to his and Africa, were held by his brother Valentinian!. Sozomen writes, that to the east Gratian added Illyricum "; which, if true, must be understood of the east part of Illyricum, for the west part was always held by the princes of the western empire, who till this time had been masters of both. West Illyricum comprised both Panf nonia's, the one and the other Noricum, Dalmatia, and Savia, which we take to be the province that was for some time known by the name of Valeria. That Gratian kept these provinces, is past dispute . East Illyricum consisted of Macedon, the one and the other Epirus, Theffaly, Achaia, Crete, both Dacia's, Upper Mafia, Dardania, and Prævalitana .

Theodofius, whom Gratian raifed to the empire, was, according to most authors, Birth, educaa native of Cauca in Galicia, which city still retains the same name; but Marcellinus tion, employ-1

ments, &c. of Theodofius.

to the conful-

F Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 5. p. 116.

**Idem, tit. 6. leg. 2. p. 194.

**DACAT. p. 253, 254.

**PACAT. p. 253, 254.

**Cod. Theodor. l. v. c. 6. p. 711. Zos. p. 746.

Soz. l. vii. c. 4. p. 707.

**Cod. Theod. l. xi. tit. 13. p. 100. & !. xiii. tit. 1. leg. 11. p. 14. 1 THEMIST. or. xiv. p. 182. <sup>m</sup> Soz. l. vii. c.4. p. 707.
Notit. c. 3. p. 6.
Vol. VI. Nº 5. in

in his chronicle supposes him to have been born in Italica near Seville, the birth- a place of the emperor Trajan; and both that writer and Claudian reckon him among the great men of the Ulpian family, from which Trajan was sprung P. Theodosius resembled that prince, according to Victor, both in the seatures of his face, and the virtues of his mind; but was a stranger to the vices of Trajan, such as drunkenness, incontinence, and ambition q. He was the son of Thesmantia and the celebrated Theodosius, who conquered a new province in Britain, overcame Firmus in Africa, and was deservedly accounted the greatest commander of his age. But his triumphs and great reputation having raifed him many enemies at court, he was executed at Carthage in the year 376, the second of Gratian's reign, as we have related above. Victor tells us, that the name of the emperor Theodosius's father was Honorius; b but he is therein contradicted by Ammianus Marcellinus, and all the other writers. Both the emperor and his father, in most ancient coins, bear the prænomen of Flavius, which, after Constantine's time, became common to those who had none of their own: whence some authors conclude, and perhaps not improbably, that the family of Theodosius made no great figure before that prince's reign; and that Claudian and Vistor only flattered him in deriving his pedigree from Trajan. Pacatus observes, that he was a native of Spain, as well as Trajan and Adrian; but takes not the least notice of his being of the same family, which we can scarce believe he would have omitted, had Theodosius been allied to those two great princes. He had, according to Victor, only one brother and a fifter, whose children he brought c up with the same care as he did his own'. St. Ambrose and Symmachus suppose him to have had feveral brothers ". One of his brothers, by name Honorius, had by his wife Maria, whom Claudian styles one of the most illustrious women Spain ever produced, two daughters, Thermantia and Serena, of whom the latter was married to the famous Stilicho, and the former to another general, whose name is not mentioned . Eucherius, whom we shall see consul in 381. is supposed to have been another of the emperor's brothers x. The emperor himself was born in the year 346. fo that he was advanced to the empire in the thirty-third year of his age y. We are told, that he was called Theodosius, not only because his father had been so named, but because both his parents were commanded in a dream to give him d that name, fignifying, according to the import of the Greek word Theodosius, that the child was in a particular manner the gift of God 2. He served under his father in Britain, when he was yet very young; and being soon after created duke of Masia, he gained a memorable victory over the Sarmatians in 374. being then only eighteen years old b. After the death of his father he withdrew to Spain, to avoid the storm which threatened him too; and there led a retired life, employing his time partly in reading, and partly in works of agriculture, till he was recalled by Gratian in 373. and declared emperor. He was then married to Flaccilla, called by most of the Greek writers Placilla, and by some Placidia. She is thought to have been the daughter of Antonius, who, after having been prefect of Italy and Gaul in e 376. and the two following years, was raised to the consulship in 382d. She was a native of Spain e, and fifter to the mother of Nebridius, who married Salvina, the daughter of Gildo, a Moorish prince, and count of Africa f. Nebridius was proconsul of Asia in 396. but died soon after; for Salvina was a widow, when St. Jerom, who had lived in great intimacy with the father of Nebridius, wrote to her in 400 s. Theodosius had at least three children by Flaccilla, viz. Arcadius, born about the year 377. during his father's retirement; for he was thirty when he died on the first of May 408. Honorius, born in 384. and a daughter, named Pulcheria, born before the year 379. since Theodosius had then, according to Claudian, several children. To these some add, and among the rest St. Ambrose, and Themistius, a third son, s named Gratian. They do not tell us whether he was the fon of Flaccilla, or Galla, the emperor's fecond wife, of whom hereafter; but Gregory of Nyssa writes in express terms, that the emperor had by Flaccilla only three children, viz. two fons and one

* MARCELL. chron. p. 78. CLAUD. p. 40.

* Vict. p. 546.

* Idem, p. 547.

* Ambros. epift. 17. p. 214.

* Sym. l. x. epift. 57. p. 459.

* CLAUD. de laud. Stil. p. 194.

* CANGE Byz. fam. p. 75.

* Themist. or. xvi. p. 203.

* Theodor. l. v. c. 5. p. 710.

* Vict. p. 546.

* Zos. p. 760.

* Ambros. fermo de diverf. p. 125.

* Vict. p. 546.

* Cod. Theodo tit. 6. p. 350.

* CLAUD. ibid. p. 193.

* Themist. p. 410.

* Ambros. ibid. p. 193.

* Themist. p. 477.

a daughter 1. Besides Gratian, who died before his father, the emperor had by Galla the celebrated Placidia, mother to Valentinian III. and another son; but the mother died in child-bed, and the child with her m.

THE joy which the news of Theodosius's promotion gave to all the subjects of the empire, was equal to the mighty opinion they entertained of his justice, integrity, moderation, and abilities in war; and truly, tho' commendations in the mouth of a poet are of no great weight, yet we cannot help thinking with Claudian, that the empire, without the assistance of Theodosius, would never have recovered its former lustre, but rather become a prey to the barbarians ". But to return to Gratian, he feems to have continued fome months at Sirmium, after the promotion of Theodofius o; b nay, Socrates, tho' in this place somewhat consused, tells us, that he gained considerable advantages over the barbarians, who furrounded him on all fides; and foon after set out for Gaul, upon intelligence, that the Germans were up in arms, and Gratian reready to break into that province P. He was at Aquileia in the beginning of July, turns to Gaulini and in the latter end of the same month at Milan 4, where he contracted great intimacy with St. Ambrofe, to whom he ever after shewed the highest respect and veneration, as appears from a letter he wrote to him with his own hand, which in our opinion deserves no less to be admired for the elegance of the style, than for the pious and truly christian sentiments it contains. It was at his request that St. Ambrose wrote, tho' unwilling to engage in religious debates, his excellent treatise c on faith, in which he proves the divinity of the Son, and another proving the divinity of the Holy Ghost'. The pious emperor was so well pleased with these two pieces, that he immediately ordered a church to be delivered up to the catholics, which he had sequestered at Milan in 380. with a design, as was thought, to give it to the Arians, out of complaisance to his mother-in-law Justina. At the same time, revoking the law by which he had granted, the preceding year, liberty of conscience to all fects, he published another, forbidding all heretics, especially the re-baptizers, to A law against preach their tenets, or to hold assemblies in any part of the empire. This law is beresits. dated from Milan the third of August of the present year 379. and was, no doubt, owing to the zeal of St. Ambrose. Gratian left Milan soon after; and passing thro d Rhatia, the province of the Sequani, and Germania Prima, repaired to Treves, where he was on the fourteenth of September", and perhaps before; for he is faid to have marched with incredible expedition, and to have surprised the people of Gaul with his unexpected arrival w. He passed the winter at Treves, and consequently was in that city, when Ausonius, upon the expiring of his confulship, pronounced the oration, which has reached our times, thanking the emperor for that and the other honours he had conferred upon him'. This year we find the Lombards, whom we shall see The Lombards. two hundred years hence masters of Italy, first mentioned in history. Prosper, who, after having copied the chronicle of St. Ferom to this time, begins now one of his own, tells us, that the Lombards, abandoning the most distant coasts of the ocean, e and their native country Scandinavia, and feeking new fettlements, as they were over-stocked with people at home, attacked first, and overcame about this time the Vandals, a German nation. They were headed by two chiefs, named Iboreus and Aionus, who dying about ten years after, they created Agelmond, son to the latter, their first king, who reigned thirty-three years y. We are told, that the Lombards, and the Gepidæ, were for many years one and the same nation; and that they passed the Danube together about the year 400. in the reign of Honorius, who allowed them settlement about Sirmium and Singidunum. This is what Grotius writes upon the authority of Paulus Diaconus, who flourished in the ninth century z. Grotius adds, that the Gepidæ, and consequently the Lombards, held the tenets of Arius, and f that they were originally Vandals. Tho we have said after Grotius, that Prosper is the first author who mentions the Lombards, yet we must own, that their name is to be met with in Ptolemy, Tacitus and Strabo. But to this Grotius answers, that by the name of Lombards in those authors are meant, not the people we are here speaking of, but other German nations, who from their long beards were called Longobarbi and Langobardi.

1 Greg. Nyss. in funere Flaccillæ, p. 533.

M Zos. l. iv. p. 777.

P. 40, 41.

Auson. ep. 2. p. 5, 6.

Socr. l. v. c. 6. p. 260.

Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 100.

AMBROS. de fide, p. 109—112.

Idem ibid. & de Spir. l. i. c. 1. p. 213.

Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 100.

Auson. conf. p. 411.

Idem ibid.

Prosp. chron. Grot. proleg. in hift. Goth. p. 53.

Idem ibid. p. 27.

Paul. Diac. de geft. Longobard. l. 1. c. 2—16.

We

state of the eastern provin-

deputies to Theodosius.

ral victories

We left Theodosius at Sirmium, where he had been declared emperor on the nine-The deplorable teenth of January of this year 379. He was surrounded on all sides by numberless multitudes of barbarians, who, after the defeat and death of Valens, scoured the neighbouring countries without restraint, destroying all with fire and sword. Dacia, Thrace and Illyricum were already lost. The Goths, the Taifali, the Alans, and the Hunns, were masters of the greatest part of these provinces, and had ravaged and laid waste the rest: the Armenians, Iberians, and Persians, were likewise up in arms, and ready to take advantage of the present distracted state of the empire 5. What evils, fays Gregory Nazianzen, have we not feen or heard of? Whole countries have been destroyed with fire and sword; many thousand persons of all ranks and ages have been inhumanly maffacred; the rivers are still dyed with blood, and the ground b covered with heaps of dead bodies. Let us not ascribe the calamities we suffer to the cowardice of our foldiers, who have conquered the world; our fins, and the Arian impiety, which has fo long prevailed, are the only cause of our misfortunes. The few foldiers who had survived the late defeat, struck with terror and dismay, kept within the cities and strong-holds of Thrace, without daring so much as to look abroad, much less to make head against the victorious enemy, who moved about the country in great bodies d. Gratian, in all likelihood, gave the new emperor fome troops; 'tis at least certain, that he left with him two officers of great distinction, viz. count Ricomer, a Frank by nation, and Majorianus, who commanded the troops of Illyricum under Gratian, and was by Theodosius raised to the post of c general both of the horse and soot. Both these officers distinguished themselves under Theodosius in a very eminent manner, and gained great advantages over the Goths e. Theodosius, leaving Sirmium soon after the departure of Gratian, repaired to Thessalonica, the capital of East Illyricum, which Gratian had yielded to him, as we have observed above s, and was still there on the seventeenth of June 8. During his stay The chief cities in that metropolis, the chief cities of the east sent deputies to him, congratulating in the east send him upon his accession to the sovereign power, and craving his protection. At the head of the deputies from Constantinople was the celebrated orator Themistius, who, in a fpeech which he pronounced on that occasion, begged the emperor to confirm the privileges granted to that great metropolis by his ancestors. The emperor received d them all in a most obliging manner, promising to redress, as far as in him lay, the evils of which they complained h. Having reinforced his army with new levies, and made other preparations for war, during his stay at Thessalonica, he took the field, probably about the end of June; for on the seventh of July he was at Scupi in Dardania, and on the tenth of August at a place called Vicus Augusti, the situation of which is unknown to geographers. Several battles were fought this year, of which we can scarce give any account; for our best guide, Ammianus Marcellinus, fails us here; and other authors are so obscure in their accounts, so inconsistent with each other, and often with themselves, that we can scarce depend upon any thing they He gains sever relate. Idatius k, Prosper l, and Orosius m, tell us, that many great battles were fought, e and as many fignal victories gained by Theodosius. On the other hand, Zosimus menever the Goths. tions but one battle, which he describes at length; but as he studies on all occasions to detract as much as he can from the glory of Theodofius, he ascribes the signal victory that was gained, not to him, but to one Modares, a prince of royal extraction among the Goths, who had lately taken party with the Romans a. Zosimus, prompted by his blind zeal for the worship of the idols, omits no opportunity of vomiting his venom against a prince who completed, as we shall see, the ruin of idolatry, which other princes had suffered out of policy, or had not been able utterly to extirpate. We ought to be very cautious in giving credit to what that writer relates to the prejudice of a prince, against whom he betrays on all occasions an f inveterate hatred, and unfurmountable prejudice. As to Modares, by whole conduct Thrace was delivered, according to that writer, from ruin and destruction, he was a man of great address, intrepidity and experience in war. St. Gregory Nazianzen wrote some letters to him, wherein he extols his piety, and recommends to him the peace and tranquillity of the church o; whence we may conclude him to have been,

epist. 135, 136. p. 864.

a not only a christian, but a catholic. Prosper tells us, that Theodosius not only overcame the Goths in several pitched battles, but forced them to repass the Danube, and by that means delivered Tbrace from the insupportable yoke under which it groaned P. And delivers Great numbers of them took part with the Romans, after having delivered up to the Thrace. emperor fome of the chief men among them as hostages. Thus Prosper, Zosimus 1, and Sozomen r. However, it is no easy matter to determine, whither those retired who repassed the Danube, since their own country was possessed by the Hunns, who had driven them out. The operations of this campaign are by some authors confusedly related, and only hinted at by others; and therefore we have not been able to give any distinct account of them. All we know for certain is, that part of the Goths submitted to Theodosius, and the rest withdrew from Thrace. In this, at least, all authors are unanimous. The emperor, having thus reflored Thrace to its former tranquillity, returned in the latter end of the autumn to Theffalonica, and there took up his winter-quarters.

THE following year 380. the two emperors were consuls, Gratian the fifth time, and Theodosius the first. The former, after having passed the winter at Treves, from which place we find two laws, dated the fixth and fifteenth of February, fet out early in the spring for Italy, and was on the fourteenth of March at Aquileia, and at Milan on the twenty-fourth of April. From Milan he advanced to Sirmium, and continued till the end of the summer, partly in the neighbourhood of that city, and partly in c Pannonia. Theodosius was seized in the month of February of this year with a dangerous malady; and this was what obliged Gratian to quit Gaul, and hasten into Gratian re-Illyricum, lest the neighbouring barbarians should lay hold of that opportunity to turns to Illyria break into Thrace'. As the Goths were still in arms, and threatened to pass the cum, Danube, Gratian, during the malady of his collegue, proposed, and concluded a And concludes treaty of peace with them, which, however advantageous to their nation, was con- a treaty with firmed by Theodosius upon his recovery. One of the articles of this treaty was, if Zosimus is to be credited, that the Goths, who served in the Roman armies, should be at liberty to quit the service when they pleased, provided they found others to substitute in their room w. Gratian, by a law dated from Milan the twenty-sourth of d April, exempts from the obligation of acting upon the stage, such women as had embraced the christian religion, tho' bound by their birth to follow that infamous profession x. He renewed the same law the following year, adding this clause to it, that if fuch women behaved for the future more like players than christians, they should be condemned to serve the stage the remaining part of their lives, without remission v. As for Theodosius, being seized in the beginning of this year with a dan-Theodosius, gerous malady, as we have hinted above, he demanded with great earnestness the being seized facrament of baptism; which he received with exemplary piety at the hands of Asco-with a dangerlus bishop of Thessalonica, after having carefully informed himself of the faith that baptized. prelate professed. Finding him to be both orthodox in his belief, and blameless in e his manners, the pious emperor immediately fent for him to court, was baptized by him; and from that instant, the violence of the malady abating, he began to recover 1. Soon after, the emperor gave a fignal proof of his zeal for the orthodox faith, His zeal for the by the famous law dated from Theffalonica the twenty-eighth of February of the pre-orthodox faith. fent year 380. In that law Theodofius declares, that he will have all his subjects, without exception, to adhere to the faith which the church of Rome had received of St. Peter, which was taught by Damasus bishop of that city, and by Peter bishop of Alexandria, a man of great fanctity; that is, that they must all acknowledge and confess the divinity of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; that those who held this doctrine, should be deemed christian catholics: but, on the conf trary, such as rejected it, should be treated as heretics, and infamous persons; their conventicles should not be called churches, and they themselves should undergo those punishments, which were due to their wickedness, from the imperial authority, and divine justice, it being a crime and a sacrilege to depart from the true faith through contempt, nay, or out of ignorance. Thus this memorable law, which was addressed to the people of Constantinople, and to the present Eutropius, with orders to r Soz. l. vii. c. 4. p. 707. 649. PROSP chron. P PROSP. chron. 4. Zos. p. 756. · Cod. Theod. chron. D. 102—104.

125

F. JORN. rer. Goth. c. 27. p. 649.
PROSP. chron.
W. Zos. l. iv. p. 756.
Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 7. leg. 4. p. 365.
V. Idem, leg. 9. p. 371. & leg. viii. p. 370.
AMBRO6.
Ep. 21. p. 229. Soz. p. 707. Aug. civit. Dei, l. v. c. 26. p. 64.
Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 2. leg. w Zos. l. iv. p. 756. 25. p. 57.

fend it into all the provinces, and cause it to be every-where observed by the subjects of a the empire b. To this law St. Austin, no doubt, alluded, when he wrote, that Theodosius, upon his accession to the empire, by a law full of mercy and justice, curbed the fury of the wicked, and relieved the church, long oppressed by the protection given by Several laws of Valons to the Arians. Besides this, the emperor published several other laws this year, tending to the reformation of manners, viz. one dated the twenty-seventh of March, forbidding all capital trials during the forty days preceding Eafter; that is, during Lent; another of the eighteenth of December, prohibiting, under severe penalties, widows to marry during the time of mourning for their deceased husbands, which was by this law extended from ten months to a whole year: Several laws against informers, who were to be punished with death, if they were found to have b informed thrice, tho' their informations had always proved true. By a law dated the fixteenth of November, the emperor declares it unlawful for any one to beg the estates of such persons as were condemned for treason; adding, whereas the importunity of such petitioners often wrests from the prince what he ought not to grant, his rescript in their favour shall be of no force; and such as shall by that means have obtained the confiscated estates, shall be punished as transgressors of the laws. These estates he will have the prince to grant merely of his own motion. Under other princes, the estates of persons condemned for treason, were frequently granted to those who had accused them, which proved a great encouragement to informers; but this, and the other laws of Theodosius, put a stop to their vile practices. By former laws, c the estates of such as had been banished, or executed, sell to the exchequer; but Theodosius, by two laws of this year, dated the seventeenth of June, orders the estates of the former to be divided between the exchequer and the criminal, or his children; and those of the latter to be left intire to their children or grand-children. We are not told what induced the emperor to be more indulgent to the children of those who were executed, than to the children of such as were only banished. In cases of treafon, only one fixth of the criminal's estate was to be left to his children, whether he was banished or executed. The emperor published several other laws this year, which are so many instances of his good-nature, his application to business, and his care of the public welfare f.

The Goths reenter Thrace.

NOTWITHSTANDING the treaty which the Goths had concluded with Gratian during the malady of Theodofius, that prince had no fooner left Illyricum, to return to Gaul, than they passed the Danube, under the conduct of Fritigern, Alatheus, and Sapbran; and breaking into Thrace and Pannonia, advanced as far as Macedon, destroying all with fire and swords. Zosimus writes, that they laid waste Thessaly and Epirus, and penetrated as far as Achaia, without meeting with the least opposition b. Theodofius, having in the mean time drawn together his troops, took the field; and coming up with the enemy on the frontiers of Macedon, thought it advifeable not to venture an engagement with forces fo much superior to him in number; but to harass them, by cutting off their parties, and intercepting their convoys. The Goths, apprifed of his defign, attacked the Roman camp in the dead of the night, made themselves masters of it, cut most of Theodosius's men in pieces, and would have taken the emperor himself prisoner, had he not saved himself by a speedy flight, while the Gaths were bussed in plundering the tents i. Thus Zosimus. But Idatius k., Mareellinus l., Gregory Nazianzen, who was then at Constantinople ., and Philostorgius , an Arian writer, and consequently no ways partial to Theodosius, assure us, that the emperor gained a complete victory over the Galbs; and that, upon his return to Constantinople, which happened, according to some, on the seventeenth, according to others, on the twenty-fourth of November, he entered that metropolis in triumph. Jornandes, who omits no opportunity of fetting forth the exploits of f his Goths, takes no notice of their pretended victory over Theodofius. Besides, Gregery Nazianzan describes his triumphal entry into Constantinople, of which he was an eye-witness; and adds, that he well deserved that honour, for having checked the fury of the barbarians, who, confiding in their numbers, and natural fierceness, had ventured to engage him. The emperor, soon after his arrival in that metropolis, Theodolius defeats the Goths.

b Idem ibid. & Soz. p. 708.

Calcust. ibid. l. v. c. 26. p. 64.

Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. to. leg. 15. p. 441.

Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. to. leg. 15. p. 441.

Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. to. leg. 15. p. 441.

Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. to. leg. 3. p. 335.

Idem, l. ix. tit. 2. leg. 3. p. 29. tit. 3. leg. 4. p. 486.

John ibid. p. 649.

Los. p. 756.

Idem, p. 757.

Los. leg. 2. p. 486.

John ibid. p. 649.

Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. to. leg. 3. p. 29. tit. 3. leg. 3. p. 486.

John ibid. p. 649.

Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. to. leg. 3. p. 29. tit. 3. leg. 3. p. 29. tit. 3. leg. 3. p. 29. tit. 3. leg. 3. p. 486.

John ibid. l. v. c. 26. p. 64.

Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. to. leg. 3. p. 29. tit. 3. leg. 3. p.

a appointed Gregory Nazianzen bishop of the place, in the room of the Arian bishop

d f

Demophilus, who refused to subscribe to the doctrine of the council of Nice. The emperor in person conducted the new bishop to the great church, and put him in possession, both of that, and of all the other churches in the city, with their revenues, driving out the Arians, who had held them for the space of forty years P. Thus was the orthodox faith re-established in the metropolis of the east, about the latter end The orthodox of this year 380. The next confuls were Fl. Syngrius and Fl. Encherius, uncle, as is faith re-estasupposed, to Theodosius. Gratian was this year, as appears from the dates of several east. laws, at Milan on the twenty-ninth of March; at Aquileia on the twenty-fecond of April, and eighth of May; and at Treves on the fourteenth of Ollober. He returned b to Aquileia on the twenty-fixth of December, and feems to have passed the winter in that city q. Valentinian had introduced the custom of fetting yearly at liberty some criminals, on occasion of the feltival of Easter. This custom Gratian confirmed by a law addressed to Antidius, vicar of Rome; but excludes from such indulgence all criminals guilty of treason, particide, murder, adultery, rapes, incest, magic, all false coiners, and such as had been pardoned before. This law was read at Rome on the twenty-first of July of this year 981 . As to the affairs in the east, Theodofius continued at Constantinople, at least to the nineteenth of July. During his stay in that metropolis, he published a law dated the tenth of January, forbidding heretics of all denominations to hold affemblies in cities, and commanding the churches throughout Allthe c the empire to be immediately delivered up to the catholics. The execution of this churches delimemorable law was committed to Sapor, one of the greatest generals of his time, catholics. who was fent into the several provinces, with orders every-where to drive out the heretics, and put the catholic pastors in possession of the churches the sectaries had usurped. Sapor met no-where with the least difficulty in the execution of his commission, except at Antioch, where the catholics were divided among themselves s. Philostorgius writes, that the Arians were not only driven from the churches, but from the city of Constantinople. This year Athanaric, the most powerful of all the Gothish princes, who had maintained a three years war with Valens, as we have related above, being driven out by a faction at home, took refuge in the Roman territories, notwithstanding his Athanaric red pretended oath never to tread on Roman ground; and coming to Constantinople, surs to Theowas there received with great marks of friendship by Theodosius, who went out to interred as meet him, and attended him, and his numerous retinue, into the city on the eleventh of Constanti-January of the present year. But Athanaric died soon after, viz. on the twenty-fifth nople. of the same month; and Theodofius caused him to be buried after the Roman manner, with fuch pomp and folemnity, that the Goths, who had attended him in his flight, aftonished at the magnificence of the funeral, returned home, resolved never to molest the Romans; nay, out of gratitude to the emperor, who had thus honoured the memory of their deceased prince, they took upon them to guard the banks of the Danube, and prevented the Romans from being attacked on that fide a. Orofius writes, e that the emperor's generous behaviour to Athanaric, made fuch a deep impression on all the Gotbifb nations, that, charmed with his virtue, and fingular good-nature, they renounced all farther thoughts of war, and submitted to the laws of the empire w The fame thing is confirmed by Idaffus and Marcellinus; but this did not happen till the third of October of the following year, as we shall relate anon. A few days after the arrival of Athanaric at Constantinople, and before his death, the philosopher Themissius pronounced his fifteenth oration in the palace before the emperor, in which he observes, among other things, that Theodosius, who was then in the third year of his reign, had granted innumerable favours, but had not yet condemned one person to death . The pious emperor, no less desirous to heal the divisions f that rent the church, than to redress the abuses which prevailed in the state, summoned this year, in the month of May, the second general or ccumenical coun- The second cil, which was held at Constantinople by all the bishops of his dominions y. While accumental the council was affembling, the emperor published a law dated the second of May, Several laws of depriving such as had renounced the christian religion to embrace paganism, of the Theodosius right of disposing of any thing by will . By a law dated the eighth of the same against heretics

P Socn. l. v.c. 7. p. 263, 264. Gred. Naz. ibid. 9 Cod. Theod. chron. p. 104, 105. f Idem, l. ix. tit. 38. leg. 6. p. 275. Idem, l. vi. tit. 5. leg. 6. p. 117, 118. Theodoret. l. v. c. 2. p. 706. f Philost. l. 9. c. 19. p. 522. Zos. l. iv. p. 758, 759. Oros. l. vii. c. 34. p. 220. w Oros. ibid. Themist. orat. xv. p. 185-190. F Socn. l. v. c. 8. p. 264. Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 7. leg. 1. * THEMIST. OFSt. XV. P. 185-190.

month,

month, he extends that penalty to the Manichees, whose estates he declares confis- a cated, unless their children should embrace the true religion; in which case they were to enjoy the inheritance of their parents b. In a council held before the emperor on the twenty-ninth of June, Theodosius declared, that the respect due to the priesthood not suffering bishops to be summoned to the public courts as witnesses, they were by the laws exempted from the obligation of appearing there . By another law dated the nineteenth of July, he forbids the Eunomians and Arians to build churches, either in the cities, or in the country, and declares the places where they shall have preached, or performed any other function, confiscated d. All these laws are dated from Constantinople; but two others of the twenty-first of July, from Heraclea in Thrace e, whither the emperor had advanced against such of the barbarians as were still in arms. b Zosimus tells us, that having demanded assistance of Gratian, that prince sent him a considerable body of troops commanded by Baudo or Bauto, and Arbogastes, who were both Franks, but experienced officers, and greatly attached to the empire. The former was father to Eudoxia the wife of Arcadius, and maintained a correspondence by letters with Symmachus f. Of the latter we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. Upon the arrival of these two renowned commanders, the Goths, who were ravaging Macedon and Thessaly, retired with great precipitation into Thrace; but not being able to subsist in that province, which they themselves had laid waste the preceding year, they were forced to sue for peace, and submit to Theodosius s. Thus Zosimus, detracting, according to his custom, as much as he can, from the glory of Theodosius. c The Seyri and However, he owns, that the emperor gained a complete victory over the Seyri and Carpodacæ de- Carpodacæ, who had, jointly with the Hunns, broken into the empire, and that he obliged them to repais the Danube b. We find the Scyri frequently mentioned amongst the northern barbarians; but of the Carpodaca no farther notice is taken in history. This campaign ended, it feems, in September; for, on the fifth of that month, the emperor was at Adrianople, and on the twenty-eighth at Constantinople, where he continued the remaining part of the year i.

odulius.

A law of Gratian against be gars.

He causes the tory to be removed out of the senate.

altar of Vic-

beretics.

THE following year 382. when Antonius, called also by some Antoninus, and supposed to have been father-in-law to Theodofius, was conful with Syagrius, the neighbouring barbarians broke into Italy; but were foon driven back by Gratian, who d passed the greatest part of this year at Milan, or in that neighbourhood, watching their motions. From some laws published in the month of September of this year, it appears, that the emperor was forced to raise new levies, and demand extraordinary subsidies, for the desence of Rhatia and Illyricum. A law dated the fisteenth of December informs us, that persons of fortune were obliged to supply the army with horses 1. As Rome was insested by multitudes of beggars, Gratian, by a law dated the twentieth of June, orders Severus, prefect of the city, to seize such of them as were capable of earning their livelihood by working, and to bestow them upon those who shall have informed against them, either as slaves, if they were such by condition, or to be employed the remaining part of their lives, if they were free-born, in tilling their grounds, and in other works of agriculture m. By another law dated the eighteenth of August, he suspends, for the space of thirty days, the execution of all criminals, reckoning from the day they received sentence. By another law, he ordered the altar of Victory, which stood in the place where the Roman senate assembled, to be removed, and declared the revenues belonging to it confiscated . This altar had been removed by Constantius, when he came to Rome in 357. but re-established by Julian in 361. and suffered to continue there by Valentinian, who allowed to all his subjects the free exercise of what religion they liked best. At the same time Gratian declared void and null all the privileges and exemptions granted by other emperors to the pagan pontiffs, or to the vestal virgins, ordering the officers of the revenue to seize on the lands, which, for the future, should be bequeathed to them, or their f temples. The pagan senators sent deputies, at the head of whom was Symmachus, to try whether they could prevail upon the emperor to revoke these laws; but Gra-Lame of Theo-tian would not fo much as admit them to his presence. The heretics met with no dolius against less severe treatment in the east from Theodosius, than the pagans in the west from

b Idem, tit. 5. leg. 7. p. 120. c Idem, l. xi. tit. 39. leg. 8. p. 327. d Idem, tit. 1. leg. 3. p. 9. c Cod. Theod. chron. p. 105. f Zos. l. iv. p. 757. SYMM. l. iv. ep. 15, 16. p. 150. f Zos. ibid. p. 758. h Idem, p. 759. l Cod. Theod. chron. p. 105. k Idem, p. 106. l Cod. Theod. h Idem, p. 759.

Cod. Theod. chron. p. 10, 1 leg. 2. p. 149.

M Idem, l. xiv. tit. 18. p. 256, 257. р. 750. l. ii. tit. 4. leg. 3. р. 149. — M Idem, l. xiv. tit. 10. р. – о Амви. ер. 11. р. 195. — Symm. l. x. ер. 54. р. 455, 456. " Idem, l. x. tit. 16. leg. 10. p. 190.

a Gratian; for by a law dated the last of March, he declared such of the Manichees, as were then known by the names of Encratitæ, Saccofori, and Hydroparastatæ, that is, the continent, the fack-bearers, the water-drinkers, guilty of death, encouraging all to inform against them, and likewise against such as, in the celebration of Easter, differed as to the day from other christians; these he likewise pronounced guilty of death P. All the laws enacted this year by Theodosius are dated from Constantinople; which gives us room to believe, that he continued in that city without taking the field, the Goths having, by their deputies, offered to submit to him, as we have related The Goths subabove. As they had been driven out of Macedon, and shut up in Thrace, where mit to Theothey could not subsist, Theodosius, not caring to drive them to despair, received their dosius. b deputies in a very obliging manner; and as they could not return to their own country, which was held by the Hunns, upon their laying down their arms, he gave them leave to fettle in Thrace and  $M\alpha fia$ , which two provinces were almost quite dispeopled by the frequent incursions of the neighbouring barbarians, and the late wars. The emperor exempted them from all the tributes and taxes that were paid by the other subjects of the empire 9. This was in all likelihood one of the articles on which they submitted. Great numbers of them entered into the Roman service; but formed a separate body, and were commanded by officers of their own nation, which proved the fource of many evils; but as they were well acquainted with the avarice, injuflice, and cruelty of the Roman officers, they refused to put themselves into their c power, and infifted upon their continuing united, in order to secure themselves against fuch infults as they had reason to apprehend, when dispersed among the Roman troops. Zosimus does not forget to blame the conduct of Theodosius, and his want of forelight, in this particular; but Themistius, in a speech which he pronounced before the emperor himself, tells him, that he gained by his indulgence and good-nature the barbarians, whom he was not perhaps in a condition to conquer by force of arms'. The Goths therefore were not yet so far weakened, as to submit to what terms the emperor thought fit to impose upon them '.

THE next confuls were Fl. Merobaudes the second time, and Flavius Saturninus. Gratian was, from the twenty-ninth of January of this year 383. to the second of d May, at Milan; at Padua on the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth of the same month; and at Verona on the several laws. He published several excellent Several laws laws this year, and among the rest one dated the nineteenth of January, revoking published by all the privileges and exemptions granted to particular persons, to the prejudice of the body to which they belonged w, another dated the twenty-seventh of February, inflicting severe penalties on such as should conceal deserters or robbers x; a third, condemning informers to fuch punishments as were due to the crimes of which they accused others, when they could not make good the charge; a fourth, forbidding any deference to be paid to fuch orders as tribunes, fecretaries, counts, or any other persons, however dignified and distinguished, should pretend to have received from the e emperor by word of mouth z: the former of these two laws is dated the twenty-seventh of May, and the latter the seventeenth of June. By a law dated the twenty-second of May, he declares those incapable of disposing of their estates by will, who shall renounce the christian religion to embrace paganism, Judaism, or the execrable tenets of the Manichees. Those by whom they shall have been seduced, are subjected to the same penalty. This year is remarkable for a dreadful samine, that raged in Rome, but more on account of the disturbances that were raised in the state by Maximus, and put an end to the life and reign of the excellent emperor Gratian. That usurper, named Magnus Clemens Maximus, was by birth a Briton, as a learned modern writer pretends to gather from Socrates b; but, in our opinion, that author f speaks of the place where he began to reign, and not of the place of his nativity c, as does likewise Gildas d. Pacatus, who flourished in those times, assures us, that he was a stranger in Britain, and had been banished into this island . Zosimus writes, that he was a native of Spain, which is not improbable, fince it is certain, that he pretended to be allied to Theodofius. He was brought up, fays Pacatus, in the family

P Cod. Theod. l. xiv. tit. 10. leg. i. p. 208. & l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 9. p. 124.

Themist. orat. xvi. p. 199.

Zos. p. 758.

Themist. ibid. p. 211.

Idem, p. 212.

Cod. Theod. chron. p. 108, 109.

W Cod. Theod. l. xi. tit. 13. p. 100.

Idem, l. ix. tit. 29. leg. 2. p. 222.

Idem, l. ixit. 1, leg. 14.

p. 19.

Idem, l. ixit. 3 leg. 1. p. 27.

Idem, l. xvi. tit. 7. leg. 3. p. 205.

Usser. ecclef.

Britan. antiq. p. 199.

Vide Socr. l. v. c. 11. p. 270.

GILD. de excid. Britan. c. 10. p. 1174

PACAT. p. 263, 269.

F Zos. p. 760.

of Theodosius as a servant, and employed in the meanest offices v. Zosimus pretends, a Maximus revolts in Britain.

His character.

He passes over into Gaul.

Gratian abandoned by his Army.

And put to

that he served in Britain with Theodosius, who, as we have observed above, attended his father into this island in the year 368. Be that as it will, feeing Theodofius raised to the empire, says Zosimus, while he could not attain to any creditable employment, prompted by jealoufy and envy, he began to foment the aversion of the Roman soldiers to Gratian, whom they looked upon as too great an encourager of foreigners; infomuch that in the end they revolted, declared Maximus emperor, and, with the usual solemnity, gave him the purple and diadem. He gave out, that he was allied to Theodosius, and that it was with his participation and consent he had taken upon him the fovereignty h. Thus Zosimus. But Sulpicius Severus i, and Orosius k, tell us, that the foldiers mutinying, forced him to accept the purple. The authority of b these two authors, of whom the former flourished at that very time, and the other foon after, is of great weight with us. Orofius styles him a man of courage, and worthy of the empire, had he attained it by lawful means 1; and Sulpicius speaks of him as one, who, abating this usurpation, deserved in every other respect to be esteemed and commended m. Gregory of Tours writes, that, before his usurpation, he had gained several signal victories in Britain ; and some modern authors, that he drove the Scots quite out of the island o. But neither is consistent with what we have related above out of Zosimus. Maximus at first was supported only by a small number of the inhabitants of this island; but others flocking to him from all parts of Britain, he found himself in a very short time at the head of a numerous army, c which, without loss of time, he transported into Gaul; and landing at the mouth of the Rhine, he prevailed upon the neighbouring provinces to revolt from Gratian, and join him, not so much by force of arms, as by art and address P, extending, says Gildas, by lyes and perjuries the empire which he had acquired by wickedness and rebellion 9. Gratian was then making war upon the Germans called Juthongi; but he no sooner heard of the arrival of the usurper in Gaul, than he hastened to Treves, to put a stop to his farther progress. On his march, great numbers of his troops, gained over by the emissaries of Maximus, abandoned him, to take part with the usurper. However, thinking himself still a match for Maximus, he lest Treves, went in quest of his enemy, and offered him battle r. Baronius writes, that Gratian, finding d himself abandoned by his own troops, had called the Hunns and Alans to his assistance, and that his army confifted chiefly of those barbarians s. The learned Usher was once of the fame opinion; but afterwards retracted it "; St. Ambrose, on whose authority it was grounded, speaking in the letter quoted by Baronius w, not of Gratian, but of Valentinian II. Gratian's army was commanded by Merobaudes, and count Balio, an officer of known valour and fidelity x. Some authors write, that a battle was fought near Paris y. But Zosimus tells us, that the two armies continued for five days together in the presence of each other, without any action, except a few skirmishes, in which no great advantage was gained on either side; but that in the end the troops of Gratian, provoked at his shewing so much savour, and giving the preference, to foreigners, as if he chiefly relied on their courage and fidelity, shamefully deserted him, and went over to Maximus. Gratian, seeing himself thus betrayed and abandoned, fled towards the Alps, attended only by three hundred horsemen; and having got into Lions, after he had been refused admittance into other cities, he was there taken prisoner, and soon after put to death i. That he was put to death at Lions, all authors agree, except Zosimus, who mistook, as is supposed, Sindeath as Lions. gidunum in Mæsia for Lugdunum in Gaul. Socrates a and Sozomen b relate his death with several circumstances unknown to other writers; for they tell us, that Andragathius, who was general of the horse under Maximus, and sent by him to pursue Gratian, coming up with the fugitive prince as he was croffing the Rhone, put him- f felf into a close litter, and ordered his men to give out, that in the litter was the empress Læta, whom Gratian had lately married, going to her husband. The emperor, giving credit to this report, and impatient to fee one whom he fo tenderly

8 PACAT. p. 264. OROS. ibid. E PACAT. p. 264. h Zos. p. 760. i Sulp. Sev. vit. S. Martin. c. 23. p. 208. k Oros.l. vii. c. 34. p. 220. l Oros. ibid. m Sulp. Sev. l. ii. c. 7. p. 290. n Greg. Tur. hift. Franc. l. i. c. 43. p. 30. viide Uss. ecclef. Brit. antiq. p. 592. p Zos. l. iv. p. 760. l Grld. excid. Brit. c. 10, 11. p. 117. s Socr. l. v. c. 11. p. 270. Soz. l. vii. c. 13. p. 720. Zos. p. 760. s Baron. ad ann. 383. t Uss. Brit. ecclef. antiq. p. 590. n Idem ibid. p. 1058. w Ambros. ep. 56. p. 320. p. 208. p. 267. Ambros. ep. 56. p. 320, 321. s Prosper. p. 267. Ambros. ep. 56. p. 320, 321. s Prosper. p. 268. h vii. c. 34. p. 721. s Oros. l. vii. c. 34. p. 721. c. 13. p. 721.

a loved, turned back to meet her; but while he was flanding with open arms ready to receive her, Andragathius, starting out of the litter, seized him, and soon after put him to death. This account cannot be reconciled with what we read in St. Ambrose, a contemporary writer, viz. that Gratian was betrayed by a person whom he had trusted with intire provinces: that being by the traitor invited to a banquet, he refused at first to comply with the invitation, suspecting some treachery; but being in the end deceived by false oaths, and seigned protestations, he came to the banquet, but was murdered, as he withdrew, by those who had feasted with him c. These circumstances are not mentioned by historians; only Orosius and Marcellinus write, that he was surprised by the craft and artifice of Maximus, and soon after put to death d. b Thus died Gratian in the flower of his age, having lived only twenty-four years, and three or four months, and reigned, from the time he had been created emperor, fixteen years, and one day, but, from the death of his father, only feven years, and nine months. He married in 374 or 375. Constantia, the posthumous daughter of the emperor Constantius, and had by her a son, and other children f; but they all died, it seems, before him s, as did likewise his wife Constantia, whose body was brought this very year to Constantinople, according to Idatius and the chronicle of Alexandria, on the thirty-first of August, and interred on the second of December. Gratian not long before his death married to his fecond wife Lata, to whom, as well as to her mother, by name Piffamine, Theodosius allowed a yearly pension, to support c them according to their rank, which they employed in relieving the poor of Rume, while that city was befieged by Alaric in the year 4081. The death of Gratian was no fooner known at Milan, than St. Ambrose, who had lived in great intimacy with him, and was, as appears from his works, deeply affected with the loss of such an excellent and inimitable prince, as he styles him, set out in great haste from that city to demand his body of Maximus in the name of Valentinian. But the usurper refused it to him, pretending, that the transporting of his ashes would serve only to renew the grief of the soldiery k. However, they were afterwards brought to Milan, and interred there near the tomb of Valentinian II. As for his character, all His character. writers, whether christians or pagans, agree, that he was endowed with every good d quality that can be defired in a prince, extolling with one voice his modesty, his justice, his moderation, and defire of doing good to all, in which he seemed to place his chief happiness. Ammianus Marcellinus, tho' a zealous pagan, writes, that he would have equalled the greatest princes of antiquity, had he lived longer; but at the same time blames him, as being too much addicted to hunting, and other diversions; which may be justly imputed to his youth, and for which he would, in all likelihood, have made ample amends by applying seriously to business in his riper years. St. Ambrose, Theodoret, Rufinus, Ausonius, and even Zosimus himself, give us a great idea of his piety, in which he surpassed all the princes who had reigned before him, Constantine himself not excepted. St. Ambrose, in his answer to a letter the emperor had written to him, e gives him the title of most christian m. The many laws he enacted in favour of the catholics, are so many instances of his zeal for the orthodox faith. Tho' none of the christian princes his predecessors had scrupled to assume the habit of the high pontiff of the pagans, yet when it was, according to custom, brought to him, he rejected Is faid to be the it, faying, that it was not consistent with the principles of the christian religion to first who rejectwear that habit. Thus Zosimus a; but it will be no easy task to prove, that either high pontiff. Constantine after his conversion, or any other christian prince, ever assumed the habit or title of Pontifex Maximus, though the latter was commonly given to them by the pagans, and even to Gratian himself o. The pagan priests, adds Zosimus, finding the emperor would not accept either of the habit or title of high-pontiff, f the chief man among them uttered these memorable words; If the prince will not be styled pontifex maximus, Maximus will soon become pontifex P, foretelling, that Maximus would be raised to the empire. But this pretended prediction, or, as we may call it, pun, was, without all doubt, invented after the revolt of Maximus. However that be, Maximus was no sooner informed of the death of Gratian, than Maximus dehe took his son Flavius Victor for his collegue in the power he had usurped, and clares his son

** Ambros. pfal. lxi. p. 848. d Oros. p. 220. Marcell. chron. Soc. Marcell. chron. Aug. civit. Dei, l. v. c. 25. Ambr. de fid. l. i. c. 20. p. 722. h Soz. l. vii. c. 13. p. 721. l Idem ibid. Zos. l. v. p. 815. h Am Ambros. de fid. p. 110. Zos. l. iv. p. 761. Baron. ann. 312. P Zos. ibid. e Socr. l. v. c. 11. p. 270. collegue. E THEODOR. I. V. C. 12. k Ambros. pf.l. lxi. p. 849.

Puts Merobaudes and Balio to death.

gave him, though then only an infant, the title of Augustus, as we read in Victor 2 the historian P; which is confirmed by some ancient inscriptions 4, tho' Zosimus gives him only the title of Casarr. The usurper fixed the seat of his empire at Treves, and extended his wings, to use the expression of Gildass, over Spain and Britain, being master, according to Zosimus, of all the countries, which Gratian, in the divifion of the western provinces, had reserved for his own share. We do not find, that he put any of Gratian's favourites to death, except Merobaudes, the conful of this year, and Balio, or, as some style him, Vallio, one of the best officers of his age; their only crime was their inviolable attachment to Gratian, by whom they had been raised for their eminent services to the greatest offices in the state ". Merobaudes received orders from the tyrant to dispatch himself, which he did accordingly, to avoid a more ignominious death w. Pacatus writes, that Balio was strangled in b his own house by the Britons, who served under Maximus x; but from St. Ambrose it appears, that the usurper had commanded him to be conveyed to Challon on the Saone, to be there burnt alive; but that he, by a violent death, prevented the execution of fo cruel a fentence y. Prosper, in his chronicle, writes, that Gratian was betrayed by Merobaudes; but is therein contradicted by all other writers, and the death of that brave officer fufficiently clears him from fo black an afperfion: whence in the chronicle of Prosper, some, instead of Merobaudes, read Mellobaudes; for Mellobaudes, king of the Franks, ferved under Gratian in quality of comes domeflicorum; and treachery was in those days the peculiar character of that nation. Maximus commanded count Narses likewise, and Leucadius, governor of a province, c to be put to death for their attachment to Gratian; but was prevailed upon by the famous St. Martin to spare them 2. Paulinus Diaconus, in his life of St. Ambrose, tells us, that that prelate was fent into Gaul to propose an accommodation between Maximus and young Valentinian; on which occasion he treated the usurper as one  $\epsilon u \epsilon$ off from the communion of the church, exhorting him to atone by a fincere repentance for the enormous crime he had committed in imbruing his hands in the blood of an innocent prince, his lawful fovereign: the same author adds, that other bishops, more complaifant, flocking from all parts to the tyrant's court, by their low and shameful flatteries, lulled him asleep in his wickedness b. As Maximus had brought over with him into Gaul the flower of the British youth, and the Roman soldiers d quartered in the island, the country remained by that means exposed to the incursions of the Scots and Picts, who meeting with little or no opposition, over-ran the northern parts, committing every-where dreadful ravages. The Romans now-andthen fent over troops to drive them back into their own country; but they constantly returned, and continued thus harassing the Roman provinces till the arrival of the Angles and Saxons, who made themselves masters of that part of the island which is now known by the name of England, about the middle of the fifth century. Those Britons, who attended Maximus into Gaul, never returned to their native country; but are supposed to have settled in Armorica, which was allotted to them by Maxi- e Gaul, are sup mus, and from its new inhabitants called Britannia, now Bretagne d. Colonies are posed to have said to have been sent from this mand into proughe at the Great, during the usursectled in Bre- the reign of Constantius Chlorus, the father of Constantine the Great, during the usurfaid to have been fent from this island into Bretagne at three different times, viz. in pation of Maximus, and when the Angles made themselves masters of this island. The ancients mention the latter, but take no notice of the other two colonies; which gives us room to question the truth of what the moderns have written on that head. Constantius, who in the end of the fifth century wrote the life of St. Germain of Auxerre, calls Bretagne, Armorica ; but Sidonius of Clermont, who flourished about the same time, speaks of Britons inhabiting the country that borders on the Loire &; nay, amongst his letters we find one to Riotham their king h. That the Britons, who went f over with Maximus, fettled in Armorica among the natives of the country, is not affirmed by any ancient historian, but may be looked upon as a conjecture not altogether improbable; but that they, driving out the ancient proprietors, made themfelves absolute masters of the country under the conduct of their leader Conon Meriodoc; and wanting women, had recourse to Dionotus, or Diodocbus, king of Cornwall, who sent them his own daughter, by name Ursula, with one thousand one hundred young women of quality, and sixty thousand of an inferior rank, is now deemed an arrant sable, even by the Roman-catholic writers. Had the Britons wanted women, they would, without all doubt, have kept those of the country, when they drove out the men. Besides, it is altogether improbable, that Cornwall was so stocked with women as to spare seventy-one thousand virgins. The sleet, fraught with these unhappy virgins, is supposed to have been driven by a storm to the mouth of the Rhine, and to have sailed up that river to Cologn, where they sell into the hands of the barbarians, who fought for Gratian against Maximus, and were by them either put to death, or carried into captivity. Ursula is still revered in the church of Rome as a saint; but the number of one thousand one hundred virgins, said to have suffered martyrdom with her, has been not many years since left out of the Roman breviary. Of Ausonius, who was preceptor to Gratian, we shall speak in note (L).

The Britons, who attended Maximus into

III.

(L) Decius, or rather Decimus Magnus Ausonius, was a native of Bourdeaux. He tells us, that he was defended of a noble family (15); however his father, who was a native of Bazas, and lived at Bourdeaux, followed the protession of physic, till his son procured him the rank and title of honorary prefect of Illyricum. He practifed gratis, and was generally effectived a min of learning; but, what may feen ftrange, was better acquainted with the Greek than the Latin tongue. He died in 377. at the age of eighty-eight or ninety (16). Cacilius Argicius Arborius, uncle to Aufonius by the mother, was born in Autun, and descended of an illustrious family; but his father and uncle being profcribed in the reign of Gallienus and Aurelian, he was obliged to abandon his country, and retire to Bayonne, where he married Æmilia C rinshia Maura, descended of a good family, and had by her one son, named Æmilius Magnus Arborius, and three daughters, Hilaria, Dryadia and Aonia: Arborius was a celebrated professor of eloquence; Hilaria professed celibacy, and became famous for her virtue; Dryadia was betrothed, but died a little before the celebration of her nuptials; Æonia was mother to Ausonius. Julia Cataphronia, the tister of Julius Ausonius, our author's father, embraced the state of virginity, and lived to a great age(17). As for Au-fonius himself, he studied rhetoric under his uncle Arborius at Toloufe, where Arborius taught about the year 325. before he was invited to Constantinople by Conflantine : he studied likewise at Bourdeaux under Minervius, Neposianus, and Staphylus, professors of grammar and rhetoric (18). When he had ended his studies, he first pleaded at the bar, and afterwards taught grammar and rhetoric; which profession he followed for the space of near thirty years, till he was by Valentinian I. appointed preceptor to his fon Gratian in 367. whom he attended into Germany the following year 368(19). He had foon after fome employment at court, with the title of comes or count, and was by degrees raised to the first offices in the state. Valentinian made him quastor, and had even promited him the confulfhip(20). After the death of Valentinian, Gratian raifed him to the high station of prafectus pratorio, first of Italy and Africa, and afterwards of Gaul. He was prefect of Gaul, and likewife conful, in 379 (21). He was, it feems, at Trezes when Gratian was killed (22); but foon after retired to Guienne (23). In a letter to Paulinus about the year 392, he describes the place where he then led a retired life (24), which is supposed to have been in Saintonge. He professed, without all doubt, the christian religion; but his writings are, even in the opinion of Scaliger, altogether unworthy of the christian name, being filled with pagan expressions, and the most bare-faced obscenities, in which he perhaps (arpaffes the most infamous among the pagan poets. As for his style, it is commended by some, and sound fault with by others. The reader will find the different opinions of critics concerning his writings in Baillet (25). His works, which give some light to history, are the epigrams he wrote on the professors of Bourdeaux, his verses on the chief cities of the empire, and the speech in which he returned thanks to Gratian for the honour he had done him in raifing him to the confulfhip. He wrote verses on all the emperors who had reigned till his time, and likewise consular tables, extending to the year 382 or 383 (26). But the latter work has been long since intirely lost, and of the former only a small part has reached us. His poem on the Mofelle was greatly effected by Symmachus (27), and is still looked upon by the best judges as his master-piece (28). Some ascribe to him, but without sufficient ground, the distinct that pass under the name of Cato (29). The emperor Theodosius, who had a particular esteem for him, wrote to him with his own hand, demanding his works (30). Aufonius and Symmachus lived in great intimacy, as appears from their letters to each other (31). Gratian, out of gratitude to his preceptor, not only preferred him to the greatest employments of the state, but likewise raised most of his relations. His father was by him honoured, as we have hinted above, with the title of prefect of Illyricum before the year 379. for in that year he died, being then in the eighty-eighth or ninetieth year of his age (32). Sanctus, who married his wife's fifter, was made governor of Britain Paulinus, son-in-law to his sister Dryadia, was railed to the government of the province of Tarraco in Spain, and the husband of his other niece by the same Dryadia to great employments (34). Arborius, presect of Rome in 380. is supposed to have been his nephew by the same fister (35). Aufonius married Attusia Lucana Sabina, the daughter of Attulius Lucanus Talifius, one of the chief citizens of Bourdeaux, and had by her two fons, viz. Ausonius and Hesperus, and one daughter, whose name is not mentioned in history. Aufonius died in his infancy; but Hesperus was presect of Africa in 376. of Italy in 378. and the same year prefect of

(15) Auson. grat. act. pro consul. p. 389. (16) Idem, parent. i. idyl. 30. p. 355—359. (17) Idem, parent. iv. p. 106—109. Prosess. Burdeg. car. 17. p. 160. (18) Vorsus in clar surb. p. 208. epist. p. 457. idyl. p. 367. Prosess. Burdeg. car. 12, 25. p. 156, 169. (19) Idyl. 32. p. 367. epist. 4. p. 428. (20) Idem grat. act. pro cons. p. 378. (21) Idem ibid. p. 391. (22) Idem, epist. 9. p. 443. (23) Idem, epist. 18. p. 463. idyl. 31. p. 485. (24) Idem, epist. 23. p. 485. (25) Baillet jugemens des savans, p. 466—472. (26) Auson. p. 136, 199, 375. (27) Sym. l. i. epist. 8. p. 9. (28) Vide Baillet, p. 472. (29) Voss. Lat. c. 4. p. 55. (30) Auson. p. 1. (31) Sym. l. i. ep. 8. p. 9. ep. 16. p. 22. ep. 31. p. 25, &c. (32) Auson. idyl. 30. p. 358, 359. parent. i. p. 102. (33) Idem, parent. xviii. p. 123. (34) Idem ibid. p. 123, 129. idyl. 30. p. 358. (35) Idem, parent. p. 121. SK. Gaul

Maximus proposes an alliance with Theodolius.

Who acknowledges him for his collegue.

But to resume the thread of the history. Theodosius, who had never stirred this year a from Constantinople, or the neighbourhood of that metropolis, was no sooner informed of the death of Gratian, than he drew together all his forces, with a defign to march against the usurper, and prevent him from seizing on Italy and West-Illyricum, belonging to young Valentinian. But in the mean time, Maximus having affured him by his deputies, that he had no design upon the dominions of Valentinian, but that he would suffer him peaceably to reign in Italy, Africa, and Illyricum, Theodosius thought it advisable to put off his journey into the west. Not long after, Maximus fent his great chamberlain to Theodosius, not to make an apology, says Zosimus b, for the murder of Gratian, but to propose an alliance with the emperor against the common enemies of the empire; and in case he rejected that friendly offer, to denounce b war against him. Theodosius, not thinking the glory that might accrue to him from revenging the death of Gratian a sufficient motive for entering into a war, which he forefaw would be attended with great evils, and perhaps with the ruin of the empire, the neighbouring barbarians being ready to invade it on all fides, hearkened to the proposals of Maximus; and acknowledging him in the end for his collegue, sent Cynegus, then comes largitionum, and afterwards prefect of the east, into Egypt, with orders to proclaim Maximus there, and to cause his image to be set up in Alexandria. Zosimus in this place writes, that Theodosius only pretended to be reconciled with Maximus, to divert him from surprising young Valentinian, who was not in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy; and elsewhere blames him for c observing the treaty he concluded with the usurper, when he ought both in policy and honour to have made war upon him. Pacatus tells us, that when Maximus revolted, Theodosius was engaged in a war on the most distant confines of the east c, perhaps with the Saracens; for he is faid by Marcellinus f to have overcome them about the beginning of his reign; and Libanius writes, that the news of a victory gained this year by Richomer was received with great joy by the inhabitants of An-The Hunns, likewise called Ephtolites, whose country bordered on Persia, as appears from Procopius, are faid to have broken into Mesopotamia about this time, and to have even laid siege to Edessa, which obliged Theodosius to send part of his forces to the relief of that city b. No wonder therefore, that the emperor at this d juncture chose rather to receive Maximus for his partner in the empire, than, by rejecting his proposals, to kindle a war in the very bowels of the empire, which, in all likelihood, would have proved fatal to both parties. The wars we have mentioned were managed by his generals; for the emperor himself, as we have observed above, continued the whole year at Constantinople, or in that neighbourhood. In the very beginning of the present year 383. that is, on the sixteenth, or, as others will have it, on the nineteenth of January, he had declared his fon Arcadius emperor i. The ceremony was performed with extraordinary pomp at the palace of Hebdomon, clared emperor. distant seven miles from Constantinople. Arcadius was then about six years old; for at the time of his death, which happened on the first of May 408. he was, according e to Socrates, in the thirty-first year of his age k. As for Valentinian II. who possessed

Arcadius de-

•

* Themist. or. xviii. p. 220. b Zos. l. iv. p. 764. c Ider Pacat. p. 263. f Marchll. chron. & Liban. vit. p. 67. Idat. Marcell. Prosp. chron. k Socr. l. vi. c. 23. p. 332. e Idem, p. 761. a Idem, p. 7--
** Sur. 15 Novemb. p. 342. е Расат. р. 263. I IDAT. MARCELL. PROSP. chron.

Gaul with his father. The daughter of Ausonius was married first to Vallatinus Euromius, who died when he was yet very young, tho' he had been already governor of a province in Illyricum, and afterwards to Thalasses, who was proconsul of Africa in 378. She had one son by Euromus or Euromius, and several children by Thalasses, of whom the eldest was named Ausonius (36). Symmachus mentions a fon of Thalassus, to whom the senate had at his request granted some favours (37). Ausonins had taken care to instruct his daughter in the liberal sciences (38). His wife Sabina died in the twenty-eighth year of her age (39); and Aufonius composed her epitaph thirty-lix years after (40). He wrote his consular tables, and some other historical pieces, for the use and instruction of his son Hesterus, whom he commends as a young man of extraordinary parts, and naturally more grave and composed than himself (41). Hesperus married the daughter of Severus Censor Julianus, and Pomponia Urbica, who was descended of an illustrious family, and had by her at least three children, of whom the youngest. named Pastor, died when he was but a youth: of Paulinus, his eldest son, surnamed the penicent, we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. From the poem he wrote on his repentance, and styled Eucharisticon, it appears, that his father was first vicar of Macedon, where Paulinus was born in 376. and afterwards proconful of Africa, which employment he held for the space of twenty-eight months (42).

(36) Idem ibid. p. 119. idyl. 30. p. 358. Sym. l. i. ep. 19. p. 17. (37) Sym. l. v. ep. 56. p. 208. (38) Aufon. idyl. 32. p. 364, 365. (39) Idem, parent. p. 114. (40) Idem ibid. p. 113. (41) Aufon. p. 79. idyl. 32. p. 362. (42) Paulin. euch. p. 284, 286.

a the western provinces of Illyricum, with Italy and Africa, while Maximus held Gaul, Spain and Britain, he was at this time but twelve, or at most thirteen years old; and the great disturbances which his mother Justina raised, by espousing with too much warmth the cause of the Arians, give us room to believe, that she reigned in her son's name. Under her Probus, who had been conful in 371. and prefect of Illyricum and Italy in 368. had the chief direction of affairs 1; but, in all matters of moment, the young prince had recourse to Theodosius m; nay, Orosius looks upon Theodosius as sole emperor, after the death of Gratian, of the western as well as the eastern provinces n.

THE next confuls were Richomer and Clearchus. The former was of the royal · blood of the Franks, had been comes domesticorum under Gratian, and was left by that b prince with Theodofius, when created emperor. In a law of the year 391. he is styled general of the horse and soot o. He was a pagan, but a man of great integrity, valour, and experience in war, as appears from the several letters which Symmachus wrote to him P. He is by some authors called Ricimer, and by others Richimer, and Ricomer. Gregory of Tours speaks of one Richimer, the father of Theodemir king of the Franks 9, whom some authors, whose opinion is not ill grounded, take to be the consul of this year 384. Clearchus, his collegue, had been proconsul of Asia in 364. and afterwards prefect of Constantinople, in which employment he was succeeded this year by the philosopher Themistius, who, on that occasion, made a short speech in commendation of Theodofius, who had raifed him to that dignity r. This year Proc culus, count of the east, being accused of extortion, and several outrages committed by his orders at Daphne near Antioch, was ignominiously deposed, and obliged to abscond, till the rage of the multitude was appealed s. Icarius, the son of Theodorus, who had conspired against Valens, was appointed count of the east in his room, which office he discharged with great rigour and severity, not sparing even the public magistrates, whom he put to the rack, in defiance of the laws, says Libanius, which had been but lately published; that is, of the laws dated the twenty-sixth of April 380. and thirty-first of July 381. This year a famine, attended as usual with a dreadful Afamine in plague, raged in Antioch, and most other cities of Syria. The plague soon ceased; Syria. but the famine continuing, Libanius, in the name of the people of Antioch, had recourse d to Icarius, intreating him to relieve, by some means or other, the poor, who had flocked from all parts to that metropolis, and were daily perishing in great numbers with hunger. But Icarius, without being in the least affected with their calamity, The cruelty of returned no other answer, than that they were abhorred, and justly punished, by the Icarius. gods w. This occasioned great disturbances in Antioch, which however were appeared without bloodshed. The same year Theodosius, resolving utterly to extirpate the idolatrous worship of the pagan gods, enacted several laws, forbidding all his subjects, on pain of death, or perpetual banishment, to offer sacrifices to idols; to consult aruspices, or diviners of what denomination soever; or to practise any of those ceremonies, which had been forbidden by his christian predecesfors. Zosimus, in his e usual style, better becoming a declaimer than an orator, tells us, that Theodosius proclaimed war against the gods; that he attacked them in their temples; that he proceeded with such severity against those who worshipped them, that no one dared own he believed there were gods, or could with fafety lift up his eyes to heaven, and adore the stars that shine there y. Libanius writes, that, on a certain occasion, standing in need of the affiftance of the gods, he had recourse to their altars; but not daring to implore their protection, or shed a tear before their statues, he only bewailed within himself his unhappy condition z. It was on occasion of the above-mentioned laws, that Libanius made his famous speech in defence of the temples, wherein he inveighs with great bitterness against the monks; blames the conduct of Constantine the Great; extols Julian; and ends his speech with threatening, that the countrypeople, who were more attached to the religion of their ancestors, than the inhabitants of the cities, will, if further provoked, take arms, and defend them by force a. The

1 Socr. l. v.c. 11. p. 270. Soz. l. vii. c. 13. p. 720.

C. 35. p. 220. ° Cod. Theod. chron. p. 123. * Symm. l. iii. ep. 59, 61. p. 195. * Oros. l. vii. ep. 68. & orat. xx. p. 471. * Idem, orat. xx. p. 464. * Cod. Theod. tit. iv. p. 435. * Liban. vit. p. 69. & orat. xx. p. 468. * Cod. Theod. tit. 9. p. 267. & l. xvi. tit. 7. leg. 18. p. 203. & tit. 10. leg. 7. p. 266. * Zos. p. 758. * Lib. vit. p. 63. * Idem, orat. pro temp. p. 10—63.

attachment of the country-people, or inhabitants of villages, called by the Latins Pagani, to their idols and temples, gave rise to the denomination of Paganus or Pe-gan, which began about this time to be given to all who worshipped idols. Libanius, a in that speech, often addresses himself to Theodosius as present; but nevertheless we cannot persuade ourselves, that he had the boldness to pronounce it before so religious

Theodosius canses all the temples to be shut up in the East, and in Egypt.

A folema embaffy fent to him by the king of Pertia, and zealous a prince. It ought, in our opinion, to be looked upon only as a declamation, delivered not in the presence of the emperor, but perhaps of his own scholars, and other pagan auditors. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the pious emperor was fo far from yielding to the arguments which the pagan sophist alledged in favour of his idols, that, on the contrary, having appointed Cynegius this very year prefect of the east, he strictly injoined him to shut up all the temples within his jurisdiction. Cynegius executed his orders with such zeal and fidelity in the East, properly so called, that he was foon after fent by the emperor for the fame purpose into Egypt, where, b by breaking in pieces the idols, by prohibiting all manner of idolatrous worship, and by shutting up the temples, in such manner that no one could have access to them, he, in a short time, utterly abolished the very remains of idolatry in a country, which, for many ages, had been, above all others, addicted to superstition? The zeal which he exerted on this occasion for the true religion, procured him after his death, which happened in 388. the honour of being interred in the church of the Apostles at Constantinople, the burying-place of the emperors m; whence his ashes were conveyed the ensuing year by his wife Acancia into Spain, probably the place of his nativity ". He was comes largitionum from 381 to 383. when he was made prefect of the east, in which office he continued till his death; that is, to the c year 388. in which he died, being then consul with the emperor Theodosius o. Libanius himself, notwithstanding his zeal for idolatry, could not help commending him as a magistrate of an unblemished character P; and Theodosius, in a law addressed to him in 385. fays, that his justice and equity were known and applauded by all the world q. It is surprising, that Baronius should confound the present Cynegius with another of the same name, who in 401. was sent by Arcadius to demolish the temple He forbids, un- of Marnas, and other temples in the city of Gaza. This year the emperor published a law, forbidding the marriages of coulin-germans, which had been always deemed marriages of lawful among the Romans, and no one had ever looked upon as incestuous. However, cousin-germans Theodosius not only prohibited such marriages, but, by the same law, commanded d the contracting parties to be burnt alive, their estates to be confiscated, and their children to be deemed illegitimater. Arcadius sostened the rigour of this law by another dated the twenty-fixth of November 396. whereby he exempts the transgressors from the penalties inflicted on them by the law of Theodosius; but nevertheless declares such marriages unlawful and incestuous, and the children incapable of receiving the least legacy from their parents. In 405, he intirely revoked the law of his father, declaring the marriages of cousin-germans absolutely lawful. This revocation was not received in the west till the time of Justinian, who caused it to be put into his code; by which means it became general, and fuch marriages were celebrated without restraint or scruple in the west, as well as in the east. At the same time, e and under the same penalties, Theodosius revived the ancient law, forbidding the marrying of nieces, which he extended to the niece of a first wife ". By another law of this year, dated the twenty-first of January, he ordered Cynegius to make a diligent fearch after the Eunomian, Macedonian, Arian, and Apollinarian bishops and clergy in Constantinople, and to drive them all, without exception, out of the city w. By a third he forbids the Jews to buy christian slaves; and allows all christians the liberty of fetting free such slaves as they shall have purchased x. Theodosius, as appears from the dates of his laws, passed most part of this year at Constantinople, and there received a folemn embassy sent to him by the king of Persia, to solicit, or rather to buy, a peace with rich presents, and to excuse, says a panegyrist, by his f submission, all the evils, which, till that time, the Romans had suffered from the Persian nation. They had lost their great king Sapor II. who died about the year 379. after having lived and reigned seventy years. He was succeeded by Artaxer, whom Eutychius supposes to have been his son 2, tho' Agathias and Abulfaragius call him

<sup>1</sup> Zos. l. iv. p. 762. Cod. Theod. l. x. tit. 10. leg. 15. p. 444. IDAT. chron. <sup>m</sup> Zos. p. 769.

R IDAT. faft.

Cod. Theod. l. iv. p. 762. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 111.

LIBAN. de ingred. ad judices, p. 100.

Cod. Theod. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 3. p. 297.

Cod. Juft. l. v. tit 4. leg. 19. p. 419.

Cod. Theod. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 3. p. 297.

W Idem, l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 13. p. 129.

X Bester p. 267.

Z Europe A. 122. leg. 3. p. 297. y PACAT. p. 263. 2 EUTYCH. P. 472.

a his younger brother 2. But if Sapor himself was born after the decease of his father, as most authors write, he could not be succeeded by his younger brother. Artaxer, ityled Ardshir by Abulfaragius and Eutychius, and Artaxerxes by Scaliger and Petavius, reigned only four years, and was fucceeded in 383, by his fon Safor III. called by Theophanes, Arfabel, who, after having reigned five years, bequeathed the kingdom in 388. to his fon Vararanes or Varanes IV. furnamed Kermasua, perhaps from some country called Kerma, conquered by his father. Varanes reigned eleven years, and maintained the whole time a good understanding with the Romans b. The embasfadors, of whom we have spoken above, were sent, not by Sapor II. as Pacatus feems to suppose , but by Super III. who reigned in Persia this year 384. Orosius b writes, that a treaty was concluded between the Persians and Romans, in virtue of With whom he which the whole east still enjoyed a profound tranquillity at the time he was compoling his history; that is, about the year 416 d. The articles of this treaty are not treaty. mentioned by any historian; but from a law of Theodofius, dated the fourteenth of June 387. and addressed to Gaddanes, satrapa or governor of Sophene, it appears, that the authority of the Roman emperors was acknowledged in that province, which, by most geographers, is placed to the south of Armenia, and is reckoned, by some historians, one of the five provinces which fovian yielded to the Persians. While the Persian embassadors were still at Constantinople, a second son was born to the Arcadius born. emperor in that city on the ninth of September. Theodosius gave him the name of c Honorius, to honour in his fon, fays the poet Claudian, the memory of his brother e diffinguished him with the title of nobilissimus, or most noble, and named him consul for the year 386 f. THE fame year, the Sarmatians having made an irruption into the dominions of Valentinian, he dispatched one of his generals, not named in history, against them, who drove them back with great flaughter, and took many prisoners, who were all The Sarmatians fent to Rome, to be either massacred in the shews of gladiators, or destroyed by the deseated by the The emperor, in the letter which he wrote to the fenate, acquainting troops of Va-he fuccess that had attended his arms, bestowed the highest encomings wild beasts. them with the success that had attended his arms, bestowed the highest encomiums on the general who commanded on that occasion 8. As for Valentinian himself, he d continued the whole year, as appears from his laws, in Italy; for, during the months of March and April, he was at Milan; at Aquileia in the month of September; and again at Milan in October, and the two remaining months of the year b. By a law dated the twenty fecond of March, which was this year Good-friday, he commanded all the prisoners, who were not charged with the enormous crimes mentioned in the law, to be fet at liberty, in honour of the approaching great festival i. This year died Vettius Agorius Prætextatus, a person greatly commended and extolled, as one Prætextatus of the most deserving men of his age, by Ammianus Marcellinus, who wrote his history dies. about this time, by Zosimus, Symmachus, Libanius, and in general by all the pagan writers; for he was not only a pagan himself, but augur, high-pontiff of Vesta and e the sun, and the head, as we may style him, of the pagan superstition. He was by Julian made proconsul of Achaia in 362. by Valentinian I. presect of Rome in 367. and afterwards prefect of Italy and Illyricum; in which employments he acquitted himself so as to be at the same time feared and beloved. Ammianus writes, that, His tharaffer. from his youth, he excelled in every virtue becoming a man of his rank; that he revived the gravity and probity of the ancient Romans k. Zosimus calls him a man of an unblemished character, and proposes him as a pattern to be imitated by all governors of provinces, and other magistrates 1. Macrobius supposes the banquet of the learned men, which is the subject of his faturnalia, to have been celebrated at the house of Prætextatus. Symmachus looked upon him as in every respect the best, or, f at least, as one of the best men of his age. He tells us among other things, that he accepted no legacies, but constantly yielded to the children or relations of the testator, whatever was bequeathed to him; that he was no less affected with the missortunes of others, than with his own; and that such as possessed estates adjoining to ** AGATH. l. iv. p. 135. ABULF. p. 90.

** AGATH. p. 136. THEOPH. p. 55, 58. EUTYCH. p. 472.
CLAUD. in Eut. l. ii. p. 120.
** CPACAT. p. 263.
** OROS. ibid.
** CLAUD. de Ser. p. 194.
** Symm. l. x. ep. 61. p. 461.
** h. Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 112.
** Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 38. leg. 7. p. 276, 277.
** AMMIAN. l. xxii. p. 210. &c. 1. xxii. p. 210. &c. 1. xxii. p. 399.
** MACROB. l. i. C. 1. p. 162.

his, in the disputes which arose between him and them, concerning the limits of their lands, would admit of no other judge but himself; so great was the opinion they had

Vol. VI. Nº 6.

)(

Ь

ķ

1

Ħ,

Th

of his integrity ". The many letters which Symmachus wrote to him, and, after his a death, to the emperors concerning him, are so many panegyrics, in which he extols his wisdom, his integrity, his modesty and moderation, his humanity and good-nature to all, not excepting even his most inveterate enemies . He came this year to Rome, and entered that metropolis in a kind of triumph, being attended by all the magistrates, by the nobility and the people, and repairing, amidst the

made prefect of Rome.

Theodofius with corn.

He forgives those who had conspired against him.

loud acclamations of the multitude, to the capitol, pronounced there an elegant oration in praise of Valentinian P. He was then consul elect; but before he entered upon that new office, he was snatched away by a natural, but sudden death, to the inexpressible grief of the Roman people. The senate erected several statues to the honour of a person, who lived, to use the expression of Symmachus, even after his b death, in the memory of all good men 9. St. Jerom, who was then at Rome, compares the death of Prætextatus, whom he styles a facrilegious idolater, with that of the holy abbess Lea, who died a few days after him r. Prætextatus was no friend to the christians; but used to say, by way of raillery, that he would readily embrace their religion, provided they would make him bishop of Rome:. About this time Symmachus was appointed prefect of Rome, in which employment he acquitted himself with great reputation, and procured a law from the emperor, moderating the expences of the new confuls, pretors and questors. The confuls used, agreeable to a custom which then obtained, to fend rich presents to their friends, and to all persons of distinction; and the pretors and questors to expend immense sums in the public e sports, which they were bound to exhibit. The value of the presents to be given by the confuls, and the fums to be laid out in the public shews by the two other magistrates, were fixed by this law, and those declared infamous, who should solicit an exemption from it . This year a famine being apprehended in Rome, by reason of the scarcity of corn in Africa, which used of late years to supply that metropolis, Theodosius, at the request of Symmachus, delivered the Roman people from the danger supplies Rome that threatened them, by sending them great plenty of grain from Egypt and Macedon. For this feafonable supply, Symmachus returned thanks, not only to Theodosius, but to count Ricomer, and likewise to Rusinus, who, it seems, made already some figure in the emperor's court ". The great power he afterwards acquired there, does d noways redound to the honour of Theodosius. The following year 385. when Arcadius and Bauto were consuls, St. Austin, then professor of rhetoric in Milan, pronounced on the first of January a panegyric on the two new consuls w. Bauto was by nation a Frank, and had been fent by Gratian in 381. to the affistance of Theodosius; but returning afterwards into the west, he served Valentinian II. with great fidelity. Valentinian passed the first six months of this year at Milan, and the rest either at Aquileia or Verona x. Tho' he enacted this year several excellent laws in favour of the church, yet he suffered his mother Justina to persecute and oppress the catholics, because they would not yield the great church of Milan to the Arians, whom she countenanced and protected v. Theodofius continued all this time at Constantinople, e where a dangerous conspiracy was formed against him; but discovered a little before it was to be put in execution. Most of the conspirators were apprehended, tried, and fentenced to death; but Theodofius generously forgave them, and would not allow any inquiries to be made after their accomplices, tho' fome persons, in whom he reposed great considence, were suspected to be in that number z. Not long after died at Constantinople the emperor's daughter Pulcheria, who was soon followed by the Pulcheria, and empress Flaccilla her mother, to the great grief of Theodosius, who was a no less tenher mother the der father than husband. The empress died at Scotuminum in Thrace, where she was empress Flac- drinking the waters for the recovery of her health; but her body was brought back to Constantinople, and interred there with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. I Gregory of Nyssa, who was then at Constantinople, pronounced her funeral oration, as he had done fome time before that of her daughter Pulcheria. The fathers of the church, who lived in that age, beftow upon her the highest encomiums; and the pagan writers themselves cannot help extolling her piety, moderation, and other vir-

n Symm. l. i. ep. 38—49. p. 29. ep. 47. p. 34.

o Idem, l. x. ep. 34. p. 417. ep. 23, 25. p. 415. ep. 34. p. 417. ep. 23, 25. p. 415. ep. 34. p. 417. ep. 23, 25. p. 415. ep. 34. p. 417. ep. 405. 406. 424.

r Hier. ep. 24. p. 156.
ldem, ep. 61. p. 165.
r Symm. ep. 21. p. 402. & cod. Theod. tit. 5. p. 382, 384.

s Symm. l. iii. ep. 55, 82. p. 127, 138.
w Aug. contra lit. Petiliani, l. iii. c. 25. p. 131.
THEMIST. OTAL. XIX. p. 231.

a Greg. Nyff. de Pul. p. 516. & de Flaccill. p. 528.

a tues b. The Greeks honour her as a faint, and celebrate her feast on the fourteenth of September, perhaps the day on which she died. The next consuls were Honorius, styled in the fasti nobilissimus puer, and Evodius, perhaps the presect of Gaul under Maximus. This year Theodofius continued at Constantinople till the third of September, when he is supposed to have left that metropolis, in order to march against the Greuthongi, who were ready to pass the Danube, and break into the empire, under the conduct of Odotheus, whom Claudian honours with the title of king d. The barbarians were attacked, and utterly defeated by the two emperors Theodofius and Throdofius Arcadius, who returned to Constantinople, leading with them an incredible number of gains a great captives, and entered that city in triumph on the twelfth of October. Thus Idatius victory over the in his fasti, and Marcellinus in his chronicle. Claudian likewise speaks of a victory. b in his fasti, and Marcellinus in his chronicle. Claudian likewise speaks of a victory gained this year by the two emperors over the Greuthongis. But Zosimus, to rob Theodosius of the glory of this, as he does of most other victories, ascribes it to Promotus, who commanded in Thrace, in quality of general of the foot. According to his account, Promotus fent into the enemy's camp fome persons, who, pretending to be deferters, undertook to conduct the barbarians over the river, and to betray the Roman commander and his army into their hands. Odotheus, not suspecting any treachery, suffered himself to be conducted by them; but in the mean time Promotus, informed by his emissaries of the enemy's design, received them so briskly, while they expected to meet with no opposition, that great numbers of them were driven c back into the Danube, and drowned, and the rest either taken prisoners, or cut in pieces. After this, Promotus attacked and made himself master of their camp, in which he found a great booty, and an incredible multitude of women and children, whom he immediately sent to Theodosius; but the emperor ordered them to be let at Hestes the catliberty, and having made them rich presents, gave them leave to return to their tives at liberty. own country, hoping by that means to gain the good will of the barbarians, fays Zosimus, to entice them into his service, and to employ them in the war against Maximus, for which he was then making great preparations under hand &. other writers suppose Theodosius to have commanded his troops in person; nay, Claudian tells us, that he engaged Odotheus himself, who was killed in the battle h. d emperor, soon after his return to Constantinople, married to his second wife Galla, He marries fifter to Valentinian II. and daughter to Valentinian I. by the empress Justina. He Galia. had by her a fon called Gratian, who died before his father, and a daughter named Galla Placidia, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the reign of her brother Honorius, and her son Valentinian III i. As for Valentinian, he was at Milan on the eighteenth of January; at Ticinum or Pavia on the fifteenth of February; at Aquileia on the twentieth of April; at Milan during the months of June and July; at Aquileia on the third of November; and again at Milan on the eighteenth of the fame month, and on the third of December k. Baronius produces a letter written this year by Valentinian to Salust prefect of Rome, injoining him to rebuild the church of Valentinian St. Paul in the neighbourhood of that city, and to inlarge it, by taking in, with the orders the consent of the senate and people of Rome, part of the public road: he commands him Paul in the to acquaint the senate, and the christian people, with the orders he had received, and Offian-way to to follow in every thing the directions of the venerable bishop of that city 1. Pru- be rebuilt. dentius describes the church of St. Paul placed on the Ostian-way, or the way leading to Ostia, and tells us, that it was built by an emperor, which Baronius understands of the emperor who reigned in Prudentius's time, and thence concludes, that the above-mentioned church was finished by Honorius m. That it was finished in the reign of Honorius, is certain, not from the words of Prudentius quoted by Baronius, but from an ancient inscription, which informs us at the same time, that it was begun by f Theodosius, perhaps when he came to Rome in 398. and imbellished by his daughter Placidia, in the time of Leo the Great, bishop of Rome. However, it is manifest from the code, that Valentinian issued orders this year 386. for the building of that church, tho the work was not begun till the reign of Honorius. The next consuls were the emperor Valentinian the third time, and Eutropius, who had been proconful of Asia, and afterwards prefect of the east. In the very beginning of this year 387.

b THEMIST. orat. xix. p. 231. orat. xviii. p. 225.

Byz. fam. p. 70. d CLAUD. conf. Hon. 4. p. 55.

8 Zos. l. iv. p. 759—763. b CLAUD. ibid. p. 55.

chron. p. 115—117. l BARON. 2nn. 386.

Theod. chron. p. 383.

* Vide men. mag. Grzc. 14 Sep. p. 209. & GANGE

* IDAT. p. 61. MARCEL. p. 6.

i Philost. I. x. c. 7. p. 139.

* Idem ibid.

* GRUTER. p. 1170.

* Cod.

Theodosius published a law addressed by way of letter to all the cities of the east, a

A fedition at Antioch;

Which is appeased, and the authors of it punished.

injoining the magistrates to honour the folemnity of Easter, by setting at liberty fuch as on the approach of that great festival they should find in their prisons, unless they had been confined for very enormous crimes. It was on this occasion that the emperor uttered those memorable words; I wish it were in my power to restore life to the dead . This year Theodofius finding the exchequer quite drained, and being on the other hand obliged to celebrate, according to cultom, the fifth year of the reign of his fon Arcadius, to which he added, it feems, the folemnity of the tenth year of his own reign, tho' he was then only in his ninth, an extraordinary tax was laid on the people to defray that expence "; for we are told, that on such occasions each foldier received five pieces of gold o. Most cities submitted chearfully to this burden; but the people of Antioch, complaining of it as an unreasonable b oppression, crouded to the house of Flavianus their bishop, as soon as the edict was published, to implore his protection; but not finding him, they returned to the forum, and would have torn the governor of the city in pieces, had not the officers who attended him, with much ado, kept back the enraged multitude till he made his escape. Being thus prevented from venting their fury upon him, they sell upon the emperor's statues, broke some of them in pieces, and dragged others, with the statues of his two sons Arcadius and Honorius, of the late empress Flaccilla, and of his father Theodosius, through the chief streets of the city, uttering the whole time most injurious and abusive reflections against their persons P. Having thus demolished most of the emperor's statues, they set fire to the house of one of the prin- c cipal citizens, to whom they bore some grudge, and would have committed other diforders, had they not been dispersed by a body of archers, who, by wounding only two of the rabble, struck terror into all the rest. The governor, hearing the archers were come, shewed himself to the multitude, and with an air of authority commanded them to disperse, and retire to their houses. Thus was the sedition quelled at once; and the city restored by noon to its former tranquillity 4. The two persons, who had been wounded by the archers, being taken, informed against their accomplices, who were all by different ways put to death by the governor of the city: some were beheaded; others exposed to the wild beasts in the theatre, and some burnt alive; he did not even spare the children, who had insulted the emperor's d statues; and caused several persons to be executed, who had been but bare spectators of the injuries offered them r. While the cruel governor was thus proceeding with inexorable feverity against the unhappy Antiochians, almost without distinction of guilty or innocent, a report was spread, that a body of troops was at hand, with orders to plunder the city, and put all the inhabitants to the fword, without diffinction of fex, age, or condition. Hereupon that populous metropolis of Syria was at once turned into a defert, the citizens abandoning in the utmost terror and confusion their dwellings, and retiring with their wives and families to the neighbouring mountains and deferts. As that report proved groundless, some returned to their e native country; but the far greater part, dreading the cruelty of the governor, and the just resentment of the emperor, kept themselves concealed in the neighbouring cities, or amongst the rocks and mountains. To those who returned, St. Chrysostom preached fome of those inimitable homilies, which have reached our times, and are wonderfully adapted to stir them up to repentance, and to make them look upon the danger that threatened them as drawn down upon them from heaven by their The eloquence and zeal of the preacher, joined to the apprehension they were under of the effects of the emperor's indignation, wrought a great change in that licentious and diffolute people, as appears not only from St. Chrysoftom himself's, but from Sozomen u, and even from Libanius w. In the mean time, Theodosius, being f informed of what had passed at Antioch, and particularly of the insults offered to his statues, and to those of his father, of the late empress, and of his children, was provoked to such a degree, that in the first transports of his passion he commanded highly provoked the city to be laid in ashes, and the inhabitants, without distinction of fex or age, against the city to be put to the sword x. This shews, that he was naturally choleric, and apt, when

m Chrys. tom. i. or. 6. p. 84.
n Liban. or. xxiii. p. 520.
r. xv. p. 407.
9 Idem, or. xiv. & xxiii. p. 396, 415.
Chrys. homil. iii. p. 49. Theodore...
v. c. 19. p. 731.
Lib. p. 397.
Vide Chrys. hom. ii. p. 22. hom. xi. p. 127. hom. vi. p. 86.

1 Idem, p. 169.
Soz. l. vii. c. 23. p. 741.
W Lib. or. xiv. p. 403. or. xv. p. 407. l. v. c. 19. p. 731. Lib. p. 397.

hom. iv. p. 54.

* Unde Chrys, hom.ii. p. 22

hom. iv. p. 54.

* Chrys, ep. ad Cel. hom. vii. p. 207.

Theodoret. l. v. c. 19. p. 731.

a in a passion to enter into the most violent measures. His indignation seemed to him the more just, as he had favoured that city above all the rest; for he had designed to reside some time there, as Valens had done, and had with that view built a magnificent palace at Daphne, and another in the old city, besides several other structures, with which he had at a great expence embellished that metropolis y. But nothing incensed him so much against that ungrateful city, as their having insolently insulted even the dead z, that is, his father, and the empress Flaccilla. However, as his wrath foon affuaged, he revoked the order he had given, and contented himfelf for the present with causing the public baths, the theatre, and the circus, to be thut up, with degrading the city from the rank of a metropolis, and subjecting it b as a common village to its rival Laodicea 2. A certain quantity of bread was there daily distributed amongst the poor, as at Rome and Constantinople; and of this largess too the emperor thought fit to deprive them b. These punishments Theodosius inflicted on the Antiochians in general, but at the same time he dispatched Cafarius, magister Appoints officiorum, and Ellebichus, magister militum, or general, with full power to try and judges to try punish such as had been concerned in the late riot c. Ellebichus was a man of an and punish the unblemished character, and is said to have squared all his actions by that colden unblemished character, and is said to have squared all his actions by that golden and truly christian rule, Do as you would be done by d. Gregory Nazianzen wrote a letter to him, intreating him, by their ancient friendship, to discharge a reader from the service, and assuring him, that by so doing he would draw down the blessing of c Heaven upon his arms, in a war of which he had the whole management. Cafarius, his collegue in this commission, was at this time magister officiorum, was presect of Constantinople in 365. presect of the east in 395. and consul in 397 f. He is commended by Sozomen and Libanius as a man of great integrity, and one who never promised what he did not design to perform s. These two officers the emperor choses in regard of their known integrity, to try and punish, according to the laws, such of the Antiochians as should be accused and found guilty of having been any-ways concerned in the late fedition. St. Chrysostom describes, with his usual eloquence, the dread and terror which on this occasion seized the inhabitants of Antioch: they apprehended nothing less than the utter destruction of their city; the emperor, as they d were well informed, was highly offended, especially at the outrages offered to his deceased father, and to the late empress, and resolved to punish them with the utmost feverity; the judges were men not to be moved by intreaties, or gained over with presents; the crime they had committed was open rebellion, and, according to the laws of the empire, punishable with death, and the confiscation of their estates; even such as were barely suspected, were liable to the most rigorous inquiries, to racks and tortures. The consternation was, as St. Chrysostom informs us, so great the city in the and general, that the inhabitants were preparing to retire, all to a man, with what utmost constereffects they could carry with them, to the mountains and deferts; and it was with nation. the utmost difficulty that he and the governor diverted them from that resolution.

e As the two judges approached the city, the whole people went out to meet them, and were received by them, especially by Ellebichus, in a very obliging manner, which allayed in some degree their fears. The next morning the alarm was renewed; for the two commissioners, having placed guards in the several quarters of the city, to restrain the people from assembling, summoned all the members of the senate or public council to their lodging, examined them concerning the late riot, heard with great patience what they alledged in their own defence, and in defence of their fellow-citizens; and after various inquiries, dismissed them, highly satisfied with the treatment they had met with, especially from Ellebichus, who could not refrain from tears, when they, throwing themselves at his seet, implored his protection. The f compassion and good-nature he shewed on this occasion revived in a manner the whole city; their fears began to abate, and joy appeared in every face. But the scene soon changed; for Ellebichus, having caused great numbers of persons of all ranks to be seized in the night-time upon private informations, repaired early next morning to the place where justice was usually administered; and ordering the prifoners to be brought in chains before his tribunal, fentenced fuch of them to death as owned their crime, and ordered those who denied it to be cruelly racked, without

THEODORET. l. v. c. 18. p. 731. & c. 19. p. 733.

LIB. OT. XVIII. p. 197. THEOD. l. v. c. 19. p. 731.

LIB. OT. XXIII. p. 529. GREG. NAZ. ep. cxxiii. p. 857.

l. ix. c. 2. p. 802. LIB. OT. XXIII. p. 518.

VOL. VI. Nº 6. * Idem ibid. 4 CHRYS. of. xii. p. 137. b Lib. p. 408. CHRYS. or. x 857. Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 354. CHRYS. Or. XVII. P. 195. Inewing

the utmost severity.

Ellebichus, one shewing the least pity or compassion, as if he had changed his nature. Those who a had feen him the day before, could scarce persuade themselves he was the same man; for not satisfied with causing persons of the first quality to be racked and tortured like so many slaves, he uttered dreadful menaces against the whole city, threatening to lay it in ashes, and put the inhabitants, without distinction of age, sex or condition, to the sword, unless they redeemed themselves and their children from impending ruin, by a timely discovery, not only of the authors and ringleaders of the late treasonable and wicked attempts, but of all who had been any-way concerned in them. St. Chrysostom, who was an eye-witness of all that passed, so far as his tenderness and compassion for the unhappy sufferers would allow him, gives us a lively, but dreadful description of this scene of horror, which he compares to that of b the last day, when all distinction of birth, wealth and rank will cease, and every one be punished or rewarded according to his deferts . Multitudes were dragged in chains from every quarter of the city to the tribunal of the inexorable judges, who, unmoved with their tears, and deaf to the entreaties of their relations, after a short hearing, either sentenced them to death, or ordered them to be racked till they owned themselves guilty, and discovered their accomplices. St. Chrysofton mentions a lady of the first quality, who, seeing her son apprehended by an officer on horseback, laid hold of his bridle, and fuffered herfelf to be dragged in that manner through the streets to the tribunal, where, with her hair dishevelled, and bathed in tears, she threw herself at the feet of Ellebichus; but he, deaf to all intreaties, pursued his c inquiries with fuch rigour, as threw the whole city into the utmost confusion. St. Chryostom, who, with some others of the sacerdotal order, was admitted into the hall where the criminals were examined and tortured, exerted all his eloquence to move the judges to compassion, and was therein seconded by the hermits, who were very numerous in the neighbourhood of Antioch, where they led a retired life amongst the adjacent mountains; but, quitting their folitude, they had flocked to the city on this extraordinary occasion, to comfort with their presence the disconsolate citizens, and try whether they could raise any sentiments of humanity or commiseration in the hearts of their judges. With this view they repaired to the hall, where the judges were sitting; and having exhorted them in a very pathetic manner to treat their d fellow-creatures with more humanity and compassion, they prevailed upon them in the end to suspend the execution of the sentence pronounced against those who were found guilty, and all proceeding against such as were not yet convicted, till a report of the whole had been made to the emperor, and his further pleasure were known. One Macedonius, an anchoret, univerfally esteemed and revered for his sanctity, distinguished himself above the rest; for meeting Ellebichus and Casarius on horseback in the forum, laying hold of one of them by his garment, he commanded them both, with an air of authority, to difmount. As neither of them knew him, they were not a little surprised, that a person, in appearance so mean and contemptible, should dare to speak to them in such a style; but they were no sooner informed who he was, than difmounting from their horses, they threw themselves at his seet; when the holy anchoret, addressing them in the Syriac tongue, "The emperor, said he, however distinguished by his imperial dignity, is still a man; and therefore ought to consider his nature, as well as his rank. Those whom he commands, are of the " fame nature with himself, and the images of the Supreme Being; let him there-" fore take care not to provoke the Almighty, by destroying the living images of the divine nature, for an affront offered to the inanimate images of his body. Other statues may be easily raised to him in the room of those that have been "demolished; but he, notwithstanding his boasted power, is not able to make the ee least reparation for a single life, which he has once taken away i." We are told, f that both Ellebichus and Cafarius heard these words, which were interpreted to them in Greek, with the greatest respect and veneration, and immediately acquainted the emperor with what they had heard k. The judges having, at the request of the ecclefiaftics and hermits, agreed to suspend the execution of the criminals, till the emperor's further pleasure was known, such as had been found guilty were conducted under a strong guard to the public prison, and the rest dismissed. Amongst the former were all those who composed the senate or council, that is, all the chief men in the

St. Chrysoftom and the hermits obtain a respite for such as were condemned.

a city, whose estates were immediately seized, together with their houses and essects, their wives and children being driven out by the officers of the revenue, and obliged to lie in the streets, their friends and nearest relations fearing, lest, by harbouring them, they should be involved in the ruin of their husbands and fathers. The hermits, having thus obtained of the judges a reprieve for the criminals, did not doubt but they should prevail upon the emperor to pardon them. In order to this, they resolved to repair without delay to Constantinople, and throw themselves at the prince's feet; but Ellebichus and Cafarius, affected with their zeal, and unwilling they should expose themselves to the satigue and inconveniencies of so long a journey, advised them rather to draw up a memorial in behalf of the unhappy citizens, and b took upon themselves to present it to the emperor. The hermits followed their They draw up a advice, and leaving the memorial in their hands, returned the same day to their memorial in mountains and deserts m. Upon their departure, it was agreed between Ellebichus and Antiochians. Casarius, that the former should remain at Antioch, and the latter carry the memorial to the emperor. Accordingly Cafarius fet out that very evening, and pursued his journey with such expedition, that the fixth day about noon he reached Constantinople, distant above five hundred miles from Antioch. In the mean time Ellebichus caused treated with those who had been condemned to be removed from the public prison to a more congreat humavenient place, allowing them the liberty of taking the air in the gardens belonging nity by Ellebito it, and seeing their friends and relations o. St. Chrysostom let no day pass without chus. e visiting them, in order to bring them, while thus kept in suspense between hope and fear, to an intire refignation to the will of the Almighty, in whom alone he daily exhorted them to place their confidence P. The Antiochians, dreading the effects of the emperor's refentment, had fent, a few days after the riot was committed, Flavianus, bishop of the place, to intercede with Theodosius in their behalf. Flavianus had met Ellebichus and Cæsarius on the road, who acquainted him with the commission they were going to execute at Antioch. The holy bishop, in hearing it, burst into tears; but nevertheless pursued his journey, still hoping he should be able to soften the good-natured emperor into compassion. The day after his arrival at Constantinople, he appeared at court; but in order to move the emperor to compaffion, stood Flavianus, bid at a distance from him, silent, and bathed in tears, as if he dared not look up, or shop of Amioch approach him. But the emperor no fooner observed him, than he flew to him, not emperor in to upbraid him for undertaking the defence of the rebellious city, but to justify his their behalf. own conduct, and complain to him of the ungrateful return the Antiochians had made for the many favours he had heaped upon them. Flavianus, bursting into tears, answered, that the severest punishment he could inslict upon them, was too mild and gentle for the enormous crimes they had committed, and their undutiful return to so indulgent a prince; but at the same time he told him, that to forgive one's enemies was a duty incumbent upon every christian; that from his pardoning such enormous offences, great glory would redound to the religion he professed; that the Jews, e Greeks, and barbarians, would admire and extol the purity of its morals, &c. He added, that now an opportunity offered of making himself a lasting instance to all posterity of humanity and good-nature; and seasonably put him in mind of the order he had iffued this very year, commanding all prisoners to be set at liberty against the solemnity of Easter, and of the memorable words he uttered on that occasion, viz. I wish it were in my power to recal the dead from their graves, and restore them to life! This admirable speech, which is related at length by St. Chrysoftom, made so deep an impression on the mind of the emperor, that he could not refrain from tears, nor forbear crying out, that he pardoned the ungrateful city, and restored the inhabitants, Theodosius however guilty, to his favour. Thus St. Chrysoftom a. But Libanius and Theodores grants them a f tell us, that the emperor, tho' greatly softened by the speech of Flavianus, yet did general pardon. not grant a general pardon till the arrival of Casarius; who presenting to him the memorial of the hermits, and at the same time pleading with great energy in favour of the unhappy city, which, he faid, had been already fufficiently punished, prevailed upon him to grant a general pardon. He therefore wrote a letter to the citizens of Antioch, shewing, that it was not without reason he had treated them with so much feverity, after they had, in such an outrageous manner, insulted his deceased father and wife. He added, that as his anger, however just, was soon appealed, he par-

doned

n Lib. orat. xxii. p. 518. & orat. xxiii. p. 533. m Idem, orat. xvii. p. 195. o Idem, orat. xxii. p. 535. PCHRYS orat. xvii. p. 100 THEODOR: l. v. c. 19. p. 732. 4 Idem, orat. xx. p. 226-233. P CHRYS orat. xvii. p. 204.

And restores to the city all its privileges.

doned all without exception, whether condemned to death or banishment, restored a to them their estates, their shews, baths, theatres, and territory, and to their city the privileges and rights of a metropolis. He concluded with expressions of the deepest concern for the death of those who had been condemned by the governor, and executed without his knowledge. This letter the emperor delivered to Flavianus, that he might have the honour of carrying the joyful tidings to the disconsolate city; but the holy bishop, impatient to put an end to the affliction of his people, yielded that honour to another, whom he thought capable of performing the journey with more expedition. It is more easy to conceive than express the joy, which the arrival of the messenger caused in Antioch. St. Chrysostom, to whom we refer our readers, describes at length what passed on this occasion, and concludes with these words: b Let the pagans be ashamed, or rather instructed; and learning our philosophy of an emperor and a bishop, renounce their errors, and embrace a religion, which encourages and produces such eminent virtues.

Maximus invades the dominions of Valentinian, who flies to Theodosius,

WHILE these things passed in the east, the boundless ambition of Maximus raised far greater disturbances in the west; for that usurper, not satisfied with the provinces which had been held by Gratian, passed this year the Alps all on a sudden, with a design to seize on Valentinian's share too; and meeting with no opposition, marched strait to Milan, where Valentinian usually resided. The young prince, not finding himself in a condition to make head against him, sled first to Aquileia, and from thence, being closely pursued by Maximus, to Thessalonica, with his mother Justina, c and the prefect Probus, to implore the protection and affiftance of Theodofius. That pious prince, in a letter which he wrote to Valentinian, in answer to one he had received from his mother Justina, told him, that he was not at all surprised at the progress Maximus had made, nor at the bad fuccess that attended his affairs, since the tyrant had protected, and he perfecuted, the orthodox faith; for Valentinian, as we have hinted above, had not only embraced the doctrine of Arius, but perfecuted the orthodox prelates, and driven several of them from their sees, being induced thereunto by his mother Justina, a most zealous Arian. Soon after, Theodosius removed from Constantinople, attended by several members of that senate, to Thessalonica, in order to comfort with his presence the young prince, who had taken refuge in his domi- d nions. Upon his arrival, he repaired to the palace where Valentinian was lodged; and after having affured him, that he was refolved to employ all the forces of the east in his defence, he prevailed upon him to renounce the Arian impiety, as the only obstacle to the success which they might expect from heaven ". Suidas relates the discourse which Theodosius made on that subject w. Zosimus writes, that in a great council held at Theffalonica, all the counsellors to a man were of opinion, that war should be forthwith declared against Maximus; but that Theodosius, foreseeing and dreading the evils inseparable from a civil war, sent first embassadors to the tyrant, feriously exhorting him to restore to Valentinian the usurped provinces, and content himself with Gaul, Spain and Britain, which had been yielded to him by himself and Valentinian x. Maximus would not, it seems, hearken to any proposals; for this very e year he laid siege to Aquileia, which he reduced, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance of the inhabitants, as he did Quaderna, Bononia, Mutina, Regium, Placentia, and feveral other cities in Italy; nay, he was the enfuing year acknowledged in Rome, and in all the provinces of Africa y. Theodosius therefore, finding a war inevitable, fpent the remaining part of this, and the first months of the following year 388, when he was conful the fecond time with Cynegius, in making the necessary preparations for carrying it on with vigour. His army confifted chiefly of Goths, Hunns, Alans, and other barbarians, whom he was glad to take into the service, to prevent their raising disturbances on the frontiers. He appointed Promotus general of the horse, and Timasius of the foot; and having committed the government of the eastern provinces f to fuch persons as, he knew, would, in his absence, consult the welfare of his subjects, and maintain the public tranquillity, he set out from The salonica in the beginning of the summer, marching with great expedition through Illyricum, with a design to surprise Maximus, who had not yet taken the field, but continued, without the least apprehension of danger, in Aquileia. Andragathius, one of the usurper's generals, a man of great courage and experience in war, had been appointed to guard the cities.

Miximus re-

him to renounce

the doctrine of Arius.

Theodosius marches against him.

* Chrys. orat. xx. p. 234.

* Zos. l. iv. p. 667. Throdor. l. v. c. 14. Soz. l. vii. c. 14. p. 721.

* Theodor. p. 724.

p. 275. Zos. p. 769.

a passes of the Julian Alps; but a report being spread, that Theodosius designed to pass the Ionian sea, and invade Italy, he was ordered to quit those passes, and to man with the utmost expedition what ships he could, in order to intercept the emperor in his passage. Thus was Maximus deprived of the assistance of that excellent commander, and of the flower of his troops, who were employed in manning the fleet, which Adragathius assembled, pursuant to his orders, on the coast of the Ionian sea. In the mean time Theodosius, entering Pannonia, advanced to Scissia, now Seisseg, before the enemy had the least notice of his approach. However, the general, who commanded the troops of Maximus in that neighbourhood, having drawn them together with incredible expedition, fell upon Theodofius as he was passing the Save; but b his army was utterly defeated, and he himself drowned in the river y. From Sciscia The army of the emperor advanced to Petovio, now Pettaw, on the Drave, where he was met by Maximus de-Marcellinus, the brother of Maximus, at the head of an army far more numerous than feated. his own. However, the emperor offered him battle, which he readily accepted; but was utterly defeated, tho his men fought with extraordinary courage and reso- Theodosius We are not told, that Maximus was present at either of these battles; but gains a second have at least advanced to support his generale. for both Paratus 2 and S. he must have at least advanced to support his generals; for both Pacatus 2 and St. Ambrose 2 write, that after his forces were twice defeated, he fled with the troops that attended him, and with the remains of his shattered army, to Aquileia, whither Theodosius pursued him, having sent Arbogastes before to invest the place, and prevent the e tyrant from making his escape. Zosimus writes, that the emperor, arriving soon after, took the town by affault by and Socrates, that it was delivered up to him by the foldiers of Maximus. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the tyrant was seized, Maximus according to some, by his own men, according to others, by the soldiers of Theodo-taken. fius, who had entered the city, and dragged in chains to the emperor, encamped about three miles from the city. Theodosius reproached him with the death of Gratian, and his unbounded ambition, which had prompted him to murder one brother, and drive the other out of his dominions. As Maximus was, or at least pretended to be, touched with remorfe for the crimes he had committed, and publicly owned he had no claim or title to the power he had usurped, Theodosius began to look upon him with an eye of compassion; which those about him observing, and searing he might pardon him, they removed him out of the emperor's sight, and, without waiting his orders, struck And beheaded. off his head d. He was executed at a place about three miles distance from Aquileia, on the twenty-seventh of August, according to Socrates; or on the twenty-eighth of July, as Idatius will have it. St. Ambrose writes, that Maximus was at the same time defeated by the Saxons, the Franks, and Theodosius 8. Those two nations had broken into Gaul, as appears from Gregory of Tours h, under the conduct of Genobaud, Marcomir and Sunno; and having ravaged the country bordering on the Rhine, were preparing to repass that river with an immense booty, when Nannius and Quentinus, two of Maximus's generals, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of e them in pieces. Quentinus followed the Franks cross the Rhine, which he passed near the present city of Nuys; but, as he was not acquainted with the country, most of his Quentinus, one men were cut off by the enemy in the woods and marshes, and the rest obliged to of the generals fave themselves by a shameful and precipitous slight. Maximus had left his son of Maximus, Vistor, whom he had declared Augustus, in Gaul, to awe the inhabitants of that pro-franks. vince during his absence. Against him Theodosius dispatched Arbogastes, who took victor, the son him prisoner, after having dispersed the troops that attended him, and put him of Maximus, to death k. Zosimus calls him a youth; but all other writers style him an infant. taken in Gaul, Andragathius, hearing of the defeat and death of Maximus, as he was cruizing in the and put to Ionian gulf, threw himself headlong into the sea, and was drowned, chusing that f kind of death, to prevent a more ignominious one, which, as Gratian had been seized and murdered by him, he had reason to apprehend 1. Orosius writes, that he was overcome in battle "; and St. Ambrose, that he had joined Maximus before his defear, and perished soon after ". Thus ended a war, which at first threatened the empire with endless calamities; and the glory which Theodosius acquired by his victory, was greatly heightened by his moderation and clemency in the use of it; for immediately

<sup>2</sup> PACAT. p. 270—275. <sup>2</sup> AMBR. p. 214: <sup>3</sup> Socr. Zos. ibid. PACAT. p. 279. <sup>5</sup> Socr. <sup>5</sup> Greg. Turon. hift. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 58, PROSP. D. 515. <sup>1</sup> Zos. y Zos. l. iv. p. 769, 770. Amb. ep. 17. p. 215.
b Zos. p. 770. Soca. l. v. c. 14. p. 273.
p. 273. IDAT. chron. & Ambr. ep. 17. p. 215.
59. Idem ibid. p. 59, 60. Zos. l. iv. p. 770.
VICT. Prosp. ibid. Docs. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220. O. VICTOR. p. 545. PROSP. p. 515.

AMBR. cp. 17. p. 214.

Vol. VI. Nº 5.

after

Theodosius deracion.

after the death of Maximus, he published a general amnesty, and was so far from a wees the victory perfecuting the friends and relations of the usurper, that he would not even suffer them mency and mo. to be reproached with their rebellion. No man was banished, says Pacatus, no man's estate was confiscated; and those who deserved, and would have suffered, the most cruel death under any other prince, were dismissed by Theodosius, without so much as hearing from him an angry word o. Those who had with most warmth espoused the tyrant's cause, were allowed to return unhurt, continues the same author. to their wives and children, to enjoy their estates unmolested, and with them the same rank, dignity and honours, by which they had been distinguished before the rebel-The wife and daughters of Maximus had been taken, and confined in a public prison by some of the emperor's officers; which the good-natured prince no b fooner knew, than he ordered them to be fet at liberty, fettled a confiderable pension upon them, and charged one of their kinsmen to take care, that no one injured or infulted them 9. But what St. Ambrose, and Zosimus himself, most of all admired in Theodosius, was his not only restoring to Valentinian his own share, when no one was in a condition to dispute with him the possession of the whole empire, but his generously relinquishing to him Gaul, Spain and Britain, which, before the revolt of Maximus, had been held by his brother Gratian. He was satisfied, says St. Ambrole, with the good he had done, without reaping any advantage from it for himself, tho no one could have blamed him, had he retained some of those provinces, considering the immense charge he had been at in restoring the young prince to the quiet c possession of the rest. As Justina, the mother of Valentinian, died about this time. Theodosius, during the three years he continued in the west, governed in the name of that prince, who was, at the death of his mother, scarce seventeen years old, and consequently not yet equal to so great a burden . While Theodosius was pursuing the war in Illyricum, a report was spread at Constantinople, that his army was cut off, and he himself in great danger of falling into the hands of the usurper. Hereupon the Arians, whom he had highly disobliged, by driving them from their churches in 380. as we have related above, rifing in the night-time, fet fire to the house of Nectarius, the orthodox bishop of Constantinople, who perished in the slames, and committed feveral other diforders. But the news of the intire defeat of the usurper being d brought foon after to that metropolis, the Arians, dreading the effects of the emperor's indignation, had recourse to the clemency of Arcadius, whom Theodosius had left at Constantinople in setting out for the war; and the young prince not only forgave them himself, but prevailed upon his father to confirm the pardon which he had granted them '. It was, without all doubt, on this occasion that the Arians fet fire of his fon Arca- to the church of St. Sophia, which confumed the roof of that stately edifice, as we read in Codin "; but Theodosius, notwithstanding his zeal for the orthodox faith, to encourage his fon to acts of clemency, at his request, overlooked that, and the other enormous disorders committed by the fanatics on that occasion. The emperor was still at Aquileia on the twenty-second of September; but on the tenth of Oslober at e Milan, where he seems to have passed the winter w. Being informed, while he resided in that city, that the christians had burnt a synagogue of the Jews, and a temple of the pagans at Callinicum in Mesopotamia, he condemned the bishop of the place to rebuild the fynagogue at his own expence, and ordered all those who had been any-ways concerned in either of these riots, to be punished with the utmost severity. But St. Ambrose, thinking a prince, who had lately overlooked far greater disorders in the Arians, ought not to exert so much rigour against an orthodox bishop and his people, wrote to him from Aquileia in their favour; and, upon his return to Milan, persuaded the emperor, by a speech which he pronounced before him in the great church, to revoke the order he had given x. About the latter end of this year, the f from the senate senate of Rome dispatched deputies to Theodosius, earnestly intreating him to give them leave to restore to its former place the altar of Victory, which had been removed by Gratian. The emperor seemed at first inclined to grant them their request; but was in the end persuaded by St. Ambrose to deny it. However, Symmachus, the chief of the deputies, a man univerfally esteemed for his eloquence, and greatly beloved by the pagans, in regard of his zeal for the ancient religion of the Romans, in a pane-

Disturbances raised in Constantinople by the Arians.

Theodofius

pardons them,

at the request

of Rome, for restoring the

altar of Victory.

Idem, p. 282. AMBR. ep 17. p. 215. AMBR. p. Socr. l. v. c. 13. p. 272. Soz. l. vii. c. 14. p. 722, 723. · PACAT. p. 281. P Idem, p. 282. * AMBR. P. 216. * RUFIN. l. ii. c. 17. p. 185. " Codin. orig. w Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 14. leg. 6. p. 409. & leg. 7. p. 410. Constant. p. 64. * AMBR. apol. 17, 18. vit. p. 83, 84.

İS

12. je!

bş

N.S

í (ť þŧ Ľ.

a gyric which he pronounced foon after on Theodosius, renewed the same request in the name of the fenate; which so provoked the emperor, that he immediately ordered him to come down, and to be put that instant into a chariot, in order to be conveyed Their request into banishment, forbidding him, under the severest penalties, ever to come within rejected, and Symmachus an hundred miles of Rome y. The emperor's indignation seemed the more just, as banished, but Symmachus had been but very lately pardoned by him, while accused by his enemies recalled. of treason, in having pronounced a panegyric during the war on the usurper Maximus. However, as Theodofius was never more ready to pardon, than when he seemed most provoked, the friends of Symmachus no sooner spoke in his behalf, than the emperor recalled him, restored him to his former rank, and, to convince the world b that he retained no ill will to him, raised him two years after to the consular dignity . This year Theodosius enacted several laws against heretics, viz. one dated the Several laws fecond of March, forbidding them, especially the Apollinarians, to hold assemblies, especially to have bishops or clergy, to live in cities, to appear at court, or to present any against here-petition to the emperor. The same prohibition was renewed by another law, ties. dated the sourceenth of June b. By another enacted two days after, all public disputes concerning religion were forbidden under the severest penalties. A law dated the twenty-ninth of February declares all marriages between Jews and christians unlawful, and subjects the contracting parties to the punishments due to adultery; another, addressed to Cynegius, forbids any one to marry his brother's wise, or his c own wife's fifter 4. The fame prohibition had been made by Constantius in 355 . Theodofius, who was still at Milan on the twenty-second of May, left that city soon after, and repaired to Rome with young Valentinian, and his fon Honorius, whom he Theodosius had sent for from Constantinople, after the deseat of Maximus. He entered that goes to Rome. metropolis in triumph on the thirteenth of June; and a few days after Latinus Pacatus Drepanius, an orator of Gaul, pronounced his panegyric in the fenate, the emperor himself being present. The orator takes notice of his liberality towards the people on that occasion, of his affability and condescension, not only in viewing the rarities of the city, but in entering the houses of private persons, which won him the hearts of the Roman people 8. The poet Claudian tells us, that at Rome he d received embassadors sent by the king of Persia to treat with him about a peace between the two empires. To Theodosius's journey to Rome was owing, according to Prudentius, the conversion of the senate and people of that city to the christian religion; not that he used any violence, says that writer, for he indifferently raised Endeavours to pagans and christians to the first employments in the state k; but so great was the in that metroforce of his example, that few, either in the senate or among the people, were so polis. attached to their errors as to withstand it. Prudentius mentions several illustrious families converted on this occasion to the true religion, viz. the families of the Paulini, of the Bassi, of the Annii, and of the Gracchi, at that time the most ancient and noble family in Rome. The people, continues that writer, flocked e to the Lateran church, to receive there the facred fign of the royal chrism, and to the Vatican, to visit the ashes of the father of the faith; meaning, we imagine, St. Peter, who was then supposed to have planted the faith in Rome. The idols, fays St. Jerom, were every-where pulled down; their temples abandoned; and the gods, once so much revered, left in their nitches alone, or attended only by mice and owls: the capitol, continues the same writer, formerly so much frequented, is now turned into a defert; the other temples are covered with dust, and filled with cobwebs; the whole city crouds to the tombs of the martyrs; and the people, in passing by those ancient temples, behold them with joy ready to fall, and bury the gods under their ruins. Rome forfakes Jupiter and his temples, despises f his ceremonies, and is ashamed of the worship formerly paid him! Theodosius however would not fuffer the statues of the gods, many of which were the work of the best artificers of antiquity, to be destroyed; but ordered them to be removed from the places where they had been adored, to the public squares, where they served as ornaments to the city . Theodofius staid scarce three months at Rome, but in y Socr. l.v. c. 14. p. 273. Prosp. de promiss. l. iii. c. 38. p. 149.

p. 118. Sym. l. ii. ep. 30, 31. p. 74. ep. 61, 63. p. 89, 90. & l.v. ep. 15. p. 191.

a Cod. Theod.
l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 14. p. 130.

b Idem, leg. 15. p. 131.

c Idem, tit. 4. leg. 2. p. 100.

d Idem,
liii. c. 38. p. 425.

c Cod. Theod. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 2.

Rus. l. ii. c. 17. p. 185.

b Claud. p. 176. l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 14. p. 130.

l. iii. tit. 7. leg. 2. p. 278. &c cod. Justin. l. v. tit. 5. leg. 5. p. 425.

c. Cod. Theod. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 2. p. 296.

f. Idem, p. 120.

s. Soz. p. 273.

Ruf. l. ii. c. 17. p. 185.

h. Claud. p. 176.

l. Prud. in Sym. l. i. p. 218.

k. Idem, p. 220.

l. Hier, ep. 7. p. 54. &c in Jov. l. ii. c. 18. p. 95. m PRUD. p. 220.

that

A comet appears in the east.

Theodofins leaves Rome.

Valentinian concludes a peace with the Franks.

against the christians in Alexandria.

Several christians massa-

that short time he not only seriously applied himself to the suppression of idolatry, a but with indefatigable care laboured to reform many abuses, which had long prevailed in the city, as appears from the several laws he published there ". He enacted one, dated the seventeenth of June, ordering all the Manichees to be driven out of the city, and declaring them incapable of receiving legacies, or leaving any thing by will even to their children. A few days before Theodosius left Rome, a comet is faid to have appeared in the east in the shape of a sword; and moving northward, to have vanished in the middle of the Ursa Major, after having lasted forty days, as we read in Philogorgius o; or only twenty-fix, as Marcellinus will have it P. The former writer mentions several other prodigies, among which he reckons two men equally remarkable for their fize, the one being feven cubits and three inches, and b the other no taller, fays that author, than a partridge, though he had an agreeable voice, and an excellent understanding: the former was a native of Syria, and the latter of Egypt, and they both lived to the age of about twenty-five q. Theodosius lest Rome on the first of September, was at a place called Valentia on the third of the same month, and on the fixth at Forum Flaminii, now Ponte Centesimo on the Topino, not far from Fuligno in the duchy of Spoleto, where he enacted a law forbidding the execution of criminals during Lent. From thence he pursued his journey to Milan, where he enacted a law, dated the twenty-fixth of November, commanding the heretic bishops and clergy to be every-where driven out of the cities and their fuburbs s. From this law, and several others of the ensuing year, it appears, that c Theodosius passed the winter in that city, while Valentinian marched into Gaul, to make head against the Franks, who were preparing to invade that province; but all we know of this expedition is, that Valentinian had an interview with Marcomir and Sunno, two chiefs of the Franks; that they delivered hostages to him; and that the emperor, on the eighth of November, was at Treves, where he took up his winterquarters. This year is chiefly remarkable for the destruction of the celebrated temple of Serapis at Alexandria, which, according to the description Ammianus Marcellinus gives us of it, surpassed in grandeur and wealth all the temples in the world, that of Jupiter Capitolinus alone excepted a; nay, Theodoret calls it the greatest, and without exception the most beautiful temple in the universe w. Theodosius, who d had hitherto spared that stately edifice, caused it this year to be levelled with the ground on the following occasion. Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, having begged and obtained of the emperor an old temple, formerly consecrated to Bacchus, but at that time ruined and forfaken, with a defign to convert it into a church, the workmen, in clearing it of the rubbish, found among the ruins several obscene figures, which the bishop, to ridicule the superstition of the heathens, caused to be exposed The pagans rise to public view. This provoked the pagans to such a degree, that they slew to arms; and falling upon the christians, cut great numbers of them in pieces, before they were in a condition to oppose their fury. At length the christians took arms in their own defence; and being supported by the sew soldiers who were quartered e in Alexandria, began to repel force by force. Thus a civil war was kindled within the very walls of the city, and no day passed without some scussle and bloodshed. The pagans, when tired with fighting, or overpowered with numbers, (for the christians were far more numerous) used to retire to the temple of Serapis; and thence fallying out again unexpectedly, seize on such of the christians as they met, and dragging them into the temple, either force them by the most exquisite torments to facrifice to their idol, or, if they refused, to rack them to death. As they excred, and put to cruel deaths, pected to be soon attacked by the emperor's troops, they chose a philosopher, by name Olympus, for their leader, with a resolution to defend themselves, their temple, and their religion, to the last extremity. In the mean time, Evagrius, governor of f Egypt, and Romanus, who commanded the troops there, having attempted in vain to persuade the pagans to quit the temple, and retire to their dwellings, sent a distinct account of the whole to the emperor, who, extolling and envying the happiness of such as had chosen rather to die, than renounce their religion, and offer sacrifice to the idols, would not suffer their death to be revenged on those at whose hands they had obtained the crown of martyrdom, but readily forgave them. However,

* Cod. Theod. l. xii. tit. 16. leg. 1. p. 612. & l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 18. p. 138.

p. 139—141.

p. Marcell. chron.

4 Philos. ibid. p. 142, 143.

5 Cod.

p. 120, 121.

5 Idem ibid.

5 Oros. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220.

6 Cod. Theod. chron. p. 120.

6 xxii. p. 234.

6 W Theodor p. 735. PHILOST. I. X. C. 9. Z Cod. Theod. chron-# AMMIAN.

a at the same time he ordered the temple of Serapis, and all the other temples in Alex-Theodosius andria, which gave occasion to frequent disturbances, to be utterly demolished, orders the facharging Theophilus, bishop of the place, who had solicited this order, to see it put Serapis, and all in execution, and injoining Evagrius and Romanus to follow therein his directions. The the temples in pagans no fooner knew that the emperor had been informed of the cruelties they Alexandria, 19 had committed, than they abandoned the temple, and dispersed, some of them retiring down. privately to their own houses, and others withdrawing from the town, and either concealing themselves in the neighbouring cities, or flying to more distant countries. Among the latter was their leader Olympus, who conveyed himself in the night on board a vessel which was ready to fail for Italy. Helladius and Ammonius, two b grammarians, under whom Socrates, the ecclefiaftic historian, had studied at Constantinople, withdrew from Egypt, and took refuge amongst the neighbouring barbarians. The former used to brag of his having killed, during that tumult, nine christians with his own hand . The temple, thus abandoned by the pagans, was delivered up to Theophilus, who, with the affiftance of the people and foldiery, reduced it in a short time to a heap of ruins, leaving nothing undemolished but the foundations, which could not be removed on account of the extraordinary weight and fize of the stones. The celebrated statue of Serapis, the principal god of the the statue of Egyptians, was broken in pieces, and the limbs of that pretended divinity carried Serapis broken first in triumph by the christians through the city, and then thrown into an huge in pieces. c fire kindled for that purpose in the amphitheatre. As the Egyptians ascribed the overflowing of the Nile, to which was owing the fertility of their country, to the benign influence of their god Serapis, they concluded, that now he was destroyed the river would no longer overflow, and confequently that a general famine would ensue. But when they observed, that the Nile, on the contrary, swelled to a greater height than had been known in the memory of man, and thereby produced an immense plenty of all manner of provisions, many of the pagans, renouncing the worship of the idols, adored the God of the christians y. Rusinus 2, Socrates 2, Eunapius b, and Sozomen c write, that croffes were found engraved on several of the stones of the temple, which occasioned the conversion of great numbers of the Egyptian priests, d the cross being in the sacred language of that nation the symbol of life; and on the other hand, a tradition having for many ages obtained among them, that their religion, and the temple of Serapis, would fublish till the fign of life appeared. Not only the statue of Serapis, which was lodged in the temple, but all the other statues of that pretended deity, were by the zealous christians carefully sought for, ignominioufly dragged through the streets, and confumed in the slames; infomuch that in the great city of Serapis, as Alexandria was frequently styled, not the least footstep was left of that idol, or of the worship which for so many ages had been paid him. In the room of the temple of Serapis was built a church, and a martyrium, fays Rufinus d, meaning perhaps a burying-place for those who had suffered martyrdom, e during the late disturbances. Sophronius, one of St. Jerom's friends, wrote a particular and distinct account of the demolition of the temple of Serapis ; but his work has not reached our times. Theophilus, who was a prelate no less active than zealous, not fatisfied with demolishing the temple of Serapis, encouraged the people, supported by the governor of the province, and the commander of the Roman troops, to pull down and level with the ground all the other temples, oratories, chapels, All the temples and places fet apart for the worship of the idols throughout Egypt, causing every-throughout where the statues of the gods to be either burnt or melted down. Of the innume-Egypt demotrable statues, with which that superstitions province was filled, he is said to have rable statues, with which that superstitious province was filled, he is faid to have spared but one, viz. that of an ape, in order to expose the pagan religion to ridif cule f. Theodofins not only approved of what Theophilus had done, but commended his zeal, and returned him public thanks for the pains he had taken in clearing that province from the abominations to which it had been fo long addicted s. Soon after he enacted a law, forbidding, on pain of death, the subjects of the empire to offer any kind of facrifice to idols; and declaring the estates confiscated of such as should burn incense before them h.

* Socr. l. vii. c. 15. p. 724. Ruf. l.ii. c. 22. p. 187. Soz. p. 726.

* Ruf. l. ii. c. 27. p. 190.

* Socr. l. v. c. 16. p. 274.

* Ruf. ibid.

* Socr. ibid.

* Eunap. c. 4. p. 60—64.

* Soz. l. vii.

c. 15. p. 725.

* Ruf. l. ii. c. 27. p. 190.

* Hier. vir. illustr. c. 133. p. 303.

* Socr. p. 275.

* Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 10. leg. 10. p. 271.

THE following year 390. when Valentinian was conful the fourth time with Neo- a terius, Theodosius continued at Milan, as appears from the code, till the fifth of July; was at Verona from the twenty-third of August to the eighth of September, and again at Milan on the twenty-fixth of November, and the twenty-third of December. At

Verona he published a law, dated the third of September, commanding those who professed a monastic life, to withdraw from the cities, and retire to the deserts, purfuant to their institution. But this law he revoked by another dated the seventeenth A law against of April 392 i. By a law, which was published at Rome on the fourteenth of May, sunnatural lust. he commanded those who should be found guilty of unnatural lust to be burnt alive in the fight of the whole people k. This year an obelifk, twenty-four cubits in height, was raised in the circus at Constantinople, and a column before the church of b St. Sopbia, on which was a statue of Theodosius in silver, weighing seven thousand four hundred ounces 1. As for Valentinian, he seems to have continued all this year at Treves, or in the neighbourhood of that city. The next confuls were Tatianus and Q. Aurelius Symmachus. Theodosius continued this year at Milan to the twentyfecond of March, was at Concordia on the ninth of May, at Vicentia on the twenty-feventh of the same month, and at Aquileia from the sixteenth of June to the sourteenth of July m. By a law dated the ninth of May, he declared those who should renounce the christian religion, after having been baptized, not only incapable of giving or receiving the least thing by will, but of being, as infamous persons, wit-neffes to any private or public deed; adding, that he would have confined them a to the deserts, had he not believed it a greater punishment for them to live among men, without being looked upon as men n. By another law, dated the ninth of the fame month, he commanded the heretics to be every-where driven out of the cities o. Some writers confine this law to the Manichees, while others extend it to heretics of all denominations. Theodosius was, as we have observed above, at Aquileia on the fourteenth of July; but soon after he set out from thence for Constantinople, leaving the intire management of affairs in the west to Valentinian, now in the twentieth year of his age. On his arrival at Thessalonica, he found the province of Ma-

The barbarians, cedon in great confusion; for the barbarians, who, at the instigation of Maximus, had revolted, and concealed themselves among the marshes and woods, after the d defeat of that usurper, taking advantage of the emperor's absence, began to sally out of their fastnesses in the night, and seizing on whatever came in their way, they marshes, infest retired with their booty before day. As it was a more difficult task to find them the province of out than to conquer them, the emperor took that province upon himself; and without discovering his design to any one, made choice of five persons, in whom he > could confide, to attend him, ordering each of them to take three spare horses, that they might shift as often as there was occasion. Thus attended and disguised, he ranged about the country, receiving from the peafants fuch refreshments as their cottages could afford him. At length he came to a small inn, kept by a woman stricken in years, who received him with extraordinary civility, which induced him to stay there that night. In the same inn lodged a person, who declining to con- e verse with the rest, and seeming desirous to conceal himself, gave the emperor no

How discovered small jealousy. Having therefore, after he was retired to his chamber, called for by Theodolius. the mistress of the house, and asked her who that person was, she answered, that who he was she knew not; but that ever fince the news of the emperor's return out of the west, he had lodged at her house, going out in the morning, and continuing abroad all day, but returning at night to his lodging, for which he honestly paid

her. Upon this information, the emperor ordered him to be seized and examined; but he refusing to declare who he was, the emperor at last discovered himself, ordered the man to be put to the rack, and by that means forced him to own the truth, viz. that he was employed as a spy by the barbarians, who lay concealed among f

the woods and bogs, to give them intelligence from time to time of the motions of the emperor's army, and to inform them what places lay most convenient for their incursions. Hereupon the emperor caused his head to be struck off; and returning early the next morning to the army, led his foldiers to the place where he had learnt from the fpy the barbarians were lodged; and falling upon them unex-

<sup>1</sup> Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 3. leg. 1. p. 96. & leg. 2. p. 97, 98.

* Idem, l. ix. tit. 2. leg. 4. p. 30.

MARCELL. chron.

Cod. Theod. chron. p. 123.

Idem, l. xvi. tit. 7. leg. 4. & v. p. 207, 208. MARCELL. chron. · Idem, tit. 5. leg. 20. p. 137.

apostares.

One against

Theodosius eaft.

amongst the moods and

a pectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces. Timasius, who, together with Promotus, commanded on this occasion under Theodosius, imagining most of the barbarians to be already cut off, advised the emperor to allow his soldiers some time to refresh themselves after so warm and fatiguing a service, that they might with more vigour pursue the rest, who could not make their escape. The emperor, following his advice, founded a retreat; but while his men were refreshing themselves without the least apprehension of danger, the barbarians, falling upon them when they were quite unprepared, and most of them overcome with wine, or asleep, made a dreadful havock of them, and would have either killed, or taken the emperor himself, had he not The emperor in been feafonably rescued by Promotus, at the danger of his own life. However, Theo-great danger. b dosius, having rallied his dispersed forces the next day, attacked the barbarians anew with such success, that sew of them escaped the general slaughter. Thus Zosimus P, He gains a on whose single authority the whole truth of this account rests; for no other writer complete visiotakes the least notice of this expedition. The victory over the barbarians was, barbarians. according to Zosimus, who studies to lessen on all occasions the glory of Theodosius, chiefly owing to the courage and conduct of Promotus; but that brave general, who had ferved the emperor with great fidelity, was this very year killed in an ambu-Promotus scade by the barbarians in Thrace. Zosimus writes, that Rusinus, the emperor's chief killed in an ambuscade. favourite, having treated Promotus in a very haughty and infolent manner, the general, not able to brook fuch treatment, struck him; which affront Rufinus revenged, c by betraying him into the hands of the barbarians, with whom he maintained for that purpose a private correspondence q. But Claudian, who mentions the death of Promotus, and wrote two books filled with invectives against Rufinus, takes no notice of this black piece of treachery. Zofimus adds, that Rufinus having complained of Promotus to the emperor, the prince, who reposed an intire confidence in him, returned him this answer; If the other ministers continue thus to envy you your good fortune, they shall soon have the mortification to see you emperor . Claudian writes, that Stilicho revenged the death of his friend Promotus on the Bastarnæ, by whose hands he fell; and that after having defeated them with great flaughter, he shut them up in a narrow valley, with the Goths, Hunns, and other barbarians, who had d long infested Thrace, and would have cut them all off to a man, had not the emperor evil counsels of the traitor Rufinus s. Theodosius, upon his return to Constantinople, Theodosius made it his chief study to suppress idolatry and Arianism, ordering such temples as endeavours to were still standing to be pulled down, and the Arians to be every-where driven out suppressidalaof the cities, lest they should infect their sellow-citizens with their pestilent doctrine in milm in the THE next consuls were Arcadius the second time, and Rusinus. Theodosius had, east. as we have observed above, during his three years stay in the west, used all possible means to extirpate idolatry; but, upon his return to the east, the pagans began to conceive new hopes, and such of the senators of Rome, as continued still attached to e the superstition of their ancestors, sent a deputation to Valentinian, at the head of which was the celebrated Symmachus, intreating him to restore to their priests and temples, the privileges which they had enjoyed till the reign of Gratian. Valentinian, who was then in Gaul, received the deputies in a very obliging manner; but could valentinian not be prevailed upon, either by them, or by the many pagan ministers who were in refuses to reflect his court, to grant them their request ". Not long after, the barbarians threatening to the temples their antient to pass the Alps towards Rhælia, and invade Italy, the emperor resolved to quit Gaul, privileges. and hasten to Milan, in order to make head against them. As he was desirous of being baptized before he engaged in a war, he dispatched from Vienne, where he then was, an express to St. Ambrose bishop of Milan, for whom he had an extraordinary f efteem and veneration, inviting him into Gaul, to administer to him that sacrament. The prelate, upon the receipt of the emperor's letter, fet out without delay; but before he reached Vienne, he received the melancholy news of the death of that unfortunate prince, inhumanly murdered, as most authors agree, by Arbogastes. He was a Frank by nation, and owed his preferment to Gratian. After that prince's death, the foldiery, by whom he was highly esteemed, and not undeservedly, for his experience in military affairs, his liberality and difinterestedness, raised him, without the consent either of Valentinian, who was then a child, or of his mother Justina, to the chosen rather to conclude a peace with them, following therein, fays that poet, the

j,

P Zos. l. iv. p. 770—773.

p. 125, 126. in Ruf. l. i. c. 17.

SYMM. l. iii. ep. 63. p. 130. Oros. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220. r Idem ibid. 1 CLAUD. de laud. Stil. l. i. AMBR. serm. de divers. p. 114.

Arbogastes

be murdered.

ons concerning

post of general; in which command he acquitted himself with great fidelity and mo- a deration, while Theodosius continued in the west; but, upon the departure of that pretends to con- prince for Constantinople, he began to act more like a sovereign than a minister or brince officer, arrogating to himself the power of controlling the young prince, and governing the court with an absolute sway. Such of the officers in the army as seemed attached to Valentinian, he discharged, and put Franks, in whom he could conside, in their room, disposing at the same time of all the civil employments, without the emperor's consent or knowledge, and bestowing them upon persons of his own faction. Valentinian, no longer able to brook such a shameful servitude, resolved to discharge Arbogastes; and accordingly seeing him one day at court, he threw him a paper, containing an abrogation of his command. But Arbogastes, having perused it, tore it in b He is discharg- pieces with great contempt, and threw it on the ground, telling the emperor with ed; but refuses the utmost arrogance, that as he had not received his authority of him, it was not in post, and causes his power to divest him of it. After this, Arbog astes, well apprised that Valentinian Valentinian to would not suffer such an outrage to pass unrevenged, resolved to be before-hand with him, and accordingly dispatched him a few days after w. Authors disagree as to the Various opini- manner of his death: Zosimus writes, that while Valentinian, attended by a small ons concerning guard, was diverting himself in the neighbourhood of Vienne, Arbogastes, assaulting him unexpectedly, stabbed him with his sword x. According to Philostorgius, he was strangled, while he was taking his diversion on the banks of the Rhone, by assaffines, whom Arbogastes had hired for that purpose. The same author adds, that, c after they had strangled him, they tied his own handkerchief about his neck, and hung him upon a tree, that the world might be induced to believe, he had laid violent hands on himself; for his guards were at some distance, and out of fight y. St. Jerom 1, Orosius 1, Rusinus b, Epiphanius c, Socrates d, and Sozomen c, agree, that he was strangled; but the two latter writers suppose this to have happened in the palace, and the eunuchs of the court, gained over by Arbogastes, to have been the authors of his death. Idatius and Tiro Prosper only write, that he was murdered by the treachery of Arbogastes. The report which Arbogastes, and those of his faction, spread abroad, viz. that the prince had laid violent hands on himself, was credited by many, and among the rest by Prosper, who relates it in his chronicle as an event d not to be questioned; but we can hardly believe, that St. Ambrose would have extolled, as he does, his piety and religious fentiments, had he ended his life by the enormous crime of self-murder. He died in 392. on the fifteenth of May, that year the eve of Pentecost, after having lived only twenty years, and some months, and borne the title of emperor fixteen years, and about fix months, tho' he cannot be faid to have reigned till the death of Gratian, who died eight years and nine months before him f. St. Ambrose tells us, that when he saw himself unexpectedly attacked by the assassins, the only words he uttered were, Alas! my poor sisters ! The funeral ceremonies were performed the next day, the fixteenth of May, with great folemnity; and his body was fent to Milan, and interred there near that of his brother Gratian, on e which occasion St. Ambrose pronounced an oration in praise of the deceased prince b, who, according to him, and most other writers, would have equalled, if not eclipsed, His character. the glory of the best emperors, had he been suffered to live longer, being of a lively genius, valiant, fober, liberal, fincere in his friendship, intirely unbiassed in the administration of justice, and in the disposing of employments partial to merit alone. Zosimus, tho' highly prejudiced against all christian princes, owns, that his death was a public loss k. He had persecuted the catholics in his mother's life-time, or rather, she had persecuted them in his name; but, after her death, he proved a most zealous patron of the orthodox faith, discountenancing the Arians and other fectaries, as much as he had favoured them before he was capable of diffinguishing f truth from falshood! His two fisters, Justa and Grata, continued at Milan, and married to Theodosius, died two years after in child-bed. AFTER the death of Valentinian, Arbogastes might have easily seized on the sovereignty; but not caring to appear guilty of such a treacherous and inhuman murder, there embraced, after his death, the state of virginity. His fister Galla, who was

w Oros. p. 220. Zos. p. 776. Socr. p. 93. Soz. ibid. Zos. ibid. Philostorg. l. xi. t. p. 145. Hier. ep. 3. p. 26. Oros. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220. Ruf. l. ii. c. 31. p. 191. Epiph. de menf. & pond. 20. p. 177. Socr. l. v. c. 25. p. 294. Socr. l. vii. c. 22. p. 739. Hiem ibid. p. 113—115. Idem C. I. p. 145. 2 Hier. ep. 3. p. 26. 4 Oros. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220. 5 Ruf. l. ii. c. 31. e Epiph. de mens. & pond. 20. p. 177. 4 Socr. l. v. c. 25. p. 294. 5 Soz. l. vii. c. 22. f Epiph. p. 177. Philost. p. 144. 5 Ambr. ibid. p. 112. 6 Idem ibid. p. 113—115. 1 Ambr. ferm. de divers. p. 107.

a he chose to conser it on one Eugenius, and to reign in his name ". Eugenius had Eugenius is see formerly taught grammar, and afterwards rhetoric, and was generally esteemed on the sin bis room. account of his eloquence. Ricomer, at the request of Symmachus, had taken him under his protection, and upon his returning into the east with Theodosius, recommended him to Arbogastes, by whose interest he was raised to the post of secretary . Zosimus tells us, that Arbogastes, reposing an intire confidence in Eugenius, and judging him capable of the most daring resolutions, imparted to him the design he had formed of murdering Valentinian, and raising him to the empire in his room; that Eugenius rejected at first the proposal with horror; but was in the end prevailed upon to fall in with the measures of his patron; whereupon he was, by his interest, after the death b of the young prince, proclaimed emperor, as a person well qualified for that high station o. He soon made himself master of all the western provinces, says Socrates P; He seizes on all which must be understood of West Illyricum, Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Britain; but not the western proof Africa, which, after the death of Valentinian, submitted to Theodosius, as appears from two laws of that prince, the one dated from Constantinople the thirtieth of December 393. and addressed to Gildo count of Africa; and the other dated from the same place the twenty-seventh of March, and addressed to Silvanus duke of the province Tripolitana 9. It is likewise manifest from Claudian, that Gildo acknowledged Theodostus, and not Eugenius. The new usurper, tho' a christian, was greatly savoured by the pagans, who were well apprifed, that he only bore the title of emperor, while c the whole power was lodged in Arbogastes, who pretended a great attachment to their religion. The aruspices, who began to appear anew, assured him, that he was destined to the empire of the whole world; that he would soon gain a complete victory over Theodofius, who was as much hated, as he was beloved, by the gods; and that his power and authority would have no other bounds, but those of the Roman empire's. Tho' Eugenius seemed to savour the pagans, yet, in the very beginning of his reign, he wrote to St. Ambrose, who did not answer his letter, till he was pressed by some of his friends to recommend them to the new prince, and then he treated him in his letters with all the respect due to an emperor v. While these things passed in the west, some disturbances happened in the court of Theodosius at Constantinople: d Rufinus, not satisfied with the consular dignity, to which he was raised this year, notwithstanding the report of his having been the author of the death of Promotus, killed by the barbarians, began to aspire at the presecture of the east, which was held by Tatianus, whom he caused to be accused of oppression in his government. Tatianus and Zosimus will have him to have been altogether innocent, and only hated by Rusinus, his son Proculon account of his integrity. Proculus, the son of Tatianus, and presect of Constantible insuccused as the instiguation nople, was accused of the same crime, Rusinus hating him, says Zosimus, for the sake of Rusinus. of his father. Theodosius appointed several judges to try them; but as Rusinus was at the head of that commission, and the other judges dreaded his resentment, they were both declared guilty: the father was deposed, and confined to Lycia, his native Tatianus ba. e country; and the fon sentenced to death; which Theodosius no sooner knew, than he nished, and his fent him his pardon: but the messenger, gained over by Rusinus, took care not to some executed.

f tuture, should be convicted of having plundered the people committed to their care;

whereas, by former laws, they were only to pay four times the value of what they had taken . As for Proculus, he must have been guilty of greater crimes than his father, fince he was punished with more severity. But however just was the punishment inflicted on Tatianus, his countrymen the Lycians, who had no share in his crimes, ought not to have had any in his difgrace and misfortunes; nevertheless acquaint the proper officers with the emperor's order, till the execution was over ". Thus Zosimus. But Libanius charges both Tatianus, and his fon Proculus, with cruelty and oppression w; and the laws enacted on this occasion by Theodosius, give us room to believe, that the charge brought against Tatianus, was not altogether groundless, as Zosimus styles it; for by one law he rook off a tax which had been levied by Tatianus, without his knowledge; by another he commanded the estates and effects of fuch persons as had been proscribed by him, to be restored to them or their children; and by a third addressed to Rufinus, he declared those guilty of death, who, for the

5

Š

ŋ.;

11

ď

12

Ø

r:i

ĸ.

<sup>**</sup> Philost.l. xi. c. 2. p. 145. Oros. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220. Claud. conf. Hon. 3, 4. p. 35, 41.

** Soc. l. v. c. 25. p. 293. Zos. p. 775. Philost. p. 146. Symm. l. iii. ep. 60, 61. p. 129.

** Zos. p. 775. ** Socr. p. 294. ** God. Theod. chron. p. 128. ** Claud. bell. Gild. p. 76. & conful. Hon. 6. p. 77.

** Soz. l. vii. c. 22. p. 740. ** Amb. ep. 15. p. 210. ** Zos. l. iv. p. 774. * Soz. l. vii. c. 22. p. 740.
* Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 28. leg. 1. p. 219, 220. ч Lib. orat. xvi. p. 423.

Rufinus made prefect of the eaft.

Theodosius,

If ho prepares for war.

His piety.

His laws against heretics.

Theodosius, at the instigation of Rusinus, a declared enemy to the Lycians, enacted a a law, declaring their whole nation infamous, depriving them of the employments they held at that time, and rendering them for ever incapable of any preferment y. unjust law was afterwards revoked by Arcadius, who restored the Lycians to their former condition, ascribing the base treatment they had met with, not to their demerit, but to the hatred of an execrable man, meaning Rufinus z. As Tatianus is highly commended by Zosimus, and persecuted with great cruelty the catholics, while he was governor of Egypt under Valens in 367. some writers from thence conclude him to have been a pagan. He had been comes largitionum to Valens in 374. three times prefect of the east, and twice conful. He is supposed to have died soon after his disgrace. When he was deposed, Kusinus was appointed present of the case in the room. The affair of Tatianus and Proculus was not yet ended, when news of the When he was deposed, Rufinus was appointed prefect of the east in his b death of Valentinian, and the usurpation of Eugenius, was brought to Constantinople. Eugenius sends A few days after, embassadors arrived from the usurper, who, without so much as mentioning the name of Arbogastes, demanded an audience in the name of Eugenius; and being admitted to the emperor's presence, proposed an alliance between him and their maiter. Theodosius received them in a very obliging manner, amused them, says Zosimus, with fair words, and dismissed them loaded with rich presents b. At the head of this embassy was one Rusinus, an Athenian, who was attended by several bishops sent by Eugenius to divert the emperor from engaging in a civil war. As Theodosius charged Arbogastes with the murder of Valentinian, the bishops did all that & lay in their power to clear him from that false, as they styled it, and groundless aspersion c. Rufinus d, Theodoret e, and Sozomen f, tell us, that, upon the departure of the embassadors, Theodosius dispatched the eunuch Eutropius, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the reign of Arcadius, to consult a holy hermit, by name John, by nation an Egyptian, whom the emperor looked upon as an oracle. Eutropius was injoined to bring him, if possible, to court; but, if he could not prevail upon him to quit his solitude, to ask him, whether he approved of the emperor's attacking Eugenius first? or, if he should wait till the usurper attacked him? The hermit declined going to court; but advised the emperor to begin the war without delay, affuring him, that he would overcome the tyrant, but not without bloodshed; that he would die in Italy, after his victory, and in dying leave his son emperor of the west. Thus the above-mentioned writers. Theodosius, upon the return of the messenger, began his military preparations; but as he consided more in the assistance of Heaven, than the number of his troops, or the bravery of his generals, he visited in the first place all the churches of his capital, attended by several bishops, and a great croud of people, imploring with them the favour and protection of the Almighty, who disposes of kingdoms as he thinks fit, and bestows victory on whom he pleases s. The military preparations, to which Theodosius applied himself with indefatigable pains, did not divert him from publishing several laws this year, among the rest one condemning such heretics as should confer or receive holy orders, to pay, e by way of fine, ten pounds weight of gold, and declaring the places where they should perform any religious ceremony, confiscated b. By another law of this year, dated the eighteenth of July, he commands those who should raise disturbances in the church, or impugn the orthodox faith, to be banished, and confined to some desert, if they had been guilty of the same fault before it. The law of the eighteenth of Officer of this year, commands such criminals as should have purloined the public money, and taken fanctuary in churches, to be dragged from thence, and punished, or the bishops who protected them, to pay what they owed k. From this law it appears, that the custom of taking fanctuary in churches had already prevailed. Before this time, St. Austin, being solicited either to deliver up a debtor, by name Fascius, f who had fled to his church as to an afylum, or to fatisfy his creditors, chose the latter 1. By a law dated the eighth of November, the emperor revived all the antient laws against paganism, forbidding, under the severest penalties, every ceremony of the pagan religion m.

F Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 38. leg. 9. p. 278, 279.

F Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 38. leg. 9. p. 278, 279.

F Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 38. leg. 9. p. 278, 279.

F Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 39. leg. 279.

F Cod. Theod. l. ii. 5. leg. 21. p. 138.

F Cod. Theod. l. ii. 5. leg. 21. p. 138.

F Cod. Theod. l. ii. 5. leg. 21. p. 138.

Cod. Theod. l. ii. 10. leg. 12. p. 273.

THE following year Theodofius was conful the third time, with Abundantius, who was, as appears from a law of the preceding year, general both of the horse and foot ". In his room Eugenius was acknowledged conful in the west, as we learn from an antient epitaph of this year, in which that usurper is styled the collegue of Theodosius in the consulship. This year Theodosius published many excellent laws, and among the rest one abrogating an antient law, which punished those with death, who uttered the restore the restored to the restored seditious words against the prince. If such words, says Theodosius in his law of this law of treason. year, proceed from levity, they are to be despised; if from folly, to be pitied; if from malice, they are to be forgiven P. In the beginning, or, as some will have it, in the end of this year, that is, on the fifteenth of January, or twentieth of November, the emperor declared his second son Honorius, Augustus. The ceremony was Honorius deperformed with great solemnity in the palace of Hebdomon near Constantinople 1. The clared Aupoet Claudian introduces on this occasion Theodosius instructing the young prince in gustus. the art of governing r. This year was ended at Constantinople a square, which bore the name of Theodofius; and the following year a wreathed column erected in it, on which were engraved the victories of that prince over the Goths and other barbarians. On the top of the column was an equestrian statue of Theodosius, which was thrown down by an earthquake in the reign of the emperor Zeno; but the column was still standing in the thirteenth century, and is frequently mentioned in history'. Theodosius passed this whole year at Constantinople, making the necessary preparations for the c dangerous war which he was resolved to undertake. As for Eugenius, he had gained Eugenius gains the preceding year considerable advantages over the Franks, being induced to make advantages war upon them by Arbogastes, who bore an old grudge to Marcomir and Sunno, two over the princes of that nation. This war was managed by Arbogastes, who passing the Rbine Franks. near Cologne in the depth of winter, laid waste the countries of the Brutterians and Chamavians, without meeting with the least opposition, Marcomir shewing himself only at a distance on the hills, with some parties of the Ansivarii and Chatti. Hence it appears, that these antient nations of Germany were at this time comprised under the name of Franks. Eugenius himself approached the Rhine, at the head of a very numerous and powerful army; and having, upon the return of Arbogastes, renewed the antient alliance between the Romans and Franks, he left Gaul, and repaired to Italy; which he had scarce entered, when he was met by a deputation from the Roman senate, intreating him to restore to the temples the revenues, of which they had been deprived by Gratian, and to re-establish the celebrated altar of Victory. Eugenius received them in a very obliging manner; but could not be prevailed upon to comply with their request. The senate soon after sent a second deputation to folicit the fame favour; which was denied them a fecond time. But when by a third embassy they renewed their request, Eugenius yielded at length to their importunity, Eugenius farestoring the pagan religion and temples to their former lustre, and suffering the vours the paantient ceremonies and facrifices to be renewed in the senate of the metropolis of his san ceremonia. e empire ". The following year 394. Arcadius being consul the third time, and Honorius the second, Theodosius was still at Constantinople on the fisteenth of May w; but he left that metropolis foon after; for he was, on the thirtieth of the same month, at Heraclea; and on the fifteenth of June at Adrianople x. He bent his march through Dacia, and the other provinces between Thrace and the Julian Alps, which separate Italy from Noricum, with a design to force the passes of those mountains, and break into Italy, before the army of Eugenius was in a condition to oppose him. Upon his arrival at the Alps, he found the passes guarded by Flavianus presect of Italy, at the head of a considerable body of Roman troops, who, after a short resistance, betook themselves to slight. Flavianus was killed at the first onset. Theodosius, Theodosius, f having thus opened himself a passage over the Alps, was met, as he came down from forces the passes those mountains, by Eugenius, at the head of a very numerous army, drawn up in of the Alps. battle-array on the banks of the river Frigidum; which Sanson and others take to be the river Vipat or Wibach in the county of Gorice, about thirty-fix miles from Aquileia.

n Cod. Theod. chron. p. 126.

O Vide Rein. p. 1021.

P Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 4. leg. 3. p. 42.

P PHILOST. l. xi. c. 2. p. 146. Sos. l. vii. c. 24. p. 741. CLAUD. conf. Hon. 3. p. 35, 36.

F CLAUD. ibid. p. 45—50.

Chron. Alex. p. 708.

CANGE Conftant. antiq. l. i. p. 76—80.

T Greg. Tur. hift. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 61, 62.

AMBR. vit. p. 85. ep. 15. p. 210.

W Cod. Theod. chron. p. 129.

I Idem ibid.

The army of Theodosius was no less numerous than that of the enemy, being reinforced by several bodies of Armenians, Iberians, Arabians, Goths, and other barbarians, who dwelt beyond the Danube. The Roman troops were commanded by Ti- a massius and Stilicho, who had married the emperor's niece; and the foreign auxiliaries by Gainas, Saul, Bacurius, and Alaric the Goth, whose name is famous in history. Of Gainas, who was of the same nation, and Saul, who was likewise a barbarian, we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the reigns of Arcadius and Honorius. Bacurius was a native of Armenia, or, as Rufinus will have it, of Iberia, nay, he is styled by that writer king of Iberia. Among the Romans he was comes domesticorum, that is, captain of the guards, and univerfally esteemed, not only for his courage and experience in war, but for the mildness of his temper, his affability and good-nature to all, even to his enemies c. Rufinus, the ecclefiastic historian, who lived in great intimacy with him while he was duke of Palestine, cells him a man of b great integrity, a pious and zealous christian, a worthy companion of Theodosius, a man endowed with every good quality of the mind, and by few equalled in the perfections of his body d. Under these leaders, the army of Theodosius advanced into the plain; but the emperor, unwilling to expose the Romans, ordered the foreign auxiliaries to begin the action, which they did with great vigour and resolution; but were foon put in diforder by the regular and well disciplined troops of Engenius, headed by Arbogastes, who fignalized himself in a very eminent manner. Bacurius however, having rallied the barbarians, led them back to the charge; and being supported by Timasius and Stilicho, renewed the combat, which lasted till night coming on, both armies retired to their respective camps. Bacurius on this occasion c diftinguished himself above all the other commanders, killed great numbers of the enemy with his own hand; but being in the end furrounded on all fides, he was cut in pieces, after having defended himself for a long time with incredible bravery. Of the Goths and other auxiliaries above ten thousand were killed; but of the Romans, who supported them, only a small number. Eugenius, concluding he had gained the day, and that the army of Theodosius was utterly defeated, gave his men leave to retire to their tents, and refresh themselves, that they might be the better able to pursue the enemy next morning. In the mean time Theodosius was advised by his generals not to hazard a second engagement, but to retire in the night, repass the Alps, and put off the decision of the war till another campaign; against which time d he might with great ease recruit his army, and renew the war with fresh vigour. But the emperor, without giving ear to their remonstrances, having assembled his troops by break of day, led them in person against the enemy; and entering their camp when least expected, put great numbers of them to the sword, and obliged the rest to fave themselves by a precipitous and disorderly flight. Thus Zosimus. But the ecclesiastic historians ascribe the victory gained by Theodosius, not to any surprize, but to the prayers of the emperor, and to the miraculous assistance of St. John the evangelist, and the apostle St. Philip, who appearing to him in the night, encouraged him to renew the fight early next morning, and assured him of victory. The same writers add, that Theodosius no sooner attacked Eugenius's numerous forces, than a e violent storm arising, and blowing full in the enemy's faces, turned their arrows and javelins back upon themselves, and raised such clouds of dust, as quite deprived them of their fight; so that having two enemies to encounter at once, they were quickly overcome. Of this storm mention is made by Theodoret f, Orosius &, Sozomen h, St. Ambrose h, Rusinus h, St. Austin h, and the poet Claudian m, who describes it with great elegance in some verses which he wrote eighteen months after n; but, to flatter Honorius, will have it to have been owing to his destiny. Arbogastes behaved on this occasion with great intrepidity; but, in spite of his utmost efforts, his men, quite disheartened, and concluding, from the extraordinary violence of the storm, that Heaven fought against them, either betook themselves to flight, or, throwing f down their arms, submitted to Theodosius, who readily received them into favour; but at the same time commanded them to apprehend, and deliver up to him, the usurper. They no sooner received this order, than they flew to the rising ground where Eugenius had posted himself to behold the battle, and was still waiting the event of it. When he observed them coming in great haste towards him, he concluded they brought him news of the victory. As they approached, he asked them, whether

&lt;sup>2</sup> Zos. p. 777.
<sup>6</sup> Ruf. l. i. c. 10. p. 166.
<sup>6</sup> Zos. ibid.
<sup>d</sup> Ruf. l. ii. c. 33. p. 192.
<sup>e</sup> Zos. p. 778.
<sup>f</sup> Theodor. l. v. c. 24. p. 739.
<sup>e</sup> Oros. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220.
<sup>h</sup> Soz. l. vii. c. 35. p. 220.
<sup>h</sup> Soz. l. vii. c. 37. p. 190.
<sup>l</sup> Ambr. ferm. de diverf. p. 117. & in pfal. xxxvi. p. 692.
<sup>h</sup> Ruf. l. ii. c. 32. p. 192.
<sup>h</sup> Ruf. l. ii. c. 33. p. 192.
<sup>h</sup> CLAUD. conf. Hon. 3. p. 36.
<sup>n</sup> Idem ibid
they

a they had, pursuant to his orders, secured Theodosius. They answered, that they despised the commands of a tyrant and usurper, whom they were come to seize, and deliver up to their lawful fovereign; and loading him that instant with irons, dragged Eugenius him, stripped of all the ensigns of majesty, to the emperor, who reproached him taken delivered with the murder of Valentinian, with the calamities he had brought upon the empire fius, and put to by his unjust usurpation, and with putting his confidence in Hercules, in defiance of death by his the only true God; for on his chief standard he had displayed the image of that own men. fabulous deity. Eugenius begged earnestly for his life; but while he lay prostrate at the emperor's feet, his own foldiers struck off his head, and carrying it about on the point of a spear, shewed it to those who, remaining in his camp, had not yet subb mitted to Theodofius. At that fight they were all thunder-struck; but being at the same time informed, that Theodosius was ready to receive them into savour, they threw down their arms, and submitted . Arbogastes, the chief author of the death of Valentinian, and the evils attending it, despairing of pardon, fled to the mountains; but being apprised that diligent search was made after him, he laid violent Arbogastes hands on himself P. The children of Eugenius and Arbogastes, who had attended lays violent their parents in this war, having great reason to expect the same treatment, took hands on himself P. fanctuary in different churches; but the pious emperor, not fatisfied with pardoning felf. them, laid hold of that opportunity to convert them from paganism, which they professed, to the christian religion, appointing proper persons to instruct them, and c convince them of their errors; which they had no fooner renounced, than he took them under his protection, put them in possession of their paternal estates, and raised them to considerable employments q. Great numbers of the partizans of Eugenius having fled for refuge to the great church of Milan, St. Ambrofe repaired to Aquileia, where the emperor then was, to folicit their pardon; which was immediately granted, and a general amnesty proclaimed r; nay, the emperor is said to have been so concerned for the blood that was shed in the battle, as to abstain for some time from the holy eucharift'. He probably followed therein the directions of St. Ambrose, at least his conduct was agreeable to the sentiments of that prelate, who, in speaking of judges, fays, That tho' he does not deny them, as many have done, the holy d eucharift, after they have sentenced criminals to death, yet he approves of their abstaining for some time of their own accord from the holy mysteries. The emperor, immediately after his victory over Eugenius, fent for his fon Honorius, whom he had left at Constantinople, under the care of Rusinus, who was thereby vested with almost an unlimited power. Before the arrival of the young prince, Theodosius had removed from Aquileia to Milan; where he received him and Serena, who came with him, in the great church, and committed them both to the care of St. Ambroje . Serena was daughter to Honorius, the emperor's brother. A few days after, he declared his son Honorius emperor of the west, assigning him for his share Italy, Gaul, Spain, Britain, Honorius de-Africa, and West Illyricum, and appointing Stilicho his first general and prime minister w. clared emperor With this declaration he fent Stilicho to Rome; on which occasion Serena, whom of the west. Theodofius had married to that general, and who accompanied her hufband to Rome, shewed a great desire, says Zosimus, to see the statue of Cybele; but she was no sooner admitted into the temple, than she snatched from the goddess a necklace of inestimable value, faying, it became better the niece of an emperor, than a senseles statue. An old veltal, who was present, transported with a blind zeal, could not forbear uttering dreadful imprecations against Serena, her husband, and her children; but Serena caused her to be driven out of the temple, and punished for her arrogance. At the same time her husband Stilicho commanded the thick plate of gold, with which the gates of Jupiter Capitolinus were covered, to be taken off, and conveyed to his f lodging. Under the plate were found engraved on the wood these words: This is reserved for an unbappy king. Thus Zosimus x, who ridiculously ascribes to these two actions, the misfortunes which afterwards befel Stilicho and Serena. The Roman senate sent deputies to congratulate Theodosius on his late victory, and to beg the confulfhip of the ensuing year for the two brothers Olybrius and Probinus. The emperor granted them their request, exhorting them at the same time with great zeal to renounce the errors in which they had been brought up, and yield to the force of a that truth, which now generally prevailed. Zosimus, who seldom agrees with other writers, supposes Theodofius to have gone in person to Rome, to have summoned to the imperial palace all the senators, who still continued attached to the ancient ceremonies of the Romans, and to have exhorted them to get the better of the prejudice of their education, and renouncing the superstitious worship of the gods, to embrace the christian religion, which alone could deliver them from their sins. But not one, continues that writer, could be prevailed upon to abandon the religion and ceremonies with which Rome had been founded, and had subsisted near twelve hundred years. Hereupon the emperor declared, that as the exchequer had been drained by the late war, he could spare no money for the ceremonies of their reli- b gion; which he therefore declared unlawful, and utterly suppressed y. He had before enacted several laws for the suppression of idolatry; but Eugenius had revoked them, and restored to the temples their privileges and revenues. This year is remarkable for dreadful earthquakes, which were felt almost every day in most provinces of the empire, from the beginning of September to the end of November; for excessive and inceffant rains, which laid whole countries under water; and such a darkness as had not happened in the memory of man ': all which the writers of those times feem to have looked upon as prognostics of the great loss the Roman empire was to fustain in the approaching death of the great Theodosius.

• Ambr. vit. p 86. Claud. conf. Hon. 4. p. 41. Ruf. p. 192. Theodor. p. 740. Socr. l. v. c. 25. p. 294. Chron. Alex. p. 710. P. Claud. ibid. p. 41. & conf. Hon. 3. p. 39. Socr. p. 295. Oros. p. 220, 221. ¶ Ambr. ep. 16. p. 211. Oros. ibid. F. Ambr. vit. p. 86. Ruf. l. ii. c. 34. p. 192. Socr. l. v. c. 26. p. 295. Soz. l. vii. c. 29. p. 753. Ambr. ep. 51. p. 309, 310. Socr. l. v. c. 26. p. 295. Ruf. l. ii. c. 34. p. 192. W. Zos. l. iv. p. 773. Zos. p. 779. Vol. VI. Nº 6.

Theodosius pire between his two children.

Theodolius dies.

His character.

THE next confuls were the two brothers Anicius Hermogenianus Olybrius and Anicius c Probinus, the fons of Petronius Probus and Anicia Proba, on whose consulate Claudian wrote a poem?. Theodosius, having restored the west to its former tranquillity, was preparing to return to Constantinosle, when he was seized with a dropfy, occasioned by the great fatigues he had undergone in the late war b. As foon as he perceived himself to be in danger, he made his will, by which he divided the empire, bequeathdividus the em- ing the east to his eldest son Arcadius, and the west to Honorius. He likewise confirmed the pardon which he had granted to all those who had borne arms against him, and remitted a tribute, which had proved very burdensome to the people, charging his fons and fuccessors to see his will duly executed as to these two points q. Socrates and Sozomen write, that finding himself in great measure eased of his pain, d he affisted at a chariot-race; but his distemper returning with great violence, he appointed one of his fons to prefide at the sports in his room; and withdrawing to his chamber, died the following night. He was heard a few minutes before he expired to utter the name of St. Ambroses. He died at Milan on the seventeenth of January of this year 395. two days before he had ended the fixteenth year of his reign, being then at most in the fistieth year of his age '. St. Ambrose pronounced his funeral oration, in which he supposes him to enjoy the rewards promised in the gospel to a religious and virtuous life ". His body was embalmed, and conveyed from Milan to Constantinople, where it was interred by Arcadius with extraordinary pomp and magnificence on the ninth of November of the present year w. A tomb of e porphyry was to be seen many ages after, supposed to be that of Theodosius. It stood in the mausoleum of Constantine the Great, near the church of the apostles x. As for the character of Theodojius, all authors, whether pagan or christian, Zosimus alone excepted, agree that he was endowed in an eminent degree with every virtue becoming a prince, without the allay of one fingle vice. Not to mention the ecclesiastic historians, and the two great luminaries of the church, St. Ambrose and St. Austin, who may perhaps be thought prejudiced in his favour, as he was a most zealous patron of the orthodox faith, Themistius, Symmachus, Pacatus, and Victor the younger, though greatly attached to the ancient religion of the Romans, which Theodosius discountenanced above all his predecessors, and made it his chief f fludy utterly to suppress, propose him as the pattern of an excellent prince, the eminent virtues that shone in him overcoming the prejudice, which his zeal for the christian religion, and aversion to the superstitious ceremonies of the pagans, raised against him among those, who, in spite of his utmost endeavours, continued obstinate in their errors?. The teltimony of those writers, who had no less reason to y Idem, l. v. p. 814. * Mar. chron. Ama serm. de divers. iii. p. 116. * CLAUD. de cons. Olyb. & Prob. p. 1—8. b Socr. l. v. c. 26. p. 295. Soz. l. vii. c. 28. p. 752. 4 Amb. ibid. p. 117. Socr. l. v. c. 26. Soz. l. vii. c. 29. p. 752. 2 Amb. ibid. p. 122. 5 Socr. p. 295. Chr. Alex. p. 710. Amb. fer. de diverf. iii. p. 117—121. W Zos. l. iv. p. 779. Amb. ibid. p. 125. Socr. l. vi. c. 1. p. 300. CANGE urb. Conft. antiq. l. iv. p. 109. Vide Sym. l. iii. ep. 81. p. 137. ер. 13. р.65. Vіст. еріт. р. 546, 547.

bç

ĺį

ıt

n

Ne.

til

eli- b

0:1

Œ,

Ċ

10 8

7.0

23

TM (

ЭX

B 23

ned)

red

ıch-

n-

nit

ρk, ß.

rii, d

, c

: 12 sch

13

æď

ή¢

red

111

bd:

, lt

3.

31

TiT

ΠXI

11

¥15

and

125, chid t

, ik

r de

. . 1

χÌ.

Q (0

أثناع

110

100

a be prejudiced against Theodosius than Zosimus, and who lived in those times, must be of far greater weight with every impartial reader, than the invectives of that historian, who lived a hundred years after. Theodosius was, as we have hinted above out of Aurelius Victor, naturally choleric, and apt in the first transports of his passion to issue such orders as savoured of cruelty. But as he was soon appealed, we have but one instance of their being put in execution before he had time to revoke them; namely, the famous massacre of the inhabitants of Thesfalonica, who had murdered in an insurrection Botericus, the emperor's lieutenant in Illyricum, because he refused to set at liberty a chariot-driver, who had been imprifoned for offering violence to a woman of some distinction. When this came to the b emperor's ears, he ordered all those who had been any-ways concerned in the murder or riot, to be put to death; but at the intercession of St. Ambrose, and other bishops affembled in a fynod at Milan, where the emperor then was, he revoked his orders, and pardoned them. Some time after, his ministers representing to him, that the Theffalonians had been encouraged to this sedition by the too great indulgence he had shewn to the inhabitants of Antioch; and that if he suffered the murder of his lieutenant to go thus unpunished, his officers for the future would be in continual danger of their lives, and he himself disturbed and alarmed with daily insurrections; his wrath was kindled anew to such a degree, that, forgetful of the promise he had made to St. Ambrose, he immediately ordered a body of troops to march to c Thessalonica, and revenge on the inhabitants the death of his lieutenant. The soldiers, entering the city, pursuant to their orders, surrounded the people, while they were affembled to behold the Circensian games; and falling upon them sword in The massacre of hand, without regard to fex, age, or condition, without distinction of guilty or Thessaionica. innocent, cruelly massacred in the space of three hours above seven thousand persons, many of whom were strangers come to Thessalonica on occasion of the sports. When news of this massacre was brought to Milan, St. Ambrose wrote to the emperor, who had left that city fome time before, upbraiding him with his cruelty, representing to him the enormity of his crime, and exhorting him to atone for it by a sincere submission and repentance. This the emperor took in good part; and An instance of d returning a few days after to Milan, repaired, according to his custom, to the great his fubmission church, to perform his devotions there. But St. Ambrofe, meeting him at the door, of the church. denied him entrance, telling him, that he was cut off from the communion of the faithful, and unworthy to appear amongst them, till he had expiated so public a crime by as public a repentance. To this the emperor readily submitted; and returning to the palace with tears in his eyes, performed with great humility all the duties of an open penance, as injoined by the canons of the church, and the custom of those times. He continued in that state for the space of eight months, that is, from the latter end of April to Christmas, when, to make some amends for his crime, and to prevent both himself and his successors from being guilty of the like cruelty for the e future, he enacted a law, or rather enforced the observance of an antient law, by which all criminals were to have a respite of thirty days allowed them between the pronouncing of the sentence of death and their execution z. It is surprising, that Zosimus, who omits no opportunity of railing at Theodosius, and often censures even the most commendable actions of that prince, should take no notice of the abovementioned massacre. The reader will find in the ecclesiastic writers other instances of the emperor's intire submission to the ordinances of the church, of his piety, felf-denial, and other christian virtues, in which he far excelled all the princes who had reigned before him. Of the writers who flourished in his reign, we shall speak in note (M).

THEODOR, I. iii. c. 17. Soz. I. iii. c. 24. NICEPH, I. xii. c. 40. Amb. ep. xxviii. Aug. de civ. Dei, 1. v. c. 26, &c.

(M) Among the writers, who flourished under Theodosius, the celebrated orator symmachus deserves, both on account of his birth and eloquence, to be mentioned in the first place. He was the son of L. Aurelius Avianius Symmachus, prefect of Rome in 36+(1). He is flyled at the head of his letters, by Macrobius (2), and in an ancient inscription, Q.

Aurelius Symmachus (3). He had at least three brothers, who were all dead before the year 389 (4). Of these Celsinus Ticianus, whom in all his letters he styles brother (5), seems to have been one. distinguishes Flavianus, who was prefect of Italy, and joined Eugenius, in whose cause he lost his life, with the same title (6); but most writers are of aninico,

(1) Sym. l. ii. c. 44. p. 81. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 69. (2) Macrob. l. i. c. 5. p. 176, 177. p. 399. (4) Sym. l. iii. ep. 6. p. 104. (5) Idem, l. i. ep. 40, 56, 68, p. 30, 38. (6) Idem p. 81. Gr. ep. 83, p. 97. (6) Idem, l. ii. ep. 44.

opinion, that he was no ways allied to him. Symmachus married Rusticiana, the daughter of Orfices, who was for many years present of Rome under Constantius, and had by her one son, named D. Fabius Memmius Symmachus (7). Orfites, his fatherin-law, was acculed in 364. and convicted of having embezzled the public money; for which crime his estate was confiscated, and he banished; but he was recalled in 366, when part of his estate was restored to him, but nevertheless he died very poor about the year 370. leaving two daughters behind him, viz. Rusticiana, and another, who was married to a perfon of distinction in Hetruria (8). Though Symma-chus had no fortune with his wife, yet he was reckoned among the wealthy fenators 9). He was high pontiff of the pagans, quæstor, prætor, corrector or governor of Lucania and Bratium in 365. and 368. proconful of Africa in 370. and 373. pre-fect of Rome in 384. and conful in 391 (10). He is styled in an ancient inscription count of the third order (11). He was a most zealous patron of idolatry, and on that account banished by Theodosius, but soon after recalled, as we have observed already. He brought up his fon with extraordinary care, and feems to have taken upon himself to instruct him (12). Being invited by Theodofius, with whom he lived in great intimacy, to come to Milan, and affift at the folemnity of his confulfhip in 399, he excused himself, alledging, that he could not leave his fon (13). His son was made by his interest, first quæstor, and afterwards prætor (14), quæstor about the year 392. and prætor in 397. The latter dignity cost him two thousand pounds weight of gold (15), and he would have spent on that occasion a far greater sum, had he not been restrained by Stilicho, who at that time ruled under Honorius (16). Young Symmachus was proconful of Africa in 415, and prefect of Rome in 419(17). In the date of a law of the year 424. he is marked conful(18); but most writers take that to be a mistake. He married, after the year 394. the grand-daughter of Flavianus, and had by her a son before the death of his father (19). He wrote some epigrams on illustrious men, and several letters, which are to be found among those of his father, who submitted his own compositions to the censure and judgment of his son (20). Symmachus, the father, was esteemed the most eloquent orator of his time; but his speeches not meeting with the applause he expected, he applied himself intirely to the writing of letters (21). His speeches have been long fince loft; but his letters have reached our times, and are divided into ten books. They were carefully preserved by his amanuentis, and one of his friends, named Elpidius, and published after his death by his son (22). Prudensius, who wrote against him, while he was still living, on occasion of his endeavouring to persuade the emperor to restore the altar of victory, extols his eloquence, and compares it to a golden spade made use of to dig up ordure (23). Macrobius compares his elegant and florid style, as he terms it, to that of Pliny the younger, and equals him in that respect to the best writers of antiquity (24). Apollinaris Sidonius and Caffiodorus admire his eloquence, and the purity of his style (25). Both these writers quote some passages out of him, which are not to be found in any of his works that have reached our times (26). Socrates (27), Photius (28), and fornandes (29), mention him with great encomiums. And truly the turn and brevity of his letters is not without fome elegance; but the same thoughts, tho', generally speaking, common and obvious, are often repeated; and his style savours much of the barbarity of the age in which he lived. Fornandes quotes the fifth book of the history of Symmachus; but as it does not appear, that either Symmachus the orator, or his son, ever wrote any history, most authors take the historian quoted by Jornandes to be different from both (30).

The Latin poet Rufus Festus Avienus is supposed to have flourished under Theodosius, because he inscribed a work to Probus, a consular man, whom most writers take to be the celebrated Probus, who died not long before the year 395 (31). St. Jerom, in his comments on the epiffle to Titus, writes, that the phenomena of Aratus had been lately translated by Avienus (32); which work, together with his translation of Dionysius's description of the world, and a third poem by the same author on the seacoasts, has reached our times. To the same Avieenus or Avianus are generally ascribed the sables of Afop in Latin verle, and the whole history of Livy in lambics; but the latter laborious performance, which is mentioned by Servius, has been long fince lost (33). Some other poetical pieces done by the fame author are still extant. He writes with more taste and elegance than could be expected from one of the age he lived in; but his fables are not to compare to those of Phadrus (34). Rufus Festus, who was proconful of Achaia under Valens, is thought to have been his fon (35). Victor the historian, who closes his history with a kind of panegyric on Theodofius, is thought to have lived in his time, and to have wrote foon after the death of that prince (36). The name of Sextus Aurelius Victor is common to him with another historian, who flourished in the reign of the emperor Valens; but from him he is distinguished by the surname of junior or the younger: in feveral manuscripts he is styled Victorius or Victorinus, and under both these names he is quoted by Paulus Diaconus (37). He wrote the Roman history; but what has reached our times is but an abridgment of his work, and thence called Victor's episome (38). Gregory of Tours quotes several things concerning the Franks out of an historian named Sulpicius Alexander (39), whom Gothofredas commends as an excellent writer, and supposes to be the same Alexander to whom Symmachus wrote several letters; from which it appears, that he was governor of a province, and was raifed by Valentinian II. about the year 387, to the post of tribune and secretary (40). Some writers are of opinion, that the Latin poet Manilius, who wrote on aftrology, flourished under Theodosius, or his son Honerius; but from several passages in that poem, especially from the last verses of the sirst book, Extremas modo per gentes, &c. thost critics conclude him to have lived in the time of Augustus, and to have written soon after the defeat of Varus (41). The motitia, or state of the provinces of the empire, published by Surita, with the itinerary of Antoninus, is supposed to have been written in the time of Theodosius; for mention is made there of the provinces of Arcadia in Egypt, and Honories in Pontus, so styled from that prince's two sons, and no notice is taken of several other provinces formed by Arcadius after the death of his father (42). The sive books of Flavius Vegetius Renatus on the military art, are addressed to the emperor, by whose order the author undertook that work (43). But that prince is sometimes named Valentinian, and sometimes Theodosius (44). All we know for certain is, that he wrote after the death of Gratian, and not long after the ravages committed by the Goths in that prince's reign, which he ascribes to his having suffered the infantry to lay asside their cuirasses and helmets (45). Vegetius is distinguished with the title of comes or count, and even with the epithet of illustrious. He is commonly blamed for confoundant with those of his time.

(7) Sidon. l. ii. ep. 10. p. 54. Sym. l. ix. ep. 121. p. 386. l. x. ep. 47. p. 441, 442. (8) Cod. Theod. tit. G. 376. Sym. l. x. ep. 47. p. 441, 442. (9) Phot. c. 80. p. 197. Sym. l. v. ep. 5. p. 187. & ep. 66. 214. Ammian. p. 377. Macrob. p. 745. (10) Sym. l. ix. ep. 41. p. 31. Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 386. (11) Rein. p. 399. (12) Sym. l. vii. ep. 30. p. 273. (13) Idem, l. viii. ep. 68. p. 335. (14) Idem, v. ep. 44. p. 202. & l. iv. ep. 12. p. 147. (15) Idem, l. iv. ep. 8. p. 146. (16) Idem ibid. (17) Cod. heod. tit. 6. p. 386. (18) Idem, tit. 1. p. 386. (19) Sym. l. iv. ep. 14. p. 14. p. 149. (20) Idem, l. viii. ep. 68. 21. p. 70. & go. appendix ad ep. Symmachi. p. 208. 201. (21) Idem liv. ep. 20. p. 16. (20) Idem, l. viii. ep. 68. p. 376. Sym. l. x. ep. 47. p. 441, 442. (11) Rein. p. 399. (12) Sym. l. vii. ep. 30. p. 273. (13) Idem, l. viii. ep. 68. p. 335. (14) Idem, l. v. ep. 44. p. 202. & l. iv. ep. 12. p. 147. (15) Idem, l. iv. ep. 8. p. 146. (16) Idemibid. (17) Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 386. (18) Idem, tit. 1. p. 386. (19) Sym. l. iv. ep. 14. p. 149. (20) Idem, l. vii. ep. 21. p. 70. & appendix ad ep. Symmachi, p. 298, 301. (21) Idem, l. iv. ep. 29. p. 159. & l. viii. ep. 68. p. 335. (22) Idem, l. iii. p. 101. & l. v. ep. 83, 84. p. 220. (23) Prud. in Sym. l. i. p. 223. & l. 2. p. 215. (24) Macr. l. v. c. 1. p. 364. (25) Sid. l. i. ep. 1. p. 11. & car. 9. p. 361. l. viii. ep. 10. p. 231. Cassiod. l. xii. ep. 1. p. 175. (26) Sid. & Cassiod. bid. (27) Socr. l. v. c. 14. p. 273. (28) Phot. c. 80. p. 197. (29) Forn. rer. Goth. c. 15. p. 636. (30) Vide Voss. hist. Lat. p. 724. (31) Idem, l. ii. c. 9. p. 202. (32) Hier. in Tit. i. p. 248. (33) Voss. Lat. p. 56. (34) Vide Baillet. tom. vi. p. 475, 476. (35) Vide Spon. p. 100. (36) Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 12. p. 221. (38) Vist. epit. p. 531. (39) Greg. Tür. hist. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 58, & c. (40) Cod. Theod. tit. g. p. 409. Sym. l. i. ep. 101. p. 58. & l. ix. ep. 25. p. 247. (11) Rein. p. 399.

with those of his time. The philosopher Themistius flourished under Theodossis, and was no less efteemed by the Greeks than Symmachus by the Latins. He was sprung from a noble family, and one of his ancestors, a philosopher by profession, had been diftinguished with several honours by Dioclesian (46); perhaps his father Engenius, who was no less famous for the profession of philosophy, than for his eloquence and learning (47). Amongst the letters of the emperor Julian there is one to a philosopher by name Eugenius (48); whom some take to have been the father of Themistins; if so, he must have been too young in Dio-elesian's time to be raised to any public employment. From his elogium written by his son soon after his death, it appears, that he preferred Ariffolle to all other philosophers, and that in his old age he used to unbend his mind from the study of philosophy with cultivating his garden (49). Themselius was of the same age with the emperor Constantius (50), born in 317. He was a native of Paphlagonia, and not of Constantinople, tho' he spent almost his whole life in that city (51). He studied rhetoric at a place on the most distant borders of Pontus and Colchis, pear Phasis, a city of Colchis, on a river of the same name, his father having recommended him to a celebrated professor, who taught in that country (52), and under whom he made such progress, that he was furnamed Euphradus, or the fine fpeaker (53).

Gregory Nazianzen ftyles him the king of eloquence; and adds, that he excelled in every thing, but most of all in the art of speaking (54). When he was yet very young, he wrote comments on Ariffects for his own private use; but nevertheless they were published, and met with geart applause (55). His comments on Aristotle, and his notes on Plato, were still extant in the time of Photius, who styles them an useful work (56). The author of the book on the categories or predicaments, fa'ily ascribed to St. Auslin, owns, that, in commissing that work, he had often recourse to Themislius, a great and wise philosopher of his time 57). Some fragments of the comments of Themislius on Arisonle are still extant (58); and Siobens quotes a passage out of that work concerning the immortality of the foul. When he had ended his studies, he went to Constantinople, and refided there for the space of at least torty years (60). He first taught philosophy, viz. that of Pythagoras, of Plate, and of Arifoste; but made most account of the latter (61). He had an incredible number of disciples, and a philosopher of Sicyon in Petoponnesus, who had studied under Iamblichus, sent him all his at once (62). He taught gratis; nsy, he affifted his disciples with money to tar as his imall estate would allow him; and thence he rejected the name of sophist, pretending it ought to be given only to mercenary teachers (63). After he had taught some time at Constantinople, he went first to the court of Conflamius, before whom he pronounced his first oration at Ancyrs in 347. having been introduced to that prince by Saturninus, who was conful in 383 (64). Not long after, that is, before the year 350. he saw Constant in the west 65). In the year 355. Constantius created him senator of Constantinoste, and wrote a letter in his commendation to the senate of that city (66). Two years after, that prince caused a strue to be erected to his honour (67). Julian wrote frequently to him in the time of his disgrace; and being created Casar, snswered by a long letter that which Themistius had wrote to him from Constantinople, encouraging him to answer the mighty expectations the world enter-tained of him (68). Upon the accession of forian to the empire, Themissius was sent to the new prince by the senate of Constantinople, to congratulate him in their name; on which occasion he pronounced, or defigned to pronounce, the oration which has reached our times (69', with feveral discourses pronounced by him before Valens, who would hear him at least once every year (70). He was with that prince in 369, when he concluded a peace with the Goths, to which the philosopher pretends to have greatly contributed (71). He attended Valens into the east, and in the Persian war in 372 (72). Socrates and Sozomen write, that he reconciled in some degree that prince to the catholics by a speech, which he pronounced before him, lies by a speech, which he pronounced before him, shewing, that he ought not to be surprised at the different opinions of men in points of religion, but on the contrary allow them great liberty (73). In the year 376, he was font by Valens to Gratian, then in Gaul. As on his return he passed through Rome, the inhabitants of that metropolis earnestly pressed him to continue there, and teach philosophy, but could not by any offers prevail upon him to accept that office; so that after a short stay in their city, he returned to Conflantinople (74). Theodosius raised him in 384. to the dignity of presect of Constantinople, and once had some thoughts of committing to his care the education of his fon Arcadius (75). He wrote several discourses in praise of that prince before the year 385, but as none of his orations are shought to be posterior to that year, he is supposed to have died foon after. All the emperors who reigned in his time, shewed him great respect, and distinguished him above all the other philosophers. Of his orations thirty-three have reached our times, comprising one in the Latin tongue, which several critics suppose not to be his. In Photius's time they were in all thirty-fix, and among them one addressed to Valentinian II. which since his time has been lost (76). Photius commends his style as grave, and at the same time florid and elegant (77). He declares himself in several places an enemy to flattery; but nevertheless commends all the emperors alike, and bestows as great encomiums upon Valens, as upon Theodosius. A poet, by name Palladius, charges him with ambitiously aspiring at the dignity of prefect, not with standing his pretended con-tempt of grandeur and honours (78). When Palladius lived, we know not. Themistius's thirteenth oration is altogether unworthy of a man of his character. Some writers will have him to have been an heretic, confounding him with one Eutychianus, who lived in the fixth century; but it is evident from his writings, that he professed paganism, tho' he was not perhaps such a fanatic as Libanius or Eunapius. Gregory Nazianzen, who admired his eloquence, wrote two letters to him, recommending several persons to his protection (79).

(41) Spanh. l. vii. p. 643. Vost. poet. Lat. p. 36. Manil. p. 160, 161. (42) Vide Noris epoch. p. 298. 302. (43) Veg. l. i. p. 13. J. l. ii. p. 30. (44) Idem, p. 13. (45) Idem, l.i. c. 20. p. 24. (46) Orat. Constantii Aug. de Themist. or. xx. p. 234. (50) Idem, or. i. p. 375. (51) Idem, or. ii. p. 23. (48) Julian. ep. xviii. p. 135. (49) Themist. or. xx. p. 234. (50) Idem, or. i. p. 375. (51) Idem, or. ii. p. 28. (52) Idem, or. xxiii. p. 292. J. or. xviii. p. 214. or. xxviii. p. 332. 333. (53) Greg. Naz. ep. cxl. p. 866. (54) Idem, ep. cxxxix. p. 865. (55) Idem, or. xxviii. p. 233. or. xxiii. p. 294. 295. (56) Phot. c. 73. p. 164. (57) Aug. de categ. c. 2. p. 23. J. c. 22. p. 34. (58) Phot. c. 74. p. 161. (59) Euseb. p. 241. (60) Idem, or. xviii. p. 298. J. or. Const. p. 22. (62) Idem, or. xxiii. p. 295. (63) Idem ibid. p. 294. (64) Idem, or. xxiii. p. 165. J. or. xxxi. p. 354. or. Const. p. 18. (66) Or. Const. ibid. (67) Themist. or. iv. p. 54. (68) Julian. ad Themist. p. 479. (69) Themist. or. v. p. 69. (70) Idem, or. x. p. 129. (71) Idem ibid. p. 133. J. or. xxiii. p. 298. J. or. xxxi. p. 354. (73) Socr. l. iv. c. 32. p. 250. Soz. l. vi. c. 36. p. 696. (74) Themist. or. xxiii. p. 298. J. or. xxxi. p. 354. (75) Idem, or. xviii. p. 215. vol. VI. No. 6.

Eunapius, who wrote the lives of the sophists of the fourth century, was a native of Sardes, the metropolis of Lydia; but studied at Athens for the space of five years, under Proereses, of whom we have spoken elsewhere, professor of eloquence in that city. He returned afterwards to Lydia, and there taught rhetoric. He applied himself likewise to the study of physic, and to that of magic, under Chrysantus, who had married his cousin. He was initiated in the mysteries of Eleusina, and blindly attached to all the ceremonies of the pagan superstition (80). By Chrysanthus he was induced to write the lives of the fophists; which work he begins with the life of Porinus, who flourished in the middle of the third century. From Plosinus he proceeds to the lives of Porphyrius, of Iamblichus, and his disciples, who were all addicted to the study of magic, as evidently appears from the account he gives us of them (81). He mentions the ravages committed in Greece by Alaric in 395 and 396. whence it is plain, that he did not put the last hand to his work till the latter end of the fourth century. He wrote the history of the emperors, which consisted of fourteen books, and extended from the beginning of the reign of Claudius, the successor of Gallienus, where the history of Dexippus ended, to the death of Eudoxia, the wife of Arcadius; that is, from the year 268. to 404 (82). His life of the emperor Julian was rather a panegyric, than a history (83). Some fragments of this history are still to be found in Suidas (84), and in the abstracts of Constantine Porphyrogenitus on em-bassies. Vossus writes, that the intire history of Eunapius is lodged in the public library of Venice (85). The history of Zosimus is but an abridgment of that of Eunapius (86). They were both declared enemies to all the christian princes, especially to Constantine the Great, tho Empapies retrenched, in the second edition of his work, most of the invectives against the christians, which he had inserted in the first (87). In his lives of the sophists, he betrays the same prejudice against the christian religion, and in several places inveighs with great bitterness against the monks. Photius commends his style as elegant, concise and expressive; but finds fault with his endless metaphors, which better suit an orator, than an historian (88). In the lives of the sophists, his style is often obscure, and not easily understood, which has led several able writers into gross mistakes (89). He frequently disagrees with the historians of his own time; nay, with those who were eye-witnesses of the events they relate. The two philosophers, Pappus and Theo, stourished at Alexandria, in the reign of Theodofius. The former wrote a general description of the earth, a treatise on the rivers of Lydia, and some other books on different subjects Theo, or Theon, belonged to the museum, says Suidas (91); that is, to the society of learned men, who composed the academy of Alexandria. He wrote a book on the overflowing of the Nile, and others on mathematics, arithmetic, aftrology, on Ptelemy's canon, and on other subjects (92). Dodwel published a fragment of Theo of Alexandria on Ptolemy's canon, with a book of fasti, which he supposes to have been done by the same writer (93).

(76) Phot. c. 76. p. 164. (77) Idem ibid. (78) Antholog. l. ii. c. 52. p. 188. Voff. poet. Grac. p. 93. (79) Greg. Naz. ep. 139, 140. p. 865. (80) Eunap. c. p. 8. 82, 102, 103. Phot. c. 77. p. 169. Jonf. l. iii. c. 17. p. 296—299. (81) Eunap. c. 21. p. 144. (82) Phot. ibid. Eunap. p. 75. (83) Phot. ibid. (84) Suid. p. 1099, 2237. (85) Voff. bift. Grac. l. ii. c. 18. p. 252. (86) Phot. e. 98. p. 272. (87) Phot. ibid. Suid. p. 1515. (88) Phot. p. 169, 172. (89) Vide Jonf. l. iii. e. 17. p. 298. (90) Suid. p. 424. p. 1307. (91) Idem ibid. (92) Idam ibid. p. Jonf. l. iii. e. 2. p. 219. (93) Append. ad Cypr. diff p. 1, 10, 98, 106.

C H A P. XXIX.

The Roman history, from the death of Theodofius the Great, to the taking of Rome the first time by the Goths.

HEODOSIUS divided, as we have observed above, the empire at his death a between his two sons Acceding and Hamiltonian between his two fons Arcadius and Honorius; but as they were too young to Rufinus prime eleven he committed the format and he format Rufinus prime eleven, he committed the former to the care of Rufinus, and the latter to that of

ıd i

1 : 1

a Stilltho. Rufinus was a native of Eause in Gascony b, and not of Eusa in Bosporus, as fome have imagined, misled by the authority of Tire Prospers. He appeared first at court in the reign of Theodosius, who, being taken with his uncommon address, and extraordinary qualities, raised him, about the year 390. to the post of magister officiorum, to the consular dignity in 392. and the same year to that of presect of the east, leaving him at Constantinople vested with almost an absolute and unlimited power, when he fet out for the west in 394. to make war on Eugenius d. Rusinus was well- His character. Thaped in his person, tall, of a graceful mien, and sprightly genius. He professed the christian religion, and was baptized in 394. on occasion of the solemn consecration of a church, which he had built, together with a palace, near Chalcedon f. He b could never have gained the efteem and confidence of Theodosius, without the appearance, at least, of piety, joined to his uncommon talents. St. Ambrose ranked him among his friends, and was glad to see him preferred 8. He lived in great intimacy with Symmachus, if the last letters of that writer's third book are, as they are commonly thought, addressed to him. In those letters Symmachus commends his lively genius, his eloquence, and the delicacy of his raillery h. He likewise extols his virtue, his fincerity and difinterestedness, and the penetration of Theodosius in chusing so worthy a minister . But the same writer blames him more after his death, than he had flattered him in his life-time k. Claudian charges him with avarice, ambition, cruelty, perfidiousness, and all the crimes and evil qualities, of which human nature c is capable. Suidas and Zosimus speak of him as a great dissembler, and one who trampled under foot all laws, both human and divine, when they stood in the way of his unbounded ambition, and infatiable avarice . St. Jerom likewise charges him with avarice ; Orofius o, Philostorgius P, and Marcellinus in his chronicle 4, with having stirred up the barbarians against the empire, in order to raise himself, in that confusion of affairs, to the sovereignty. St. Ambrose reproaches him in Theodoret as the author of the massacre of the inhabitants of Thessalonica. Zosimus ascribes to his treachery the death of Promotus, killed by the barbarians in 391. and the downfal and misfortunes of Tatianus, and his fon Proculus, in 392 . But other writers question the innocence both of the father and son, as we have already observed. Stid licho, who ruled with no less absolute sway in the west under Honorius, than Rusinus Stilicho first did in the east under Arcadius, was originally a Vandal, whence he is styled by St. Jerom minister to Honorius. a demi-barbarian. Claudian, who was no less biassed in his favour, than prejudiced against his rival Rufinus, mentions none of his ancestors, besides his father, who had a considerable command in the army under Valens u. Stilicho himself bore arms from His character. his childhood, and rose by degrees to the post of magister utriusque militiæ, that is, of general both of the horse and foot w. He commanded the Roman troops, according to Zosimus, for the space of twenty-three years; that is, from 385. to 408. and attended Theodosius in all his wars x. That prince must have entertained a great opinion of him, fince he preferred him to all those who courted his niece Serena, whom e he had adopted after the death of her father Honorius. By her Stilicho had a son, named Eucherius, born at Rome in 389. while Theodosius was in that city, and two daughters, Maria and Thermantia, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the sequel of our history. Theodosius would not have honoured Stilicho with his alliance, had he not professed the christian religion; but as he is more commended by the pagan than christian writers, and his son Eucherius openly declared himself against christianity, we cannot, upon the bare testimony of Baronius, believe him to have been, not only a zealous, but a pious christian. Zosimus writes, that, during the twenty-three years he commanded the Roman armies, he never fold any military employments, or deprived the foldiers, as others had done to enrich themselves, of f the least share of their pay. The same writer extols his moderation, in not preferring * Oros. l. vii. p. 221. Ambr. ferm. de divers. p. 117. Zos. p. 780. B Claud. in Rut. 1. 1. p. 12, 25. Dz Marca histoire de Bearn, p. 24. d Zos. l. iv. p. 773. Cod. Theod tit. 6. p. 382. Mb. ep. 50. p. 309. Philost. l. xi. c. 3. p. 528. Soz. l. viii. c. 17. p. 780. f Pallati. 8 Amb. ep. 50. p. 309. h Symm. l. iii. ep. 82, 83, 88. p. 137. Symm. l. iii. ep. 82, 83, 88. p. 137. AMB. ep. 50. p. 309.

hift. Lauf. c. 12. p. 915.

AMB. ep. 50. p. 309.

hift. Lauf. c. 12. p. 915.

AMB. ep. 50. p. 309.

AMB. ep. 5 9 Mar. chron. p. 79. F Theodor. l. v. c. 17. p. 728. P. 93. Val. ser. Franc. l. i. p. 104. Oros. l. vii. c. 38. p. 222. p. 124. W Prosp. l. iii. c. 38. p. 150. Grut. p. 112.

his fon Eucherius to any confiderable employments, tho' he had a just title to the first in the state . But other writers thatge him even with a delign of raising his a fon to the empire, and deposing his lawful sovereign Honorius, his ward and his sonin-law; for that prince married successively both Stilicho's daughters. Zosimus endeavours to clear him from this charge; but at the fame time owns him to have been in the highest degree corrupt and partial in the administration of justice; to have countenanced those who plundered the provinces, provided they shared with him the

at the fovereignty.

tinus's cruelty and arbitrary proceedings.

ries Eudoxia.

spoils; and to have in a short time acquired, by the most unlawful means, immense riches 2. We read the same thing in Suidas b, who feems to have copied it from Eunapius. To resume now the thread of our history: Upon the death of Theodosius, Arcadius, to whom the eaftern provinces had been allotted, repaired immediately to Constantinople, while Honorius continued at Milan, to awe with his presence the bar- b barians inhabiting the countries bordering on Rhætia, who were faid to be in arms, and ready to break into the empire. As Honorius was but a child, and Arcadius a youth, without either parts or experience, both princes bore the bare name of emperors, the whole power being lodged in Rufinus and Stilicho, of whom the former ruled with an absolute sway in the east, and the other in the west. These two mini-Both minifer, sters agreed, says Zosimus, in plundering the provinces, and impoverishing whole agree in plun- nations, to enrich themselves; but at the same time, jealous of each other's grandering the fee- deur, neither of them thought himself sase, while his rival continued in power c. Stilicho pretended, that Theodosius in dying had committed to his care both princes, and the management of the affairs of both empires: hence looking upon the power which c Rufinus enjoyed in the east as a mere usurpation, he was constantly meditating with himself in what manner he might compass his ruin, and engross the whole autho-Rufinus aspires rity to himself d. On the other hand, Rusinus, not satisfied to rule with an absolute sway under Arcadius, began to aspire at the sovereignty; and thinking the readiest way to attain it, was to marry his daughter to the young prince, who, he imagined, would not look upon it as any disparagement to assume his father-in-law for his collegue, he caused overtures concerning this match to be made to him with the utmost fecreey; which however foon became the public talk, and heightened the aversion which the people had already conceived against him, on account of his arrogance, avarice, and arbitrary proceedings e. While this affair was on foot, Eucherius, the d emperor's uncle, thinking himself ill-used by Lucianus, count of the east, complained of him to Arcadius, who cast the whole blame upon Rufinus, by whose interest he had been raised to that post. Lucianus was the son of Florentius, presect of Gaul in the latter end of the reign of Constantius; and having purchased the favour of Rusinus, by presenting him with rich possessions, had been recommended by him to the emperor, who thereupon made him count of the east, in which office he is said to have acquitted himself with the greatest justice, moderation and integrity; insomuch that he refused even to comply with a request of the emperor's uncle, which appeared to him inconsistent with equity. This being misrepresented to Arcadius, Rusinus, instead of protecting one who had purchased his favour at so great a price, lest Constantinople, without imparting his design to any one; and hastening to Antioch with Aremarkable a small retinue, entered that city in the dead of the night, caused Lucianus to be instance of Ru-apprehended, and when he was brought before his tribunal, commanded him, tho no one appeared against him, to be beaten with leaden balls fastened to cords, till he expired. This barbarous proceeding highly provoked the inhabitants of Antioch, and Rufinus, to appeale them, ordered a magnificent portico to be built, which was deemed the most stately edifice in all Syria. From Antioch Rusinus returned in great haste to Constantinople, pleasing himself with the thoughts of his suture affinity with the emperor; but, upon his arrival, he found Arcadius immoveably determined to marry Eudoxia, who had been proposed to him by the eunuch Eutropius; and f Arcadius mar- accordingly the nuptials were celebrated on the twenty-seventh of April of this year 395. to the great disappointment of Rusinus . Eudoxia was a Frank by nation, the daughter of the famous count and general Bauto, who had been consul in 385. and not of the emperor Gratian, or of the famous general Promotus, as some have advanced Her charaster. Without sufficient grounds. As she was a woman of great address, of a haughty and imperious temper, she soon gained an absolute sway over the weak prince her

F Idem, l. v. p. 110, 111.

2 PHILOST. p. 461, 465.

2 Zos p. 780—789.

3 Suid. p. 690,

4 Idem ibid. p. 782.

5 CLAUD. in Ruf. l. ii. p. 20. & conf. Hon. 3.

5 Idem, l. v. p. 780, 781.

5 Idem, p. 781, 782.

6 Chron. Alex.p. 710.

7 Vide Val. rer. Franc. l. ii. p. 65.

8 PHILOST. l. xi. c. 6. p. 729.

husband.

od 1 Ç.

(td

t

a husband . Some writers have questioned her modesty k; but from that charge she is cleared by others, tho' all agree in accusing her of an insatiable avarice, which often prompted her to most flagrant acts of injustice. However, she had some outward appearance of piety, favoured the catholics, shewed great respect to the prelates and clergy; and having prevailed upon the emperor in 401. to demolish the temple of Marnas, and other temples at Gaza, she built in that city a most stately and magnificent church, which from her was called Eudoxiana. Hence St. Chrysoftom publicly commended her as the mother of the church, the patroness of the saints, the support of the poor, &c 1. But the cruel persecution she afterwards raised against her panegyrist, has rendered her name infamous in the history of the church. But to return to Rufinus:

b That minister found himself disappointed as to the marriage of his daughter, and his alliance with the imperial family; and at the same time dreaded the credit of the eunuch Eutropius, but more the arms of Stilicho, who pretended to have been by Stilicho claims Theodosius appointed guardian to both his children, and was preparing to march into the same p the east, to dispossess his rival of the authority he had usurped. In order therefore in the east as in to defeat the designs of Stilicho, and to have an opportunity of getting rid of Eutropius, and even of seizing the sovereign power, he resolved to set all in a slame, and involve the whole empire in the utmost consuston. With this view he privately Russius stirs firred up by his emissaries the Hunns, who penetrated as far as Antioch, destroying up the Hunns all with fire and found, and commissing every where upheard of cruelties and fact the and Goths to all with fire and sword, and committing every-where unheard-of cruelties ". At the invade the em-

c same time he encouraged the samous Alaric to put himself at the head of his country-pire. men the Goths, and drawing together as many barbarians of other nations as were willing to follow his standard, to break into Greece, affuring him, that he should meet with no opposition. Alaric at that time commanded a body of Goths in the Roman fervice; but being diffatisfied, that he had been rewarded with no better preferment, fince he had distinguished himself in the late war with Eugenius, he readily closed with the proposal of Rusinus; and being by him supplied with large sums, he affembled an incredible multitude of barbarians of different nations; and putting himself at their head, he ravaged all Thrace, Pannonia, Macedon and Thessaly. As he drew near the famous streights of Thermopyla, Gerontius, who guarded them, and was

d privy to the wicked defigns of his patron Rufinus, immediately withdrew, and opened a free passage for the barbarians into Greece, where they raged with incredible fury, Dreadful raputting those to the sword who offered to oppose them, and sending into their respe-vages commit-Ctive countries all the women and children that fell into their hands, together with ted by the the whole wealth of that opulent province. As Antiochus, at that time proconsul of the conduct of Achaia, and another of Rufinus's creatures, did not offer to make head against them, Alaric. they over-ran the whole country, rifling the temples, pillaging the cities, and committing fuch ravages and devastations, as were felt by the unhappy inhabitants for many years after. The whole country between Dalmatia, the Adriatic gulf, and the Euxine sea, was laid waste, and turned into a desert, the inhabitants concealing themselves

e in dens and caves, through fear of being either inhumanly murdered, or carried into captivity. The city of Constantinople itself was in a manner belieged, parties of the barbarians advancing with great boldness to the very gates of that metropolis. Rufinus, attired after the Gotbic manner, went out, as he said, to treat with them, and was received by the barbarians with extraordinary marks of esteem; which confirmed the suspicion most people entertained of his treachery.

WHILE these things passed in the east, Stilicho was busied on the bank of the Stilicho renews Rhine, in renewing the antient alliances of the Roman people with the Franks, and the antient alliances with the other German nations. This he accomplished, says Claudian P, in less than fourteen German nadays; which Mr. Valois maintains to be absolutely impossible. That writer speaks sions. f much at length of Marcomir and Sunno, two princes or chiefs of the Franks in those days, as does likewise Gregory of Tours. Claudian, who distinguishes them with the title of kings, and informs us, that they were brothers, says, that they endeavoured to raise new disturbances after the peace concluded with Stilicho; but that one of them, after having been kept some time in prison, was banished into Tuscany; that the other, attempting to revenge the affront offered to his brother, was killed by his own people; and that Honorius appointed other kings over the Franks in their

m Oros. l. vii. c. 37. WAL. room.

Stillcho relief of Greece

turn into the west.

Rufinus murdered

And his estate confilcated.

in his power and employments by Eutropius.

room. This feems to have happened, according to Claudian, before the revolt of a Gildo; that is, before the end of the year 397. Valefius writes, that Marcomir outlived Sunno; and confequently that it was he who was banished into Tuscany. He is thought to have been the father of Faramond, supposed to have been the first king of France ". Stilicho, having thus renewed the antient treaties with the Franks and Germans, resolved to march to the succour of Greece; in which undertaking he embarqued the more readily, as he hoped to have an opportunity of ruining Rufinus. and getting the whole power of both empires into his own hands. Leaving theremarches to the fore Gaul about the latter end of the spring, he set forward with all the western troops, and those likewise of the east, that had been lest in the west after the deseat of Eugenius. He marched, according to Claudian, over the Alps, no doubt the b Julian Alps, and consequently through Dalmatia. The barbarians, hearing of his arrival in those parts, resolved to make a stand in Thessaly, and with this view assembled into one body all their troops, that were in feveral parties dispersed about the country. Stilicho was already within a small distance of the enemy's army, and his men shewed a great forwardness to engage them, when Rusinus, concluding, that, if the barbarians were overcome and repressed, the storm would fall upon his own head, prevailed upon Arcadius to fend for the oriental troops. Accordingly an officer He is ordered by was dispatched to Stilicho, with a peremptory order from the emperor to send them Areadius to re- forthwith, and return with the rest into the west. Stilicho was greatly surprised at this order, which, he thought, fnatched out of his hands a certain victory, and c exposed the empire to imminent danger. However, not daring to disobey, he not only fent the troops, but half the treasure which Theodosius had left w. In dismissing the forces, he appointed one Gainas, by nation a Goth, and his intimate friend, to conduct them to Constantinople, after having imparted to him his delign of dispatching Rufinus, and, no doubt, encouraged him to lay hold of the first opportunity that offered to put it in execution. Under his conduct the army arrived in the neighbourhood of Constantinople on the twenty-seventh of November; and the emperor, according to custom, went out in person to meet them, attended by Rusinus, who, as he had gained over some of the chief officers to proclaim him emperor on this occasion, had already prepared the purple, the diadem, and the donative for the foldiery. d The army received the emperor with all the respect due to the son of Theodosius the Great; but at the same time, upon a signal given by Gainas, they sell upon Rusinus, and cut him in pieces, while he was pressing Arcadius to declare him his collegue x. This happened, according to Claudian, at the palace of Hebdomon !, where the emperors of the east were usually crowned. After his death, they cut off his head, and putting a stone in his mouth to keep it open, they carried it on the point of a spear to Constantinople, where it was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy . They likewise cut off his right hand, and carrying it about the streets of Constantinople, asked alms for the infatiable Rusinus, reduced to beggary. By this invention they collected confiderable fums, every one being glad to reward with some e small acknowledgment those who had contributed to the death of a person they so much abhorred. His estate and all his effects were confiscated; and the decree issued on that occasion was sent to Rome, where the people expressed the greatest joy at the death and deserved end of that insatiable robber, to use the expression of Symmachus, who had plundered the world b. His wife and daughter, fearing they should fall a facrifice to the sury of the people, took sanctuary in a church, whence they were suffered to retire to Jerusalem, where they spent the rest of their days. Palladius bestows great encomiums on Salvia or Silvia, the sister of Rusinus, who had embraced the state of virginity d. From a law dated the fifth of August of the ensuing year 396. it appears, that his wife's fortune was restored to her . Neither Stillicho f He is succeeded nor the empire gained any thing by the death of Rusinus, he being succeeded, not only in his power and employments, but in his cruelty, avarice, and other detestable qualities, by the eunuch Eutropius, who had concurred with Stilicho in all his measures against their common rival. Eutropius was by birth an Armenian, by condition a a flave, and had been made an eunuch foon after his birth, eunuchs being then more in His extraction, request, and consequently more advantageous to the seller, than common slaves. He employments, had frequently shanged masters, having been often bought and fold. When he and character. had frequently changed masters, having been often bought and sold. When he was already stricken in years, a soldier, named Ptolemy, gave him as a present to his general Arintheus, who was famous under Valens: Arintheus presented his daughter with him when she was matried, to comb her hair, and perform such-like mean offices about her; which when he could no longer discharge on account of his age, the gave him his liberty. Being now his own mafter, he found means to get into the court, where he was employed in the lowest offices, till he was raised by the interest of Abundantius, who was consul in 393. to a more creditable posts. Theodob fius sent him in 392, as we read in Sozomen, to consult the holy hermit John in the wilderness of Thebaiss. That prince seems to have reposed some confidence in him. After the marriage of Arcadius with Eudoxid, he was made, no doubt at her recommendation, great chamberlain, and upon the death of Rufinus, vested with the same power and authority which that minister had enjoyed s. Rusinus seemed to survive in this wicked eunuch, who was, according to Eunapius, a declared enemy to virtue, and every virtuous manh. That writer, after having drawn his pottrait in the blackest colours, concludes, that he has not painted him such as he really was, there being no crime with which he might not deservedly charge him . He surpassed in avarice Rufinus himfelf, exposing to public sale the chief employments, and enc tertaining an incredible number of informers to accuse such persons as were possessed of estates; by that means he conveyed the whole wealth of the empire into his own coffers : the prisons, and places of banishment, were all filled with unhappy exiles, stripped of their wealth, the only crime for which they had been condemned 1. As for Arcadius, who was a prince of very slender parts, he suffered himself to be intirely governed by this wicked minister, not daring in a manner to inquire into his conduct, or give ear to those who had the boldness to complain of his arbitrary proceedings. However, by several laws of this year, he confirmed those that had been enacted by his father against heretics m; and by one addressed to Marcellus, then magister officiorum, he commanded that officer to inquire with great care whed ther any employments at court were held by heretics, and not only to dismiss, but to banish such as he should discover in the palace, with those who had recommended them ". Honorius continued all this year at Milan, or in the neighbourhood of that city, as appears from the dates of his laws.

THE next confuls were, Artadius the fourth time, and Honorius the third. This year Stilicho, who was returned to Italy with the western troops, set out anew with stilicho rea defign to succour Greece, reduced to a most deplorable condition by Alaric, and the turns to the barbarians under his command. He embarqued on the Adriatic sea; and landing Greece. without opposition in Peloponnesus, cut off great numbers of the enemy in various fuccessful encounters; and in the end obliged them to retire to a mountain in Arcae dia, named Pholoe, at a small distance from Pisa. There he shut them up on all fides, cut off their communication with the neighbouring country, and even turned the course of the river that supplied them with water o. But when he had them thus in his power, he suffered them to escape, to retire out of Peloponnesus, and to But suffers pillage Epirus in their retreat P. Orosius supposes him to have conmived at their Alaric so of escape, and therefore thinks him no less guilty than Rushus, who first stirred them cape. up against the empire q. Zosimus writes, that they owed their safety to the negligence and misconduct of Stilichot. But Claudian tells us, that Eutropius, looking upon Stilicho as a more dangerous enemy than Alaric, persuaded Arcadius to conclude a peace with the latter, to take him and the barbarians, who had ravaged the best f provinces of the empire, under his protection, and to order Stilicho to withdraw his troops forthwith out of Greece, which belonged to Arcadius. Thus was Stilicho robbed the second time by a jealous rival of the glory of delivering the empire, and triumphing over the barbarians'. Soon after, Alaric was by Arcadias, or father by his governor Eutropius, appointed commander of the troops in East-Illyricum,

K

ş

j

·y эď

5X 13t

[5]

33

ø

Goth. p. 170. & in Eutrop. L ii. p. 113.

Stiliche, at the instigation of Eutropius, declared a public enemy.

which comprised Greece, as we read in Claudian' (N). As for Stilicho, though he immediately retired with his troops out of Greece, pursuant to the orders of Arcadius, yet that prince, in obedience to the commands of Eutropius, as Zosimus expresses it, caused him to be declared a public enemy by a solemn decree of the senate of Constantinople ", ordering at the same time all the lands and palaces he had in the east to be seized and confiscated w. Claudian adds, that Stilicho discovered an assassin, who had been hired to murder him, and several letters dispersed among his troops, in order to debauch them, and fir them up against him . Eutrofius, not fatisfied with having thus defeated all the measures of Stilicho, aspiring at the same post in the court of Arcadius which he held in that of Honorius, resolved to remove all those out of the way, in whom Arcadius seemed to repose any confidence. He h began with Abundantius, by whose means he had been first raised at court, and who on that account deserved, according to Claudian y, tho' not at his hands, the treatment he met with. Abundantius had ferved in the army with great reputation in the time of Gratian, and had been raifed by Theodosius to the post of general both of the horse and soot, to the prætorship, and in 393. to the consular dignity 2. But Eutropius, jealous of the authority and credit which his experience, and known integrity, procured him at court, and panting after the immense wealth with which his eminent services had been rewarded, prevailed on the weak prince with his crafty and malicious infinuations, to banish him to Pityus, a city of Bosporus, to the north of the Euxine sea, and beyond Colchis; where he led a miserable life, stripped of all c his effects, till the death of Eutropius, when he was removed from thence, and confined to Sidon in Phanicia, in which city he died a. The credit which Timafius had at court, and with the army, gave the wicked minister, who could bear no competitor, more jealousy than that of Abundantius. He had been long one of the chief commanders of the army, had served Valens and Theodosius in all their wars with great honour and integrity, and been rewarded by the latter in 389. Histreacherous with the consular dignity b. Eutropius, resolving to procure by some means or other the ruin of so powerful a rival, had recourse to one Bargus, who lived in great intimacy with Timasius. Bargus was a person of a mean descent, and had been obliged for some notorious crime to fly from Laodicea in Syria, his native city, and d retire to Sardes in Lydia. There Timasius accidentally met him; and being pleased with his facetious conversation, without inquiring farther into his character, admitted him to his confidence, gave him the command of a cohort, and took him with him to Constantinople; at which the magistrates were highly displeased, because he had been formerly banished that city. To this man, as a proper instrument for his villainous purpose, Eutropius applied, and easily prevailed upon him to betray his friend and benefactor, by accusing him of treason, and producing against him a counterfeit writing, upon which he was without delay brought to his trial. Eutropius persuaded the emperor to judge him in person; but perceiving the people were highly provoked to see a person of Timasius's dignity and character arraigned upon the deposition of such an infamous and mercenary wretch as Bargus, he advised the e prince, whom he managed as he pleased, to withdraw, and substitute Saturninus and Procopius in his room. Of these the former had discharged the chief employments in the state, and the consulship in 383. but is said to have dishonoured his old age by a general and mean compliance with the will of the ruling minister d. Procopius was son-in-law to the emperor Valens, of a rough and savage temper, but not easily prevailed upon to swerve from what he thought just and equitable, as appeared in this case; for he boldly maintained, that such an infamous wretch as Bargus ought not to be admitted as evidence against a person of Timasius's rank, practices against Timafius.

Eutropius

banished.

causes Abundantius to be

> * Idem in Eutrop. ibid.
> * Zos. p. 788.
> * CLAUD ibid. Zos. l. 5. p
>
> * CLAUD. Zos. ibid, Hier. ep. iii. p. 26. Ast. or. iv. p. 76.
>
> * Zos. p. 786, 787.
> * Idem ibid. * Zos. p. 788. W CLAUD. de laud. Stil. l.i. p. 130. X Idem ibid. Zos. l. 5. p. 788. Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 347. iii. p. 26. Ast. or. iv. p. 76. Zos. p. 786, 787. Ast. p. 76. * Idem ibid. f

(N) His words are,

Ditatur; qui fervat, eget. Vassaror Achiva Gentis, & Epirum nuper populatus inultam, Prasidet Illyrico. Jam quos obsedit, amicus Ingreditur muros, illis responsa daturus, Quorum conjugibus potitur, natosque peremit. Sic hostes punire solent, hat pramia solvant Excidiis-- (8o).

a against his friend and benefactor. But Saturninus prevailing, the unhappy Timasius was stripped of all his wealth, and banished to Oasis, a barren and inhospitable Timasius baplace in Libya, from which there was no possible means of escape, it being sur-nished. rounded by a vast desart, full of sand, which moving to and fro with the wind, fuffered no track or footstep of any former traveller to be seen. Of this place, to which criminals began to be confined about this time, Zosimus gives us, on occasion of the exile of Timasius, a most frightful description. The same historian adds, that a report was spread, that Syagrius, the son of Timasius, accused as privy to the crime of his father, having escaped from those who had been sent to seize him, rescued his father, with the assistance of some robbers, out of the hands of the solb diers, who were conducting him to the place of his exile; and that neither the father nor the son were ever after heard of f. Others write, that Timasius was found dead in the fands that furrounded Oasis, having perhaps attempted to make his escape 8. St. Jerom, writing in this year 396. says, that Timasius lived then an exile at Assus, a city of Asia h. But as Sozomen, Zosimus and Asterius agree, that he was confined to Oasis, some, instead of Assus, read in the text of St. Jerom, Oasis; while others, to reconcile that writer with the other three, pretend, that he was first banished to Assus, and afterwards, by Eutropius's orders, conveyed to Oasis. Bargus did not long enjoy the price of his treachery and wickedness; for Eutropius, who was a man of too great discernment to trust a traitor, and well knew, that one who e had betrayed his friend and benefactor, would not prove faithful to him, resolved to get rid of him as foon as possible; and accordingly, having fent him upon some advantageous commission out of Constantinople, during his absence, he induced his wife, who was then at variance with her husband, to present to the emperor some treasonable papers, which she pretended to have found in his custody. Hereupon Bargus was upon his return arraigned, fentenced to death, and executed. Thus His accuser was the crime of that treacherous wretch punished, as it deserved, by the very Bargus put 10 person who had induced him to commit it k. Pentadia, the wife of Timasius, was death. deaconess of the church of Constantinople in 404. when St. Chrysostom was banished that city: he wrote, while in exile, several letters to her, in one of which he ind quires after her family and relations, and calls her house a house of bleffing!. It was, according to Sozomen, in order to apprehend Pentadia, and some others who had taken fanctuary in the church, that Eutropius persuaded the emperor to enact a law forbidding any one to fly to the church for refuge; and commanding those who should, to be dragged from the altars, and punished the more severely . This law raised a general odium against Eutropius n: Socrates pretends, that it drew down from heaven all the misfortunes that afterwards befel him o: Sozomen and Chrysostom exclaim loudly against it P, and observe, that in a few years after Eutropius himself was forced to fly to that afylum, from which he had excluded others, owning, fays Chrysoftom, more by his actions than his words, the injustice of his law q. It was e revoked immediately after the difgrace and downfal of Eutropius, and erased out of all the public registers. Churches are still held as asylums in Italy, and the two kingdoms of Spain and Portugal; which, not to mention other crimes, is the true cause of the many murders committed in those countries. This year dreadful earth- Great earthquakes were felt in most provinces of the east, and the sky appearing all in a flame quakes, &c. in over the city of Constantinople, terrified the inhabitants and the emperor himself to the east. such a degree, that, abandoning the city, they retired to the fields. It was revealed, as St. Austin writes, to a pious person, that the city of Constantinople was on a certain day to be confumed by fire fent from heaven: when that day came, the above-mentioned phænomenon appeared over the city, but vanished some time after, leaving it unhurt, the inhabitants, who had given credit to the prediction, having by a fincere and timely repentance prevented the execution of the fentence pronounced against them. Thus St. Austin, in a sermon which he preached a sew years after s. From the several laws of this year, most of which tend to the utter suppression of idolatry, and the curbing of heretics, it appears, that Arcadius continued the whole time at Constantinople, or in the neighbourhood of that city. The law of the twenty-second of March is dated from Regium, which is supposed to have been an im-

r. 26. I. iv. c. 3. p. 257.
P Soz. Chrys. ibid. m Soz. p. 766.

q Idem ibid. Vol. VI. Nº 6.

perial palace about fifteen miles from the metropolis. Nothing happened this year a Fritigil, queer in the west worthy of notice, except the conversion of Fritigil, queen of the Marof the Mirco-comans, to the christian religion. At the request of St. Ambrose, who wrote several mans, converted to the christopher in the holy mysteries, she is said by Paulinus sed to the christopher in the holy mysteries, she is said by Paulinus sian religion. Diaconus to have induced the king her husband to enter into an alliance with the Romans: it is certain that amongst the many barbarous nations that in the present reign broke into the empire, no mention is made of the Marcomans. Some mifunderstanding arose this year between St. Ambrese and Stilicho, the latter having caused a criminal, by name Cresconius, to be apprehended in a church, to which he had fled for refuge: but Stilicho in the end acknowledged his fault, and atoned for it ". Honorius continued all this year at Milan, as is evident from the dates of his laws.

THE next confuls were Cafarius and Atticus; the former had succeeded Rusinus in the prefecture of the east, Eutropius being, as an eunuch, excluded from that office; and the latter had been governor of West Illyricum under Valentinian II. in 384. Casarius seems to have entered upon his consulship at Constantinople, and Atticus at Rome w. This year 397. Arcadius, leaving Constantinople in the month of July, went to Ancyra, and staid there till the latter end of September, when he returned to the metropolis with as much pomp and shew as if he had conquered the Persians, says Claudian, who supposes him to have constantly passed the summer at Ancyra, Eutropius diverting him by that progress from applying his mind to affairs of statex. Stilicho still claimed the administration of affairs in the east, and was preparing to c march anew into the dominions of Arcadius, in order to make good his claim by force of arms, and revenge on Eutrapius the injurious decree issued against him by the senate of Constantinople. But that wicked and crafty minister, not scrupling, for the support of his own power, to kindle a war between the two brothers, privately Eutropius fer- persuaded Gildo, who commanded the Roman troops in Africa, to revolt from Honosuades Gildo to rius, and submit to Arcadius, hoping by that means to divert Stilicho from pursuing his intended expedition into the east y. Gildo was brother to the famous Firmus, who made war upon the Romans in 373. but was overcome by count Theodosius, the father of the emperor of that name. In that war Gildo sided with the Romans, and was afterwards, that is, about the year 387. by Valentinian II. or rather by Theodo- d fius, who governed in his name, appointed count of Africa, and commander of all the troops in that province. Theodofius, that he might have, as it were, some pledge of his fidelity, in conferring that dignity upon him, married Salvina, the daughter of Gildo, to Nebridius, nephew by the mother to the empress Flaccilla 2. St. Jerom, in a letter which he wrote to Salvina about the year 400. Ityles her a virtuous and truly christian widow; and at the same time commends the piety of her mother, and her father's fifter, who had embraced the flate of virginity. As for Gildo himself, he was, if not by religion, as Marcellinus will have it, at least in his manners, a pagan. Glaudian charges him with avarice, cruelty, luxury, and all manner of lewdness, the more shameful and scandalous, as he was already stricken in years b. c St. Austin speaks of him as one famous for wickedness and debauchery; and in one of his sermons styles him, tho' without naming him, a wicked wretch d. When Eugenius usurped the empire of the west, Gildo acknowledged Theodosius; but when that prince marched against the usurper in 394. he declined sending him any succours, as other governors of provinces had done, in obedience to the emperor's orders, expecting the issue of the war, as was supposed, in order to join the party that should prevail; insomuch that Theodosius would have treated him as an open enemy, according to Claudian, had he not been prevented by death. Eutropius having induced him to revolt from Honorius, as we have related above, he obliged most of the cities of Africa and Carthage itself to acknowledge Arcadius, placing such f governors in them as he knew were attached to his own interest, with a design of acknowledged feizing, when an opportunity offered, the province for himself, as he had but a very in most cities of mean opinion of both princes f. When news of his revolt was brought to Honorius, Gido's character.

revolt from

Honorius.

Africa.

he acquainted the senate of Rome with it, who immediately declared Gildo a public

t PAUL. DIAC. vit. Amb. c. 36. p. 10. * Idem, c. 34. p. 9. w Sym. l. vii. ep. 30. p. 273. Cod.

* Claud. in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 110.

Hier. ep. xi. p. 94. Cod. Thead. Theod. chronol. p. 136. Prosp. p. 470. Idat. in fast.

**CLAUD. in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 110.

**Zos. p. 788.

**Ammian. l. xxix. p. 399. Zos. l.v. p. 788. Hier. ep. xi. p. 94. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 128. CLaud. bell. Gild. p. 70—78.

**Hier. ep. ix. p. 73—76.

**CLaud. bell. Gild. p. 74. 84.

**Aug. ep. lxiv. p. 285.

**Idem in fo. hom. v. p. 29.

**CLaud. ibid. p. 76.

**Idem ibid. & de laud. Stil. l.i. p. 130. Oros. l. vii. c. 36. p. 221.

a enemy, and dispatched a solemn embassy to Arcadius, intreating him to restore Africa to its lawful fovereign 8. Symmachus at the fame time wrote to Arcadius, probably by order and in the name of the fenate, exhorting him not to quarrel, but to live in friendship and amity, with his brother . In the mean time a famine began to rage in Rome, Gildo not suffering any corn to be conveyed thither from Africa. Two fleets were therefore equipped with great expedition, the one to be employed against Gildo, and the other in bringing corn and other provisions to Rome from Gaul and Spain 1. The former sailed this year, and, with a seasonable supply, quieted the populace, ready to rife; but the latter could not be equipped till the following year. During these warlike preparations, died the celebrated bishop of Milan St. Ambrose, St. Ambrose b by no one more regretted than by Stiliche, who, looking upon the death of that dies. prelate as the greatest misfortune that could befal Italy, had, upon the first news of his illness, caused public prayers to be offered for him in all the churches of Milan k. Honorius continued this whole year at Milan. Some of his laws are indeed dated from Rome; but that is generally thought to be a mistake 1. By one of these set up in the Some laws square of Trajan on the ninth of March, he forbids the Romans to follow in their enacted this dress foreign fashions m; for it is to be observed, that the Romans, by conversing year. familiarly with the Goths, grew, by degrees, fond of their fashions, and began to adopt them; which was looked upon as a fatal prelude to what happened foon after. A blind submission to the modes and fashions of a foreign nation, has but too often c been the forerunner of a more dreadful flavery: may it not prove such in our days! By another law, he confirms all the privileges and exemptions, which his predeceffors, moved by a due respect for religion, had granted to the churches, to the ecclefiastics, and particularly to the bishop of Rome p. In the east, Arcadius, by a law dated the first of April, commanded all the Apollinarian teachers to be banished Constantinople, and the houses where they had held their private assemblies to be confiscated . That of the seventeenth of June forbids any one to insult the Jews, or their patriarch, whom he had honoured the preceding year with the title of illustrious, which was given to the first officers of the empire P. The law dated the first of July, exempts the ministers of their religion from the same burdens, from which the d bishops, priests and deacons were exempted q. By a law dated the eighth of November, Arcadius commanded all domestics, whether free-born or slaves, to be sentenced to death, who should inform against their masters, except in cases of treason r. This year, on the seventeenth of June, the empress Eudoxia was delivered of a daughter, Flaccilla born. named Flaccilla from the emperor's mother, and distinguished with the title of nobi-lissima, or most noble s. THE following year 398. when Honorius was conful the fourth time, with Eutychianus, who entered upon that dignity at Constantinople, Stilicho pursued with the utmost vigour his warlike preparations against Gildo; but was greatly at a loss how to manage that expedition with fuccess, and whom to trust with the command of the e troops. But from this perplexity he was foon delivered by the feafonable arrival in Italy of Mascezel, brother to Gildo, who gave him a true account of the state of affairs in Africa, and suggested to him the most proper means for suppressing the Mascezel was not only a christian, but a person of extraordinary piety; and therefore could not by any means be prevailed upon to join his brother in the rebellion, who thereupon resolved to murder him; but he, by a timely flight, defeated his wicked defign. Gildo however vented his rage on the two fons Mascezel had left behind him, caufing them both to be put to death, and leaving their mangled bodies to be devoured by the wild beafts. Stilicho, not doubting but, to revenge the death of his children, and the attempt upon his own life, he would carry f on the war with vigour, and serve the republic with unshaken fidelity, committed to him the whole management of the intended expedition against his brother a. Zofi- Mascezel, bromus writes, that Mascezel was attended by a very numerous army w; but Orosius x ther to Gildo, and the chronicle of Alexandria y affure us, that it was but five thousand strong. him.

E CLAUD. de laud. Stil. p. 131. SYMM. l. iv. ep. 4. p. 143. h SYM. ibid. p. 144. l Idem, p. 143. CLAUD. de laud. Stil. l. i. p. 131. l. iii. p. 148. in Eutrop. p. 103. bell. Gild. p. 70. k Ambr. vit. c. 34. p. 10. c. 45. p. 12. l Cod. Theod. chron. p. 136, 137. m Cod. Theod. l. xi. tit. 16. leg. 22. p. 215. n Idem ibid. p. 133. ldem, l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 33. p. 151. ldem, l. xvi. tit. 8. leg. 12. p. 227. ldem, leg. 13. p. 228. r Idem, l. ix. tit. 6. leg. 3. p. 52. l Mar. & Alex. chron. p. 712. ldem, l. xxix. p. 400. Oros. l. vii. c. 36. p. 221. CLAUD. bell. Gild. c. 79. p. 788. ldem ibid. w Zos. p. 788. Soros. p. 221. V Chron. Alex. p. 713.

Their authority is confirmed by Claudian, who fays, that Stilicho made small prepa- a rations for this first expedition, but had in readiness another fleet, and a more renowned general, to; be employed, in case any missortune should befal the first y. That poet names the several corps, or, as we may now call them, regiments, of hands on him. felf.

Gildo intirely defeated.

His estate confiscated.

licho's orders.

which Mascezel's army was composed 2. It embarqued at Pisa, and putting to sea, tho' a storm, if we may depend upon a poet a, was then apprehended, steered along the east coast of Sardinia, and landed safe in Africa. Mascezel, without loss of time, led his troops against Gildo; and falling upon him before he could draw up his army, gained, after a bloody and obstinate fight, a complete victory. Thus Zosimus b. But Orofiuse, Marcellinus d, and Paulinus Diaconuse, ascribe this success to the miraculous affistance of St. Ambrose, who, appearing to Mascezel, assured him, that in b three days time he should gain a complete victory in the very place where he was then encamped. Hereupon he continued, fay they, in the same post; and the third day, after having spent the preceding night in praying, and singing hymns with some holy hermits, whom he had brought with him from the island Capraria, now Capraia, he saw himself surrounded on all sides by the numerous forces of the enemy; but not in the least daunted, he marched against them with his small army in battle-array. His piety prompted him to try first, whether he could by fair means bring them back to their duty; but one of the standard bearers answering him with great arrogance, he drew his fword, and wounded him in the arm; which obliged him to lower the ensign. The other standard-bearers, imagining he had submitted, strove who should c be the first in following his example, and lowering their ensigns, threw themselves at the feet of Mascezel. Some of the barbarians however, encouraged by Gildo, attempted to make a stand; but were soon put to the rout. Thus were seventy thousand men, says Orosius, defeated by five thousand, without any stratagem or treachery, nay, and almost without bloodshed. This miraculous success, continues that writer, would hardly be credited, were there not many persons still living, who were eye-witnesses of it f. Paulinus assures us, that he had this account from Mascezel's own mouth, after his return to Milan s. However, we will not take upon us to prefer it to that of Zosimus. Gildo made his escape, and reaching the sea, went on board the first vessel he found; but being by a contrary wind driven into the harbour d Gldoistaken; of Tabraca near Hippo in Africa, he was there apprehended, exposed to the insults of but lays violent the populace, and then thrown into prison, where he strangled himself, to avoid a more cruel and ignominious death . Upon the defeat and death of Gildo, all Africa submitted anew to Honorius. Claudian, who omits no opportunity of flattering his great hero Stilicho, ascribes the whole success of this expedition to the prudence and vigilance of that minister. He wrote a poem on the war with Gildo; but that piece is imperfect, since the poet leaves the Roman fleet on the coast of Sardinia in their way to Africa. The leading men of Gildo's faction were fent to Rome, to be tried there; and some of them were publicly executed. Optatus, bishop of the Donatists at Tamugadi in Numidia, one of Gildo's most zealous partizans, died in prison. As c feveral innocent persons were, as it frequently happens on such occasions, accused, and dragged to prison, Honorius, by a law addressed to Victor proconsul of Africa, put a stop to such unjust prosecutions, ordering false informers and witnesses to be punished according to the rigour of the several laws enacted against them. Gildo's estate fell to the exchequer, and proved so large, that a particular treasurer was appointed to manage it, with the title of comes Gildoniaci patrimonii, or count of Gildo's patrimony . Africa being thus restored to its former tranquillity, Mascezel returned to Italy, and was received at Milan by Stilicho, in appearance with the greatest demonstrations of friendship and esteem; but the glory he had acquired by putting so speedy an end to a war, which the minister had so much apprehended, f giving him no small jealousy, he resolved to dispatch without delay this new rival. Accordingly, as he was one day passing a bridge in the neighbourhood of Milan, Mascezel, who attended him, with many other persons of distinction, was, by his Mascezel put private orders, pushed into the river, and drowned 1. Orosius writes, that Mascezel, to death by Sti- elated with his success, had fallen from his former piety, and even dragged from the

> Y CLAUD. de laud. Stil. I. i. p. 131, 132.
>
> 2 Idem, bell. Gil. p. 80.
>
> 3 Idem ibid.
>
> 4 Zos. ibid.
>
> 4 Oros. p. 221.
>
> 5 Mar. in chron.
>
> 5 Amb. vit. c. 15. p. 13.
>
> 6 Oros. p. 221, 222.
>
> 8 Amb. vit. c. 51.
>
> 6 CLAUD. de laud. Stil. I. i. p. 132.
>
> 7 Zos. p. 788. Oros. Paulin. ibid. Mar.
>
> 6 Chron.
>
> 1 Cod. Theod. tit. 3. p. 288. CLAUD. ibid. p. 148.
>
> 8 Idem, tit. 2. p. 349, 352-1 Zos. l. v. p. 788, 789. & tit. 34 P. 347.

a altars several criminals, who had fled to them for refuge; which that writer looks upon as an enormous crime, and the true cause of his unfortunate end . About the time of the defeat of Gildo, Honorius married at Milan, Maria the daughter of Stilicho Honorius by Serena, cousin german to that prince ". He was then but thirteen, and Maria marries Maria, the daughter of not yet marriageable 9; whence some authors pretend, that the marriage was never Stillcho. confummated, fince Maria died very young long before the year 408 P. Claudian wrote several poems on this marriage q, which, according to him, was first proposed, nay, and commanded, by Theodosius. But his predictions concerning the kings who were to proceed from it, shew he was a poet, and not a prophet. By the deseat of Gildo, an intire harmony was re-established between the two brothers, as that b poet tells us :; but the same misunderstanding continued between the two ministers. who nevertheless agreed in plundering the unhappy people, and conveying into their private coffers the whole wealth of the two empires a. Eutropius persuaded Arcadius Eutropius conto name him, tho' an eunuch, for the consulship of the ensuing year; but Stilicho sul. would not fuffer him to be acknowledged in the west w. Claudian writes, that when news of the consulate of Eutropius was brought to the court of Honorius, that prince was busied with Stilicho in receiving the submissions of the Alemans, Suevians and Sicambrians; in giving kings to some; and commanding others to raise levies for recruiting his armies x. Whether this may be founded on truth, or ought to be looked upon only as a poetical fiction, we will not take upon us to determine. The c same poet, in enumerating the great things Stilicho had performed by himself or others before his consulship, that is, before the year 400. says, that he succoured Britain, sellicho proattacked by the neighbouring nations, namely by the Scots, who, arming all Ierne or vides for the Ireland against it, had covered the sea with their fleets; that he put it in a condition against the not to fear their arrows, nor the efforts of the Piets; and that he had fecured the Bri- Scots, Piets, tish coast against the descents of the Saxons, which the inhabitants apprehending before, and Saxons. were constantly on their guard, through fear of a surprize y. He adds elsewhere? that the Saxons being overcome, the sea was quiet; that the Pists having lost their strength, Britain was delivered from her fears. The learned Usher ascribes to Stilicho the establishing of a legion in Britain, to defend it against the Pists, the Scots, and d the Saxons 2. This legion is mentioned by Claudian b. About the same time a proper officer was appointed to guard the coast against the attempts of the Saxons, with the title of comes limitis Saxonici, or count of the Saxon coast, that is, of the coast overagainst the country of the Saxons . In the east, the cities of Constantinople and Chal- Earthquaket cedon were shaken with violent earthquakes; several buildings were confumed with and other calalightning; and the sea, breaking in upon the land, laid whole countries under water. mities in the Claudian mentions several other prodigies, which were all the forerunners, says that poet, of a prodigy never before heard of, viz. an eunuch conful '; for the following year 390. Eutropius prevailed upon Arcadius to create him a patrician, to honour him with the title of father to the emperor, and to raise him to the consular dignity. He e was the first and the last cunuch that ever held, or rather disgraced, the fasces. His image, with the enfigns of his dignity, was carried, as it were in triumph, through all the cities of the east; but Stilicho refusing to acknowledge him in the west, Man-Manlius Theolius Theodorus alone is named consul in some fasti, and in the laws of Honorius. Some dorus consulting writers, mistaking his two names for the names of two different persons, mark Man-the west. lius or Mallius, and Theodorus, as confuls of this year . Manlius Theodorus is famous from the praises bestowed upon him by Claudian, in a poem which he wrote on his confulfhip ; and by St. Auftin, who, having known him at Milan in 384. inscribed to him in 386. his book de beata vita, of a bappy life, which he published soon after his conversion s. Claudian does not commend him on account of his family, but for f his learning, his eloquence, and his virtue h. After he had pleaded some time at the bar, he governed, first, part of Libya, in quality of proconsul of Africa, and afterwards Macedon; whence he was called to court, and created quæftor, whose province

CLAUD. conf. Hon. 4. p. 55.

CLAUD. conf. Hon. 4. p. 55.

Idem, p. 63.

Idem, bell. Gild. p. 70.

Idem de laud. Stil. l. ii. p. 140.

Colef. Britan. antiq. p. 595. ** OROS. l. vii. c. 36, p. 221.

** CLAUD. conf. Hon. 4, p. 55.

** ibid.

** CLAUD. p. 56—69.

** Idem, p. 57.

** Idem, p. 63.

** Zos. l. v. p. 789.

** CLAUD. in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 111.

** Idem in Eutrop. l. i. p. 102, 103.

** Uss. ii. CLAUD. bell. Get. p. 167. & epith. in Pallad. & Celer. nupt. p. 200.

in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 108, 109.

** Idem in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 200.

** Uss. ii. Eutrop. l. ii. p. 108, 109.

** Idem in Eutrop. l. iii. p. 108, 109.

** Aug. de beat. vit. p. 212.

** CLAUD. ibid. p. 84. Uss. ecclef. Britan. antiq. p. 595.

Uss. ibid. p. 226.

CLAUD. e Uss. ibid. p. 336. CLAUD. f CLAUD. in Man. Theed. conf.

it was to draw up the laws that were enacted by the emperor. To this dignity he was raised by Gratian in 380. Upon the death of that prince, he withdrew from a public affairs, and led a retired life, till he was recalled to court by Honorius, or rather by Stilicho, who appointed him prefect of Gaul in 395. and prefect of Italy in 397 k. Symmachus bestows great encomiums upon him i; and St. Austin, who informs us that he was a christian, extols his modesty, his learning, his eloquence and generosity m. Claudian, in the poem he wrote on his consulship, admires his integrity, moderation, affability, and other virtues "; but elsewhere o, divesting himself of the character of a panegyrist, he owns, that Italy would have reaped greater advantages from the prefecture of Theodorus, had he slept less.

Varanes king of Perlia mur-

DURING the consulship of Theodorus in the west, and Eutropius in the east, died Varanes, or Vararanes IV. king of Persia, who, during the eleven years of his reign, b had lived in friendship with the Romans. He was killed, we know not upon what dered, and suc- provocation, by his own subjects, and succeeded by his brother Isdegerdes, or, as Abulceeded by Isde- faragius styles him, Yasdejird P. Eutychius, who calls him Al Aitham, supposes him to have been the fon of his predecessor q. He reigned twenty-one years, ever maintaining a friendly correspondence with the Romans; but was, according to Eutychius, a prince of great severity, or rather cruelty; whence he was surnamed Al Aitham, or Athim, that is, the had. Procopius gives him a quite different character, describing him as a generous-spirited prince s. He is famous in the history of the church, on account of the perfecution which he raised about the end of his reign against the christians in his dominions. The most remarkable event that happened in the east during c the consulship of Eutropius, was the downfal of that samous and powerful minister, which Zosimus ascribes chiefly to Gainas. He had commanded the Goths, and other barbarians, under Theodosius; and, after the deseat of Eugenius, reconducted the eastern army to Arcadius, on which occasion he caused Rusinus to be cut in pieces, in the manner we have related above. For this eminent piece of service he did not think himself sufficiently rewarded by Eutropius, who, as he used to brag, was indebted to him for all his grandeur. From a common foldier he had been raised by Theodosius to the chief command of all the Goths, and other barbarians, in the Roman fervice, and by Eutropius, after the death of Rufinus, to the post of general of the Gain saissais. Roman horse and foot; but yet not satisfied, and scorning to depend upon a slave d and an eunuch, he refolved, by fome means or other, to dispatch him, hoping, if he were once removed, to succeed him in his power and authority. While he was pleasing himself with these thoughts, count Tarbigild, or Tribigild, who was by nation a Goth, and commanded a numerous body of his countrymen at Nicolia in Phrygia, came to court; and after a flort stay at Constantinople, was preparing to return to his quarters, highly diffatisfied with the haughty behaviour, and arbitrary conduct, of the prime minister, when Gainas, to whom he was allied, according to Socrates u, refolving to improve his discontent to the ruin of Eutropius, imparted to him the design he had formed against Eutropius, and encouraged him to revolt, assuring him, that he would, to the utmost of his power, assist and support him under-hand. Tribigild, who was a man of great intrepidity and resolution, and ready to embarque in any desperate undertaking, immediately closed with the proposal; and returning to Nicolia, took arms early in the spring, pillaged that and several other cities in Phrygia, and putting all to the fword who fell into his hands, without distinction of fex, age or condition, he threw the whole province of Asia into the utmost consusion, the inhabitants, struck with terror and dismay, abandoning their habitations, and slying for resuge to the most distant provinces. When news of these disorders was brought to court, Eutropius endeavoured first to gain Tribigild with large presents, and greater promises; but finding he could not, by fair means, bring him back to his duty, he dispatched a body of troops against him, under the conduct of one Leo, a person f greatly attached to his interest, but in every respect unfit for that command. Leo, having passed the streights of the Hellespont, continued in that neighbourhood, not daring to encounter the enemy. Gainas, who pretended to be highly provoked against Tribigild, on account of his revolt, was enjoined to guard Thrace, and the sea-coast, in order to prevent an irruption on that side; but he, keeping the whole fied with Eutropius.

He induces Tribigild to revolt.

Tribigild pillages several provinces.

<sup>1</sup> Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 388. * CLAUD. ibid. p. 87, 89. Cod. Theod. ibid. & l. xi. tit. 6. leg. 11. p. 33.

Sym. l. v. ep. p. 10. 189, ep. 4, 8. p. 11, 15.

Mag. ibid.

CLAUD. ibid. p. 89, 90.

Stem, epig. xxiv. p. 261.

PABULFAR. p. 91.

EUTYCH. ibid.

Lidem, tom. 2. p. 79.

PROCOT. bell. Perf. l. i. c. 2. p. 8.

Zos. l. v. p. 789.

Soz. l. viii. c. 4. p. 760, 761.

Sozr. l. vi. c. 6. p. 306.

Sozr. ibid.

a time a private correspondence with the rebels, instead of defending Thrace, advised

Tribigild to march his forces without delay to the fea-fide, and, croffing the Hellespont, to enter that province. Had his advice been followed, the rebels would have made themselves masters of Constantinople without opposition; but Tribigild, bending his march towards Pisidia, was met there by one Valentine, a citizen of Selga, at the head of a small body of slaves and peasants. Tribigila despised them at first; but as they were well acquainted with that mountainous country, and had, by their frequent disputes with the robbers in those parts, learnt to make sudden onsets, and lay ambushes, they cut off great numbers of his men, and at length shut him up on all sides, in such manner, that no room being left for him to escape, he must ine- Is reduced to b vitably have perished, had he not, by a large sum, prevailed upon one Florentius, great distress. who guarded a narrow pass called Cochlea, to withdraw, and suffer him to retire. However, his men, by the ambuscades, frequent skirmishes, and sudden onsets of the Pisidians, were now reduced to three hundred. With these he marched into the plain, where he was again shut up between the two rivers Melane and Eurymedon. In this extremity, he found means to acquaint Gainas with the desperate posture of his affairs, who thereupon, under colour of reinforcing Leo's army, detached a strong body of barbarians, with private orders to join Tribigild; which they did accordingly. With their affiltance Tribigild opened himself a passage out of Pisidia, and falling unexpectedly upon Leo, cut most of his men in pieces. Leo himself, attempt- But escapes, c ing to make his escape, perished among the marshes w. From Pisidia, Tribigila and defeats returned into Phrygia, where Gainas, who had advanced into that province, as if against him. he designed to attack him, suffered him to rage with greater sury than ever, magnifying in all the letters he wrote to the emperor, his conduct, his exploits, and the number of his troops, and suggesting, that the only means to save the empire from imminent ruin, was to comply with his demands, the chief of which was, that Eu-Gainas lays the tropius, the author of all the present calamities, should be delivered up into his hands. whole blame on Eutropius, At the same time news was brought to court of the death of Varanes king of Persia, and a report spread, that his successor was preparing to invade Syria. false alarm, and the accounts that were by Gainas daily transmitted to Constantinople d of the progress made by Trigibild, some were for recurring to Stilicho, and others for fatisfying the rebels, by facrificing the minister to the welfare of the state x. Areadius, who was under the greatest perplexity, chose the latter; and sending for Eutro-pius, caused him to be stripped of the consular ensigns, and discharged him?. Thus Zosimus. But Socrates, Philostorgius, Sozomen, and Chrysostom, relate the downfal of Eutropius, without mentioning either Gainas or Trigibild. Socrates only says, that he had offended Arcadius 2; Sozomen, that he had affronted the empress 2; and Chryfostom, who was then at Constantinople, that he had injured the emperor b. Philostorgius writes, that Eutropius having insolently threatened to drive the empress out of the palace, she went, with her two little daughters, Flaccilla and Pulcheria, in her e arms, to throw herself at the emperor's feet, and demand satisfaction. Arcadius, moved with the tears of his wife and children, remembered at length, that he was emperor; and fending for Eutropius, discharged him, and commanded him that Whois disgrainstant to quit the palace; which he did accordingly, without being attended by a ced, and deposed. fingle person, tho' he had been hitherto constantly surrounded with crouds of pretended friends and adorers c. Claudian seems to favour the opinion of Zosimus; for in his second book against Eutropius, he describes at length the war of Tribigild, which would have been quite foreign to his purpose, had it not had any connection with the downfal of Eutropius, which he mentions in his preface to that book. However, the poet, after having expariated on that war, only describes the consternation it occasioned at Constantinople, and introduces the east recurring to his hero Sti-licho d. Perhaps he wrote, or intended to write, a third book. Eutropius, thus disgraced, and apprehending his life to be in danger, took fanctuary in a church, Hetakes san-But the people exclaiming against him in the theatre, and Gainas, with the soldiery, stuary in a pressing the emperor to restore the state to its former tranquillity, by either putting charch. to death or banishing the abhorred minister, a band of soldiers was sent to drag him

W Zos. l. v. p. 789, Philost. p. 531. Claud. in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 110, 116, 119.

Claud. in Eutrop. l. ii. p. 119, 120.

Y Zos. ibid.

Socr. l. vi. c. 5. p. 304.

C. 7. p. 767.

CHRYS. in Eutrop. tom. 4. p. 486.

Philost. l. xi. c. 6. p. 529. * Zos. p. 793. * Soz. l. viii. c. 7. p. 767. ibid. p. 129—122. 4 QLAUD.

from his afylum, some of those who had appeared till that time most zealously attached

attached to him, taking upon them that province. But Chrysoftom, then bishop of a Constantinople, presenting himself before them, and resolutely declaring, that he would not fuffer them to profane the church, they seized him, and carried him to

Where he is protectes by St. Chrylostom.

the emperor, who was by him prevailed upon to grant that protection to Eutropius, from which many guilty of smaller crimes had, by his means, been excluded f. The next day, incredible multitudes of people flocked to the church, to have the fatif-

He is taken in endeavouring to make his nished.

He is accused anew, tried, and executed.

Many temples Bulledere 27.

faction of seeing Eutropius, whom they all hated, divested of his power, and, by a just retaliation, brought to that deplorable condition, to which he had reduced many of their friends and relations. On this occasion Chrysostom made a speech to the affembled multitude, on the vanity of all human grandeur, endeavouring at the fame time to awake in the hearts of his auditor's fentiments of compassion for the unhappy by criminal. When he saw them begin to relent, he ended his speech, by exhorting them to go all in a body to the imperial palace, and throwing themselves at the prince's feet, to beg his life 8. Whether they complied with this exhortation, we are no-where told. All we know is, that a few days after, Eutropius, having privately left his afylum, in order to make his escape, was taken, and banished to the island of Cyprus h. Zosimus writes, that when he was banished, he was assured, that escape, and ba- his life should not be taken from him; and Claudian, who wrote at the time they were conducting him to Cyprus, says, that though he had caused an eunuch to be beheaded, yet he should not undergo the same punishment k. The law has reached our times, by which Arcadius confiscated his estate, stripped him of the dignity of c great chamberlain, degraded him from the rank of patrician, and ordered his name to be erased where-ever he was styled consul, his statues to be pulled down, and his images to be removed. By the same law Aurelian, the prafectus pratorio, is injoined to cause him to be conducted under a guard to the island of Cyprus, and to be there narrowly watched, lest he should raise new disturbances. This law is dated the seventeenth of January of the present year; which must certainly be a mistake, since all historians agree, that he was banished after the revolt of Tribigild, who took arms in the spring. Chrysostom gives us room to believe, that several other persons were banished with Eutropius m; and truly a favourite seldom falls alone. However, his fifter, tho' very rich, was suffered to continue at Constantinople . Gainas, not yet d fatisfied, caused several charges to be brought against him; upon which he was conducted from the island of Cyprus to a place called Pantychium, between Chalcedon and Nicomedia, where he was tried by the prefect Aurelian, and several other persons of distinction, who, upon his being convicted of having in his consulship made use of ornaments peculiar to the imperial dignity, condemned him, and he was beheaded on the last day of the present year o. Zosimus, who pretends he had been promised his life upon oath, says, that, to cover that perjury, they gave out, that the oath was only with respect to Constantinople, and caused him to be beheaded at Chalcedon P. This year is remarkable in the history of the church, for the many temples that were demolished both in the east and west, and the severe laws that were enacted by the two princes against all manner of idolatrous worship; which may be said to have given the last blow to the pagan superstition. The temples, says Tiro Prosper in his chronicle, were this year demolished throughout the Roman world 4. By a law dated the thirteenth of July, Arcadius commanded all the temples throughout his dominions to be pulled down, not only in the cities, but likewife in the country's and by another dated the first of November, the materials were to be employed in repairing the bridges, highways, aqueducts, and the walls of the cities. By other laws, all manner of superstitious worship was forbidden, both in publick and private, under the feverest penalties, and the priests and ministers of the idols deprived of all the privileges granted them by former princes'. In the west Honorius enacted f a law, dated the twenty-ninth of January of this year 399. forbidding heathenish facrifices on pain of death, and commanding the temples to be every-where pulled down, and the statues of the idols to be broken in pieces, that no footsteps might remain of the ancient superstition ". Notwithstanding this law, several temples were

CHRYS. tom. 3. p. 671, 667.

f Idem, tom. 4. p. 486.

SOCR. p. 304.

SOZ. p. 767.

CHRYS. tom. 4. p. 482—487.

h CHRYS. in pfal. xliv. hom. 2. p. 667.

ZOS. l. v. p. 797.

CLAUD. ibid. p. 107.

COd. Theod. l. ix. tit. 11. leg. 17. p. 312.

CHRYS. ibid. p. 671.

ZOS. p. 793.

PHILOSTORG. l. xi. c. 6. p. 519.

SOCR. l. vi. c. 5. p. 305.

AST. orat. iii. p. 76, 77.

P ZOS. p. 794.

PROSP. in chron.

Cod. Theod.

xvi. tit. 10. leg. 16. p. 283.

Idem, l. xvi. tit. 10. leg. 16. p. 310.

Idem, tit. 10. leg. 13.

spared

ij,

31 :

jr.

3 38

Б

rş.

'n 131

иl

ved

तिनो है

5

ĵe.

恢

ie.

, fo

a spared at the request of the bishops, who begged them, and consecrated them to the worship of the true God. Among these was the samous temple of the goddess The temple of Calestis, the chief deity of Carthage, one of the most stately edifices in the whole Carthage empire; for it is faid, with the buildings belonging to it, to have taken up the turned into space of two miles, the whole being inclosed by a wall of an extraordinary height a church. and beauty. This temple was with great pomp and folemnity confecrated on Easterday by Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, attended by several other bishops, and an incredible multitude of christians, who had flocked from all parts to affist at that ceremony w. Besides the destruction of several temples recorded by the ecclesiastic writers, nothing happened this year in the west which historians have thought worth transb mitting to posterity. Honorius was, as appears from the dates of his laws, on the twenty-ninth of Jenuary at Ravenna, from the fixteenth of February to the fourth of June at Milan, at Brixia or Brescia on the fixth of June, at Verona in July, in August at Padua, and at Altino in September; whence he returned to Milan, and there passed the winter x.

THE next confuls were Stilicho and Aurelianus; the latter entered upon this new Stilicho conful. dignity at Constantinople, and the former at Milan, with the greatest pomp that had ever been seen in that city v. In the east no advantage accrued to the public from the death of Entropius, the empress Eudoxia, a bold, enterprising, and avaricious woman, as Zosimus styles her, having, upon the downfal of that minister, gained c an absolute ascendant over her husband. She was constantly beset by women, eunuchs, and informers, who prompted her to fuch crying acts of violence and injustice, that every good man wished for death, to avoid seeing such enormous disorders . In the mean time, Gainas, having concluded a pretended peace with the rebels, began to Gainas and march back to Constantinople, followed by Tribigild, whom he joined at Thyatira, Tribigild joins where they both agreed to march to Sardis in Lydia, and plunder that metropolis; their forces, and plunder but not being able to pass the rivers that were swelled by the heavy rains, they parted several proonce more; and bending their march to the sea, Tribigild took his rout towards vinces. Lampsachus on the Hellespont, and Gainas towards Chalcedon, allowing their foldiers to plunder all the countries through which they passed. Their approach caused a d general consternation at Constantinople; nay, the whole empire seemed to be in imminent danger. As Arcadius had no troops to make head against them, and prevent their entering Thrace, he was advised to send deputies to Gainas, and to save the empire from utter ruin, by granting him whatever he demanded. Gainas, with great insolence, required three of the most eminent men in the state, whom he thought capable of thwarting his ambitious designs, to be delivered up to him, in order to be put to death. These were Saturninus, who had been consul in 383. and employed for the space of thirty years in public affairs; Aurelianus, this year's conful, who had been prefect of Constantinople in 393. and the preceding year the præsectus pratorio; and John, secretary to the emperor, and in whom the prince reposed great e trust . The emperor complied, tho' much against his will, with this arrogant and Arcadius tyrannical demand, those three illustrious persons pressing him of their own accord forced to com-to sacrifice them to the public welfare b. With the emperor's consent they lest Con-ply with his un-just demands. stantinople, and presented themselves before Gainas, encamped in the neighbourhood of Chalcedon, who immediately ordered them to be beheaded, but changed the fentence of death into that of perpetual banishment, when the executioner had already lifted up his arm to discharge the satal blow c. They were chiefly indebted to Chryfostom for their lives, which were granted them at his intercession d. They were all three fent under a guard towards Epirus; but having, either by corrupting the Goths that guarded them, or by some other means, made their escape, they appeared, f when least expected, at the court of Constantinople, to the great joy of the emperor, and the whole city. Zosimus is the only writer who mentions John among those Gainas, not yet satisfied, demanded a conference with the emperor in person; and And to confer with this demand too the emperor was obliged to comply, passing for that purpose with him in over to Chalcedon, in the neighbourhood of which city he had an interview with Person.

* Cod. Theod. chron. p. 140, 141, 417.

* Sym. l. iv. ep. 31.

p. 161.

* Zos. p. 800, 802.

* Zos. p. 793—795. Soz. l. viii. c. 4. p. 760. Socr. l. vi. c. 6.

p. 306. Synes. ep. xxxi, xxxiv, xxxviii. p. 177—179.

* Socr. ibid. Soz. p. 761. Chrys. tom. v. hom. 72. p. 895.

Vel. VI. N° 6.

Gainas, in the church of St. Euphemia, where it was agreed, that both Gainas and whom Gainas demanded; all other writers speak only of Aurelianus and Saturninus.

Tribigild should lay down their arms, and return, if they pleased, to Constantinople; a and that the former, besides the command of all the Goths in the Roman service, should have that of the Roman horse and foot, with the consular ornaments, and an authority almost unbounded P. We find nothing henceforth in history relating to Tribigild, except that he perished in Thrace soon after q. As for Gainas, upon his return to Constantinople, he demanded a church in that city for the Arians, whose doctrine was held by him, and most of the Goths his countrymen. The timorous emperor, not daring to give him an absolute denial, referred him to Chrysostom, The intrepidity bishop of the city, who shewed him the edict of the emperor Theodosius, forbidding of St. Chryso- all heretics and sectaries to hold any assemblies in the city. Gainas replied, that the services he had rendered the empire deserved at least one church, in which he b and those of his persuasion might have the free exercise of their religion. To this the prelate replied boldly, that his rewards already exceeded his deferts; that from the mean condition of a common foldier, he had been raised to the high station of commander in chief of all the Roman forces; and ought to be satisfied with the honours he enjoyed, without demanding what could not be granted without a notorious breach of the laws. Gainas, finding he had not to deal with an Arcadius, but a Chrysoftom, thought it adviseable to drop his demand r. Socrates and Sozomen mention a church in Constantinople belonging to the Goths'; but they must be understood not of the Arian, but the orthodox Goths, fince Marcellinus, a zealous catholic, styles it in his chronicle our church. However, the Arians were, it feems, at this time allowed to e affemble without the walls of the city. About this time appeared over Constantinople a comet of unufual magnitude, portending, as was faid, the great danger the city was in from the perfidiousness of Gainas. For that barbarian, who commanded in chief the armies of Arcadius, having filled Constantinople with his Goths, and re-Gainas forms a moved from thence all the Roman troops, formed a delign of feizing first the wealth design of seiz- of the bankers, and then setting fire to the palace. But this wicked project being ing Constantifrustrated by a miracle, which the reader will find related at length by Socrates ", Sozomen w, and Philostorgius x, he withdrew from the city on the tenth of July, as it were to take the air, fays Zosimus y, or to perform his devotions, as we read in Socrates 2, in the church of St. John Baptist, seven miles from the city, pretending to d be possessed, say Sozomen and Socrates b, with an evil spirit. He lest in the city the greater part of his Goths, with private orders to fall upon the inhabitants immediately after his departure, and to give him a fignal, that he might return and join them with those who attended him c. Gainas defeated his own design, according But fails in his to Zosimus, by returning to force the gate before the signal agreed on; which alarmed the city 4. Socrates e and Sozomen f write, that the foldiers, who guarded the gates, observing those, who went out with Gainas, loaded with arms, which they endeavoured to conceal, attempted to stop them. Hereupon the Goths, having killed feveral of the guards, opened themselves a way sword in hand; but the citizens, in the mean time taking the alarm, flew to arms; and Arcadius, acquainted with what e His men maf. had happened, declared Gainas a public enemy, and ordered all the Goths in the city to be put to the sword. Upon this Gainas returned in great haste; but not being able to force the gate, which he found barricaded, and defended by a numerous body of citizens, he was obliged to drop the enterprize, and retire. Philostorgius supposes him to have been still in the city, and to have retired in the nights. What happened the day following, we are no-where told; but the day after, the sacred.

attempt.

nople;

twelfth of July, the citizens fell upon the Goths, who were still remaining in the city to the number of seven thousand, and cut most of them in pieces; the rest, overpowered with numbers, took fanctuary in the church of their nation, which stood close to the palace; but the citizens having obtained leave of the emperor to attack f them even in their alylum, they first uncovered the roof; and after having for some time plied them warmly with showers of darts and arrows, they set fire at last to the church, which was reduced to ashes, with all who were in it . This was looked upon, says Zosimus, by every good christian as an enormous crime i. Gainas, highly

P Idem, p. 794. Socr. p 306, 307. Soz. p. 761. Theodor. l. v. c. 32. p. 744.

P Philos. l. xi. c. 8. p. 531.
P Philos. l. xi. c. 8. p. 531.
Soz. p. 762.
Theodor. p. 774, 775.
Socr. p. 308.
Soz. p. 762.
Theodor. l. v. c. 30. p. 743. Soz. p. 761.
Socr. l. vii. c. 6. p. 307.
Soz. p. 762.
P Philost. l. i. c. 8. p. 531.
Y Zos. l. v. p. 795.
Socr. p. 307.
Socr. p. 308.
P Philost. p. 762.
P Philost. p. 795.
Socr. p. 308. Chron. Al. p. 712. Soz. p. 762.
Chron. Al. p. 712. Soz. p. 762.
Soc. p. 796. Marc. chron. Zos. ibid.

a provoked at the massacre of his friends and countrymen, pulled off the masque; and making open war upon the state, ravaged all Thrace; but not being able to Heravages make himself master of a single city there, the inhabitants, who were accustomed Thrace. to fuch incursions, having learned how to defend their walls, how to fally out, and distress the enemy, he left that province, and marched into the Chersonesus, with a delign to cross the streights of the Hellespont, and enrich himself and his army with the spoils of Asia. But Fravitus, who commanded in those parts, having assembled in great haste a considerable number of vessels, attacked him in his passage; and being favoured by the wind, obliged him to return to the coast whence he had sailed, is defented with the loss of many thousands of his men either killed or drowned. Fravitus with great loss b was himself a Goth, and a pagan, according to Zosimus k, but greatly attached to by Fravitus. the Roman interest, having married a Roman of distinction in 380. and ever since that time served the empire with great fidelity. He was one of the chiefs of those Goths, who being driven out of their own country by the Hunns, were allowed by Theodosius to settle in Thrace. Eunapius writes, that soon after he killed with his own hand Eriulphus, another of their chiefs, because he was for taking arms against Theodosius, pursuant to an oath, by which they had all bound themselves, before they left their own country in 376. to do the Romans, however kindly by them received, all the mischief that lay in their power! As he was a man of great courage, a strict observer of military discipline, vigilant, and indefatigable, he had c been employed on feveral occasions, and acquitted himself in every command with great reputation: he had lately cleared the east of the robbers, who had long infested it, roving up and down the country in great bodies ". However, he was suspected of having suffered Gainas and the rest of his countrymen to escape, when he might have easily cut them all off: but Zosimus ", and most historians, clear him from this charge, which seems the more groundless, as he was for his conduct on that occafion rewarded the following year with the consulship. From the Chersonesus, Gainas returned to Thrace, and was there, according to Socrates and Sozomen o, cut in pieces, with all his men, by the Romans, who pursued him. Zosimus writes, that His death. after he had massacred all the Romans whom he found in his army, lest they should d betray him, he passed the Danube, being desirous to end his days in the ancient country of the Goths. But Uldes or Uldin, king of the Hunns, then masters of those countries, thinking it highly impolitic to receive into his dominions so renowned a commander with an army of his own nation, met him with all his forces on the frontiers, gave him battle, and, after a sharp dispute, put him and all his men to the fword. His body being found, Uldes caused his head to be cut off, and sent it to Arcadius P, who received it at Constantinople on the third of January of the ensuing year 401 9. During these troubles, Eudoxia, who had been hitherto distinguished only with the title of Nobilissima, received that of Augusta on the ninth of Eudoxia January; on which occasion she caused her image to be carried through all the created Aue provinces of the empire, to receive the fame honours that were paid to the images gusta. of the emperors. This no empress before her had presumed to do; whence many complained of it as an innovation, and among the rest Honorius, in a letter which he wrote to his brother . But not many years after, the empresses claimed the same honours; nay, and assumed the same titles of pious, bappy, most pious, perpetual, vistorious, &c. that were given to the princes their husbands. On the third of April Arcadia born. of this year, Eudoxia was delivered of Arcadia, her third daughter s. In the beginning of this year the city of Constantinople was shaken with violent earthquakes, which the facrament of baptism'. During the above-mentioned disturbances raised by Gainas in the east, the western provinces, especially Italy, were alarmed by a sudden irruption of the barbarians, under the conduct of the celebrated Alaric, and Radagaisus king of the Hunns. Of the former we have already made frequent mention; but as he is to act a chief part in the history of Honorius's reign, we shall here acquaint our readers with what we have copied from the best writers concerning a man so famous in the

lasted three days; on which occasion great numbers of pagans demanded and received

<sup>1</sup> Zos. Socr. Soz. ibid. Philost. p. 531. Lidem ibid. <sup>1</sup> Eu ibid. Zos. p. 769. Philos. p. 531. Socr. p. 309. Zos. p. 798. P. Zos. p. 798. 9 Socr. p. 309. Chron. Al. p. 12. Marc. chron. l. ii. p. 66. & fpicileg. veter. fcript. tom. x. p. 8. Chron. Al. p. 712. 1 EUNAP. p. 21. m EUNAP. Socr. p. 309. Soz. p. 763.

F Vide VAL. rer. Franc. * SYN. ep. lxi. p. 204. CHRYS. in Act. hom. vii. xli. p. 69, 360.

The origin, birth and employments of Alaric.

records of those times. Alaric was by nation a Goth, born in the island of Peuce a at the mouth of the Danube, whence Claudian calls that river his paternal god ". He was not sprung from the family of the Amali, the most illustrious of the Gothish nation, but from that of the Balthi, which held the fecond rank; and to him, in particular, his countrymen had given the name of Balt, which in their language fignified bold and enterprising w. Though Claudian introduces him speaking in the language of a pagan x, yet it is certain he was a christian, but an Arian, the doctrine of that herefiarch having prevailed among the Goths ever fince the year 375 v. Long before the year 410. in which he took Rome, he used to brag, that he would one day extend his conquests to that great metropolis, pursuant to the prediction of an oracle?. This we learn of the poet Claudian, who little imagined then, that the b prediction would ever be fulfilled. Prudentius likewise, who wrote some years before Alaric took Rome, tells us, that he was often heard to say, he should one day set fire to that city 2. He passed the Danube in 376. with his countrymen, driven out of their own country by the Hunns. Claudian says, that he often engaged the imperial troops, and once shut up the emperor Theodosius in the windings of the Hebrus in Thrace b. However, in 382. he submitted to him with the other Goths, and received lands in Thrace, where they were allowed to fettle, upon condition of their ferving, when wanted, in the Roman armies. Pursuant to this agreement, they attended Theodosius in his last expedition against the usurper Eugenius in 394. on which occasion Alaric commanded a body of his countrymen. He had no other c rank in the beginning of the reign of Arcadius and Honorius; whence Rufinus, finding him dissatisfied, easily prevailed upon him to revolt, and plunder Greece in 395. Stilicho gained several advantages over him in Peloponnesus; but suffered him to escape in 396. as we have related elsewhere. Arcadius entered into a treaty with him, and appointed him general of the Roman troops in East-Illyricum, which post he held when Tribigild revolted, that is, in 399. The Goths, who were subject to the empire, created him about the same time, if Jornandes is to be credited, their chief and general, with the title of king of the Visigoths d. The same writer adds, that the Goths, despising both Arcadius and Honorius, and discontented because they had not fent them the usual presents, began to mutiny, and resolved to make war upon the d empire, in order to enrich themselves with the spoils of so many wealthy provinces. Whatever was the motive that prompted them to take arms, it is certain, that this He ensers Italy year 400. the Goths, under the conduct of Alaric, and Radagaifus king of the Hunns, with Radagai- entered Italy in a hostile manner on the side of Pannonia, leaving Sirmium on their right f. Jornandes writes, that they met with no opposition 8: according to St. Jerom, they besieged Aquileia; and after having opened themselves a way into Italy, they laid the country waste far and near ". This happened the present year; but they were still in Italy in the beginning of the sollowing year 401. for Paulinus, in his annual poem on the birth-day of Felix of Nola, the fourteenth of January, writes in 401. that the Goths, and other foreign nations, were still pursuing their ravages in Italy. As we have no distinct account of this first irruption of Alaric e into Italy, we know not how it ended; but as it seems altogether improbable, that he continued in that country till the battle of Pollentia, fought two years after, in which no mention is made of Radagaisus, we are inclined to believe, that Stilicho induced them both, by some means or other, to retire, and that Alaric returned about the end of the year 402.

fus, and lays waste several provinces.

He retires.

Theolofius born.

THE next consuls were Vicentius prefect of Gaul, and Fravitus or Fravita, of whom we have spoken above. This year is remarkable for the birth of Theodosius, the son and fuccessor of Arcadius, born, according to Socrates k, and the chronicle of Alexandria, on the tenth, according to Marcellinus, on the eleventh of April, and, soon after his birth, declared Casar m, and baptized with extraordinary pomp and solem- f nity. This year Arcadius published a law, forbidding any one to beg the estates of condemned persons, till two years after they had been confiscated a. The Euxine sea

<sup>**</sup> CLAUD. conf. Hon. 6. p. 177. BAUDR. PRUD. in Sym. l. ii. p. 242. w Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 14. 29, p. 630, 651. * CLAUD. bell. Get. p. 179. y Oros. l. vii. c. 37. p. 222. 2 CLAUD. ibid. p. 159. PRUD. in Sym. l. ii. p. 242. b CLAUD. ibid. p. 170. Idem conf. Hon. 6. p. 177. Socr. l. vii. c. 10. p. 346. Zos. l. v. p. 783. d Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 29. p. 651. & de regn. fucc. c. 43. p. 653. Idem ibid. Prosp. chron. Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 29. p. 651. Ruf. p. 15. Hier in Ruf. l. iii. c. 6. p. 239. Paulin. car. xxiii. p. 585. d Jorn. ibid. p. 651. h Hier. in Ruf. l. iii. c. 6. p. 239. l Paulin. carm. xxiii. p. 585. d Socr. p. 763. l Chron. Al. p. 712. Theod. l. ii. p. 568. Soz. p. 763. Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 42. leg. 17. p. 345.

a was this year frozen over for the space of twenty days . A band of slaves and deserters pillaged part of Thrace, pretending to be Hunns; but Fravitus, marching against them, put most of them to the sword; and dispersed the rest P. In the west, Honorius, by a law dated the twenty-fifth of June, forgave all the debts owing to the Aninstance of exchequer before his first consulship; that is, before the month of September 386, the generosity of By the same law, he ordered all prosecutions and suits for what was owing from that Honorius. time to the year 395. that is, to his accession to the empire, to be suspended, till he had inquired into the circumstances of the debtors q. The following year, when Arcadius and Honorius were both confuls the fifth time, nothing remarkable happened in the east, except the promotion of young Theodosius to the imperial dignity; b which ceremony was performed with extraordinary magnificence in the palace of Hebdomon, on the tenth or eleventh of January . In the west, Alaric entered Italy Alaric enters anew. Claudian, who wrote a poem on this war, supposes, that he set out from Italy anew; Thessaly'; but Socrates tells us in a very confused manner, that not presuming to take upon him the title of emperor, he left Constantinople, and, upon his arrival in Illyricum, put all to fire and fword; but as he was passing out of Thessaly Into Epirus, he was attacked in the narrow passes of mount Pindus by the Thessains, who killed three thousand of his men in the neighbourhood of Nicopolis. Notwithstanding this loss, he pursued his march, carrying all before him. What prompted him to these acts of hostility, we are no-where told. Claudian lays the whole blame on Alaric, e charging him with treachery ". On the other hand, Orofius accuses Stilicho, as if he had been the chief author of this war, and had provoked the Goths, by refuling to grant them certain lands, which they demanded upon terms very advantageous to the empire w. He hoped, says that writer, when a war was once kindled in the bowels of the empire, to improve it to his own advantage, and fettle the fovereignty on his fon Eucherius. Be that as it will, Alaric entered Italy in the latter end of the autumn, the winter being more favourable to his men, enured to a cold climate, than to the Romans, not accustomed to bear the hardships of war in that season y. He passed the Alps without opposition, the Roman troops being then employed in driving out a body of barbarians, who had made an irruption into Rhatia. As there d was then no army in Italy to oppose him, he ravaged without controll the provinces And ravages of Venetia and Liguria; which threw Rome itself into the utmost consternation: the several prowalls of that metropolis were repaired with great expedition by Flavius Macrobius opposition. Longinianus, then prefect of the city 2; and the citizens, not being suffered to retire with their families and effects, were buffed night and day in preparing arms, and putting themselves in the best posture of defence they could . The court was no less alarmed than the people, Alarie threatening to besiege the emperor himself, and force him to comply with his demands b. Honorius was for retiring into Gaul; but Stilicho would neither suffer him, nor his own wife and son, to abandon Italy . However, the emperor left Milan, and retired to Ravenna, which thenceforth became The emperor the usual place of his residence. The news of this irruption soon reached the most retires to Radistant provinces of the east; for we are told, that this very year the christians of venna. Edessa in Mesopotamia, repairing to the church of St. Thomas, begged in their public prayers, that the Arian robber, who plundered Italy, might meet with the just doom, which had overtaken his countryman of the same sect, meaning no doubt Gainas e. THE next confuls were Theodosius Augustus and Rumoridus. Who the latter was, in the service of Honorius; for, generally speaking, one of the consuls belonged to the eastern, and the other to the western empire. This year 403. Eudoxia was, on the tenth or eleventh of February, delivered of Marina, her fourth and last daugh-Marina born.

wife his own statue to be placed on a column, which, according to some writers, was CLAUD. bell. Get. p. 169. w Oros. l. vii. c. 37, 38. p. 221, 222.

* Idem ibid.
6. * Grut. p. 165. Prud. in Sym. l. ii. p. 242.

b Idem, conf. Hon. 6. p. 186.

* Idem, bell. Get. CHRYS. tom. 6. p. 272-274. reared

we are no-where told; but his name gives us room to think he was a Goth, probably ter f. A statue of filver was erected to the empress on a column of porphyty, near the church of St. Sophia; which occasioned a misunderstanding between Eudoxia and St. Chrysostom, bishop of the city, who could not endure the profane sports that were exhibited before the statue at the very entry of the church s. Arcadius caused like-reared this year in the quarter of the city called Xerolophos, and is described by Gyl- a lius. The same year Arcadius built the city of Arcadiopolis in Thrace k, or rather gave that name to the antient city of Bergulæ 1. To return to Italy: Stilicho, having in fome degree removed the young emperor's fears, fays Claudian, croffed the lake of Como, and passing the Alps in the depth of winter, entered Rhætia, where, with his unexpected arrival, he alarmed the barbarians, and not only obliged them to fue for Stilicho affim- peace, but persuaded great numbers of them to join him. At the same time he disbles an army, patched messengers to the troops that guarded the coasts of Britain, and the banks of the Rbine, ordering them to march immediately, and with all possible expedition, into Rhætia. Upon their arrival, he commanded them to pursue their march into Italy; but fet out himself before them, attended by a small number of troops, in b order to return with all speed to court. When he came to the Adda, he found the enemy encamped on the opposite bank, and masters of the bridge; but not in the least daunted, he threw himself into the river as soon as it was dark, and forcing his way fword in hand through the midst of the barbarians, appeared unexpectedly at court, to the inexpressible joy of the emperor m. The troops arrived soon after out of Rhatia; and Stilicho, putting himfelf at their head, marched against the enemy; against Alaric. but could not hinder Alaric from passing the Po, and advancing to Pollentia, now Pollenza, on the Tanaro in Piedmont , where the two armies engaged, almost on the same spot, says Claudian, where Marius had formerly defeated the Cimbrians ?; but he was therein mistaken, for the Cimbrians were overcome in the neighbourhood & of Vercelli P. There is a great disagreement among authors in the accounts they give us of this battle: Jornandes writes, that Alaric having advanced to Pollentia, in virtue of a treaty, by which Honorius had yielded to him the provinces of Gaul and Spain, then held by the Vandals, Stilicho followed him, and without any regard to the faith of treaties, or law of nations, fell upon him, while he was under no apprehension of an enemy q. But it is certain, that the Vandals had not yet entered either of those provinces. Claudian, Cassiodorus and Prudentius suppose Stilicho to have been present, and to have commanded the army in person; but Orosius tells us, that Saul, a pagan and barbarian, was vested with the chief command; and that he, imagining the Gotbs, out of respect to their religion, (for they were for the most part christians, tho' Arians) would not fight on Easter-day, attacked them on that solemn festival. In the present year 403. Easter sell on the twenty-ninth of March'; which is agreeable to what we read in Claudian, viz. that the war of Alaric began and ended with the winter: In the Roman army served a body of Alan horse, commanded by an officer of that nation, who, advancing with more courage than prudence, was flain at the head of his men; which put them into no small confusion: but Stilicho coming feafonably with the foot to their affiftance, they rallied, and returned to the charge". Claudian and Prudentius " suppose the battle to have been gained by the Romans; but Cassiodorus in his chronicle writes, that Stilicho and the Roman army were defeated, and put to flight; and Jornandes, that the Goths, when surprised by e Stilicho, betrayed no small fear; but afterwards took courage, and put most of his men to the sword, obliging the rest to save themselves by a precipitous and disorderly flight*. According to Orofius the Romans gained the battle; but were overcome after the victory y. The Romans, while victorious, forced and plundered the enemy's camp, in which they found the spoils of several provinces, and the wife of Alaric, with his children and daughters-in-law, whom they took prisoners. Alaric was no fooner informed of their misfortune, than he fent deputies to Stilicho to fue for peace; which was readily granted him, upon condition of his marching forthwith out of Italy 2. Pursuant to this agreement, Alaric repassed the Po, and retired as far as Verona, where, in defiance of the late treaty, he began to plunder the country, and f commit other acts of hostility. Hereupon Stilicho detached against him a strong body of barbarians, by whom he was overcome, and obliged to take refuge amongst the mountains. He endeavoured to pass the Alps, and seize on Gaul or Rhasia; but found all the passes guarded by Stilicho, who kept him blocked up, till most of his Alaric sues for peace.

* Theoph. p. 66.

1 Vide BAUDR. p. 120.

186, 187.

2 Idem ibid. p. 170—180.

2 P. 662.

1 Orose GYLL. de Constant. geograph. l. iv. c. 7. p. 300.

THEOPH. p. 66.

Vide BAUDR. p. 60,

114.

CLAUD. bell. Get. p. 165—168. cons. Hon. 6. p. 186, 187.

Idem ibid. p. 170—180.

Idem, bell. Get. p. 171.

PLUT. vit. Mar. p. 767.

JORN. rer. Goth. c. 30. p. 653.

OROS.

Vii. c. 37. p. 221.

Buch. cycl.

CLAUD. ibid.

CLAUD. p. 172. & cons. Hon. p. 181, 182. PRUD. ibid.

e

ì

bş ¢

rİŢ

T.

53

ri,

Ţ,

: of

Ţ 25

126 ni)

100

100

15

- 14 -132 10

a men forsaking him, and joining the Romans, he thought it adviseable to withdraw Abandons Italy, in the night-time, and return through by-ways into Pannonia. Thus Claudian a and return to Orofius writes, that the barbarians could not agree among themselves; that the Goths were divided into two factions; and that the Alans and Hunns, who ferved under Alaric, often quarrelled, and destroyed each other b. Italy being thus delivered from the barbarians, Honorius, to satisfy the senate and people of Rome, who, by frequent embassies, had intreated him to honour their city with his presence, lest Ravenna, Honorius examples and set out for that metropolis; which he entered in triumph, having Stilicho with ters Romein him in the chariot, about the beginning of December. He was received with loud triumph. acclamations by the fenate in a body, by the nobility and people in their best apparel. b He would not suffer the senate to attend, according to custom, his triumphal chariot on foot; but allowed his fifter Placidia, and Eucherius his brother-in-law, to pay While he was still at Ravenna, he suppressed and utterly abo-He abolishe: him that honour c. lished the shews of gladiators, which, the forbidden by Constantine the Great in 325. the shews of had been tolerated by his successors, even by Theodosius himself, out of complainance gladiators. to the people, fond beyond expression of that inhuman diversion d. Theodoret writes, that an anchoret, by name Telemachus, attempting to prevent the gladiators from engaging in the amphitheatre at Rome, whither he was for that purpose come out of the east, was by the incenfed populace stoned to death; and hence Honorius, according to that writer, took occasion to suppress those sports. Be that as it will, they

c were forbidden after the battle of Pollentia, as appears from Prudentius, and before Honorius's triumphal entry into Rome; since Claudian, in describing the shews that were exhibited on that occasion, makes no mention of gladiators 8.

THE following year 404. Honorius was conful the fixth time, with Aristanetus, of whom we find no further mention in history. The empress Eudoxia died this year The empress of a miscarriage, on the sixth of October, a few days after she had prevailed upon Eudoxia dies. the weak prince her husband to banish St. Chrysostom, whom she had for some time persecuted with great bitterness, on account of his reflecting in his sermons, as she imagined, and perhaps not without reason, on her conduct, and his exclaiming against the profane sports that were exhibited before her statue, which stood near the d church. On the very day he left Constantinople, a fire broke out in the great church, which intirely confumed it, with the palace where the fenate used to affemble, and the neighbouring edifices. This calamity was imputed to the exiled bishop's friends, and several of them were thrown into prison, and racked to death. But of these violent proceedings against Chrysostom and his friends, the reader will find a distinct account in the ecclesiastic writers. The empress was interred on the twelsth of Octo-ber, in the church of the Apostles, where her tomb was to be seen many ages after. Before her death the Hunns had broken into Thrace, and the Isaurian robbers commit- Most of the ted great diforders in Asia and Syria. The former, having pillaged great part of eastern provin-Thrace and east Illyricum, retired of their own accord beyond the Danube, loaded Isaurian rebe with booty k. Against the latter was sent Arbazacius, who cut great numbers of bers. them in pieces, and shut them up on all sides; but suffered them in the end to escape, being bribed by the large sums they offered him'. Suidas, who calls him a native of Isauria, and a few lines after an Armenian, says, that, from his insatiable rapaciousness and avarice, he was nicknamed Harpazacius, or the Harpy m. The Isaurians, having now nothing to fear from Arbazacius, over-ran the provinces of Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycaonia, Pisidia, Cappadocia, and Lower Syria, extending their ravages to the frontiers of Persia on one side, and to the Euxine sea on the other, ransacking every-where, and pillaging the open country, with the villages, and unfortified towns. They even passed over into the island of Cyprus, and caused a general conf sternation in Phanicia, Caria, Judea, and Jerusalem itself; insomuch that the people were every-where busied in building walls, in preparing arms, and putting themselves in a posture of defence: but, upon the approach of winter, they withdrew to their inaccessible mountains, with an immense booty, which they took care to share with Arbazacius ". In the west, Honorius began his sixth consulship at Rome, which is the Honorius his fixth confulfing.

* CLAUD. conf. Hon. 6. p. 178—183. b Oros. p. 221. c CLAUD. conf. Hon. 6. p. 188, 189. d Socr. l. i. c. 18. p. 48. Soz. l. i. c. 8. p. 411. Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 11. leg. 2. p. 395. c Theod. l. v. c. 26. p. 741. f Prud. in Symm. l. ii. p. 242. s CLAUD. in conf. Hon. 6. p. 190, 191. b Socr. l. v. c. 4. p. 34. &l. vi. c. 4. p. 16. Pallad. vir. Chryf. Cange de Confrant. l. iv. p. 110. k Socr. l. viii. c. 25. p. 793. Philost. l. xi. p. 530. l Zos. l. v. p. 802. Chrys. ep. 120. p. 754. m Suid. p. 412. Theod. vir. patr. c. 10, 21, p. 828.

Subject

The feat of the western empire transferred to Ravenna.

subject of the poem that Claudian pronounced on occasion of that solemnity o. The a emperor continued at Rome at least till the fifteenth of July, as appears from the dates of his laws. From Rome he returned to Ravenna, and there fixed his relidence, notwithstanding the earnest intreaties of the inhabitants of Milan inviting him back to their city. From this time Ravenna became the feat of the western or Roman empire; whence the country in which it stood was called Romania, which name it still re-

THE next confuls were Stilicho the second time, and Anthemius, who was soon after appointed prefect of the east, and is mightily commended by St. Chrysostom P. We shall have frequent occasion to speak of him in the reign of Theodosius II. This year the Mazichi and Auxoriani, two nations of barbarians inhabiting the country b between Cyrenaica and Tripolitana, laid waste great part of Egypt 9. Arcadius was on the twelfth of June at Nice; on the tenth and twenty-third of July, and twelfth of August, at Ancyra in Galatia, whence he returned in the beginning of autumn to Confrantinople r. This year Italy was again alarmed with a fudden irruption of barbarians, led by Radagaisus, or Rhodogaisus, as the Greeks style him. He was one of the kings with a numer- or chiefs of the Goths, a pagan by religion, and a sworn enemy to the Roman name. He is by some writers styled king of the Hunns'. He entered Italy, as we have observed above, with Alaric in the year 400. but returning afterwards beyond the Danube, he affembled an army, confifting, according to Zosimus, of four hundred thousand, according to Orosius and Marcellinus, of two hundred thousand barbarians, of the various nations dwelling beyond the Danube and the Rhine, who were then all blended under the common name of Goths z. The commanders, who were distinguished with the title of lords, amounted, according to Photius a contemporary writer, to the number of twelve hundred y. With this formidable host he broke fuddenly into Italy, vowing to facrifice to his gods, says Orofius, all the Roman blood he could shed z. The news of his approach threw all Italy, and Rome itself, into the utmost consternation. As Radagaisus was a zealous worshipper of the gods, and facrificed every morning to Jupiter, the pagans in Rome gave out, that he would, without all doubt, prevail, not so much by his numerous forces, as the protection of the gods, whom the ungrateful Romans had banished from a city, which they had so d often defended. Unless the antient religion, said they, be restored, and christianity, the only cause of our calamities, utterly abolished, the city must fall into the hands of the barbarians, who have the gods on their side, whom we have forsaken. With these complaints the whole city was filled, and the name of Christ every-where blasphemed, as the true cause of the present calamities b. In the mean time Stilicho, having affembled at Pavia all the Roman forces, amounting to thirty legions, and reinforced them with great numbers of Goths, Hunns and Alans, under the command of Sarus a Goth, and Uldin king of the Hunns, he left that place, bending his march towards Hetruria, where Radagaisus was busied in the siege of Florence, which city enters Italy o us army;

Radagaisus

CLAUD. conf. Hon. 6. p. 191.
 P CHRYS. ep. 147. p. 780.
 P PHILOST. l. xi. c. 8. p. 350, 351.
 Cod. Theod. chron. p. 148.
 Aug. in pfal. cv. c. 10. p. 547.
 PROSP. chron.
 Zoš. l. v. p. 803.
 W Oros. l. vii. c. 37. p. 222.
 X Zos. Oros. ibid.
 PHOT. c. 80. p. 180.
 Oros. ibid.
 Aug. de civit. Dei, l. v. c. 23. p. 63.

(N) The city of Ravenna is faid by some to have been sounded by the Thessalians; but Pliny calls it a colony of the Sabines. It was once reckoned amongst the cities of Umbria; but afterwards became the capital of a particular province, called Flaminia, and belonging to Cifalpine Gaul, and the vicarship of Italy (1). It was inclosed on all sides, either by the sea, by an arm of the Po, conveyed thither by Augustus, or by marshes, through which there was but one way, and that very narrow, leading to the city; so that it was, in a manner, a peninsula, and accessible only on one side (2). The sea washed the walls of the city, and formed a spacious harbour, in which two hundred and fifty ships could ride fafe (3). Augustus, and after him several other emperors, kept constantly two fleets for the defence of Italy, one of which was stationed at Ravenna on the Adriatic, and the other at Misenum on the Mediterranean sea. But Jornandes, who was bishop of Ravenna about the middle of the fixth century, tells us, that the harbour was then become a garden, and the city divided into three quarters, or rather cities, of which the highest was called Ravenna, the second, in which was probably the imperial palace, Cafarea, and the third Classis, because in that place, then distant three miles from Ravenna, was for-merly the harbour with the seet (4). A city, thus fituated amidst waters and marshes, could not be healthy; but, on the other fide, it could not be eafily attacked, and might with great ease be succoured by sea, affording at the same time a safe retreat into the east, when it could be no longer maintained. These reasons, without all doubt, prompted Hone-rius to fix the seat of the empire there, notwithstanding the pressing and reiterated remonstrances of the inhabitants of Milan and Rome. a was already reduced to the utmost extremity. As Stilicho came unexpectedly upon the enemy, he immediately ordered the Hunns, and other auxiliaries, to fall upon one of the three bodies into which he found their army divided. His orders were executed, and an hundred thousand of the enemy cut in pieces, without the loss of Which is deone man on the fide of the Romans'. Thus St. Austin, Zosimus and Prosper. Rada-feated by Stilligaisus retired with the rest to the neighbouring mountains of Fesulæ, where he was cho, closely belieged by Stilicho, and reduced, with his numerous army, to such extremity, that he attempted to escape secretly, and leave his men to the mercy of the Romans; but as all the passes were well guarded, he fell into Stilicho's hands, and was And he himself by his orders put to death foon after. His men, finding themselves abandoned by taken prisoner, and just to b their leader, and destitute of all manner of provisions, submitted to the Romans in death. fuch numbers, that they were fold like beafts, in droves, at a crown a head 4; but as by the famine that had raged among them while shut up in the mountains, they had contracted an ill state of health, they all died in a few days. Orofius and St. Austin :

ascribe this victory to a miracle.

THE following year Arcadius was conful the fixth time, with Anicius Probus, the younger brother of Olybrius and Probinus, consuls in 395 8. A dreadful fire happened this year at Constantinople on the twenty-fifth of October h; and Palestine was infested with such multitudes of grashoppers, as quite darkened the sky, and turned Palestine inday into night. St. Jerom, who was then composing his comments on the prophet multitules of c Joel, writes, that, after they had done great mischief, they were driven by the wind, grashoppers. partly into the Dead sea, partly into the Mediterranean, and thrown soon after on both shores in such heaps, that they insected the air, and occasioned a plague i. This year Arcadius enacted, amongst several others, a law dated the twenty-eighth of April, threatening with death, not only the authors of libels, but such as should read fuch defamatory writings, without tearing or burning them k. Honorius continued all this year at Ravenna, where he enacted a law dated the feventeenth of April, encouraging all persons, whether free-men or slaves, to take arms in desence of their country, and promising to the latter their liberty, to the former three pieces of gold to be paid immediately, and seven more after the war 1. This law was, without all d doubt, occasioned by the motions of the northern nations, who, on the last day of this year 406. entered Gaul, and fixing their abode there, gave beginning to the utter ruin of the Roman empire in the west. Orosius, Marcellinus, Tyro Prosper, and St. Jerom, assure us, that they were stirred up, and invited into Gaul, by Stilicho, who even supplied them with large sums, hoping, by their means, to raise his son Eucherius to the empire m. The barbarians who, at his instigation, broke into Gaul this The Alans, the year, were the Alans, the Vandals, and the Suevians. The Vandals, in attempting to cross Suevians, break the Rhine, were attacked by the Franks, who cut twenty thousand of them in pieces, into Giul, with their king Godigiscles, and would have put them all to the sword, had not the Alans and Suevians, hastening to their assistance, obliged the Franks to retire. Upon e their retreat, the barbarians passed the Rhine without opposition, and entered Gaul. Thus Gregory of Tours, upon the authority of an antient writer named Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus n. The Vandals appointed Gonderic or Gontharius, the fon of Godigiscles, king in his room o. The following year, when Honorius was conful the seventh time, and Theodosius the second, the eastern empire enjoyed a profound tranquillity; but in the west the Vandals, Alans and Suevians, committed dreadful ravages in Gaul, where they were joined by the Burgundians, and many other nations, stirred up, says Orosius P, by Stilicho. The first city that selt their sury was Mentz, which Andtake sevethey took by storm, and levelled with the ground, after having inhumanly massa-rat ciries. cred many thousands of the inhabitants in the churches, to which they had fled for f refuge. Worms held out for a considerable time; but was in the end taken, and laid in ashes. Strasbourgh and Spires underwent the same fate. Thence they marched to och c. 2. p. 60.

** Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 34. leg. 10. p. 246.

** Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 34. leg. 10. p. 246.

** Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 34. leg. 10. p. 246.

** Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 39. leg. 10. p. 246.

** Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 39. leg. 10. p. 246.

** Oros. ibid. Hier. ep. 11. p. 93. Mar. Prosp. in chron.

** Idem ibid. & Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 3. p. 184. Oros. ibid. Aug. ARC. chron.

b Chron. Alex. p. 714.

1 Idem, l. vii. tit. 13. leg. 16, 17.

GREO. Tur. hift.

Chron.

Chron. civ. Dei, p. 63. Jock c. 2. p. 60. p. 387, 388. m O Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 62. P OROS. ibid. 9 HIER. ep. 11. p. 95.

Rheims, to Tournay, to Amiens, to Arras, made themselves masters of all Aquitain, Gascony, the provinces of Lions and Narbonne, and extended their ravages from the Alps to the ocean, the governors of the provinces having no troops to oppose them 4;

. Vol. VI. Nº 6.

and set up Constantine for emperor; into Gaul.

which submits

to him.

lence.

Constantine master of all Gaul.

His issue.

for Stilicho had withdrawn, as we have related above, the forces that guarded the a banks of the Rhine, on occasion of the war with Alaric. The whole country, says St. Jerom, writing about this time, between the Alps and the Pyrenees, between the Rhine and the ocean, is over-run and pillaged by the Quadi, the Vandals, the Sarmatians, the Alans, the Gepidæ, the Heruli, the Saxons, the Burgundians, and the Alemans. In the mean time the Roman troops quartered in Britain, apprehending the barbarians would, after the intire reduction of Gaul, cross the sea, and, jointly with the Scots and Irish, fall upon them, and expecting no affiltance from Honorius, refolved to fet up an emperor of their own; and accordingly conferred that dignity on one Mark, whom after a few days they murdered, upon some dislike, and placed Gratian, a native of Britain, in his room '. Gratian, after a short reign of four b The Romans in months, underwent the same fate, and was succeeded by Constantine, a common soldier, who was chosen merely for the sake of his name, which was common to him with Constantine the Great, who, being advanced to the imperial dignity in Britain, had made himself master of the whole empire, and governed it with great prosperity Who passes over and success. The new prince, immediately after his promotion, passed over into Gaul, taking with him all the Roman forces quartered in the island, and the slower of the British youth; by which means the country, thus left quite naked and defencelefs, was not long after obliged to submit to the yoke of new lords. Constantine landed at Bologne, and continued there, till he was joined by the Roman troops, who were dispersed up and down Gaul, and who chose rather to submit to him, than to the c barbarians. Hereupon Limenius, prefect of Gaul, and Cariobaudes, commander of the Roman forces, fled into Italy, leaving the barbarians to waste the country on one side, and Constantine to pursue his success on the other ". Honorius, who was at Rome when news of this revolt was brought him, immediately dispatched an express to Stilicho then at Ravenna, who hastening to Rome, ordered Sarus, by nation a Goth, but an officer of known valour, bold and enterprifing, to march with a fufficient force into Gaul, and make head against the usurper. Sarus was met on the frontiers of Gaul by Justin, one of Constantine's commanders, whom he easily defeated and killed, feated by Sarus, after having put to the sword the greatest part of his forces. He then led his men, besieged in Va- encouraged with this success, to besiege Valence in Dauphiny, whither the usurper had d retired. Upon his approach, Constantine sent Neobig astes, another of his generals, to treat with him of an accommodation; but him Sarus caused to be murdered, contrary to the law of nations, and the affurances he had given him w; but Constantine having placed, in the room of the two generals he had loft, Edobincus and Gerontius, the former a Gaul, the latter of Britain, Sarus, fays Zosimus with little appearance of The sugeraised truth, dreading their courage and experience, raised the siege of Valence, and retired in great hafte. Constantine's army pursued him to the Alps, over which he was obliged to purchase a passage of the Bagaudæ, by quitting to them all his booty x. However that be, it is certain, that Sarus railed the fiege, and repaffing the Alps with his army, returned to Italy. Upon his retreat, Constantine fixed his residence at Arles v, overcame the barbarians in feveral battles, and in the end forced them to fue for peace; which he granted, without obliging them to quit Gaul, probably because he designed to maintain himself by their means in his usurped power 3. These disturbances did not prevent Honorius from enacting this year fevere laws against the Donatists, Manichees, Phrygians, Priscillianists, and all sectaries in general a.

> THE following year 408, when Anicius Bassus and Flavius Philippus were consuls, is remarkable for many memorable events. In the east died at Constantinople on the first of May the emperor Arcadius, after having lived thirty-one years, and reigned twelve years with his father, and fourteen after his death b, or rather thirteen years, three months, and fourteen days. He was buried near the empress Eudoxia, in the f church of the Apostlesc, where their tombs of porphyry were to be seen several ages after 4. He left behind him but one fon, viz. Theodoftus, then eight years old, but just weaned, says Sozomen c. We shall examine elsewhere what we read in Procopius, viz. that Arcadius by his last will appointed Isdegerdes, king of Persia, guar-

Plus, Viz. Lilac 22. Col. ix. c. 11. p. 813. Phot. c. 80. p. 180. Col. vii. c. 40. p. 223. Bed. hift. gent. Aug. l. i. c. 10. p. 12. Soz. Zos. ibid. Oros. Soz. Zos. ibid. Phot. p. 181. W Zos. p. 803, 804. Phot. p. 181. Oros. p. 223. Soz. ibid. Zos. p. 824. Fidem, p. 807. Col. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 40. p. 160. leg. 48. p. 168, 169. leg. 20. Col. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 40. p. 160. leg. 48. p. 168, 169. leg. 10. c. 23. p. 332. Theod. ibid. Cange w Zos. p. 803, 604.
2 Oros. l. vii. c. 40. p. 223.
2 Cod. Theod. i. xvi. tit. 5. 165. 7.
41. p. 160, &c.
3 Theod. l. ii. p. 568. Sock. l. vi. c. 23. p. 332.
3 Const. l. iv. p. 110.
4 Soz. l. ix. c. 1. p. 799. Chron. Alex. p. 712.

į.

4

a dian to the young prince. We have observed in the history of his reign, that he had four daughters, Flaccilla, Pulcheria, Arcadia, and Marina: Flaccilla is never mentioned by historians but on occasion of her birth; whence we may conclude, that she died soon after. The other three embraced the state of virginity, and led exemplary lives f. They were all styled queens, as appears from the councils s; but only by courtefy; for, excepting Pulcheria, who was declared Augusta in 414. they had no other title but that of most noble. Arcadia and Marina built a palace at Constantinople, which for many ages retained their name. The former built likewise a church in honour of St. Andrew, which was many ages after, when become a monastery, rebuilt by Theodora, the niece of Michael Paleologus. Arcadia died in 444. and b Marina on the third of August 449 i. Arcadius himself was a prince naturally inclined His character. to virtue, and an enemy to vice, but of very slender parts, and therefore intirely governed, and shamefully imposed upon, by his ministers, and the empress, who abused his authority to oppress the people in a most despotic and tyrannical manner. To return to the west: Constantine, having reduced all Gaul to his obedience, fent a body of troops into Spain, in order to oppose Didymius and Verianus or Verinianus, who having affembled the few troops that were quartered in that province, and reinforced them with fuch flaves and peafants as were willing to take arms, had seized on the passes of the Pyrenees. Didymius and Verinianus were brothers, natives of Spain, and nearly allied to Honorius, for whom they openly declared, while e most of the cities of that province were ready to revolt from him, and submit to the usurper k. The troops that were first sent against them not being able to open themselves a passage through the Pyrenees, which were carefully guarded by the two brothers, Constantine obliged his eldest son, by name Constant, who professed a monastic life, to quit his retirement, created him Cafar, and dispatched him with Constans, the the flower of his army, commanded by Gerontius, an experienced officer, into Spain. Son of Constan-Didymius and Verinianus defended the passes for some time with great resolution and tine, declared intrepidity; but being overpowered with numbers, were in the end obliged to retire. Constant pursued them close; and coming up with them in Lusitania, now Portugal, cut most of their men in pieces, and took both them and their wives prisoners. d Upon the news of their defeat and captivity, their brothers Theodosius or Theodosiolus, and Lagodus, who had taken arms in another province, abandoned Spain to the usurper, and retired, the former to the court of Honorius, and the latter to that of Theodofius, who had succeeded his father Arcadius in the empire of the east !. Constans, having thus reduced all Spain, and appointed Gerontius to command the army He reduces all and guard the Pyrenees, returned to Gaul, where he presented the two illustrious Spain, and is captives to his father, who immediately ordered them to be privately put to death. declared Augustus To reward his fon for his eminent services, he created him Augustus, honouring gustus. him, says Zosimus m, with a diadem. At the same time he sent a solemn deputation to Honorius, excusing his revolt, as if he had been forced by the foldiery to accept e of the fovereignty, and demanding to be acknowledged by him as his partner in the empire. Honorius, not finding himself in a condition to make war upon the usurper, thought it advisable to comply with his request; and accordingly sent him Honorius the imperial purple, honouring him, at the same time, with the title of Augustus n. acknowledge Italy was at this time threatened with a new invasion of the barbarians, under the for his colle conduct of the famous Alaric, who, at the instigation of Stilicho, leaving Pannonia and Dalmatia, where lands had been granted to him and his Goths, passed unexpectedly the Alps, and breaking into Noricum, threatened to invade Italy, and lay Alaric all waste before him, unless a certain sum, which he pretended to be due to him threatens Italy. and his troops, were immediately sent him. Upon this demand, Honorius, who was I then at Rome, affembled the senate, when several senators of great distinction were for rejecting his demand, and marching the army without delay against him, urging, that to comply with an arrogant and unreasonable demand was not buying a peace, but figning a contract of perpetual flavery. However Stiliche, who maintained a private correspondence with Alarie and his party, pleading with great warmth in his favour, as if the money he demanded were really due, it was agreed, that four The money he thousand pounds weight of gold should be sent him. Lampadius, who had with great demanded is

f Soz. l. ix. c. 5. p. 804.

MAN. chron. & chron. Al. p. 734.

P. B13. Phot. p. 184.

T Zos. p. 830. Soz. Phot. Oros. ibid. Greg. Tur. hift. Fr. l. ii. c. 9. p. 62.

Zos. ibid.

B Idem, p. 818.

Phot. p. 180. Greg. Tur. ibid.

Stilicho difgraced, and put to death.

Stilicho supposed by some guilty, by others innocent.

Honorius divorces his daughter

Thermantia.

liberty of speech opposed this motion, and by that means incurred the displeasure a of Stilicho, as foon as the fenate broke up, took fanctuary in a neighbouring church o. A few days after Honorius, leaving Rome, fet out for Bononia; whence, after a short stay, he removed to Ticinum, now Pavia, attended by one Olympius, who, by an outward shew of christian piety, says Zosimus, had gained the considence of the emperor, and was by him employed about his person. As every one was now well apprised of the wicked designs of Stilicho, Olympius thought himself obliged to disclose them to the emperor, which he did accordingly on the road from Bologna to Pavia, and so thoroughly convinced him of the treachery of his minister, that the prince, awaked, as it were, out of a deep lethargy, no fooner arrived at Pavia, than he dispatched an express to Ravenna, where Stilicho then was, with two different orders, b the one commanding him to be secured, and the other to be put to death. Upon the arrival of the messenger, Stilicho took sanctuary in a church; but the next day, being in the presence of the bishop assured by the soldiers upon oath, that they had orders only to arrest him, he left his asylum, and delivered himself into their hands; which he had scarce done, when the messenger produced the warrant for his death; whereupon he was beheaded the same day, the twenty-third of August of the present year 408 P. It was no fooner known at Pavia, that the emperor had ordered him to be arrested, than the army encamped there, encouraged by Olympius, says Zosi-Several of his mus 9, flew to arms, and in a tumultuous manner flew all those who were known to friends are cut be well-affected to the difgraced general, and amongst the rest Limenius, presect of c in pieces by the Gaul, Chariobaudes, commander of the troops in the same province, who had both been lately driven out of that province by Constantine, Longinianus, formerly presect of Italy, Vincentius, general of the horse, Salvius and Petronius, the one comes domesticorum, the other comes largitionum, another Salvius, who was quæstor, Nemorius, then magister officiorum, and many other persons of great distinction. All authors, except Zosimus and the poet Claudian, agree, that he was guilty of the crimes laid to his charge, viz. that he maintained a private correspondence with Alaric; that he invited the barbarians into Gaul, hoping the emperor would reward his eminent fervices, after he had driven them out, with affuming him for his collegue; that he had formed a design of murdering the two princes Honorius and Theodosius, d and seizing on both empires for himself; that by a potion given to Honorius, he prevented his having any issue, &c. But Zosimus pretends these crimes to have been all feigned by his enemies, in order to prejudice Honorius against him, and procure his ruin, to which the credulous prince in the end confented. The same writer adds, that after his death several of his friends were cruelly tortured, and amongst the rest Deuterus, the emperor's great chamberlain, and Peter his chief secretary, who died on the rack without owning any of the several charges that were brought against him or them as privy to his wicked defigns s. Stilicho professed the christian religion; but his fon Eucherius was not only a pagan, but a professed enemy to the christians; nay, he used to brag amongst the pagans, says Orosius, who wrote about that time, e that if he ever attained the empire, he would fignalize the beginning of his reign with the re-establishment of the pagan, and utter extirpation of the christian ceremonies. If what that author writes be true, the partiality which Zosimus, a zealous patron of paganism, shews for Stilicho and Eucherius, may be easily accounted for. The emperor had married in the beginning of this year Thermantia, Stilicho's fecond daughter, Maria, his eldeft daughter, whom Honorius had married in 398, being dead fome years before "; perhaps when the emperor was at Rome in 404. for her body was discovered in the Vatican church on the fourth of February 1544. with several things of great value: her body, when exposed to the air, mouldered away; but the gold of her garments remaining, when the rest sell to ashes, weighed thirty-six f pounds w. Honorius married Thermantia at Rome, where the match was concluded by Serena, alledging, fays Zofimus, to her husband Stilicho, who was averse to it as incestuous, that the other fister died a virgin . Upon the death of Stilicho, Honorius divorced his daughter, and fent her back untouched to her mother Serenay. Zosimus writes, that she died soon after; but, according to the chronicle of Alexandria,

> <sup>o</sup> Zos. p. 805. Philost. l. xii. c. 2. p. 532. Rutil. l. ii. p. 142. P. Zos. p. 810. Soz. l. ix. c. 4. p. 806. Oros. l. vii. c. 38. p. 222. P. Zos. p. 808, 809. Zos. Socr. Oros. ibid. Zos. p. 811, 819. Oros. p. 222. Zos. p. 804. Phot. c. 80. p. 177. W. Anast. Childerici, p. 53. Aringhi Rom. subterr, l. ii. c. 9. p. 173. Mabill. iter Italic. p. 145. Zos. p. 804. Tidem. p. 811, 804.

a dria, news of her death was brought to Constantinople on Friday the thirtieth of July 415. Her body too was found in the Vatican in 1543, adorned with the imperial robes, and all the enfigns of majesty . As for Eucherius, when he heard the news of his father's death, he fled to a church for protection; but being dragged from thence by the emperor's orders, he was fent under a strong guard to Rome, and Eucherius, his there executed b. Thus were the empire, says Grosius c, and the church, by the son, executed. death of a few persons, delivered from the wicked attempts of their enemies. However, we could wish for the reputation of Honorius, a pious and well-meaning prince, that the pretended criminals had been tried in due form; for such as suffer without being heard, have a right to be deemed innocent. All the ecclefiastic writers supb pose Stilicho to have been guilty; but the crimes laid to his charge were never proved either in his life-time, or after his death; and hence Zosimus looks upon them as false imputations, and groundless suspicions. Stilicho's estate was confiscated, and Stilicho's likewise the estates of all his avowed partizans, and of such as had been preserved estate confishing for money decay and Heliocrates was sent to Romano saign them which cated. by him for money d; and Heliocrates was fent to Rome to feize them, which commission he discharged with great humanity and good-nature, warning underhand those who were the least guilty to remove their effects out of the way: but his moderation cost him dear; for he was not only deprived of his commission, but sent in bonds to Ravenna, and would have been put to death, had he not found means to escape out of prison, and save himself in a church. Such was the end of Stilicho, c after he had commanded in chief the Roman armies for the space of twenty-three years. He was no doubt a person of extraordinary qualities, a great statesman, a His character. valiant foldier, and experienced officer. He gained such an ascendant over Honorius, who was blindly guided by his counsels, that, till the time of his disgrace, he governed with a more absolute sway, than the emperor himself. Zosimus, however partial to his memory, accuses him of rapine and oppression, of great partiality in the administration of justice, and of conveying by degrees into his own coffers the whole wealth of the empire f. Stilicho was succeeded in the administration by Olym-Olympius pius, the chief author of his ruin. He was a native of the country bordering on prime minister. the Euxine sea, and not only professed the christian religion, but outwardly affected d an extraordinary piety, says Zosimus 8, infinuating thereby, that his piety was counterfeit: but St. Austin entertained a very favourable opinion of him, as appears from the commendations he bestows upon him h; as did likewise Symmachus, tho a zealous pagan i. Olympiodorus writes, that he owed his first preferment to Stilicho, who recommended him to Honoriusk; which would render the return he made that minister highly criminal, if he had any thing in view but the public welfare. He had in Stilicho's life-time a confiderable employment at court, and was after his death raised to the post of magister officiorum, or steward of the emperor's houshold, one of the greatest employments in the state 1. Soon after his promotion, he wrote to St. Austin, desiring that zealous prelate to suggest to him from time to time what He favolers e he thought would conduce to the good of the church. In the very beginning of the church. his administration, he caused several laws to be enacted against the pagans, Jews, and heretics, especially the Donatists in Africa. By a law dated the sourteenth of November, all those who were not of the catholic communion, or did not conform to the religion of the prince, were excluded from all employments at court o. When this law was enacted, one of the chiefs of the barbarians in the Roman service, resigned his command, and his example, if Zosimus is to be credited P, was followed by many others, who were either pagans or Arians. Amongst the several laws of this year, relating both to civil and ecclesiastic matters, one was enacted forbidding all persons of quality to trade, not that trade was by any means looked upon as degradf ing, but because others, in dealing with men of power and authority, were liable to be injured by them without redress?.

WHEN the Roman soldiers quartered in the cities of Italy heard of Stilicho's death, they flew to arms, and, out of harred to him, inhumanly murdered the wives and The wives and children of the barbarians, whom he had taken into the service, and whom they children of the

the Roman

<sup>2</sup> Chron. Al. p. 716. ARINGH. MABILL. ibid. Philos. l. xii. c. 3, p. 533. Zos. p. 813. fervice mur © Oros. p. 222. Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 40. leg. 20. p. 319. Zos. p. 811, 819. Idem, dered.

p. 780, 789. Bldem, p. 810, 811. Aug. ep. cxxiv, cxxix. p. 242, 245. Sym. l. ix. ep. 60.

p. 362. Phot. c. 80. p. 177. 1 Zos. p. 808. Aug. ep. cxxix. p. 245. Cod. Theod.

l. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 44. p. 165. Idem ibid. leg. 42. p. 163. P. Zos. l. v. p. 820. Cod. Juft. l. iv.

sit. 62. leg. 2. p. 306. p. 302. 1. xvi. tit. 5. leg. 44. p. 165. tir. 63. leg. 3. p. 395.

VOL. VI. Nº 6.

ľ

ď

ığ

er I

ral Ler

ba

jā 1

115 Ţ.

13% i il

1 75

, in

6 A

enters Italy, and befreges Rome.

on that account looked upon as privy to his wicked designs, as public enemies. The a barbarians, highly provoked at this unheard of cruelty, vowed revenge; and quitting the emperor's service, retired, to the number of thirty thousand and upwards, to Alaric, who, tho' thus reinforced, fent deputies to Honorius, offering to conclude a lasting peace with him, and never more to disturb the tranquillity of the empire, provided he would fend him a sufficient sum to pay his army their arrears. Honorius refuling to comply with his demand, he dispatched an express to Ataulphus or Athaulphus, his brother-in-law, who was quartered on the frontiers of Pannonia, ordering him to hasten with his troops, consisting of Goths and Hunns, into Italy. In the The barbarians mean time, Alaric himself advancing with long marches from Noricum to the Po, join Aliric, who crossed that river without opposition; and passing in sight of Ravenna, where the b emperor then was, pursued his march almost without halting till he arrived at Rome, which he immediately invested, blocking up all the roads and avenues leading to it, and placing guards at the mouth and on the banks of the Tiber, to prevent the inhabitants from receiving any supplies or provisions by water t. By this means the city, which was crouded with people, was foon reduced to great diffress: a famine began to rage, which was attended with a plague, arising from the great number of dead bodies that lay in the streets unburied ". Olympiodorus writes, that the unhappy citizens were reduced to the fatal necessity of feeding upon human flesh, and devouring each other w; and Zosimus, that they were almost brought to that extre-

Which is re-Streights,

And complies with the demands of Ala-TIC.

Screna, the cho, fut to death.

mity x. During this calamity, the pagans, and among the rest Pompeianus, presect & of the city, began to cry aloud, that recourse ought to be had to the gods of their ancestors, who had so often relieved the city, and delivered it from the greatest dangers. Zosimus adds, that Innocent, at that time bishop of Rome, consented to their offering sacrifices to the gods, provided it were done privately; but that they were, notwithstanding his consent, afraid to perform the ceremony?. Sozomen writes, that, at the instigation of some Hetruscan aruspices, they actually revived the ancient facrifices; which were so far from relieving the city, that thenceforth it laboured duced to great under greater difficulties than ever z. Be that as it will, the unhappy citizens were in the end obliged to fend out deputies to treat with Alaric. These were Basilius, who had been prefect of Rome in 395. and John, the emperor's first secretary. d Alaric hearkened to their proposals, and agreed to raise the siege, and ever after continue faithful to the Romans, upon their delivering up hostages, and paying to him five thousand pounds weight of gold, thirty thousand of silver, four thousand filk garments, three thousand skins of purple dye, and as many pounds of pepper -For the railing of the required sum, the senators were taxed according to their estates; but as they had not so much ready money by them, that wicked genius, fays Zosimus b, which then governed the affairs of mankind, prompted those, who were concerned in levying the faid fum, to the height of iniquity; for to make good the deficiency, they had recourse to the ornaments of the temples and images of the gods: some of the latter, that were of gold or filver, they melted down, • and among the rest that of Valour, which being destroyed, the ancient Roman valour was utterly extinguished, as had been foretold by persons skilled in divine matters, and well versed in the rites and ceremonies of their country. The treaty was ratified The fiegeraifed by Honorius, and the fum thus raised sent to Alaric, who thereupon raised the siege, and retired with his army into Hetruria. When he first appeared before Rome, the fenate, with the confent and approbation of Placidia, the emperor's fifter, then in the city, caused Serena, the widow of Stilicho, to be put to death, upon a false widow of Still- supposition, says Zosimus, of her privately corresponding with the enemy d. Lata, the widow of the emperor Gratian, and her mother Pissamene, signalized their good > the famished citizens. While the western empire was thus miserably harassed by the barbarians, and rent into two empires by the usurpation of Constantine, whom Honorius had been obliged to acknowledge for his partner in the fovereigney, a profound peace reigned over all the provinces subject to young Theodosius, though not yet eight years old. They were chiefly indebted for the happiness they enjoyed to Anthemius, who taking nature during the siege, relieving with great generolity, as Zosimus himself owns , f:

d Idem. p. 114, 115. . Idem ibid. 121.

h

od

si, f

ad Ma

nd uld.

119

Š.

110

a upon him the administration, discharged the office of prime minister with an inter The happy adgrity hardly to be matched in history. He was grandson to Philippus, who had ministration of been presect of the east under Constantius, which office Anthemius himself discharged the east. from the year 405. to 414 . Ammianus Marcellinus mentions one Simplicius, the son of Anthemius the elder, and probably the father of Anthemius the younger, who was disgraced in 3591. The latter was magister officiorum before the year 404. embassador to the king of Persia before the year 405. consul in that year, and soon after præsesus prætorio. He had at least one daughter, who was married to Procopius, by whom she had Anthemius, advanced to the empire in 465 ". Anthemius, who go- His charaster. verned the eastern empire during the minority of Theodofius, is commended by all b the writers of those times as an experienced commander, an able statesman, a zealous christian, and one who had nothing so much at heart as the glory of his prince, and the happiness of the people ". He was, says Synesius, who constantly styles him the great Anthemius, in my opinion, and in that of all men, the greatest, the best, the most virtuous, difinterested, and well-meaning minister, that ever governed a state. Procopius writes, that Arcadius, either distrusting his brother Honorius, or apprised that the distracted state of his own affairs would divert him from minding those of the east, begged in his will Isdegerdes, king of Persia, with whom he had entered Whether Islainto a strict alliance, to take upon him the care and tuition of the young prince: the gerdes, king of same writer adds, that Isdegerdes, who was a prince of great generosity, sent embass-appointed fadors to acquaint the senate of Constantinople, that he accepted the charge, and was guardian to resolved to make war upon such as should presume to raise disturbances in the state P. the young Theophanes, who wrote after Procopius, and has borrowed from him the greatest part prince. of his history, adds, that Isdegerdes, not being at leisure to attend the administration in person, sent Antiochus to Constantinople in his room, a person of extraordinary abilities, and of an unblemished character, who discharged the trust reposed in him with the greatest integrity till the year 414. when Pulcheria taking upon her the administration, he was deprived of his authority, and even of his life 4. Zonaras follows Procopius and Theophanes, as does likewise Cedrenus. It is surprising, that such an event, one of the most remarkable in history, should by no historian be taken notice of before Procopius, who wrote a hundred and fifty years after, and is often guilty of no small mistakes, being missed by popular and ill-grounded traditions, among which we may reckon this supposed last will of Arcadius; for Azathias tells us, that it was the common talk, having been handed down by tradition from father to fon; but that he found it vouched by no writer, except Procopius, not even by those who had given a particular account of the death of Arcadius. And truly Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Zosimus, Philostorgius, both Prospers, and Marcellinus, take not the least notice of this memorable transaction. Isidore of Pelusium, and Synesius ", mention an eunuch, by name Antiochus, who passing from the service of a Persian lord, named Narses, to that of Theodosius II. became preceptor to the young prince; which perhaps gave rife to the above-mentioned tradition. This year the Hunns The Hunns and Squiri, or Scyri, a northern nation, broke suddenly into Thrace, under the con- and the Squiri lord, named Narses, to that of Theodosius II. became preceptor to the young prince; which perhaps gave rise to the above-mentioned tradition. This year the Hunns The Hunns and Squiri, or Scyri, a northern nation, broke suddenly into Thrace, under the con- and the Squiri duct of Uldin, of whom we have made mention above; but some of their officers break into abandoning them to join the Romans, they retired with great precipitation; how- the latter are ever, the emperor's troops, coming up with the Squiri before they could reach the almost intirely Danube, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and took the rest prisoners. By this cut off.

overthrow, that nation was almost utterly extirpated w.

The next consuls were, Honorius the eighth time, and Theodosius the third. In Gaul, Constantine, who reigned there, caused himself to be acknowledged consul in the room of Theodosius x. As Honorius, under various pretences, declined delivering up to Alaric the promised hostages, and executing some other articles of the treaty not mentioned by historians, the senate sent Attalus, Cacilianus, and Maximianus or Maximilianus, to represent to him in their name the evils that might thence accrue to the empire, especially to the capital. But their remonstrances were utterly disregarded by the emperor, missed, says Zosimus, by Olympius and Alaric's enemies at court y. However, he raised Attalus to the post of comes largitionum, and Cacilianus

h Socr. l. vii. c. 1, p. 324.
AMMIAN. l. ix. p. 151.
C.8. p. 813.
Sid. cat. ii. p. 291, 292.
CHRYS. p. 780. Socr. Syn. ep. lxxv. p. 220.
Syn. cat. p. 299. & ep. lxxii. p. 220, 221.
Procop. bell. Perf. l. i. c. 2. p. 7.
Theoph. p. 69.
Zonar. p. 43.
Cedren. p. 334.
AGATH. l. iv. p. 137.
Syn. p. 84.
Soz. l. ix. c. 6. p, 807, 809.
GRUTER. p. 2052.
Zos. l. v. p. 817—819.

Ataulphus enters Italy.

Olympius disgraced.

The generals Turpilio and Vigilantius put to death.

Alaric returns to that of prafectus pratorio 2. In the mean time, Alaric, provoked at the emperor's 2 before Rome. backwardness in complying with the articles of the late treaty, left Hetruria, and approaching Rome, blocked it up a second time, his army being reinforced with forty thousand flaves, who had made their escape out of the city a. Honorius sent fix thousand chosen troops to the defence of the city; but they were intercepted by Alarie's parties, and all either cut off, or taken prisoners, except Valens, their commander, Attalus, and about an hundred more, who with much ado got into Rome b. Maximilianus, one of the prisoners, was ransomed by his father with thirty thousand pieces of gold. Zosimus writes, that the fix thousand men fent by Honorius to defend the city, made up five legions; fo that a legion at this time confilted but of twelve hundred men. In the mean time, Ataulphus, whom Alarie had fent for, as we have b observed above, was advancing to join him; and had already passed the Julian Alps, and entered the province of Venetia, when Honorius dispatched against him all the forces quartered in the neighbouring towns, who cut in pieces eleven hundred of his men, with the loss only of fifteen; but notwithstanding this check, Ataulphus pur-fued his march, and joined Alaric d. About this time, Olympius, the prime minister, was disgraced, divested of all his honours, and discharged, the eunuchs of the court blaming him to the emperor as the author of the present calamities. He was succeeded by Jovius, then present of Italy, a person highly commended by Zosimus; which gives us room to believe him to have been a pagan; for he is scarce ever to lavish of his praises on those who professed the christian religion. With Olympius e several other officers were changed. Attalus was made presect of Rome, and Demetrius comes largitionum, or treasurer, in his place. The soldiers, mutinying at Ravenna, demanded the heads of the two generals Turpilio and Vigilantius, and likewise of Terentius and Arsacius, the emperor's two first chamberlains. Hereupon the timorous prince, at the instigation of Jovius, perhaps the author of the tumult, ordered the two generals to be conveyed on board a vessel, in order to be sent into exile; but the foldiers, who were charged to conduct them, put them both to death. Terentius was banished into the east, and Arsacius confined to the city of Milan f. Eusebius was made great chamberlain in the room of Terentius; Valens succeeded Turpilio in the post of general of the horse; and the office of comes domesticorum, held by d Vigilantius, was given to Ellebichus or Allobichus. These were all creatures of Jovius, whose authority was thus thoroughly established F. At the same time, Generides, by birth a barbarian, was appointed general of the troops quartered in Rhatia, Noricum, Dalmatia and Pannonia; which countries he protected with great fidelity against the barbarians, who attempted to invade them. Zosimus writes, that he was a pagan, and that for his fake Honorius revoked the law excluding the pagans from all employments ". The same law was revoked with respect to heretics, especially the Donatists, to whom some churches were restored, which had been formerly taken from them, the emperor following therein the advice of Jovius, of Heraclianus, count of Africa, and of Macrobius, the author of the Saturnalia, as is commonly believed, e at that time proconful of Africa i.

Alaric being returned before Rome, as we have observed above, the senate sent a fecond deputation to the emperor, pressing him to execute the articles of a treaty, which he himself had ratified. Alaric approved of this step, and appointed a body of Goths to escort the deputies, among whom was Innocent, bishop of the city. At the same time Alaric, by the advice of Jovius, with whom he had been intimately acquainted in Epirus, advanced with part of his army to Ariminum or Rimini, that he might be nearer at hand to treat with the emperor, then at Ravenna. Jovius himself met him at Rimini; and after some conferences with him, wrote to court, advifing the emperor to comply with the articles formerly agreed to; or if he thought f them unreasonable, to satisfy Alaric by preferring him to the post of commander in chief of all the Roman forces. To this letter the emperor answered, that he was resolved never to preser Alaric, not any of his people. The emperor's letter being delivered to Jovius, while he was in Alaric's tent, and he with the utmost imprudence reading it out aloud, Alaric was so provoked at the prince's declaration, that he immediately decamped, bending his march towards Rome: but soon after changing his mind, he sent some bishops to Honorius, with very moderate pro-

Honorius refuses to comply with the proposals of Alaric.

b Idem ibid. c Idem ibid. d Idem, Eldem ibide Phot. p. 181. h Zos. ibid.

a pofals; for he offered to enter into a perpetual alliance with Honorius, and to defend the empire against all invaders, provided he would only fend him a small sum to pay his men their arrears, that they might not mutiny when disbanded, and allow them to fettle in Rhatia and Noricum, which provinces paid but an inconsiderable tribute, and nevertheless obliged the emperor, as they were exposed to the incurfions of the neighbouring barbarians, to maintain numerous armies to defend them, which he took upon himself to do, without putting the empire to the least charge. These proposals, however reasonable, were rejected, Jovius having, by a second fault, cut off all means of an accommodation; for, apprehending the emperor might, from his late imprudent conduct, suspect him of privately favouring Alaric, he overb acted the contrary part, inducing the emperor to swear, that he would never make And swears peace, but wage perpetual war with Alaric: this he swore himself by the emperor's never to make head, and obliged all the officers both civil and military to take the same oath k. him. Alaric, tho' informed of these unaccountable proceedings, sent back the bishops to Ravenna, earnestly intreating the emperor, who had not sufficient forces to withstand him, not to fuffer that stately metropolis, which for so many ages had been revered Alaric's modeby all nations as mistress of the world, to become a prey to her enemies. But the ration. emperor continuing obstinate in his former resolution, Alarie pursued his march to Rome; and approaching the city, acquainted the inhabitants with the emperor's invincible obstinacy, inviting them at the same time to consult their own safety by joining him against Honorius. This proposal they rejected at first with indignation; but Alaric having, after a few days siege, taken the castle at the mouth of the Tiber, He besieges in which all the public provisions were lodged, they immediately opened their gates, Rome, which and received him into the city, which he entered attended by a small guard, and acknowledges obliged the citizens to renounce their allegiance to Honorius, and acknowledge, not Attalus for himself, as he might have easily done, but Attalus, then prefect of the city, for emperor. emperor '. Attalus was a native of Ionia, and greatly beloved by Alaric and his Goths, because he had been baptized by Segisarius their bishop m, and consequently professed the doctrine of Arius, tho' he was in his heart a pagan, according to Pbilostorgius n. Attalus, thus created emperor by Alaric, made him in return commander d in chief of all his forces, and Ataulphus his comes domesticorum, distributing the other great employments amongst pagans and Arians. As it was a matter of the utmost importance to secure Africa, whence Rome was supplied with provisions, Alaric advised the new emperor to send thither without delay a considerable body of troops under the conduct of Drumas, who was by nation a Goth, but an officer of great experience and address: but Attalus, contrary to the advice of Alaric, sent one Constantine or Constans, a person quite unacquainted with military affairs, and with him but a small number of troops, being assured by the aruspices, says Sozomen, that Africa would immediately submit o. But Constantine was upon his first landing cut off with The usurper's all his men by Heraclianus, who took care to place guards in all the ports of Africa, troops defeated e that no corn might be thence conveyed to Rome, which by that means was foon by Heraclianus reduced to great streights P. In the mean time, Attalus, without waiting news from Africa, fet out from Rome with the fuccours he received from Alaric, with a defign to beliege the emperor in Ravenna, who, alarmed at his motions, dispatched Jovius, the prime minister, Valens, general of the foot, Potamus, the quæstor, and Julian, his first secretary, to wait his arrival at Rimini, and acquaint him, that the emperor Honorius offers was willing to acknowledge him as his partner in the empire. But Attalus would only to acknowledge grant Honorius his life, and the liberty of retiring to what island he pleased 4. Jovius, Attalus; Who insists upon in a private conference with Attalus, not only advised him to insit upon these terms, bis religning. but fuggested to him, that he ought to maim the emperor so as to prevent his f having iffue; which wicked fuggestion was rejected with horror, if Olympiodorus is to be credited, by Attalus himself. That treacherous minister returned to court; but being fent back to the usurper with new proposals, he continued with him. Honorius, finding himself thus betrayed by his friends, and no-ways in a condition to oppole so many enemies at once, resolved to abandon Ravenna, and retire by sea into the east; but was diverted from that resolution by the seasonable arrival of sour thou-Honorius refand men, sent him by his nephew Theodosius; which encouraged him to continue ceives a seasone at Ravenna, and there wait the issue of the war in Africa. And truly his arms were from Theodo.

* Soz. l. ix. c. 7. p. 808, 809. Zos. p. 822—824. * Philost. l. xii. c. 3. p. 533. Soz. p. 810. Phot. p. 181. Phot. ibid. Vol. VI. Nº 6.

15

ij,

or,

Soz. Zos. ibid.
 Zos. p. 819. Soz. ibid.
 Zos. p. 828.

6 B

attended

attended there with uncommon success; for Attalus having, after the death of Con- a flans, fent thither a body of troops far more numerous than the first, Heraclianus cut them likewise in pieces; and not only continued to keep the ports blocked up, so that no provisions could be conveyed to Rome, but sent a seasonable supply of money to Honorius, which he immediately distributed among the soldiery, and by that means re-established his affairs. In the mean time Alaric reduced all the cities of Liguria and Æmilia, except Bononia, which he was obliged to abandon, after having lain a considerable time before it. He caused Attalus to be every-where proclaimed emperor, and obliged the people to swear allegiance to him '.

Maximus fet up in Spain by Geroncius.

The Britons

And the Armorici.

empire,

Alans and Sucvians enter Spain,

Spanish provinces among shemselves.

WHILE these things passed in Italy, Geroncius, to whom Constans, the son of Constantine, had committed the government of Spain, as we have related above, revolt- b ing, upon some disgust, from Constantine, set up one Maximus for emperor, whom Olympiodorus supposes to have been his son ", while other writers style him his client or creature w. Orofius speaks of him as a person of a mean extraction, and altogether unknown z. It was no sooner known in Gaul, that Geroncius had revolted, than the Vandals, Suevians, Alans, and other barbarians, whom Constantine had suffered to remain in that province, as we have related above, flew to arms, probably at the instigation of the new usurper, and made themselves masters of several cities. The people, finding themselves thus harassed by the barbarians, and expecting no relief either from Honorius or Constantine, resolved to defend themselves. The Britons were fall off from the the first, who, falling off from the empire, established a new form of government c among themselves, after having driven out the barbarians, the Germans, according to Zosimus, but more likely the Scots or Irish, who had invaded their country y. Thus they continued a free people till the year 421. or 422. when, overpowered by their warlike neighbours the Scots, they were forced to implore the protection of the emperor, and submit anew to the laws of the empire, as we shall relate hereafter. All the Armorici, says Zosimus, that is, in the language of the Gauls, the maritime people, followed the example of the Britons, and shaking off the Roman yoke, gave rise to a new state and government z, which, notwithstanding all their efforts, proved but short-lived. The barbarians, meeting with greater opposition than they expecteed from the inhabitants of Gaul, who had taken arms in their own defence, and acquainted d with the distracted state of Spain, which was represented to them as a wealthy and fruitful country, resolved to try whether they could settle there. With this design, the Vandals, the Alans and Suevians, bent their march towards the Pyrenees, which they passed without opposition, the guards, who had been placed there by Geroncius to defend the narrow passes, either retiring at the approach of such multitudes, or joining them 2. Thus the barbarians first entered Spain in 409. on a Tuesday, says Idatius, the twenty-eighth of September, or the thirteenth of October b; but in the year 409, the thirteenth of October fell on a Wednesday. The passes of the Pyrenees being once opened, the barbarians, who had over-run Gaul, poured in swarms into Spain, and there made themselves masters of several cities and strong-holds, deseated the troops which Constantine had sent, under the conduct of his son Constant, to suppress the rebellion of Geroncius, and obliged Constans himself to abandon the country, and retire to his father at Arles. As for Geroncius, they entered into a kind of alliance with him against their common enemy Constantine d. The barbarians, having And over run no enemy to oppose them, after the retreat of Constant, over-ran the whole country, the whole count committing every-where unheard-of cruelties; which the reader will find described at length by Idatius, who, in this very century, was bishop of a city in Spain. Olympiodorus writes, that the Romans, who had taken refuge in fome strong-holds, were reduced to the dreadful necessity of feeding upon one another; and adds, that a mother, who had four children, killed and devoured them all; for which unnatural cruelty she was stoned to death by the populace f. The barbarians continued their f ravages, putting all to fire and fword, till the year 411. when being absolute masters of the country, they applied themselves to the tilling of the ground, and And divide the other works of agriculture, after having divided among themselves by lot the Spanish provinces. In that division Galicia fell to the Vandals and Suevians, the for-

* Zos. p. 819. Oros. l. vii. c. 42. p. 224.

† Idem ibid.

В Риот. с. 80. p. 184.

« Soz. p. 814. Greg. Tur. p. 63. Oros. p. 224. Prosp. 2nn. 412.

* Oros. ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Zos. l. vi. p. 817.

* Oros. l. vii. c. 40. p. 223. Soz. l. ix. c. 12. p. 814.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Oros. l. vii. c. 40. p. 223. Soz. l. ix. c. 12. p. 814.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Oros. l. vii. c. 40. p. 184.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Oros. l. vii. c. 40. p. 184.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Oros. l. vii. c. 40. p. 184.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Oros. l. vii. c. 40. p. 184.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Oros. l. vii. c. 40. p. 184.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Oros. l. vii. p. 817.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Oros. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* f PHOT. c. 80. p. 189.

!3

ņ

þ

j.

g

٦,

11

8

iere

li 1

h T

nd.

i

0

. 4

a mer having Gonderic for their king, and the latter Ermeric; Lusitania, and the province of Carthagena, to the Alans; Batica to the Silingi, who were likewise Vandals, and are supposed to have given to their lot the name of Wandalusia, which was afterwards changed into that of Andalusia. Such of the natives as had the good luck to escape the general slaughter, submitted to the barbarians, who, touching the holy book of the gospels, swore, that they would treat them for the future as their friends and allies; which oath they observed so religiously, that many Romans chose to live in poverty, says Orosius, under the barbarians, rather than to return into the dominions of the empire b. The inhabitants of Galicia however maintained their liberty, and formed a new state in a corner of that province, where they were often b attacked, but without fuccess, by Emeric or Ermeric, king of the Suevians . Nothing happened this year in the east worthy of notice, except a tumult at Constantinople, Atumult at Constantinople, Constantiwhere the people riling on account of the scarcity of bread, burnt the house of Mo-nople. naxes, prefect of the city; but the senators, and other wealthy citizens, having, by voluntary contributions, raised a large sum for the relief of the poor, and the bakers being publicly whipt through the city, as was frequently practifed when bread grew dear, the tumult was quelled k.

THE following year 410. when Varanes alone was conful, is remarkable for the taking of Rome by Alaric. Varanes began his consulship at Constantinople; but the western empire, especially the city of Rome, was involved in such troubles, that Hoe norius was not at leisure to think of a consul. Attalus however raised Tertullus, a pagan, to that dignity; but he was acknowledged only by the partizans of the usurper; whence Varanes alone is named consul in the fasti, and in the laws, some of which are dated thus; the year after the eighth confulship of Honorius, and the third of Theodosius!. As Heraclian continued to keep the ports of Africa blocked up, and the lands in Italy had not been tilled for several years, by reason of the wars, the Roman people were reduced to feed upon chesnuts; nay, human sless was publicly Agreat famine fold, and several mothers were said to have devoured their children w. This obliged both Alaric and Attalus to hasten to Rome, in order to advise with the senate about the proper means of supplying the city. Most part of the senators were for sending d into Africa a body of Golhs, Alaric engaging, that Drumas, one of his officers, would reduce it with five hundred only; but Attalus openly declared, that he would not by any means employ Goths in that war; which so piqued Alaric, who had already begun to look upon Assalus as one no-ways qualified for the high station to which he had raised him, that he resolved to depose him, lest, by his obstinacy and imprudence, he should quite ruin his affairs. He was consirmed in this resolution by Jovius, who persuaded him, that Attalus, scorning to depend upon him, and to hold the empire upon precarious terms, was determined to destroy him. This conduct of Jovius has induced some writers to believe, that he maintained a private correspondence with Honorius; nay, that he abandoned him with no other view but to betray e Attalus ". Be that as it will, Alaric, finding the new emperor unequal to so great a charge, and provoked at his late declaration and misconduct with respect to the affairs of Africa, fent deputies once more to Honorius, with very reasonable terms; which the emperor feeming inclined to comply with, Alaric publicly stripped the mock prince Alaric deposes of all the badges of fovereignty, and fent them to Honorius. He would not however Attalus, deliver up either Attalus, or his son Ampelius; but insisted upon their being pardoned, fince their crime was owing more to him than to them o. Attalus being thus deposed, Alaric approached Ravenna, and stopped at a place called the Alps, about nine miles from that city, in order to put the last hand to the treaty of accommodation between And attempts him and the emperor P. But this peaceable face of affairs was foon changed by an an accomm f unlucky and unforeseen accident: Sarus the Goth, of whom we have made frequent dation with mention commanded a body of three hundred men in Picenum, without declaring Honorius. mention, commanded a body of three hundred men in Picenum, without declaring either for Honorius or Alaric. However, Ataulphus, who bore him an irreconcilable hatred, resolved to destroy him, and with this view marched at the head of a strong party against him; which obliged him to declare for Honorius, and retire to Ravenna.

A great famino

Olympiodorus writes, that Alaric was so provoked at the kind reception Sarus met with

<sup>**</sup> OROS. C. 41. p. 223. IDAT. ISID. chron.

** OROS. l. iii. c. 23. p. 173. & l. vii. c. 41. p. 223. I Hem ibid.

** Cod. Theod. tit. 5. p. 84. Lib. orat. i. p. 64. Chron. Alex. p. 716.

** Cod. Theod. chron. 156.

** Socr. l. ix. p. 810. Zos. l. vi. p. 830.

** Philost. p. 181.

** Phot. Chron. Alex. p. 716.

** Phot. Phot. Chron. Soc. p. 810. Philost. l. xii. c. 3. p. 533.

** Soc. p. 809. Zos. P. 809. Zos. p. 80

Which is unbappily broke

And Rome anew besieged, taken, and plundered.

Alaric orders churches.

from the emperor, that he would hearken to no terms q. On the other hand, Sozomen a tells us, that Sarus, apprehending a peace would be prejudicial to him, fell unexpectedly upon the Goths, and put some of them to the sword. However that be, it is certain, that Alaric departed in a great rage from the neighbourhood of Ravenna. and returned to his army, encamped near Rome, as foon as Sarus had joined the emperors, restoring the purple, and other badges of majesty, to Attalus; but in a few days degrading him anew, as if he defigned to traduce and expose to ridicule the imperial dignity. Socrates writes, that having shewed him to the foldiery with all the enligns of fovereignty, he exposed him the very next day to public view in the dress of a flave ". To this was the majesty of the Roman empire now reduced. Alaric no fooner arrived before Rome, than he blocked it up on all fides, and by that means, b as provisions were already very scarce, reduced it in a few days to the utmost extremity. Some authors, and among the rest St. Jerom w, write, that it held out a long time; while others fay, Alaric reduced it with such expedition, that Honorius, when told by one of his courtiers, that Rome was lost, understood him of a favourite cock bearing that name, not being yet informed, that the city of Rome was belieged x. There is likewise a disagreement among authors as to the manner in which it was taken. Procopius writes, that Proba, an illustrious Roman matron, pitying the unhappy condition of the people, reduced by the famine that had long raged in the city to the fatal necessity of devouring one another, opened the gates in the nighttime to the enemy v. Sozomen fays it was taken by treachery, without explaining c himself farther 2; but Orosius uses the word irrumpit 2, which seems to import, that the enemy broke in by force, or took the city by affault. Be that as it will, that proud and haughty city, styled the metropolis of the universe, after having triumphed over fo many nations, and extended her dominions from one end of the known world to the other, was, on the twenty-fourth of August of the present year 410. taken by a barbarian, who had not a foot of ground which he could properly call his own. As the had, for the space of one thousand one hundred and sixty-three years, pillaged the rest of the world, and enriched herself with the spoils of the plundered nations, she underwent in the end the same fate, and suffered in her turn the same calamities, which she had brought upon others. Alaric, when upon the point of d breaking into the city, addressing his foldiers, told them, That all the wealth lodged in it was theirs, and therefore he gave them full liberty to feize it; but at the same time he strictly injoined them to shed the blood of none but such as they should find his mento spare in arms, and above all to spare those who should take fanctuary in the holy places, the lives of the citizens, especially in the churches of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, which he named because ally of fuch as they were most spacious, and consequently capable of affording an asylum to great numshould fly to the bers of people. Having given these orders, he abandoned the city to his Goths, who treated it no better, according to St. Jerom, than the Greeks are faid to have treated antient Troy b; for after having plundered it for the space of three, or, as others will have it, of fix days, they fet fire to it in several places; so that the stately palace of c Salust, and many other magnificent buildings, were reduced to ashes; nay Procopius writes, that there was not in the whole city one house lest intire; and both St. Jerom d and Philostorgius e, that the great metropolis of the empire was reduced to a The miserable heap of ashes and ruins. Tho many of the Goths, pursuant to the orders of their general, refrained from shedding the blood of such as made no resistance, yet others, which the city more cruel and blood-thirsty, massacred all they met; so that the streets in some quarters of the city were feen covered with heaps of dead bodies, and swimming in blood f. However, not the least injury was offered to those who had fled to the churches; nay, the Goths themselves conveyed thither, as to places of safety, such as they were defirous should be spared s. Many of the statues of the gods that had f been left intire by the emperors, as excellent pieces of art, were on this occasion destroyed, either by the Goths, who, tho' mostly Arians, were zealous christians, or by a dreadful storm of thunder and lightning, which fell at the same time upon the city, as if it had been fent on purpose to complete, with them, the destruction of idolatry, and abolish the small remains of pagan superstition b. The learned bishop

* Idem ibid. Philost. p. 534. t Oros. I. vii. c. 42. w Hier. ep. 16. p. 121. * Prosp. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 2. p. 811. Oros. p. 222. b Hier. ep. 16. p. 121. f Idem ibid. f Hier. & p. 180. 7 Idem 1010.

e Procop. p. 179.

HIER. ep. 12. p. 100.

Procop. p. 179.

Oros. l. vii. c. 39, p. 222. & l. ii. c. 19. p. 164. f Idem ibis.

a of Meaux wrote a famous treatife, showing, that the taking of Rome by Alaric may be looked upon as one of the chief mysteries foretold by St. John in his revelations. The pagans ascribed the calamities which Rome suffered on this occasion, to its having banished the gods, by whom it had been often protected against far more powerful enemies. These calumnies St. Austin fully consuted in his 81st, 105th and 106th fermons, in another intituled of the destruction of the city of Rome k, and in his great work de civitate Dei, wherein he shews, that Rome had fusfered far greater calamities before it embraced the true faith, and that it was preserved by the christian religion from utter destruction 1.

<sup>t</sup> Explication de l'apocalypse.

k Aug. serm. p. 546. & Rom. excid. p. 330.

1 Idem de civ. Dei.

C H A P. XXX.

The history of Rome, from the taking of the city by the Goths, to the death of Theodosius II.

ALARK, having staid, according to some, six, according to others, only three days in Rome, retired from thence into Campania, carrying with him immense Alaric retires, wealth, and a great number of captives, among whom was Placidia, the fifter of miththe Honorius, whom he treated with all the respect due to her rank and sex. After he Rome, into had ravaged and laid waste Campania, Lucania, Samnium, Apulia, Calabria, and the Campania. country of the Brutii, he approached the streights of Sicily, with a design to pass over into that island, and thence into Africa, which he intended to reduce; but the fleet he had prepared for that purpose being shipwrecked in the streights, he continued in the neighbourhood of Rhegium, deliberating what further measures he was to take; but before he came to any resolution, he was suddenly seized with a fit of sickness, c which carried him off in a few days 1. The Goths were deeply concerned for the He dies in the death of their king, (for they had given him that title, as we have observed above) neighbourhood and fearing the Romans should offer some indignity to his bones, they turned the of Rhegium. course of the Busento near Cosenza in the Farther Calabria; and having buried him, with many rich spoils brought from Rome, in the bed of the river, they restored the waters to their natural current, and killed all the flaves they had employed in the work ". After this, they chose Ataulphus king in his room. He was brother- Ataulphus in-law to the deceased prince, who had married his fifter. Fornandes writes, that chosen king in he returned to Rome, and pillaged that city a second time n. But of this second destruction of Rome, as he styles it, no mention is made by any of the writers who d flourished at that time. While the barbarians were thus ravaging Italy on one fide, Constantine, leaving Gaul, where he reigned, entered it on the other, giving out, Constantine that he was marching to the affistance of Honorius, tho' his real design was to strip invades Italy; him of the few provinces that were left him. With this view he was already advanced as far as Verona; but while he was preparing to pass the Po, in order to march to Ravenna, and there confer, as he pretended, with the emperor about the most proper measures in the present juncture, he received news of the unhappy, but deserved end of Alabicus or Allohicus, one of Honorius's generals, whom that prince had caused to be put to death, upon a well-grounded suspicion of his privately corresponding with the usurper . This Constantine no sooner understood, than he repassed in great But repasses the e haste the Alps, and retired to Arles, where he found his son Constants driven out of Alps in great Spain by the above-mentioned barbarians. Geroncius, who had joined them against raires to Arles. him, pursued him into Gaul; which obliged Constantine to send Edobicus, one of his generals, to procure supplies among the Franks and Germans, and to commit the ** Soz. l. ix. C. 10. p. 8. JOHN. rer. Goth. c. 30. p. 673. ** Joi C. 12. p. 814. Phot. c. 80. p. 181. Zos. l. v. p. 821. n Idem, p. 654.

1 Oros. l. ii. c. 19. p. 164. Socr. l. vii. c. 10. p. 347. PHILOST. l. xii. c. 3. 534. Aug. civ. Dei, l. i. 19. p. 8. Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 30. p. 653.

** Jorn. ibid. ** Idem, p. 654.

Vol. VI. Nº 6.

1

į

X.

n

tie

j(i

أخفا

į,

-1

(ic n Gi

009

į,

guard

Conflans takon, and put to death by Geroncius. who besieges guard of Vienne, and the other cities on the Rhone, to his fon Constans. But Geroncius, arriving in the mean time before Vienne, took the place; and having put Constans, whom he found in it, to death, advanced without opposition to Arles, and there closely besieged Constantine himself P. While the western empire was thus involved in endless calamities, the provinces all over the east enjoyed a profound peace Constantine in under the wise administration of Authenius; so that nothing remarkable happened there, except the difference of one Andronicus, governor of the Pentopolis, who, by his tyrannical extortions, deserved to be first excommunicated by Synesius bishop of Ptolemais, the metropolis of that province, and afterwards removed by Anthemius from his government 9.

Constanting fent against Constantine.

fes the fiege of into Spain,

Where he lags violent hands on himself.

Maximus taken; but his ared.

The Germans coming to the assistance of Constantine defeated.

THE following year 411. Theodosius alone was the fourth time conful, Honorius b being diverted, by the troubles in the welt, from naming any one to that dignity r. This year Honorius sent Constantius, an officer of great experience and address, and inviolably attached to the interest of his prince, into Gaul, with what troops he could spare, to make war upon Constantine, whom, after his entering Italy, the emperor no longer looked upon as his partner in the empire, but as a public enemy. Constantius was not by birth a barbarian, but a Roman; that is, he was born a subject of the empire, according to Olympiodorus, in the city of Panaisa in Illyricum'. Valesius supposes, upon what authority we know not, that he was a native of Naissus in His character. Dacia, the birth-place of Constantine the Great. He was a man of extraordinary parts, well-shaped in his person, agreeable in conversation, frank, generous, an c enemy to all diffimulation and reftraint, difinterested, brave, and equally capable of commanding an army, and governing the state ". He was no sooner named for this expedition, than he fet out at the head of a confiderable army for Gaul, where he was joined upon his first arrival by most of the troops of Geroncius, then bussed in reducing the city of Arles, in which was Constantine himself, as we have related above. Geron-Geroncius rai- cius, finding himself abandoned by his men, raised the siege in great haste, and sled Jes the siege of into Spain, where the few soldiers who attended him, provoked at his unseasonable feverity, attacked him in the house where he was lodged; which he defended, tho affifted only by one friend, and a few flaves, with great resolution and intrepidity, killing three hundred of the aggreffors. In the end the flaves, confulting their own d fafety, made their escape, which Geroncius too might have easily done, had he been able to prevail upon himself to forsake his wife, whom he tenderly loved. When he found himself overpowered, he resolved to lay violent hands on himself. His wife, by name Nonnichia, apprifed of this resolution, earnestly intreated him to put her to death, rather than fuffer her to fall into the hands of the incenfed foldiery. Moved with her tears, he first dispatched her, then his friend, and lastly himself w. It is furprifing, that Sozomen should commend this in Nonnichia, as an action worthy of the christian religion, which she professed x. As for Maximus, whom Geroncius had set up for emperor, as we have related above, he was secured by his own men, and brought to Constantius, who stripped him of the ensigns of majesty, but spared his e life, looking upon him as a person of himself inostensive, and incapable of giving the least umbragey. He retired into Spain amongst the barbarians, and was still alive when Orofius wrote his history, that is, in 417'. To return to Constantius: he pursued the siege of Arles, which Geroncius had begun. Constantine, who was in the place with his second fon, by name Julian, held out for the space of four months, in expectation of the succours which Edobicus was sent to procure amongst the Franks, and other German nations. Edobicus arrived at length, at the head of an army far more numerous than that of Constantius; which so terrified the emperor's generals, that they were for abandoning the siege, and retiring into Italy. But their retreat being cut off by the enemy, they were forced to put the whole to the iffue of a battle. f Ulphilas therefore, who commanded under Constantius, passing the Khone with a strong detachment of foot, concealed himself among the woods, till the enemy passed, and were ready to engage Constantius; when falling unexpectedly upon their rear. while Constantius charged them in front, they were immediately put to the rout. Edobicus shed to the house of a Gaulish lord, by name Ecdices, who, notwithstanding the many favours he had received at his hands, struck off his head, and carried it to Constan-

P Soz. ibid. Phot. p. 184. Oros. p. 224. 9 Synes. 2. 74. p. 184. Oros. p. 224. 1 Synes. 2. 74. p. 187. C. 80. p. 103. 1 Val. rer. Franc. l. iii. p. 107. 9 Synes. 7. 74. p. 220.

Plant. Pros. C. 43.

Phot. p. 185. Oros. c. 43.

Phot. p. 186. X Soz. ibid. &c. PHOT. C. 80. p. 193. p. 124. Soz. l. ix. c. 16. p. 817. 7 Oros. ibid. Plem ibid. w Oros. p. 224. Soz. p. 815. Phor. ibid.

a tius, who ordered the traitor to depart the camp that instant, lest his presence should draw down from Heaven some missortune upon the whole army . Constantius returned without loss of time before Arles, which still held out with great obstinacy, till news being brought to the Roman camp, that Jovinus, having usurped the imperial title in Farther Gaul, was advancing full march to Arles, at the head of a formidable army, confisting of Alemans, Franks, Burgundians, and Alans, with a design to fall on the emperor's army. Upon this intelligence, Constantius thought it adviseable to comply with the terms which had been proposed before by the besieged, but rejected by him, viz. to grant a general indemnity, and to promise upon oath, that the lives of Constantine and Julian should be spared. Hereupon the gates were opened, dered to Conband the victorious army received into the town. Constantine had some time before stantius. divested himself of the purple, and taking fanctuary in a church, caused himself to be ordained prieft, thinking that character would screen him from the emperor's just Constantius nevertheless caused both him and his son to be secured, and fent into Italy, where they were, by the emperor's orders, beheaded about thirty Constantine miles from Ravennab. Honorius would not grant them their lives, because they and his son behad put to death his two cousins Didymius and Verinianus; but as they had been pro-headed. mifed indemnity by his lieutenant, the christian as well as the pagan writers look upon this action as a breach of faith unworthy of a prince. About the same time Jovinus causes that Constantine divested himself of the purple, Jovinus, or, as he is styled by Sozo-bimself to be men and Philostorgius, Jovianus, assumed it at Mundiacum, says Olympicdorus; which emperor. fome take to be Mentz. He was descended from one of the most illustrious families in Gaul, and is faid to have caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at the instigation of Goar king of the Alans, and Guntarius, or Gondicarius, prince of the Burgundians d. It appears from his medals, that he made himself master of Treves e; but his reign was short-lived, as we shall see anon. In the east, the tranquillity which the people had long enjoyed there, was disturbed this year by the Ausurians, a Moorish nation, who, breaking into the Pentapolis, laid waste that province; but were soon driven out by Anysius, who had succeeded Andronicus in that government. The Saracens likewise committed great disorders on the frontiers of Egypt, Palestine, Phanicia, and & Syria; but retired of their own accord.

THE following year 412. when Honorius was conful the ninth time, and Theodosius the fifth, the Goths at length left Italy, either in virtue of a treaty between Honorius The Goths and Ataulphus their new king, as Jornandes seems to suppose f, or because they had leave Italy, and break into already quite drained that country of its wealth, which, from the sequel of the history, Gaul. appears more probable. However that be, quitting Italy, they broke into Gaul, ravaging the countries through which they passed. Upon their arrival in that province, Attalus, whom Ataulphus had brought thither with him, advised the Goth to join Jovinus against Honorius, and divide Gaul between them. Ataulphus and Jovinus met upon that proposal; but all we know of their interview is, that Jovinus was e not at all pleased to see Ataulphus and his Goths in Gaul E. Sarus, whom we have often mentioned, having about this time revolted from Honorius, because he refused to punish the authors of the murder of one of his officers, by name Bellerid, was going into Gaul, to offer his fervice to Jovinus; which coming to the ears of Ataulphus, his implacable enemy, he went to meet him, at the head of a thousand men. Sarus, tho' attended only by twenty persons, defended himself with such resolution, that it was with the utmost difficulty he was taken alive, after having killed with his Sarus taken own hand great numbers of the enemy. Ataulphus caused him soon after to be put prisoner by to death; which, as he was a brave and experienced officer, created a misunder-put to death. standing between Jovinus and Ataulphus. Jovinus soon after took his brother Sebaf stian for his partner in the empire, contrary to the opinion of Ataulphus, who was so provoked at his promotion, that he dispatched privately deputies to Honorius, offering to restore to him his sister Placidia, and to send him the heads of the two usurpers. provided he would supply his men with a certain quantity of corn. The emperor having readily complied with his demand, Ataulphus foon found an opportunity of dispatching Sebastian; but Jovinus, upon the news of his death, fled to Valence, where he was closely besieged, and in the end forced to submit to Ataulphus, who delivered him up to Dardanus prefect of Gaul, by whose orders he was put to death at Nar- 2 Idatius ascribes the defeat of the two usurpers to the generals of Honorius, who had perhaps joined Ataulphus. Dardanus, at this time prefect of Gaul, is highly commended by St. Jerom and St. Austin, who wrote several letters to him; but Apollinaris Sidonius, who is likewise honoured with the title of saint, paints him as a person of a most infamous character, in whom centred all the vices of the three usurpers Constantine, Jovinus and Geroncius (O). This year Theodosius, or rather Anthemius, caused the walls of all the frontier towns of Illyricum to be repaired k.

* Idem, p. 223. Phor. c. 80. p. 184. Greo. Tur. hist. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 65. Soz. l. ix. c. 14. p. 815. b Phor. Soz. Greg. Tur. ibid. c. Phor. c. 80. d. Soz. p. 816, 817. Oros. p. 224. Phor. p. 184. c. Synes. catast. p. 299. & cp. 78. p. 223; 224. f. John. res. Goth. c. 31. p. 655. c. Oros. p. 224. Риот. ibid.

Jovinus is taken, and put to death.

Heraclianus revolts in Africa.

returns to Atrica.

covered, and cut in pieces by the joldiery.

The Burgundians allowed to settle in Gaul.

THE next confuls were Lucius and Heraclianus: but the name of the latter was erased out of the fasti; for he revolted this very year from Honorius, and causing himself to be proclaimed emperor in Africa, which he had with so much bravery b defended against Attalus, he equipped a fleet there of seven hundred sail, according to fome, of three thousand seven hundred, according to others, if there is no militake in the numbers . Orofius writes, that his fleet was more numerous than those of Xerxes, of Alexander, or any other monarch mentioned in history m. With this Lands in Italy; formidable armada he failed from Africa, and landing fafe in Italy, marched strait but, seized with to Rome, which his approach threw into the utmost consternation; but count Marinus marching out to meet him, at the head of all the troops he could affemble, the usurper, seized with a sudden panic, betook himself to slight, and hastening on board one of his vessels, returned alone to Carthage. Upon his slight, his men immediately submitted, and were received into savour by Honorius, who soon after published c a law, dated the fifth of July, and addressed to the people of Africa, wherein he declared Heraclianus a public enemy, and impowered every one to apprehend him, and put him to death, where-ever they found him ". He was, foon after his return Where he is dif- to Carthage, discovered by some soldiers in an antient temple, and by them immediately cut in pieces o. His estate was confiscated, and bestowed upon Constantius P. The same year the Franks made an irruption into Gaul, set fire to the city of Treves, and laid waste the neighbouring country 9. The Burgundians, who had entered Gaul in 407. with the Vaudals and Alans, made themselves this year masters of the country now known by the name of Alface, or Alfatia. Constantius, who had reduced the rest of Gaul after the death of the two usurpers Constantine and Jovinus, marched d against them; but they demanding leave to settle in Gaul, as friends and allies of the Roman people, the Roman general, not caring to reduce them to despair, persuaded the emperor to grant them part of the country which they had conquered . Such was the rife of the kingdom of the Burgundians in Gaul, under the conduct of Goudicarius or Guntiarius. Socrates commends them as a peaceable people, for the most part artificers, and willing to earn a livelihood with labour s. Orajus writes, that is 417. they had all embraced already the christian religion, and the catholic faith, and treated the Gauls, who lived under them, not as their vassak, but their friends: About the year 440, the herefy of Arius began to prevail among them ", which was probably owing to their intercourse with the Goths. Ataulphus had promised, as we have observed above, to restore to Honorius his sister Placidia, taken prisoner in Rome, but treated by him, as she had been by Alaric, with the utmost respect. Constantius, hoping the emperor would give her to him in marriage, was continually prefing Ataulphus to comply with this article; but as Honorius had not yet fent to the Goths the corn he had promised them, Ataulphus, who desired to marry Placidia himself, refused to part with her, till the emperor had executed his promise, which he was

```
h Oros. ibid. Phor. p. 184. Soz. l.ix. c. 15. p. 817.

I Sid. l. v. ep. 9. p. 132.

MARC. chron.

P Phor. c. 80. p. 185.

Bucu de Belg. p. 4
                                                                                                 Side, l. v. ep. 9. p. 139. * Cod. Luxur. n Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit.
l. xv. tit. 1. leg. 29. p. 322.
40. leg. 21. p. 320. l. ii. c. 9. p. 63.
                                          F Oros. c. 43. p. 224. VAL. p. 136. Buch. de Belg. p. 440. Convr. annal.

Socr. l. vii. c. 30. p. 371.

Oros. p. 219.

Socr. p. 272.
eccles. Fran. ann. 407.
```

(O) From an antient inscription discovered near Sisteron in Provence, it appears, that Dardanus, or Claudius Postumius Dardanus, as he is styled there, had been governor of Vienne, and its territory, prefect of Gand, quartor, and in the end raised to the rank of patrician; that his wife's name was Nevia Galla; and that his brother, Claudius Lepidus, who is distinguished in the inscription with the title of count, had been governor of Germania Prima, and treasurer. This inscription was made in honour of Dardames, and his wife Galla, for having built a castle on a steep rock which stood on their estate, that the country-people, in the fudden irruptions of the barbarians, might have a fafe place to retire to with their families and effects. This caftle was then called Theopolis; but is known at present by the name of Rochetaillée.

Į,

K!

4

ä

ظد

1

13

.

Ţ,

51 وتلك

az d

III I . 55

被

a not at that time in a condition to do: however, the Romans promised to send the corn as foon as Placidia was reftored; and Ataulphus to reftore Placidia as foon as the corn was fent'. After matters had continued for some time in this situation, Ataulphus, at last, thinking himself deluded by the Romans, began hostilities anew; and having reduced the cities of Narbone and Toulouse, advanced as far as Marseilles; Ataulphus but met there with such vigorous resistance from count Bonifacius, that he was forced makes himself to abandon the enterprize and retire, after having lost great numbers of his men, major of home and and been himself wounded. From Marseilles he bent his march to Bourdeaux, where Toulouie. he was received as a friend ". In the east, one Lucius, a pagan, who commanded the troops attending the court, provoked at the zeal of young Theodofius in extirb pating idolatry, refolved to fave it from utter ruin by affassinating his prince. With this design he went to the palace, and was thrice upon the point of drawing his Lucius arfword; but was deterred from executing his wicked purpose by a woman of an extra-tempts upon ordinary stature, and a threatening aspect, who, as often as he put his hand to his the life of Theodorius.

Thus Damascus, a pagan writer, who flourished about the latter end of the present century. Photius, who copied it from him, calls it a most remarkable event, and not to be questioned, fince related by a pagan writer w: but it is not, however remarkable, taken notice of by any other historian. This year the city of Constantinople was surrounded with Constantithe walls, which Socrates styles the great walls x. Those which had been built by nople surc Constantine the Great were pulled down, and this new work, twenty miles in circuit, new walls. completed in two months v. But this we can hardly believe upon the authority of Nicepborus, an historian not much to be relied on. It was called the new wall, and the wall of Theodosius 2. The emperor published this year several laws against the Re-baptizers, the Eunomians, the Sabbatians, and the Protopaschites, that is, against

THE next confuls were Constantius and Constans, both generals, the former in the west, and the latter in the east. This year the negotiations between Honorius and d Ataulphus, interrupted by the taking of Narbonne and Toulouse, were resumed. But the more the Goth was pressed by Constantius to send back Placidia, the higher he raised his demands, that the emperor refusing to comply with them, he might have a more plausible excuse for detaining her. In the end, by means of one Candidianus, he prevailed upon her to marry him, and the nuptials were celebrated at Narbonne, Ataulphus in the month of January of this year 414. With the utmost pomp and solemnity. marries Placi-Placidia appeared on that occasion sitting on a bed of state, and Ataulphus in the dia. Roman dress. He yielded to the royal bride the most honourable place, and prefented her with fifty basons filled with pieces of gold, and fifty with jewels and precious stones of an inestimable value, part of the spoils brought from Rome. Attalus e affisted at the ceremony, and sung the epitbalamium or nuptial song; a degrading function for one who had been vested with the imperial dignity. This marriage was generally looked upon as an accomplishment of Daniel's prophecy, that the king of the north should marry the daughter of the king of the south b (P). Honorius did not, it feems, consent to this marriage; for soon after Ataulphus obliged Attalus He obliges Atto refume the purple, and caused him to be acknowledged emperor by his Goths, talus to resume However, he wished for nothing so much as to conclude a lasting peace with Hono- the purple. rius, and seems to have set up Attalus anew, with no other design but to intimidate those, who, in the celebration of Easter, differed from the church as to the day, and therefore styled themselves Protopaschites, as if they followed the primitive practice the emperor, and oblige him to grant to him and his Goths more favourable terms.

00

OLYMP. ibid.

(P) At St. Gille in Languedoc was found an inscription made by the neighbouring people in honour of Ataulphus and Placidia, their princes and fovereigns, as they are styled, for having chosen Heraclea, that is, according to some, the present St. Gille, for the place of their residence (1). In this inscription, which both Spon and du Cange look upon as genuine, Ataulphus is styled the most powerful king of kings, and the most just conqueror of conquerors: he is likewise commended for having driven out the Vandals, probably some of that nation, who had remained in Gaul. Placidia is styled Casarea, as if the had enjoyed the rank and honours peculiar to the Cafars.

(1) Spon. p. 157.

Vol. VI. Nº 6. 6 D

Orosius

Orofius writes, that at first he had nothing less in view than the utter ruin of the a Roman empire, and the establishing the empire of the Goths in its room; of giving the name of Gotbia to that country, which was then called Romania; and founding fuch a monarchy among his countrymen as Augustus Casar, had introduced among the Romans: but being by long experience convinced, that the Goths were incapable of being governed by laws, he began to think, that the only means of acquiring a great name was to restore, instead of destroying, the Roman empire; and with this view he courted the friendship of Honorius, especially after he had by Placidia a son, to whom he gave the name of Theodosius. But Constantius, and his party at court, defeated all the measures taken by Ataulphus and Placidia to bring about an accommodation: they would not fuffer the emperor to hearken to any overtures, how- b ever reasonable; so that the war being renewed, Ataulphus was in the end obliged to quit Gaul, and retire into Spaine. Valesius is of opinion, that he withdrew in virtue of a treaty between him and Constantius ; but the expression of Orosius, that be was forced to quit Gaul, seems to import, that he was driven out by force s. Honorius published a law this year, dated the twenty-third of March, forbidding any one to molest such as should take sanctuary in churches, on pain of being prosecuted and punished as guilty of high treason b. The law dated the twentieth of May allows every one full liberty to kill fuch lions as they should find on their grounds, but not to hunt them, in order to take them alive, and fell them. These lions were kept for the public shews; but the interest of our people, says the emperor in that law, c must be preferred to our diversion.

Ataulphus obliged to quit Gaul, and resire into Spain.

Pulcheria is declared Augusta, and takes upon her

While these things passed in the west, Pulcheria, sister to the emperor Theodofius, being declared Augusta in the east, on account of her extraordinary wisdom and piety, took upon her the administration, Anthemius thinking her better qualified the administra- for it than himself, though she had just then entered only the sixteenth year of her tion in the east. age, and was but two years older than the emperor. And truly, as she was endowed with most extraordinary parts, and eminent for piety, her administration proved equally advantageous to the state and the church. Theodosius II. excelled perhaps in piety and religion even his grandfather Theodosius the Great, which all authors agree to have been in great part owing to the uncommon care Pulcheria took in d inspiring him with those religious maxims, by which she ruled her own actions k. In the very beginning of her administration, she persuaded the young prince to dismiss the eunuch Antiochus, of whom hereaster, and to remit whatever was due to the exchequer from the year 368. to 407 !.

Ataulphus murdered in Spain.

THE following year, when Honorius was conful the tenth time, and Theodofins the third, Theodosius the son of Ataulphus and Placidia, died in Spain, whither his father had retired with his Goths; and was buried in a filver coffin near Barcelona, in a place of prayer, says Olympiodorus m, that is, in a church. Ataulphus himself did not long survive him; for he was killed this very year at Barcelona, in the month of August or September, fince the news of his death was brought to Constantinople on a Friday the twenty-fourth of the latter month. He was stabbed in his stable by one of his own countrymen and domestics, named Dobbius, whose former master, a leading man among the Goths, Ataulphus had caused to be murdered several years before °. Fornandes supposes him to have waged a long war with the Vandals in Spain, and to have been killed three years after he had reduced that country by one Vernulphus, whose former master Ataulphus had murdered P. But in what relates to Ataulphus, we have all along followed Olympiodorus, a contemporary historian, who, generally speaking, agrees with the other writers of those times. Photius has transmitted to us an abstract of his work. We are surprised, that Giannone, in his history of the kingdom of Naples, should to his authority prefer that of Jornandes, f a writer of a much later date, who seldom agrees with other historians, and often disagrees with himself. Ataulphus, in dying, charged his brother, not named by our historian, to send back Placidia to the Romans, and to live in friendship with Be is succeeded them q. But the Goths, instead of his brother, chose for their king Sigeric, the broby Sigeric, who ther of Sarus, who immediately ordered the fix children that Ataulphus had had by sauses all his children to be murdered, and is murdered ibid. himself.

d Oros. l. vii. c. 43. p. 224. COLYMP. ibid. p. 184. Icol. Theod. l. xv. tit. 12. leg. 1. p. 392. Col. Boo. Theod. p. 70. Isid. Peluf. l.i. ep. 36. p. 11. Cod. Theod. l. xi. tit. 28. p. 203. Colymp. apud Phot. p. 88. Idem ibid. Philostorg. l. xii. c. 4. p. 534. Colymp. apud Phot. p. 188. e OLYMP, ibid. p. 184. f Val. rer. Franc. 1. III. p. 392. lac. 2. D. 107. Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 12. leg. 1. p. 392. р. 800. 1 Тнеорі В Олумр. apud Phot. p. 88. P JORN. rer. Goth. c. 31. p. 655.

ij

Ď 2,

, TL

1

1)

by

a a former wife, to be inhumanly murdered, revenging, by that piece of cruelty, the death of his brother r. He even obliged Placidia to walk with other captives twelve miles before his chariot. But he was affaffinated by his own people the feventh day after his election', and Vallia chosen in his room, after he had caused all those to be murdered who stood in competition with him for the crown. This year a great tumult happened at Alexandria; the christians and Jews, who were very nume- A great turous in that city, quarrelling on account of certain sports exhibited on a Saturday, mult at Alex-St. Cyril, bishop of the place, threatened to drive the Jews out of the city; which the christians exasperated them to such a degree, that they resolved to vent their rage upon his and lews. whole flock, the more because they were favoured by Orestes, presect of the city, then at variance with the bishop. Accordingly having provided themselves with arms, some of them in the dead of the night began to cry fire, giving out at the same time, that the great church was in slames. Hereupon the christians, hastening out of their houses to save the church, were massacred in great numbers by the Jews, who lay in ambush for them, and knew one another by a certain mark or badge, which they wore for that purpose. The bishop, highly provoked at this barbarity, drove all the Jews out of the city; which the governor refenting as an encroachment upon his authority, the breach between him and the bishop was widened, and they both wrote to court, complaining of each other's conduct. In the mean time, the hermits or monks, who led a retired life on the neighbouring mountains, e being told, that Orestes had espoused the cause of the Jews against Cyril and the christians, slew to the city, and meeting the prefect in his chariot, reviled him with the names of pagan and idolater. Orestes, to appeale them, told them, that he was a christian, and had been baptized by Atticus, bishop of Constantinople. But while he was yet speaking, one of the monks, by name Ammonius, wounded him on the head with a stone. His attendants, believing him killed, for he was in an instant covered all over with blood, betook themselves to slight; but some of the citizens, coming to his rescue, seized the monk, and delivered him up to the presect, who caused him to be tortured till he died on the rack. The populace resolved to revenge his death, which they did in the following manner, to the great scandal of the chrid stian name and profession. At that time lived in Alexandria, Hypatia, the daughter The celebrated of the celebrated philosopher Theon, who had been brought up and instructed by her Hypatia inhu-father with extraordinary care, and was thought to excel in learning and quickness and murder-of apprehension all the philosophers of that age. She was thoroughly acquainted flians. with the different doctrines of the various fects of philosophers, and publicly explained them to an incredible number of disciples, who slocked from all parts to hear her. She was no less remarkable for her chasticy, and modest carriage, tho' her friendship was courted by all the great men of her age, than for her knowledge and erudition. As the was in great favour and esteem with the prefect Orestes, the populace, partly to revenge the death of Ammonius, and partly because they imagined, as she was a e pagan, that she incensed the prefect against the bishop and his friends, rose suddenly in a tumultuous manner; and being headed by one Peter, a reader in a church, they stopped her as she was returning to her house, and pulling her out of her chariot, dragged her to a neighbouring church, where they flayed her alive, and tearing her in pieces, carried her mangled members to a place called Cinaron, and there burnt them to ashes. This unheard-of barbarity reflected great scandal on the christian name, especially on the church of Alexandria. Thus Socrates u, whose authority is questioned by most ecclesiastic writers, who suppose him to have been a zealous Novatian, and consequently an enemy to St. Cyril, who, upon his first coming to the see of Alexandria, had caused the penal laws against those, and all other secta-f ries, to be strictly executed. This year Theodosius, by a law dated the seventh of December, excluded the pagans from all employments both civil and military w. The pagans By another law, dated the nineteenth of October, he deposed Gamaliel, patriarch of excluded from the councils of the provinces, whereas the patriarchal dignity was hereditary. THE next confuls were Theodosius the seventh time, and Junius Quartus Palladius, who was prefect of Italy this and the five following years 1. Vallia, lately created the Jews, for having abused his authority *. Gamaliel is supposed to have been the ments both last patriarch of that nation, which was thenceforth governed by primates chosen by civil and mili-

* Idem ibid. Oros. p. 224. Soz. l. ix. c. 9. p. 811.
* OLYMP. ib
id. Prosp. chron.
* Socr. l. vii. c. 13.
* Cod. Theod
Idem, tit. 8. leg. 22. p. 239.
* Idat. Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 376. * OLYMP. ibid. OROS. p. 224. " Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 10. leg. 21, p. 293. ibid. Prosp. chron. x Idem, tit. 8. leg. 22. p. 239.

king of the Goths in Spain, resolved to pursue the war against the Romans, and the island of Lipari.

ried to Contlantius.

The Franks allowed to fettle in Thongria.

Vallia gains great advantages over the Vandals in Spain.

Goths allowed to settle in Aquitain.

succeeded by Theodoric.

attempt the reduction of Africa; but the fleet he was fending thither being shipwrecked near the streights of Gibraltar, and most of the Goths on board of it drowned, Vallia, king of he entered into a treaty with Constantius, and in the end concluded a peace with the Goths in Honorius, delivered up hostages, and, upon his receiving six hundred thousand meaopain, concludes a peace fures of corn, fent back Placidia to her brother 2. Vallia not only concluded a peace, with Honorius, but entered into an alliance with the Romans against the barbarians, who had settled in Spain, adviling the emperor to let them fight it out among themselves, since whatever side prevailed, he was sure to be a gainer b. This advice Honorius followed, to the great advantage and relief of the empire, as we shall see anon. Attalus, whom the Goths had carried with them into Spain, seeing a peace concluded between them b and the Romans, endeavoured to make his escape by sea; but the ship was taken, and confined to and he carried to Constantius, then in Gaul, who fent him to the emperor, by whose orders his right hand, or, as others will have it, only the fingers of his right hand were cut off, to prevent his writing, and he confined to the island of Lipari, where the good-natured emperor caused him to be treated with great humanity. This year Theodosius, leaving Constantinople for the first time after the twenty-second of July, retired to Eudoxiopolis, called formerly Selymbria, on the sea-coast between Constantinople and Heraclea, and continued partly there, partly at Heraclea, till the twenty-ninth of September d. The following year 417. when Honorius was conful the eleventh time, and Constantius the second, the emperor, to reward the services of c that brave general, gave him in marriage his fister Placidia, an honour at which he had been long aspiring. Placidia could not by any means be prevailed upon to give her consent; but the emperor, taking hold of her hand, gave it in spite of her to Constantius. They were thus married on the first of January of the present year, when Constantius entered upon his second consulship. A few months after, Honorius, leaving Ravenna, repaired to Rome, which he entered in triumph, caufing Attalus, brought for that purpose from Lipari, to walk before his chariot. When the triumph was over, Attalus was remanded to the place of his exile, and Honorius returned foon after to Ravenna f. The Armorici, who had revolted in 409. and introduced a new form of government among themselves, were this year brought again under d subjection by Constantius 8. About this time the Franks, after having dwelt for the space of near two hundred years on the German side of the Rhine, were allowed to pass that river, and settle in Thongria, that is, in the territory of Tongres, where they were governed by as many kings as they had cities or cantons. But whether Faramond, who reigned at this time, had any authority over the other princes, or was only more powerful than the rest, is what we are no-where told. He was the fon of Marcomir, of whom we have spoken elsewhere, and the grandson of Priamus, whom Tiro Prosper calls the first king of the Franks mentioned in history k. In the east nothing remarkable happened this year besides an earthquake, which overturned several houses at Constantinople, and the city of Cybyra in Phrygia.

THE following year, Honorius being conful the twelfth time, and Theodosius the eighth, Vallia, making war upon the barbarians in Spain, cut off all the Vandals called Silingi, who had fettled in Bætica or Andalusia. He likewise made such a dreadful havock of the Alans, who had hitherto ruled over the Vandals and Suevians, that their king Ata being killed among the rest, they sled for protection to Gonderic, king of the Vandals, who had fettled in Galicia, and submitted to him. Hence the fuccessors of Gonderic used to style themselves kings of the Vandals and Alans m. Con-Vallia and his stantius, to reward these eminent services of Vallia and his Goths, gave them Aquitania Secunda, comprising the present archbishoprick of Bourdeaux, and some neighbouring cities, that is, the whole tract from Toulouse to the sea, to which he added f foon after Novempopulania or Aquitania Tertia, that is, the province of Auch, and Gascony. Vallia fixed his residence at Toulouse, which by that means became the capital of the kingdom of the Goths ". Vallia on the other hand yielded to the He dies, and is Romans the countries he had taken from the Vandals and Alans in Spain. He died foon after, leaving behind him one daughter, married to a Suevian, by whom the > * Oros. p. 224. Philost. l. xii. c. 4. p. 534. Olymp. ibid. p. 189. Dros. Hilost. Oros. ibid. Socr. l. vii. c. 36. p. 381. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 163. C OLYMP. b Oros. ibid. e OLYMP. p, 192. Rut. l.i. p. 132. 1. i. p. 44. P. 483. f Cod. Theod. chron. p. 164. h GREG. Tur. hift. Fran. l.ii. c. 3. p. 64. BUCH. de Belg. p. 453. COINT. tom. i. p. 44. P. 483.

>
> I IDAT. chron. Sid. carm. ii. p. 300. I IDAT. PROSP. chron. k Prosp. chron. 1 Chron. Al. p. 718. O JORN. C. 33. p. 658. IDAT. p. 32, 33.

1

Z, 2

Ċ

3

1 Þ

المتنا

. 25

R CZ

0 % . .

Ď

1,194

2.13

a had Riciner, who completed the ruin of the western empire. The deceased prince was succeeded by Theodoric, called by some Theodorus, and by others Theodorides P. In the east one Plintha, by nation a Goth, revolted, but was deseated in Palestine 9; which is all we know of this war. Plintha, notwithstanding his defeat, must have concluded an advantageous peace with Theodosius; for he was raised the following year to the confular dignity, and preferred to the post of general of the Roman horse and foot, in which he acquitted himself with great reputation and fidelity. In the confulship he had Monaxius for his collegue, another of Theodosius's officers; so that both consuls were in 419. Subjects of the eastern empire, as they had been in 417. of the western. Of the two consuls, one was, generally speaking, chosen in the east, b the other in the west; and he named the first, who was first in rank: if they were equal, each named in the first place his own consul. This year Honorius, by a law dated from Ravenna the twenty-second of November, extended the right and privileges of an afylum to all places within fifty paces of the church, declaring those guilty of facrilege, who should arrest any one within that space. On the second or third of July of this year, Placidia was delivered at Ravenna of a fon, who was Valentinian named Valentinian, and succeeded Honorius in the empire'. The barbarians in Spain III. born. being no longer harassed by the Goths, who had retired to Gaul, as we have related above, and settled there, began to quarrel among themselves. Gonderic, king of the Vandals, having gained great advantages over Eremeric, king of the Suevians, c obliged him in the end to fly for refuge to the mountains of Biscay, where he kept him and his people blocked up. But in the mean time, Afterius, count of Spain, and the vicar Maurocelus, falling unexpectedly upon Gonderic, cut great numbers of his Gonderic, king men in pieces, and obliged the rest to abandon Biscay and Galicia, and retire into of the Vandais, Batica ". Nothing happened this year in the east, which historians have thought Romans out of worthy of notice, except an attempt upon the life of Aetius, prefect of Constantinople, Biscay and Gar who was attacked by an affaffin, named Ceryachus, as he was returning from the licia, retires great church. We are not told what gave occasion to this attempt, nor what became of the affaffin. By a law dated the twenty-fourth of September, Theodofius declared those guilty of death, who should teach the barbarians the art of building d ships, to which they were yet strangers x. The following year, when Theodosius was conful the eighth time, and Constantius the third, the army mutinied in the east, and put to death their general, by name Maximinus, as we read in the chronicle of Marcellinus: but of this mutiny no mention is made by any other writer. In the west nothing remarkable happened this year; but under the following confuls Agricola and Eustatius, the emperor Honorius, on the eighth of February, raised Constantius Constantius is to the imperial dignity, declared him his collegue, and gave the title of Augusta to raised to the his wife Placidia y. The images of Constantius and Placidia were sent to Constanti-dies soon after. nople, with the news of their promotion; but Theodosius refused, for what reason we know not, to acknowledge them; which would have kindled a war between the two e empires, had not Constantius died soon after, that is, on the second of September, after having reigned seven months wanting six days. He was buried at Ravenna, where he died of a pleurify, in a mausoleum, built by his widow Placidia, near the church of St. Vitalis 2. The same year the emperor Theodosius married Eudocia on Theodosius the seventh of June, on which occasion there were great rejoicings at Constantinople a. marries Eudo-Eudocia was the daughter of an Athenian philosopher, by name Heraclitus, upon cia. whose death her two brothers Gesius and Aurelianus defrauding her of the share that was due to her of her father's estate, she went to Constantinople to implore the protection of Pulcheria. As she had been instructed by her father with extraordinary care in several languages, and in every branch of literature, and was besides remarkf able for her beauty and engaging behaviour, Pulcheria, after several conferences with her, began to think her a proper match for her brother Theodosius, whom accordingly she persuaded to marry her. Thus the modern Greeks; but the ancient writers tell us, that she was the daughter, not of the philosopher Heraclitus, but of Leontius, Her birth, an Athenian sophist, or professor of eloquence at Athens b. Before the nuptials were education, &c. celebrated, Theodosius caused her to be baptized by Atticus, bishop of Constantinople,

P JORN. p. 659. OLYMP. p. 193. PHILOST. l. xii. c. 8. p. 166. Socr. l. y. c. 23. p. 292. Cod. Theod. p. 36. I IDAT. MARC. PROSP. OLYM. p. 192. CANGE Byz. fam. p. 66, 67. LDAT. Chron. W Chron. Al. p. 720. Cod. Theod. l. ii. tit. 40. leg. 24. p. 322. Theoph. p. 72. OLYMP. p. 192. MAR. chron. PHILOST. l. xii. c. 12. p. 537. OLYMP. p. 193. IDAT. chron. MABIL. it. Iral. p. 39, 40. Chron. Al. p. 724. Socr. l. vii. p. 360. Vol. VI. Nº 6. 6 E

War between the Persians and Romans.

Narles, the Persian gene-Ardaburius.

Ardaburius besieges Nilibis.

And the king of Pertia Theodoliopolis.

who changed the name of Athenais, which she bore before, into that of Eudocia c. a As Eudocia had been brought up to letters, she used to divert herself with making verses, and this very year she composed a poem on the victory gained by the Romans over the Persians d, of which anon (Q). The two brothers of Eudocia, informed of her good fortune, and conscious to themselves of their behaviour towards her, absconded; but she, instead of resenting the injury they had done her, invited them both to court, and raised them to great preferments. What Codinus, a modern Greek author, writes of the seven philosophers, who, he says, attended Eudocia to Constantinople, has the air of a sable f. This year the peace, which had long subfifted between the Romans and Persians, was broken, and a war kindled between the two empires on the following occasion. Vararanes V. who in 420. had succeeded b his father Isdegerdes in the kingdom of Persia, having, at the instigation of the Magi, raifed a bloody perfecution against the christians in his dominions, great numbers of them took refuge in the Roman territories, and repaired to Constantinople, where they were received with great kindness by Atticus, bishop of that city, and by him recommended to the emperor, who was so far from delivering them up when redemanded by the Persian embassadors, that, on the contrary, he declared his resolution of defending them, and the religion they professed, with the whole strength of the empire. Some misunderstanding had arisen before between the two princes, the Perfian king refusing to send back some workmen, whom he had hired out of the Roman territories, to dig in mines of gold, which he had lately discovered. Besides, c the Persians had plundered and insulted some Roman merchants trading to their country v. Upon these provocations, as Vararanes continued to persecute the christians in his dominions, Theodosius proclaimed war with the Persians, and, without loss of time, dispatched Ardaburius, an Alan by nation, at the head of a considerable army, into Azazene, a Persian province beyond the Tigris, which he laid waste, after having gained a complete victory over Narses, whom the king of Persia had sent with a numerous army to oppose him. The battle was fought on the third of Sepral, defeated by tember, and the news of the victory brought on the fixth of the same month to Constantinople, tho' seven hundred miles distant from the borders of Persia, by a famous courier of those times, named Palladius. He travelled with the same sur- d prifing expedition to what part foever he was fent; whence of him it was pleafantly faid, that he had found means to reduce the Roman empire to a petty state. Narses, after his defeat, abandoning the province of Azazene to the mercy of the enemy, marched with incredible expedition into Mesopotamia, with a design to invade the empire on that side, which was then destitute of troops, and unprepared for a defence. But Ardaburius, aware of his design, followed him close, and obliged him to shelter himself within the walls of Nisibis, which place he immediately besieged. In the mean time, the king of Persia, having received intelligence of the deseat of his general, and the danger both he and the city of Nisibis were in, affembled all his forces; and entering Mesopotamia, laid siege to Theodosiopolis, with a design to e divert Ardahurius from that of Nisibis. But the besieged, having at their head Euromius, bishop of the place, defended it with such vigour and resolution, that the Persians, after having battered it with an incredible number of machines for a whole month without intermission, were obliged to drop the enterprize, and retire i. The enemy were foon after reinforced with a numberless multitude of Saracens, under

d Socr. l. vii. c. 21. p. 360. * Evag. l. i. c. 20. p. 297. E ZONAR. p. 44. Chron. Al. p. 724. f. Vide Codin. de off. Constantin. eccles. p. 30, 31. Socre. p. 557, 558. Idem ibid. Theodoret. l.v. c. 37, p. 243. Socr. 1. vii. c. 18. p. 353. h Socr. C. 19. p. 557, 558.

(Q) She likewise put into hexameter verse the five books of Moles, with those of Joshua, of the Judges, and of Rush. This performance, which confilted of eight books, is highly commended by Photius, as is likewife the paraphrase, which the same princess wrote in verse upon the prophecies of Zachariah and Daniel, and Photius found with a prometry on St. Cutrism and St. Zustin done without poem on St. Cyprian and St. Justin, done, without all doubt, fays that writer, by the same hand (3). The reader will find in Photius a long abstract of that poem (4). Zonaras mentions another work of the same empress, which he calls Homer's rhapsody. It contained the history of our Saviour, and intirely consisted of verses borrowed from Homer. It was begun by a patrician, says Zonaras, but ended by Eudo ia (5). Some take this patrician to have been one Pelagius, who was killed in the reign of Zene, about the year 480. and is faid to have been the author of a rhapfody (6). But he was a pagan, as appears from Cedrenus (7), and confequently can hardly be thought to have been the author of that work, or any part of it.

(3) Phot. c. 183. p. 413-416. 71. (6) Voff. poet. Grac. p.78, (5) Zon. tom. iii. p. 37. Cange Byz. fam. (4) Idem, p. 420. (7) Cedr. p. 354. p. 71.

the

Ċ

1

J.

of

ll.

300

13

منائة

لمناأة

T

100

: 9

17

Sur a

1. 18

a the conduct of Alamundarus, a renowned warriour, who, to raife the drooping spirits of the Persian monarch, bragged, that in a short time he would deliver into his hands, not only the Romans who belieged Nifibis, but Antioch itself, the metropolis of Syria. But not long after, his men, being seized with a panic, and not know- But are both ing whither to fly, threw themselves headlong into the Euphrates, where an hundred seized with a thousand of them are said to have perished. The Romans, seized at the same time panic, and rewith the like fear, upon a sale report, that the king of Persea was advancing to the size. with the like fear, upon a false report, that the king of Persia was advancing to the relief of Nisibis with a great number of elephants, burnt all their machines, raised the siege, and retired in the utmost confusion into the Roman dominions'.

THE following year, when Honorius was conful the thirteenth time, and Theodo- The Romans b fius the tenth, the war was pursued with uncommon success against the Persians, gaingreat ad-From Socrates, who only hints at the military preparations, as foreign to his main vantages over purpose, it appears, that Ariobindus, one of the Roman generals, killed in a single combat a Persian famed for his valour; that Ardaburius put to the sword seven Perfian commanders, surprised in an ambuscade; and that Avisianus cut in pieces the few Saracens who had escaped being drowned in the Euphrates. Notwithstanding these advantages, Theodosius, imagining the Persians, thus weakened and disheartened, would hearken to an accommodation, and give over persecuting the christians, in whose defence he had taken arms, sent embassadors to Vararanes, with very reasonable proposals; which the Persian would have accepted with joy, had he not been c diverted from it by the immortals, that is, a corps of ten thousand chosen men, so called because they had never been conquered. These persuaded the king to keep the Romans in suspense, with a design to surprise them in the mean time; for they imagined they would not at that juncture be upon their guard. With this view they divided themselves into two bodies, one of which lay concealed among the woods, while the other advanced in order to attack the enemy, and draw them into the ambuscade; but Procopius, who commanded a separate body of Romans, observing their motions from an eminence where he was posted, and apprised of their design, attacked them in the rear, while Ardaburius charged them in front; by which means they were furrounded, and all to a man put to the fword. Vararanes was no fooner d informed of this new calamity, than calling the Roman embaffadors, he agreed to the terms they had proposed, and concluded a peace with the empire for an hundred Apeace conyears, which lasted, according to Evagrius, till the twelfth year of the reign of Ana-cluded between statius; that is to the year 502 k. The chief article of this treaty was, that the Per- and Persians sian king should recal the banished christians, restore them to their estates, and put for 100 years. a stop to the cruel persecution he had raised against them. While these things passed in the east, Honorius attempted in the west to recover Spain out of the hands of the barbarians, greatly weakened by their intestine wars. With this view he ordered Castinus, general of the foot, and comes domesticorum, or captain of the guards, to march against them, at the head of a very numerous and powerful army. Castinus e foon reduced them to fuch streights, that they were preparing to submit, and abandon the country which they had feized; but the Roman general having unseasonably ventured an engagement, twenty thousand of his men were cut in pieces, and he The Romans obliged with the rest to take refuge in Tarraco !. Idatius ascribes this deseat to the receive a great treachery of the Goths, who ferved in the Roman army; but all other writers to the Spain.

rash and imprudent conduct of Castinus. THE following year, when Marinianus and Asclepiodotus were confuls, a misunderstanding arose between Honorius and his sister Placidia, whom the emperor had entertained at court, ever fince the death of her husband Constantius, with such tenderness and affection, as gave occasion to some very scandalous reslections. Some f authors write, that the great sway she bore in the administration giving no small jealousy to the other courtiers, they persuaded the emperor, that she corresponded privately with the Goths, who still looked upon her as their queen, and betrayed to them all his counsels m. However that be, it is certain, that the extraordinary affection he had hitherto shewn her being this year changed into an aversion no less extraordinary, Placidia thought it adviseable to quit the court, and retire, with her son Placidia obliged Valentinian, and her daughter Honoria, to Constantinople, where she was kindly received to quit the by her nephew Theodosius, tho' he had formerly refused to acknowledge her husband tire into the

* Idem, c. 18. p. 357. * Evagr. l. i. c. 19. p. 276. Theodor. forValentinian.

359. Greg. Tur. l. ii. c. 9. p. 63, 64. Salvian. l. vii.

96. h Socr. ibid. p. 357-360. l. v. c. 39. p. 245. Socr. c. 21. p. 359. p. 165-168. M OLYMP. p. 196.

Honorius dies. Constantius for emperor, and to give her the title of Augusta n. Soon after, Honorius a died at Ravenna of a dropfy, having reigned twenty-eight years since the death of his father Theodosius, and thirty-one since the time he was first created Augustus. He died, according to Theophanes, on the fifteenth, according to Olympiodorus, on the twentyfeventh of August of the present year 423°. His body is said to have been found in 1542. With those of his two wives, Maria and Thermantia, the daughters of Stilicho, in the church of St. Peter at Rome P. If so, it must have been conveyed thither from Ravenna, where his mausoleum, supposed to have been built by his sister Placidia, is still to be seen. Of the writers who sourished in his reign, we shall speak in note (R). Honorius no sooner expired, than an express was dispatched to Theodosius

> " Idem ibid. Cassion. chron. • THEOPH. p. 72. OLYMP. ibid. P MABILL. it. Ital. p. 145.

(R) Under Honorius flourished Olympiodorus, who wrote in Greek the history of that prince, from the year 407. the thirteenth of his reign, to his death. His work confifted of twenty-two books, and was inscribed to Theodosius II. or the younger (8). The reader will find an abstract of it in Photius (9), who censures the style as low, and altogether unworthy of an historian. However, both Zosimus and Sozomen feem to have copied it in feveral places, with some alteration in the phrase and expression. The author was a native of Thebes in Egypt, and a pagan by religion. He was fent, with others, in 412. on an embassy to a king of the Hunns, named Donatus. Of this voyage (for he went by sea) he gives us an account, and likewise of his journey to Athens, and of another to Syene in Egypt, and to the country of the Blemmyes (10). This is all we know of him. Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus wrote likewise the history of the reign of Honorius, from the year 406. to the death of that prince; but of his work only a few passages have reached our times, quoted by Gregory of Tours (11). Claudian may be ranked among the historians who have written of Honorius; for of him we have learnt several particulars of that prince's reign. He was a native of Alexandria in Egypt, as he himself tells us in different places (12), and not the fon of a merchant at Florence, as some modern writers have endeavoured to prove. He first applied himself to Greek poetry; and a fragment of a poem written in that language on the battle of the giants, has reached our times (13). His first Latin poem was on the confulthip of the two brothers Olybrius and Probinus, who were confuls in 395. He continued to write on different subjects till the fixth consulship of Honorius in 404. He was sent by the citizens of Rome in 396 to congratulate Honorius on his third consulfhip (14). He was honoured by the Roman senate with a statue, which, in consideration of his excellency in poetry, was erected in the square of Trajan (15). This honour was conserved upon him before he wrote his poem on the battle of Pollentia, fought in 403 (16). He was then tribune and notary, or secretary of state, and enjoyed the title of clarissimus, which was given to the Roman senators. Having, by means of Serena, Stilicho's wife, married a lady possessed of great wealth in Africa, he thenceforth became a protessed admirer, or rather adorer, of that great general and statesman, inveighing at the same time with much bitterness against his rivals Rusinus and Eutropius (17); neither does he spare his countryman Adrian, who was prafectus pratorio in 40%, and 412. having probably been ill-used by him;

for in an epiftle addressed to him to appeale his wrath, he complains, that his family was undone; that of his friends some had been put to the rack, and others banished; and that he himself was reduced to beggary (18). To avoid the ill treatment he met with from Adrian, he retired, perhaps to the east; for Evagrias ranks him among the poets who flourished under Theodosius II (19). He was, as appears from his poems, an adorer of Jupiter, and all the other pagan gods. Orofius calls him & most obstinate pagan; but at the same time commends him as an excellent poet (20). St. Auflin likewise speaks of him as a person greatly attached to the pagan superstition (21). Hence such pieces as contain christian sentiments are by the best critics thought not to have been written by him, tho' they pass under his name, but perhaps by Claudian Mamertus, a christian poet of Vienne in Gaul. Bailles prefers Claudian to all the poets who have written ever fince the age of Augustus, tho' he is not, in the opinion of that writer, without some faults. His style is sometimes flat, and sometimes sublime, and most of his poems filled with youthful fallies (22). In all his poems there are feveral most beautiful passages. His invectives, especially the two books against Eutropius, are most esteemed by the learned (23). It is uncertain whether or no the poem on mount Ætna was written by him. Rutilius, or, as he is styled at the head of his poem, Rutilius Claudius Numatianus, flourished in the reign of Honorius. He was a native of Gaul, according to some, of Tou-louse. His father had been governor of Hetruria, quæstor, comes largirionum, and presect (14. The Hetruscans, by whom he was greatly beloved, on account of his good nature, and impartiality in the administration of justice, erected several statues to his honour at Pifa, and in other places. He was dead when his fon wrote his poem. Rutilius bore two of the greatest employments in the state, viz. the office of magifler officiorum, and that of prefect of Rome (25). In his poem he declares himself a pagan, and a fworn enemy to the monks, especially to those who lived in the island of Capraria or Capraise, on the coast of Tuscany, a young nobleman of his acquaintance having renounced a plentiful estate, and abandoned his friends, relations, and even his wife, to lead a retired life among them (26). Rutilins left Rome, where he had lived many years, to return to Gaul, where he had not been ever fince the barbarians entered that country in 407. He fet out from Rome in 417. or 420. about the month of October; and embarquing on the Tiber, repaired to Porto, where he waited a whole fortnight for the

(8) Phot. c. 80. p. 177. (10) Idem. p. 177-193. (11) Greg. Tur. hift. Franc. (8) Phot. c. 30. p. 1/1.

l. ii. c. 9. p. 62—64. (12) Claud. ep. 1. p. 235. ep. q. p. 24.

p. 236. (14) Idem, epig. 9. p. 240. (15) Idem, conf. Hon. 3. p. 39. (16) Bell. Goin. p. 17.

(17) Idem, ep. 2. p. 239, 240. (18) Idem, epig. 29. p. 261. Grep. 1. p. 257. (19) Evag. l. i. c. 19.

(20) Orof. l. vii. c. 35. p. 221. (21) Aug. civ. Dei, l. v. c. 26. p. 142. (22) Baill.

(24) Rut. p. 128, 137, 139. (y) Idem ibid. p. 236. (14) 10em, 175. (18) Idem, epig. 1 (17) Idem, ep. 2. p. 239, 240. (18) Idem, epig. 1 p. 278. (20) Orof. l. vii. c. 35. p. 221. (19) 10em, p. 23. (23) 1dem, p. 131, 138. (26) Idem, p. 137.

with the news of his death, which that prince concealed for fome days, and in the mean time gave private orders to a body of troops to advance into the neighbourhood.

new moon, and the fetting of the Pleiades (27). Those who are skilled in aftronomy, may learn from thence the precise year and day of his departure. In 417. and 420. it was new moon in the latter end of Offic-At Porto, twelve miles distant from Rome, he heard, or imagined to hear, the shouts of the peo ple in the circus. He embarqued there on b a small vessel, for the convenience of landing when he pleased to visit his friends, and of lying every riight ashore (28). He landed at Circumcella, now Chusa Vecchia, and went to view certain hot waters three miles from thence, called the baths of Theres. Putting to sea again, he discovered the ruins of Gravisca, and Cosa or Cossa, two cities famous in former ages. The inhabitants of the latter are faid to have been forced, by prodigious swarms of rats, to quit their habitations, and abandon the place of their nativity (29). He came ashore like-wise at Porr-Ercole, beyond which he saw the island of Elbs, more useful, says he, on account of its ironmines, than the Togos for its golden fands. From Port-Ercole he pursued his voyage to Piombina, and from thence to Volterra, where he went to fee the fine house of Albinus presects of Rome, and the falt-pits at a fmall distance from it. At Volterra he found Victorinus his intimate friend, who, having abandoned Toulouse, the place of his nativity, after the settling of the Goths there, had retired to Italy, and led a country-life in the neighbourhood of Volterra. He had been formerly vicar to the prefect of Britain, which office he discharged to the great satisfaction of the people. Honorius, upon his retiring from Toulouse, had invited him to court, and given him the title of count; but he preferred a retired life to all the honours the emperor could confer upon him (30). From Volterra he failed to the island of Gorgon and from thence to the port of Pifa, where he landed, and went to the city of Pifa, to fee one of his old friends, by name Protadius, who, having loft a great estate in Gaul, seized, no doubt, by the barbarians, enjoyed greater happiness on a small farm he had in Umbria, than he had ever done when possessed of immense wealth, and large territories in his own country. He had been prefect of Rome, and had been diftinguished with several other great employments (31). Several letters written to him by Symmashus have reached our times (32). From the port of Pifs, where Rusilius was obliged to continue some time, by reason of the bad weather, he pursued his voyage to Portus Luna, now Lerice, as is commonly believed (33). Thus far his itinerary, that is, the poem in which he describes his voyage. It was divided into two books, of which the lat-ter is almost intirely lost. It has all the elegance and beauty that can be expected in a performance of that unpolished age, and informs us of several things relating to the history of those times (34). Some gross mistakes that are to be found in it, are, without all doubt, owing partly to the transcribers, partly to ignorant critics, who have strangely mangled and confounded several passages. The author be-trays throughout the whole work an inveterate hatred both to the Jews and christians; whence we may conclude Lachalius, Lucilius, and his other heroes, to have been pagans. Lucilius wrote fome fatires, in no respect inferior, if we may depend upon the judgment of Rutilius, to those of Turnus and Juvenal (35); but none of them have reached our times. One Flavius, faid by St. Jerom to have wrote in verse a treatise on physic, is supposed by Vossius to have stourished in the reign of Honorius, and likewise the author of a comedy, styled Durrius Rlansi, which is inscribed to one Russius (36). About this time flourished Macrobius, or, as he is flyled at the head of his works, Aurelius Theodosius. Ambrosius Macrobius; for all the persons he introduces in his saturnalia, lived under Theodosius I. and his fon Honorius. He was born in a country where the Lasin tongue was not common, that is, in Greece, or in the east (37). To his name is added, in an autient manuscript, the word Steerings, denoting perhaps his country (38); but to us quite unknown. He is diftinguished with the title of illustricus, peculiar to the first officers of the empire (39). Hence most writers conclude him to be the Macrobius who was great chamberlain to Theodofins II. in 422, for whole take that prince equalled the office of great chamberlain to those of the prafectus pratorio, and the magister militia (40). But against this opinion may be objected, that Macrobius, the author of the faiurnalia, had a fon, by name Eustachins; whereas the great chamberlains were, generally speaking, eugreat chamberlains were, generally ipeaking, eunuchs. Besides, we cannot persuade ourselves, that Theodosius II. would have suffered a pagan (for such was the writer we are speaking of) to enjoy that office; which obliged him to be always about the emperor's person. The opinion of those is better founded, who suppose the Macrobius, who was proconful of Africa in 410. to be the author of the saturnalia. One Macrobius was vicar of Spain in 200, and 400, but stripped of his employment and 399. and 400. but stripped of his employment, and punished for some neglect with respect to the posts (41). The work by which Macrobius is chiefly known, is his faturnalia, that is, a collection of antiquities made by him for the instruction of his son, and supposed to have been uttered in a familiar conversation among friends, during the faturnalia, or the feasts of Saturn. The persons he introduces were the most famous then at Rome for their learning and erudition. He addresses his work to his fon, for whose sake he undertook it. He relates most things in the terms of the authors from whom he borrowed them, by reason he could not express himself with ease in the Latin tongue; and truly, when he speaks himself, he plainly betrays his small knowledge of that language (42). Besides the sturnalia, he wrote two books on the dream of Scipio, which he likewise inscribed to his son, for whose instruction he undertook that, as he had done the other work. These two books were trandone the other work. I nese two books were trainflated into Greek by Maximus, furnamed Planudes (43). Another book patters under the name of Macrobias, on the conformity and difagreement of the Greek and Latin tongues (44). Macrobius wrote indeed a book on that fubject; but the work which has reached our times, was done by John Erigenes, who flourished in the ninth century, and followed the plan of Macrobius, whom he copied, changing fome things, and adding many of his own (45). One of the chief persons introduced by Macrobius in his faturnalia, is Servius, who had lately begun to teach polite literature at Rome, and is painted as a person of great learning, and at the same time universally beloved on account of his modesty (46).

(27) Idem, p. 131, 132. (28) Idem ibid. (29) Idem, p. 133. (30) Idem, p. 137. (31) Idem, p. 138. (32) Sym.l. iv.ep. 17, 34, 57. p. 150, 174. ep. 30, 32, &c. (33) Rut. p. 141. (34) Voss. bist. l. iii. c. 2. p. 746. (35) Rut. p. 137. (36) Voss. ibid. (37) Macrob. fat. l. ic. 8. p. 161. (38) Wilth append. ad dypt. Leod. p. 4. (39) Macrob. p. 159. (40) Cod. Theod. zit. 2. p. 82. (41) Idem, l. viii. tit. 5. leg. 61. p. 565. (42) Vide Baillet. tom. 2. p. 27, 28. (43) Macrob. p. 17. (44) Idem, p. 556. (45) Idem, p. 601, 604, 736. (40) Idem, fds. l. i. c. 2. p. 166. cb. l. vii. c. 7. p. 478.

VOL. VL Nº 6.

Theodolius causes himself to be proclaimed emperor of the west. John, the deceased emperor's chief secretary, af-Sumes the purple.

of Salone in Dalmatia, that they might be ready at hand to prevent the disturbances, a which, he apprehended, would be raised in the west by the death of Honorius, who had left no children to succeed him. Having taken this step, he made public the death of his uncle, and at the same time caused himself to be proclaimed emperor of the west in his room 9. This did not deter John, the deceased emperor's chief secretary, from affuming the purple in Rome, being, no doubt, encouraged in his usurpation by Castinus, then commander in chief of all the troops in the west; for he was afterwards differed and banished, as one of the usurper's chief friends and abetters. The new tyrant was immediately acknowledged, not only in Rome and Italy, but likewise in Gaul and Dalmatia; which encouraged him to dispatch embassadors to Theodosius, to acquaint him with his promotion; but that prince refusing to b acknowledge him, and having even ordered his embassadors to be arrested, and thrown into prison, he began to prepare for war, and fent the famous Actius, with great fums, to draw the Hunns over to his affiftance. That celebrated commander, who governed the western empire with an absolute sway during the reign of Valentinian III. was a native of Dorofterum in  $M\alpha fia$ , and the fon of Gaudentius, who, tho by birth a Scytbian, was raised to the highest employments in the empire, and married an Italian lady of great distinction, called by some Italica. By her he had Aetius, who served at first among the emperor's domestics, or the troops of his houshold, and was given as an hostage to Alarie, after the battle of Pollentia in 403. and afterwards to the Hunns, with whose chiefs he, by that means, became acquainted. c Upon his return from the country of the Hunns, he married the daughter of Carpilio, captain of the guards, and had by her two fons, Gaudentius, who, after the death of Valentinian, was taken by Genseric, and Carpilio, whom Valentinian fent with the cha-Actius his cha-racter of embassador to Attila'. Actius was a person of a majestic mien, of a tall stature, and a robust constitution, which enabled him to bear with patience the racter.

9 OLYMP. ibid. Socr. l. vii. c. 23. p. 363. Idat. chron. F. V. Cassiod. l.i. ep. 4. p. 4. Pris. leg. p. 53. Sidon. p. 169. Oros. p. 305. r VAL. rer. Franc. l. iii. p. 220.

He is introduced speaking mostly of Virgil, whose inimitable Eneid he explained daily to the Roman youth. Maurus Servius Honorasus, the author of the learned comment on that poet, is, without all doubt, the Servius of Macrobius; but most authors are of opinion, that what has reached us, is but an abridgment of that learned work; nay, some take it to have been compiled from Servius, and several other antient critics. It is generally held in great esteem, tho' not quite free from saults (47). In the fifth or fixth century flourished a grammarian, named Martianus Mineus Felix Capella, who published several philological pieces, partly in profe, and partly in verse, which are still extant, and divided into feven books. He is faid in the manuscript copies to have been honoured with the proconsular dignity. He was a native of Carthage; and truly his barbarous and uncouth ftyle plainly shews, that he was no Roman. In his allegorical marriage of Mercury with the sciences, there is a great deal of erudition; but the invention is low and mean (48). Securus Melior Felix, who professed the christian religion, and taught rhetoric at Clermont in Auvergne, was at the trouble of correcting in 534. one of the copies of Capella's works. Felix is flyled in that manufcript V. SP. Com. Confil. that is, Vir speciabilis, comes confilorianus, a man of rank, and one of the contistorial or the emperor's counsellors (49). Capella was greatly effectmed in France about the end of the fixth century, as appears from Gregory of Tours (50). Sosspater Charifius, who published five books of obfervations on the grammar, still extant, flourished, according to Baillet, in the time of Honorius, and before him a grammarian named Diomedes, whose works have likewise reached our times; but strangely mangled by Johannes Casarius, who published them, with many observations of his own. Charifius is quoted by Priscian, who wrote about the end of the fifth century (51). About the same time Fabius Fulgentius Planciades published an explication of some words, addressed to one Calcidius, another grammarian. He is styled, and indeed deservedly, both by Vessius (52) and Baillet (53), one of the most ignorant, impertinent and trifling authors that ever wrote. He ascribes to Tacitus, and other writers, works never before heard of. Cave calls him an arrant trifler (54); and all other critics speak of him with the utmost contempt. In the reign of Theodosius I. or his children, was published, as is commonly believed, what we call the map or tables of Peutinger, which are a kind of itinerary made by some quarter-master, if we may so call him, for the use of those who conducted the Roman troops from one place to another. The author feems to have been altogether ignorant, both of geography and mathematics. These tables belonged to one Conrad Pentinger in Augsbourg, and are thence called the tables of Peutinger; but they were published by Velser, who had them engraved by John Mores of Antwerp. The reader will find them in the theatrum geographicum of Bretius, published at Amsterdam in 1619. and among Velser's works, published at Nuremberg in 1682. A civilian, by name Eusebius, described the war of Gainas in a poem, which he styled Gainades; and the same subject was handled by another poet, named Ammonius, who read it to Theodofius Il. in 438. Both these poems were greatly esteemed (55); but neither of them has reached our times. Voffins supposes them to have been written in the Greek tongue, and ranks the authors among the Greek poets (56).

<sup>(47)</sup> Vide Baill. 10m. 2. p. 29—32. (49) Wilt. p. 4. (50) Vide Voss. p. 713, 714. Lat. l. 1. c. 30. p. 159 (53) Baill. p. 38, 39. (56) Voff. poet. Grac. c. 9. p. 77, 78.

<sup>(48)</sup> Idem, p. 34, 35. Voss hist. Lat. l. iii. p. 712, 713. (51) Vide Baill. tom. 3. p. 36-40. (52) Voss hist. (54) Cavescripe, eccles. p. 274. (55) Socr. p. 309.

A 17.75 1.

*, *, * 11

. 10 . . .

a greatest fatigues and tolls attending a military life. He is no less commended by the antients on account of his prudence, address, and penetration in state assairs, than for his courage, intrepidity, and experience in war. He was quite free from avarice, had but little ambition, and was such a lover of justice, that no recommendations, however preffing, were capable of making him fwerve from what to him appeared equitable. Such is the character given him by Frigeridus, a writer who flourished in his time, as quoted by Gregory of Tours'. Prosopius writes, that Aetius and Bonifacius, who defended, as we have observed above, Marfeilles, when attacked by Ataulphus, were the two greatest commanders in the whole empire, and that they deserved to be called the last Romans ". John, upon his usurping the empire, committed to He sides with b Aetius the care of his palace, and then fent him to engage the Hunns in his cause, the usurper.

with orders to fall upon the rear of the troops of Theodofius, if they entered Italy, while he himself charged them in front v. On the second of January of the present year, Eudocia was declared Augusta x.

THE next consuls were Castinus and Victor. The former was general of the troops in the west. Of the latter we find no farther mention in history. In an antient inscription, John the usurper is styled consul, he being probably acknowledged in the west, and not Victor, whom we may suppose to have belonged to the eastern empire v. This year Theodosius, having drawn together all the forces of the eastern empire, ordered them to march to the frontiers of Dalmatia, under the conduct of Ardaburius, c his fon Aspar, and Candidianus. With them he sent Placidia, and her son Valentinian, allowing the former to refume the title and enfigns of Augusta, which had been Theodosius given her by her brother Honorius, but she had quitted upon her entering the domi- grants to Plagiven her by her brother Honorius, but me nad quitted upon her entering the double cidiathetine nions of Theodosius; and the latter to wear the habit peculiar to the nobilissimi; which of Augusta, title had some time since been given to the sons of emperors before they were created and to Valenti-Cæfars. This was renouncing all pretentions to the empire of the west, and tacitly man that of yielding it to Placidia and Valentinian. Before they left Constantinople, Theodosius Casar. betrothed his daughter Licinia Eudoxia, born in 422. to young Valentinian, born on the second or third of July in 419. When this ceremony was over, Placidia set out from Constantinople with her son, who, upon his arrival at The salonica, received the d enligns peculiar to the Casars, at the hands of Helio, magister officiorum to Theodosius, by whom he had been fent thither for that purpose z. The following year, Theodosius being conful the eleventh time, with Valentinian, the army of Theodofius having croffed Pannonia and Illyricum, appeared unexpectedly before Salona, which was taken by with Placidia and Valentinian, by land to Aquileia, while the foot, under the command of his father Ardaburius, was conveyed thither by fea. This scheme was so well executed on the fide of Aspar, that arriving at Aquileia, before the enemy had the least notice of his march, he entered the place without opposition; but the fleet Aspartaket being dispersed by a violent storm, Ardaburius was driven ashore, and taken by the Aquileia from e usurper's soldiers, who immediately carried him to their emperor, then at Ravenna, the usurper. by whom he was received with great joy, and treated with the utmost civility, the usurper hoping, by his means, to prevail upon Theodosius, with whom Ardaburius bore a great sway, to acknowledge him for his collegue. As he was allowed to converse with whom he pleased, he gained over the chief officers, who had already begun to be tired of their new prince, and privately acquainting his son Aspar with the security in which the tyrant lived, advised him to advance speedily with his best troops to Ravenna. Aspar immediately set out from Aquileia with the cavalry; and being conducted through the marshes which surrounded Ravenna on the land-side by a shepherd, whom Socrates supposes to have been an angel, he entered the city, find- He surprises fform. There it was agreed among the generals, that Aspar should lead the cavalry, f ing the gates open and unguarded, and, with the affishance of the officers gained over Ravenna. and by his father, secured the tyrant before he had time to make his escape, and sent him takes the ulur in chains to Placidia and Valentinian, then at Aquileia, who ordered first his right- to death. hand, and then his head, to be cut off a. Procopius writes, that after his hand was cut off in the circus, he was, by way of derision, carried about the streets on an ass, exposed to the outrages and insults of the incensed multitude b. Thus ended the usurpation of John, after he had borne the title of emperor about a year and fix months,

PROCOP. bell. Vand. l. i.c. 3, p. 183. W OLYMP. p. 96. Prosf. chron. 7 Sidon. p. 137. DLYMP. p. 169. Prosp. chron. Philost. p. 573. Socr. p. 363. Philostore. p. 538. OLYMP. ibid. p. 197. Procop. bell. * GREG. Tur. p. 50. * Chron. Alex. p. 726. GREG. Tur. p. 57. Vand. l. i. c. 3. p. 181.

according

into favour.

Valentinian III. declared emperor of the west, and his mother Placidia regent.

Thrace rausged by the Hunns.

The Goths removed from Pannonia into Thrace.

Bonifacius in great favour with Placidia.

He is forced, by the treachery of Actius and Felix to revolt.

according to Philostorgius. Three days after his death, Actius entered Italy, with an a army of fixty thousand Hunns, who being met by Aspar, a bloody battle was fought, without any confiderable advantage on either fide; but in the mean time Actius, informed of the death of the usurper, thought it adviseable to make the best terms he could for himself. Accordingly, Placidia promising not only to receive him into Actius submits, favour, but to distinguish him with the title of count, he submitted, and prevailed and is received upon the Hunns to return into their own country d. Castinus, who was supposed to have favoured the usurpation of John, was sent into exile. When news of the captivity and death of the usurper was brought to Constantinople, Theodosius declared his cousin, young Valentinian, emperor, and Placidia regent of the empire during her son's minority. He intended to have taken a progress into Italy, in order to invest b him there with the fovereignty, and with that defign advanced as far as Thessalonica; but was seized in that city with a malady, which obliged him to return to Constantinople, whence he dispatched Helio to Rome, where Valentinian then was, with the purple and imperial diadem, which the young prince received on the twenty-third of Ostober of the present year 425 f. The same year the Vandals, who had settled in Spain, ravaged the Balearic islands; and the Goths, to whom settlements had been allotted in Gaul, seized on some of the neighbouring cities, and even laid siege to Arles; which however they were forced to raise at the approach of Aetius, who was fent against them with a considerable army 8. In the east, Thrace was laid waste by the Hunns, probably the same who came to the assistance of the usurper John, and e even threatened Constantinople with a siege; but their leader, by name Rougas, or Roilas, being killed with lightning, and great numbers of them being daily swept away by a plague, which broke out in their army, the rest withdrew of their own accord, dreading, not the valour of the Romans, says Socrates, but the power of Heaven, which had evidently espoused the cause of Theodosius. The following year 426, when Theodofius was conful the twelfth time, and Valentinian the second, nothing remarkable happened in either empire. But under the next confuls, Hierius and Ardaburius, the Goths, who had held Pannonia ever fince the year 377. When they first entered that province, were by Theodofius transferred from thence into Thrace, where they continued for the space of fifty-eight years, that is, till they made themselves d masters of Italy, under the conduct of Theodoric . This gives us room to believe, that Theodosius, in yielding the western empire to Valentinian, retained Pannonia, which comprised that part of the present Austria and Hungary, that lies on the Roman side of the Danube, and had hitherto belonged to the empire of the west. Great disturbances happened this year in Africa, which were attended with the loss of that The celebrated count Bonifacius, who is styled by St. Austin the joy of the church, the bulwark of Africa, and the glory of the empire, had been rewarded by Honorius, for his gallant behaviour at Marseilles, with the command of the troops in Africa; which province he defended with great bravery against the repeated attempts of John, tho' acknowledged by all the other commanders, and governors of pro- & vinces. Placidia, highly pleased with his conduct and loyalty, called him to court, upon the death of that tyrant; and after bestowing upon him the highest encomiums, preferred him to the post of comes domesticorum, and sent him back into Africa with This gave no small jealousy to his rivals at court, especially to an unlimited power. Felix, commander in chief of the Roman forces, and to Aetius, who, after his departure, persuaded Placidia, that he had preserved Africa for himself, and only waited an opportunity of establishing there an independent sovereignty. Actius added, that the empress might, when she pleased, oblige him to pull off the mask, by recalling him from his government; for he was very fure Bonifacius would disobey her orders. Hereupon the credulous princess immediately ordered Bonifacius to repair to Rome; f but Actius having written to him before, that the empress sought his ruin, and, in order to compass it, would soon recal him, advising him at the same time, with great protestátions of friendship, to consult his own safety, he, upon the receipt of Placidia's letter, concluded Actius to be his true friend, and following his advice, refused to comply with the orders he had received. Hereupon Placidia, no longer questioning the truth of Actius's information, declared Bonifacius a public enemy, and dispatched a strong body of troops against him, under the command of Mavortius, Galbio, and

d Idem ibid. Cassion. chron. e PHILOST. ibid. e Prosp. chron. F Socr. l. vii. c. 24. p. 364. OLYMP, ibid. IDAT. chron. 8 Sidon. p. 22. Imat. chron. b Socr. p. 387. I THEOP.

31

n

10- t

CT4

Ü

1

13

T.

10 70

1 20%

- E

or III

'n0

di

į (O

nig che

ø

jes,

a Sinex, who belieged Bonifacius, in what place we are no-where told, and kept him thut up, till quarrelling among themselves, Mavortius and Galbio were killed by the treachery of Sinex, and he in a fally by Bonifacius, who gained a complete victory, Defeats the without the loss of one man. Placidia, being resolved, notwithstanding the ill success troops sent of her three generals, to pursue the war with vigour, committed the whole management of it to Sigifult, by nation a Goth, who, without loss of time, passing over Another army into Africa, with a great number of his countrymen, made himself master of Car-lent to reduce thage and Hippo. Bonifacius, finding the empress obstinately bent upon his ruin, and himself not in a condition to contend with the whole strength of the empire, had recourse to the Vandals, who, ever since the deseat of Castinus in 422. had peaceably He recurs to b enjoyed the province of Batica or Andalusia, and were at this time governed by Gen- Genseric king feric, brother to their late king Gonderic. Genseric was, according to Jornandes k and Procopius, of a low stature, and lame by a fall from his horse: he thought much, and spoke little; was an enemy to pleasure and debauchery; had a wonderful address in gaining the affections of the people, and fowing diffentions among his enemies. He was remarkably brave and courageous; but no less ambitious and passionate; well skilled in the art of war, and long inured to the hardships and toils attending it. He renounced the catholic faith, which he first professed, to embrace the doctrine of Arius, which prevailed among his countrymen the Vandals m. His brother Gonderic left several sons behind him; but he caused them all to be put to death, together with their mother ". With this barbarian Bonifacius, whose piety had been formerly fo much extolled by St. Austin o, was forced, in his own defence, to enter into a treaty, whereof the chief, and perhaps the only, article was, that, upon their affifting him, Africa should be divided between Gonderic, says Procopius falsly, suppoling him still alive, Genseric and himself P. The treaty being agreed to, Genseric, who passes over having affembled a great number of veffels, ordered all his Vandals, women and chil-into Africa. dren, as well as men, to embarque; and abandoning Spain in the month of May of the year 228. while Felix and Taurus were confuls, croffed the streights of Gibraltar, and landed in Africa 9. The Romans took possession anew of the provinces which the Vandals had abandoned, and held them, till they were driven out by the Sued vians, as the Suevians were in their turn by the Goths, who, by that means, came to settle in that part of Spain. The same year Aetius was sent into Gaul, to make war upon the Francs, whom he defeated with great flaughter, and obliged them to The Franks abandon the country on the Roman fide of the Rhine, in which they had been allowed driven out of Gaul by Actius, by Honorius to settle, and to retire with their families beyond that river '. What gave occasion to this war, we are no-where told. The Franks were governed at this time by Clodius, as Prosper Tyro styles him, or Clodion, as he is called by Gregory of Tours, and the modern writers. He is supposed to have been the son, as well as the successor of Faramond. Nothing happened this year in the east worthy of notice, except the publishing of a law, by which all brothels were suppressed in e Constantinople . Florentius and Dionysius, consuls for the year 429. were succeeded by Theodosius and Valentinian, the former the thirteenth time, and the latter the third time consul. During the consulship of the two princes, Actius was raised to the chief Who is appointcommand of all the troops of the western empire, in the room of Felix, who was at ed commander the same time created a partition, but soon after killed in Revenue by the must in chief of all the same time created a patrician; but soon after killed in Ravenna by the muti-the forces of the nous soldiery, stirred up against him by Aetius, jealous of his great credit at court. mestern empire. The same year Actius gained considerable advantages over the Juthongi, whose country bordered on Rhætia; over the inhabitants of Noricum, who had revolted; and over the Goths in Gaul, attempting to raise new disturbances in that province x. The following year, when Bassus and Antiochus were consuls, Aetius intirely reduced the f Norici, and likewise the Vindelici, who had joined the former in their revolt. From Noricum he passed into Gaul, to awe the Franks, who were said to be in arms ". This year Placidia discovered at length the true cause of the revolt of Bonifacius. Some of Placidia acthat general's friends, greatly surprised at his entering all on a sudden into an alli-quainted with ance with the enemies of the empire, after having defended it against the barbarians the true cause with so much zeal and integrity, obtained leave of the empress to pass over into Bonisacius.

* JORN. c. 36. p. 657. 1 PROCOP. p. 184. ** IDAT. p. 17.

* Aug. ep. 70. p. 126. P PROCOP. p. 45. 4 PROSP. chron. IDAT. p. t

Vandal. p. 3. F PROCOP. p. 19. IDAT. ibid. CASSSIOD. chron. JORN

* Tyr. Prosp. Greg. Tur. hift. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 64. w Cod. T.

p. 38. ** IDAT. Sidon. car. vii. p. 338. JORN. ret. Goth. c. 34. p. 660. 1 PROCOP. p. 184.

** IDAT. p. 17.

** MALEL. hift. chron. 10cop. p. 45.

9 Prosp. chron. IDAT. p. 18. Vict. Vit. de perfec.

9. IDAT. ibid.

CASSSIOD. chron. JORN. rer. Goth. c. 34. p. 66c.

"ur. hift. Franc. l. ii. c. 9. p. 64.

W Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 8. leg. 13. y IDAT. p. 19. Vol. VI. Nº 7.

Africa, in order to confer with him in person, and hear what he could alledge in his a own defence. Bonifacius was overjoyed to see them, and produced, upon their

to perjuade the Vandals to retire from Atrica. cius's men cut in pieces by Genteric.

by Genieric,

all Africa.

A civil war between Bonifacius and Aethe former is killed.

charging him with treason and rebellion, the letter which Aetius had written to him, protesting, that nothing but his own safety and preservation could have induced him to turn his arms against his prince and country. With this letter they returned to Placidia, who was thereby fully convinced of the treachery of Aetius; but not thinking it adviseable to provoke him, as he was then at the head of a victorious army in Gaul, she concealed her indignation for the present, and contented herself with expressing, in a letter to Bonifacius, her fincere detestation of the injury that had been done him; withal affuring him of her favour and protection for the future; and exhorting him to return to his duty, and confulting, with his usual zeal, the safety of the empire, b drive out the barbarians, whom, for his own fafety, he had called in. This Boni-He endeavour; facius readily undertook, offering them immense sums, provided they quitted Africa, and returned to Spain; but as they had already reduced the whole country, except three cities, viz. Carthage, Hippo, and Cirtha, Genseric first returned him a scoffing answer; and then falling upon him, cut most of his men in pieces, and obliged Most of Bonifa. Bonifacius himself to fly to Hippo: which place the barbarians immediately invested; but were obliged the following year, for want of provisions, to raise the siege, after it had continued for the space of fourteen months, Genseric attacking the town almost daily with incredible fury, and Bonifacius defending it with equal vigour and intrepidity 7. In the east was held this year an œcumenic council at Ephesus, in which the c doctrine of Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, afferting not only two natures in Christ, but two persons, was condemned, and he deposed on the twenty-second of June, the fentence of his deposition being figned by above two hundred bishops. The next year Actius was raised to the consulship, Placidia still pretending to be unacquainted with his treacherous conduct towards Bonifacius. He had for his collegue Valerius, the preceding year prefect of Constantinople. This year Bonifacius, reinforced with powerful succours sent him both by Placidia and Theodosius, offered battle to the Vandals; Bonifacius and who readily accepting it, cut most of his men in pieces, took an incredible number Afpar defeated of prisoners, and obliged the rest to shelter themselves among the rocks and mountains. Among the prisoners was Marcianus, who afterwards attained to the empire. d Aspar, who commanded on this occasion the eastern troops, with much-ado escaped out of Africa, and returned to Constantinople, as did Bonifacius to Italy, being invited Who over-runs thither by Placidia. Upon their departure, the barbarians over-ran all Africa, committing every-where dreadful ravages, and unheard-of cruelties; which struck the inhabitants of Hippo with such terror, that they abandoned their city, which was first pillaged, and then fet on fire, by the victorious enemy. St. Austin, bishop of the place, died the year before, in the fourth month of the siege. Carthage and Cirtha were now the only places in all Africa held by the Romans. Bonifacius, upon his arrival at Ravenna, was received with extraordinary demonstrations of kindness and esteem by Placidia, and raised to the chief command of the army, in the room of e Actius; who, finding his treachery discovered, and dreading the power of Bonifacius, assembled the forces under his command, in order to destroy his rival. Bonifacius, at his approach, marched out at the head of a body of chosen troops to meet tius, in which him. Hereupon a battle ensuing, Bonifacius received a wound, of which he died three months after b. Thus Marcellinus, who did not, it seems, think it necessary to acquaint us in what place the battle was fought, nor which fide carried the day. The same writer adds, that Bonifacius on his death-bed exhorted his wife Pelagia to marry no man but Aetius, if his wife should die before him. Aetius, dreading the refentment of Placidia, withdrew to the court of Rugula, or Rouas, king of the Hunns, whence he returned foon after, at the head of a numerous army of barbarians; but f the empress promising not only to pardon him, but restore him to his former post, he dismissed the barbarians, and returned to court, where he was this very year raised to the rank of a patrician c. The following year, Theodosius being consul the fourteenth time, with Petronius Maximus, a dreadful fire broke out at Constantinople, which lasted three days, and confumed all the public granaries, with many other stately edifices, and great part of the city d. In the following confulship of Aspar and Areobindus, Honoria, fifter to the emperor Valentinian, having suffered herself to be debauched by

b MARC, chron.

· Idem ibid. Prosp. chron. · PROSP. IDAT. chron.

đ

ż

1

S

ان

ad:

r.

ý,

7.

1

Ź

Ĭ.

7.1 . 1

11 an)

لثالنا

, or

M.L

:7

(1)

a one of her domestics, named Eugenius, was banished the court, being then sixteen years old, and fent to Constantinople, her mother Placidia having discovered, that, by means of her eunuchs, she maintained a private correspondence with Attila, who Honor'a fifter had succeeded Rouas king of the Hunns; that she had even sent him a ring, and was to Valentinian, daily pressing him to enter Italy at the head of a powerful army, and marry her. The responds with following year 435. Theodosius being consul the fifteenth time, and Valentinian the Attila. fourth, a peace was at length concluded with the Vandals in Africa, to whom the The Romans Romans yielded great part of Numidia, all the province Proconfularis, and likewise yield great part Bizacene. This treaty was figned at Hippo, on the eleventh of February, by Genseric, of Africa to the and by Trigetius, who had succeeded Bonifacius in Africa. The king of the Vandals.

b delivered up to the Romans his son Huneric by way of hostage. The same year Actius gained a great victory over the Burgundians, who having been allowed in 413. to fettle in that part of Gaul which borders on the Rhine, had revolted from the Romans, and plundered Belgic Gaul. Gondicarius, their king, was obliged to submit to fuch conditions, as the conqueror thought fit to impose upon him and his people s. But Gondicarius did not long enjoy the peace which Aetius had granted him, being soon after, that is, in the beginning of the following year, when Anthemius Isidorus and Senator were consuls, attacked by the Hunns, and cut off, with twenty thousand 20,000 Burof his men 8. Socrates writes, that of the unhappy Burgundians three thousand only gundians cut were left alive, who having embraced the christian religion, and received the facra-Hunns.

c ment of baptism, went, full of courage and confidence, to attack the enemy, of whom they killed a thousand, and obliged the rest to save themselves by a precipitous flight h. Thus Socrates. But Orosius assures us, that the Burgundians had embraced the christian religion before the year 417. The Goths, who had been allowed to settle in Aquitain, as we have observed above, and had Theodoric for their king, not fatisfied with the countries that had been allotted them, made themselves masters of several neighbouring cities belonging to the Romans, and even laid siege to Nar- The Goths bebonne; which however they were forced to raise, either this year 436. or the following, fiege Narbonne; but are obliged as Idatius will have it, count Litorius coming seasonably to the relief of the place to drop the en with a numerous body of Hunns, who falling upon the Goths, put them to flight, and terprize, and d entered the city, each horseman carrying with him two bushels of corn; which proved retire. a very welcome supply, the inhabitants being by the long siege reduced to the utmost extremity . While these things passed in the west, Theodosius completed the ruin of Theodosius's edict against all idolatry in the east, by a law enacted in 435. ordering all the temples, oratories, manner of ido. and places confectated to the worship of the idols, to be pulled down, and forbidding latrous worship his subjects, on pain of death, to practise any of the pagan ceremonies, either in public or private. By this law the very foundations of the temples were to be intirely demolished, and the sign of the christian religion, no doubt the cross, to be set up in the place where they had stood '. Theodosius passed part of the year 436. at Cyzi-The following year 437. when Aetius was conful the second time, with Sigife vultus, or Sigifvult, the Romans, affished by the Hunns, pursued the war against the Goths in Gaul m; but with what success, we are no-where told. The Saxon pirates began this year to infest the coasts of the Armorici . Eudoxia, the daughter of Theodofius by the empress Eudocia, had been betrothed to Valentinian in 424. as we have related above; and this year the nuptials were celebrated with great solemnity Eudoxia, the at Constantinople, on the twenty-ninth of October, Valentinian being then eighteen daughter of years and five months old. The ceremony was to have been performed at Theffalo-Theodosius, nica; but Valentinian, out of complaisance to the royal bride, proceeded to Constan-lentinian III. tinople; which city he entered on the twenty-first of October. Theodosius, in giving, or, as others will have it, in betrothing his daughter, to Valentinian, obliged the f young prince to yield to him West Illyricum, comprehending the Upfer and Lower Who yields to Pannonia, Dalmatia, and the two Noricums, viz. Mediterraneum and Ripense P. The Theodosius West Illyritwo Pannonia's comprised that part of Austria and Hungary, that lies on the Roman cum. side of the Danube; and the two Noricums the archbishopric of Saltzburg, with Styria and Carinthia. As for East Illyricum, it had belonged to the emperors of Constantinople ever fince the time of Gratian, who yielded it to Theodofius the Great. Valen-

PROSP. chron. PROCOP. p. 386. f IDAT. p. 21. SID. car. vii. p. 338. B IDAT. p. 25. VALES. rer. Franc. l. iii. p. 136—138. B Socr. l. vii. c. 30. p. 371, 372. OROS. l. vii. c. 32. p. 305. B IDAT. p. 21. SID. car. vi. p. 346. Cod. Theod. tit. 10. leg. 25. p. 296. Theodor. l. v. c. 36. p. 749. B PROSP. MARC. chron. B SID. car. vii. p. 342. Socr. l. vii. c. 44. p. 388. Chron. Alex. p. 570. Socr. ibid. Chron. Alex. JORN. de reg. fuc. p. 92, 93.

tinian lest Constantinople in the latter end of this year; and having spent the winter a at Thessalonica, returned early in the spring to Ravenna. He had by Eudoxia two daughters, viz. Eudocia and Placidia.

8000 Goths cut in pieces by Actius in Gaul.

Toulouse bejeeged by Litorius

His men are eut in pieces by Theodoric,

Theodoric concludes a peace with the Romans.

by the Suevians, and Carthage by the Vandals.

THE following year, Theodosius being consul the sixteenth time, with Acilius Glabrio Faustus, the Suevians, who had settled in Galicia in 409. under the conduct of their king Ermeric or Hermeric, came, after a long and bloody war to an agreement with the ancient inhabitants 9; but the articles of that treaty have not been trainfmitted to us. The Romans still pursued the war against the Goths in Gaul, of whom eight thousand were this year cut in pieces by Actius. In the east Justinian published, on the fifteenth of February of the present year 438. his famous code, that is, a collection of all the best and most useful laws that had been enacted by the b lawful princes his predecessors. Eight able civilians were employed in this work, at the head of whom was Antiochus, who had been consul in 431. Such laws as were not contained in this code, were declared to be of no force. It was immediately received in the west; nay, it met with better success there than in the east, where The Justinian it obtained only for the space of about ninety years, that is, to the reign of Justicode published nian, who abrogated this, and published a new code: but in the west it was received by Theodoric, and the Ostrogoths, who made themselves masters of Italy about the end of the fifth century, and likewise by Alaric, king of the Visigoths or Westrogoths, in Languedoc and Spain. The laws that were afterwards added to the code by Theodosius, and some other princes, were called Novellæ. Theodosius, in publishing the c code, enacted, that the laws made by one prince should be of no force in the dominions of the other, unless confirmed and figned by him s. In the following confulship of Theodosius, the seventeenth time consul, and of Festus, Litorius, after having gained great advantages over the Goths in Gaul, laid fiege to Toulouse, their capital. Theodoric, who was in the place, sent several catholic bishops to Litorius, with very reasonable proposals; nay, he offered in the end to submit to what terms the Romans thought fit to impose upon him, begging only, that they would grant to him and his Goths their lives and liberty. But Litorius, confiding in the valour of his Hunns, and defirous of taking the Gothish king alive, and carrying him in triumph, would hearken to no proposals. Hereupon Theodoric, having first performed his devotions, d and visited all the churches of his capital in the habit of a penitent, sallied out at the head of his Goths; and falling upon the enemy, cut most of them in pieces; put the few who survived the general slaughter, to slight; and having surrounded Litoand he himself rius, while he was attempting to make his escape, took him alive in spite of the taken prisoner. vigorous and desperate resistance he made, and carried him with his hands tied behind his back into that city, which he had hoped to enter that very day in triumph. Theodoric caused him to be exposed for some time to the insults and outrages of the populace and children, and then to be thrown into the public prison, where he died foon after. Litorius seems to have been a pagan; for he reposed great confidence in the answers of the aruspices ". He was, next to Aetius, the most powerful man, e and the best general, in the western empire w. After this victory, the Goths might have easily extended their conquests to the Rhone; but Theodoric, thinking he ought to use with moderation a victory, for which he acknowledged himself in a particular manner indebted to heaven, hearkened to the proposals of Avitus, presect of Gaul, and this very year concluded a peace with the Romans upon very reasonable terms 1. fornandes supposes this peace to have been made by Litorius, and no battle to have been fought, or victory gained by the Goths; so little was that writer acquainted even with the history of his own nation. The Hunns, who served under Litorius, were commanded by a king of their own nation, named Gauseric, who, during this war, laid siege to the city of Bazas, belonging to the Goths; but is said to have t been obliged by a miraculous apparition to drop the enterprize and retire, as the Merida taken reader will find related at length by Gregory of Tours y. The fame year Merida, then the metropolis of Lusitania, was taken by Richila, who the year before had succeeded his father Hermeric, king of the Suevians, in Galicia 2. But the loss of Carthage in Africa, surprised on the twenty-third of Ottober of the present year by r Prosp. chron. PRROSP. chron. Doviat. hist. jur. civ. c. 1. Ritters-9 IDAT. p. 21, 22. nut. in jur. Just. c. 3. Cod. Theod. nov. 1. p. 1. GREG. Tur. hist. Fran. l. ii. c. 27. p. 81. Satv. atvian. de gub. l. vii. p. 164. w Idem ibid. p. 164. SID. car. vii. p. 340. IDAT. p. 22. x PROSP. IDAT. chron. SID. car. vii. p. 341. SALVIAN. de gub. l. vii. p. 164. Y GREG. Tur. de glor. martyr. i. i. c. 13, p.31-34. 3 IDAT. p. 22.

ر د

Œ,

から 一

īľ.

أثر iii N

湖湖

js cl

, b

e 32

a Genseric, king of the Vandals, proved a more fatal blow to the western empire. By the taking of that important place, which had belonged to the Romans for the space of five hundred and eighty-five years, the Vandals remained masters of the Proconfularis, of Byzacene, Getulia, and part of Numidia. However, Valentinian maintained so long as he lived, the two Mauritania's, viz. Casariensis and Sitisensis, with Tripolitana, Tingitana, and that part of Numidia in which Cyrtha stood. In the east nothing worthy of notice happened this year, except the journey which the empress Eudocia undertook to Jerusalem, in compliance with a vow she had made to visit the holy places there z. She passed through Antioch, where, in the presence of the fenate and people, she pronounced a speech in commendation of that city from a b throne of gold enriched with precious stones a. At her departure, she presented the magistrates with a very considerable sum, for the relief of the indigent citizens. The inhabitants of that metropolis acknowledged the kindness she had shewed them by erecting two statues to her honour, placing the one, which was of brass, in the museum; and the other, which was plated over with gold, in the senateb. At Jerusalem she presented Juvenal, bishop of the place, with great sums, to be distributed among the poor, and with a cross of gold, adorned with precious stones, to be set up on mount Calvary; for which the bishop is said to have presented her in his turn with the right hand of St. Stephen, the protomartyr c. The following year, when Valentinian was conful the fifth time with Anatolius, Genseric made a descent Sicily ravaged c upon Sicily in the month of June; and meeting with little or no relistance, ravaged by Gentleric. the open country, committing unheard-of cruelties, and even laid fiege to Palermo: but not being able to reduce the place, he returned to Africa with an immense booty d. The fame year count Cenforius, who had been fent by Valentinian to negotiate a peace between the Suevians in Galicia, and the natives of that country, was befieged by Recbila in Merfola on the Guadiana, where he refided, and, upon the reduction of the place, taken prisoner. About the same time, Aetius, removing the Burgundians The Burgundifrom the banks of the Rhine, allotted them fettlements in the present duchy of Eavoy, and rewarded a body of Alans, who had served the Romans with great fidelity under by Actius to and rewarded a body of Alans, who had ferved the Romans with great fidelity under the present the conduct of their king Eocaric or Eocric, with lands on the Loire f. These Alans duchy of Savoy. d are supposed to have settled afterwards with the Britons in Armorica 8. Bucherius takes Sangiban, king of the Alans, mentioned by Jornandes, to have been the successfor of Eccaric b. As Salvianus wrote at this time his treatife on judgments, we shall transcribe out of that piece a passage, wherein the author acquaints us with the chief virtues and vices of the several barbarous nations then infesting the empire. The Goths, says that writer, are treacherous, but chaste: the Alans are not so chaste, but less treacherous: the Franks are liars, but kind to strangers: the Saxons are exceeding cruel, but wonderfully chaste. But tho' the Saxons are cruel, continues Salvianus, the Gepidæ are void of humanity, the Hunns lewd and deceitful, the Alemans drunkards, the Alans lovers of plunder, and the Franks deceitful and perfidious to such a e degree as to look upon false oaths as ornaments of speech; yet these vices are not so criminal in the barbarians as in the Romans, who are instructed in the morals of the christian religion i. The same writer observes elsewhere k, that tho' the Goths would not fuffer their own people to frequent brothels, yet in the countries allotted to them they kept up those infamous places for the sake of the Romans, who lived among them, and claimed the scandalous privilege of frequenting them without restraint. In the east, Paulinus, the empress Eudocia's chief savourite, who by her Paulinus pur interest had been raised in 430. to the high post of magister officiorum, was this year to death by the put to death by the emperor's orders at Casarea in Cappadocia. And this is all emperor's orwe find in the ancient writers concerning this remarkable event. The more modern f Greeks ascribe his death to the jealousy of Theodosius; and tell us, that the emperor The cause of being presented on the sixth of January with an apple of an uncommon size, and his disgrace, as extraordinary beauty, he immediately fent it, as a rarity, to Eudocia, and she to related by the Paulinus, in whose conversation she took great delight, as he was a man of learn-writers. ing, and the empress herself well versed in all the branches of literature. Paulinus, not knowing by whom it had been fent to the empress, thought it a proper present for the emperor, and accordingly carried it to him. This raised some jealousy in

b Idem ibid. Chron. Al. p. 731. & Chron. Al. p. 730. E IDAT. Buch. Belg. p. 492. Vol. VI. Nº 7. 6 H Theodosius, Theodosius, who thereupon dismissed Paulinus; and sending for Eudocia, asked her a ing between the emperor and his wife retires to Jerufalem.

The conful Cyrus firipped of his confular ornaments by the emperor.

Theodosius fends a power. ful firet and army against Genieric.

Bu he is them; and Valentinian, to conclude a peace with Genseric.

what was become of the apple. The empress, not caring to own she had given it to Paulinus, answered, she had eat it. Upon this, the emperor, producing it, commanded Paulinus to be immediately executed, and from that time shewed himself fo indifferent towards the empress, that she begged leave soon after to return to ferusalem, and to continue in that city, which was readily granted her. Thus Constantine Manasses, Zonaras, Nicephorus, Glycas and Codinus ". That Eudocia Misunderstand- retired about this time to Jerusalem is very certain; and likewise, that there was a misunderstanding between her and the emperor, who caused a priest, by name Severus, and a deacon, named John, whom Eudocia had carried with her from Con-Eudocia, who stantinople to Jerusalem, to be murdered, for no other reason, but because the empress b lived in great intimacy with them, and made them frequently rich prefents. This giving, either jealoufy to the prince, or occasion to scandalous resections, Theodosius dispatched Saturninus, his comes domesticorum, to ferusalem, with private orders to dispatch the two favourite ecclesiastics. Eudocia was so affected with their death, that, not mistress of her temper, she caused, in her turn, Saturninus to be murdered; which provoked the emperor to fuch a degree, that he ordered all the great officers of her court to quit her service, and return to Constantinople; which was reducing her to the condition of a private person. Thus she lived at Jerusalem to her death, Where she died, which happened in 460. She is faid to have solemnly declared on her death-bed, that she was altogether innocent as to the crime, of which Theodosius had suspected c her and Paulinus. As she was possessed of immense wealth, which the emperor left untouched, she built at Jerusalem a great number of churches, monasteries and hospitals, adorned the city with many stately edifices, and, at a vast expence, repaired the walls, which in most places were intirely ruined. She was buried in a magnificent tomb in the church of St. Stephen, which she had built in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem . Her piety is greatly extolled by most writers, especially by Cassiodorus, who styles her of all women the most pious, the most religious P. The following year, Cyrus alone was conful: he excelled in polite learning, especially in poetry; and having by that means gained the favour and protection of Eudocia, who took great delight in verses, he had been raised by her interest to the first d employments in the state. As he entered the circus this year with the consular ornaments, the people, by whom he was greatly beloved, received him with fuch acclamations, that the emperor, who was present, caused him out of jealousy, a few days after, to be stripped of all his employments, and his estate to be confiscated, giving out, that he was inclined to paganism, and that he aspired at the empire. Hereupon Cyrus fled for refuge to a church, and caused himself to be ordained priest. The emperor, respecting his new character, granted him his life, and soon after fuffered him to be ordained bishop, and to be raised to the see of Cotyea in Phrygia 9. As Genseric, king of the Vandals, was now become very formidable, Theodosius resolved in the end to affift Valentinian, his coufin and fon in-law, against so powerful an enemy. Accordingly he fitted out a fleet, confisting of eleven hundred large ships, and putting on board of it the flower of his army, under the conduct of Arcovindas, Ansilus, and Germanus, he ordered them to land in Africa, and joining the western forces there, to drive Genseric out of the countries he had usurped. They steered their course to Sicily, in order to pass more easily from thence over into Africa. But in the mean time, Genseric having sent a solemn embassy to Theodosius, and pretending to be desirous of concluding a peace with the two empires, the Roman generals waited on the coast of Sicily the result of the negotiations, which Genseric crastily spun out till the season proper for action was over r. While his embassadors were still at Constantinople, the Persians, with an open breach of the treaty made between the two f empires in 422. entered the Roman territories in a hostile manner; which obliged obliged to recal Theodofius to recal his forces, and Valentinian to conclude a peace with Genferic, which he could not obtain but by yielding to him all the countries in Africa, which he had seized, and we have mentioned above s. Anatolius and Aspar were dispatched against the Persians, who finding the Romans, whom they expected to surprise, upon their

m Manass, p. 55. Zonar. tom. iii. p. 37. Niceph. l. xiv. c. 23. p. 485. Glyc. p. 261. Codin. orig. Conftantinop. p. 56. R Evag. l. i. c. 21. p. 277, 278. Cedr. p. 343. Theoph. p. 88. Li. c. 22. p. 280. Ced. p. 337. Chron. Al. p. 732. Niceph. l. xiv. c. 50. p. 558, 559. P. Cassiod. pf. l. p. 174. Q. Zon. p. 35. Theoph. p. 83. Chron. Al. p. 736. Theoph. p. 87. Chron. Al. p. 730. Idem, p. 88.

guard,

Ü

d

d ::-

Ŋŀ

d.

î.

t.

ji.

1

対は高温

1

[5]

110

a guard, hearkened to an accommodation; so that a peace was concluded, whereof one of the chief conditions was, that neither the Persians nor the Romans should for the future raise any new fortifications on the frontiers'. The same year Arjaces, king of Armenia, dying, divided his kingdom between his two fons Tigranes and Arsaces; but by his last will bequeathed the far greater part to Tigranes. Hereupon Arfaces had recourse to Theodosius, who threatening to make war upon Tigranes, terrified the young prince to fuch a degree, that flying to the protection of the Persian king, he yielded to him his share, preferring the ease and quiet of a retired life to all the charms of a crown. Arsaces, on the other hand, dreading the power of the Persians, put Theodosius in possession of his share, upon certain conditions, one of b which was, that his family should enjoy for ever an intire liberty, and an exemption from all tribute and taxes ". Thus ended the kingdom of Armenia, after it had con- The end of the tinued for many ages, and given occasion to much bloodshed and endless wars, waged ancient kingby the Romans first with the Parthians, and afterwards with the Persians. It began dom of Armenia. and ended in an Arfaces. The share of Tigranes belonging to the Persians was called Persarmenia and Armenia Persica w. The part of Arjaces held by the Romans was thenceforth governed by a particular officer, with the title of comes Armenia, or count of Armenia x. The same year the Hunns, taking advantage of the wars, in The Hunns which the Romans were engaged with the Vandals and Persians, passed the Danube, invadeThrace. and with a formidable army tell unexpectedly upon Thrace. They had invaded that c province in 425. under the conduct of Rougas, their king, as we have related above; but he being killed with lightning, and at the same time a plague breaking out, and raging with great violence in his army, the barbarians repassed the Danube of their own accord, not caring, fays Socrates v, to engage in a war with the Romans, whose cause heaven had evidently espoused. Rougas was succeeded by Roas or Rouas in 434. who concluded a peace with the Romais, whereof one of the conditions was, that they should pay him a yearly pension of three hundred and sifty pounds weight of gold. A few years after, the Hunns resolving to drive out the Boischi, and other barbarous nations dwelling on the banks of the Danube, under the protection of the Romans, Rouas dispatched one Eilas to the court of Constantinople, threatening d to make war upon Theodosius, if he lent them the least affistance. Hereupon the two generals, Plintha and Dionysius, were appointed by the emperor to treat with the king of the Hunns, and divert him, if possible, from the resolution he had taken. But in the mean time Rouas dying, and his nephew, the famous Attila, of whom Rouas, king we shall speak at length in the history of the Hunns, succeeding him, the embassadors of the Hunns, were ordered to treat with him and his brother Bleda, his partner in the fovereignty. fucceeded by But in the room of Dionysius, who could not agree with Plintha, was sent the questor Attila. Epigenes, a man of great experience in negotiations. The embassiadors had an interview with the two princes in the neighbourhood of Margum, a city on the Danube in Upper Messia, at a place where the Margus or Margis falls into that river. The e Romans were obliged to confer with them on horse-back, the Huns refusing to dismount. The peace was confirmed, but upon such conditions as plainly betrayed The Romans the weakness and deplorable condition of the empire. These were, 1. That the conclude a Romans should deliver up to Attila and Bleda such Hunns as had taken, or should for Hunns upon the future take, refuge in the Roman dominions. 2. There the Person dominions as had taken, or should for Hunns upon the future take, refuge in the Roman dominions. 2. That the Roman prisoners, who most shameful should make their escape from the Hunns, without paying their ransom, should in conditions. like manner be delivered up, or eight pieces of gold be paid for each of them. 3. That, instead of three hundred and fifty pounds weight of gold, the Romans should for the future pay annually seven hundred. 4. That the Romans should not affift any nation whatfoever, when attacked by, or at war with the Hunns. In comf pliance with this shameful treaty, the Romans immediately delivered up to Attila fome princes of the royal blood of the Hunns, who were by his orders crucified like the meanest of slaves, in the fight of the Romans, for no other crime but because they had abandoned their own country to serve in their armies. Attila, being, in virtue of this treaty, at full liberty to make what conquest he pleased, reduced all the northern countries, his authority being acknowledged even by the feveral barbarous nations lying north of the Euxine sea?. Having thus extended his domini-

* Адатн. р. 237. Procop. bell. Perf. p. 8. * Procop. de ædif. l. iii. c. г. p. 52, 53. l.i. p. 29. Тнеовогет. р. 944. * Тнеов. р. 77. Procop. p. 29. У Socr. р. 38 hift. Goth. de legat. р. 45—48. w PROCOP. 7 Socr. p. 387. * PRIS.

Attila, notwithstanding the treaty of peace, paffes the Danube;

And makes

of several

ons, he resolved to take advantage of the wars in which Theodosius was engaged this a year with the Persians and Vandals; and accordingly, without any regard to the above-mentioned treaty, he passed the Danube at the head of a very numerous and formidable army, and entering Thrace, made himself master of several cities and strong holds, and, among the rest, of Viminacium, a place of great importance on the Danube, and of Margum, which was betrayed to him by the bishop of the place. Elated with this success, he dispatched a messenger to Theodosius, requiring, or rather commanding, him to deliver up forthwith all the Hunns who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions, to pay part of the tribute that had been owing for some time, and to settle what should be paid him for the future. Theodosius could not prevail upon himself to abandon those, who, after the declaration of war, had for- b faken Attila, and come over to him. Whereupon Attila began to ravage the country, putting all to fire and sword, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. He took by storm Retiarium on the Danube in Upper Masia, Singidunum, Naissus, and Sirmium, himself master formerly the capital of all Illyricum, with several other cities and strong holds, insomuch that Theodosius, not thinking himself safe at Constantinople, retired the following year 442. when Eudoxius and Dioscorus were consuls, into Asia 2. As to the issue of this war, we are left quite in the dark. All we know is, that this very year a peace was concluded between Attila and Theodosius, who thereupon returned to Constantinople, and entered that city on the twenty-seventh of August b. From this time Attila continued quiet till the year 447, contenting himself with only threatening to c make war upon the Romans, in order to draw from them corn, money, provisions, The Romans and whatever else he stood in need of; for the Romans, trembling at the very name dread the name of Attila, complied with all his demands, however unreasonable, and obeyed him, fays Prifeus, like so many slaves, that he might have no pretence to take arms against them. The embassadors he sent to Constantinople returned always loaded with prefents; infomuch that, when he thought fit to reward any of his own people, he used to fend them, under some pretence or other, with the character of embassadors to Theodosius, who, to court the friendship of their master, never failed to load them with prefents to a great value. Thus were the subjects of the empire impoverished to enrich the barbarians, their sworn enemies c. Attila, finding himself thus become d the terror of the Romans, is faid to have fent, out of mere wantonness, two Goths, with the character of embassadors, the one to Theodosius, and the other to Valentinian, whom, by his orders, they addressed thus; Attila, my master and yours, combehaviour and mands you to get ready a palace for his reception . During these transactions in the east, the Suevians made great progress in Spain, where they took the city of Seville, and reduced all Batica, with the province of Carthagena e.

THE following year, Maximus being conful the second time with Paterius, Theodosius, leaving Constantinople, visited the province of Pontus, where he caused the public edifices, and walls of Heraclea, to be repaired f. As he was one day, during this progress, marching on foot, greatly tormented with heat, dust, and thirst, an e officer of his guards presented him with a beautiful cup full of fresh and excellent liquor; but the emperor, returning the officer thanks in a most obliging manner, declared, that he would not by any means refresh himself, when it was not in his

of Attila.

His haughty arrogance.

The eunuch graced.

power to refresh those who attended him g. In 444. when Theodosius was consul the eighteenth time, with Albinus, died Arcadia, the fifter of Theodosius h. The same Arcadia dies. year the eunuch Antiochus, the emperor's great chamberlain, being convicted of extortion, and abusing his authority to the oppression of the people, was by Theodosius degraded from the rank of a patrician, and confined to the monastery of Antiochus dif- St. Euphemia at Chalcedon, stripped of the great wealth he had amassed, and deprived of all the honours which he had enjoyed i. Theophanes writes, that Theodosius made ! him pope, meaning perhaps, that he obliged him to take holy orders. Upon his difgrace, the emperor enacted a law excluding all eunuchs from the dignity of patrician k. The following year, when Valentinian was conful the fixth time with Nomus, nothing remarkable happened in the east; but in the west, Vitus being sent with a

The Romans confiderable army into Spain, to support the Romans, that is, the natives, against the defeated by the Suevians, most of his men were cut off by Recbila, and he obliged to save himself Suevians in Spain.

* Idem, p. 34—57. Chron. Al. p. 730. Prosp. Marcel. chron. Marc. Prosp. chron. Cod. Theod. tit. 10. leg. 9. p. 898. Prisc. p. 36, 37. Cod. Theod. nov. tit. 30. p. 13. Pasc. p. 395. Marc. chron. J. Zonar. tom. iii. p. 34. Тнеоги. p. 83. Cod. p. 48.

z !

Ç,

1

þ

13

Ĭ.

12

7

11

Ť (6

المنكنة

N.

Œ,

çi,

11

t

a by flight, and abandon the inhabitants to the mercy of those barbarians. The next year, Actius being consul the third time with Q. Aurelius Symmachus, the Britons, no longer able to withstand the Scots and Picts, had recourse to Aetius, who governed the western empire almost with an absolute sway; to move him to compassion, they wrote him a letter with the following direction, The groans of the Bri- The Britons tons to the conful Actius; but could not, with all their groans and tears, prevail upon to Actius. The learned Usher thinks, that Valentinian was then under apprehension of a war with Attila ". The venerable Bede supposes the Hunns to have already broken into the western empire o; but he was therein certainly mistaken. In the east a dreadful plague raged this and the following year, 4 when Ardaburius and Alypius were confuls, and violent earthquakes were felt in most provinces, which overturned feveral cities, and great part of the new walls of Conflantinople, with fifty-seven towers, and many stately edifices, not only in that city, but likewise at Antioch and Alexandria P. The same year, 447. Attila, upon what Attila breaks provocation we know not, (for both emperors readily complied with all his demands, anew into the however unjust and arrogant) broke into Thrace with a formidable army, consisting head of a forof Hunns, Goths, Gepidæ, Alans, and many other barbarous nations, commanded by midaele army. their respective kings. Attila, whom they all obeyed, at the head of this numerous host, over-ran without opposition Illyricum, Thrace, both Dacia's, Mæsia, and Scythia. He took and plundered above seventy cities, and, among the rest, Philippoc polis in Thrace, properly so called, Arcadiopolis in the province of Europe, and Mar-cianopolis, the metropolis of Lower Masia. They extended their ravages on one side He over runs to the Euxine sea, and on the other to the streights of Thermopylæ, which part Thef-several provin-saly from Achain or Greece. In the mean time, Arnegiselus, governor of Massia and ces. Thrace, having drawn together all the troops quartered in those two provinces, marched against Attila; and engaging him in Lower Masia, on the banks of the river Utis, which falls into the Danube near a city of the same name, cut off great numbers of his men; but falling unluckily from his horse, he was himself killed, after having fold his life dear, and his army put to the rout?. Another battle was And defeats fought in the Chersonesus near Gallipoli, probably by the generals Aspar and Arcobin-generals sent dus, who were both sent against Attila. But no better success attended the Romans in against him. this than in the other engagement; fo that Theodofius was obliged the following year 448. when Zeno and Postbumianus were consuls, to send Anatolius, with one Vigilius; who understood the language of the Hunns, to Attila to sue for peace, which he was strictly injoined to conclude upon any terms. A peace was accordingly agreed The Romans to, and ratified by the emperor, on the following terms, highly opprobrious to the continue as Roman name, viz. 1. That the Romans should pay immediately to Atrila six thousand upon shameful pounds weight of gold, and every year two hundred. 2. That they should send terms. back to him all his deserters, and receive none for the future. 3. That they should deliver up the Roman captives, who had escaped without paying their ransom, or e pay for each of them twelve pounds weight of gold. 4. That the Romans should fend no embassadors to Attila, till they had delivered up to him all his deserters and fugitives. Pursuant to this ignominious treaty, six thousand pounds weight of gold were fent immediately to Attila, with all the Hunns who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions, among whom were feveral princes, who chose rather to be killed by the Romans, than to fall into the hands of Attila. While these things passed in the east, Recbila king of the Suevians settled in Spain, died at Merida in 447. and Rechila, king was succeeded by his son Requiarius, who the year following married the daughter of the Sueviof Theodoric, king of the Golbs in Languedoc, and soon after went to pay a visit to his dies, and is father-in-law at Toulouse; but on his return to Spain, surprised the city of Lerida; succeeded by his f and carrying with him from thence a great number of captives, pillaged the terri-son Requiarius. tory of Saragosa, which, according to Isidorus, belonged to the Romans t. This year a misunderstanding arose between Attila and Valentinian on account of some sacred vessels, which Attila falsly pretended to have been stolen from him by one Silvanus, a banker in Rome. Silvanus, who was the lawful owner of these vessels, had sold Attila seeks a them to the church. But as they were pieces of exquisite workmanship, Attila, covet- pretence to ing them, or rather feeking a pretence to quarrel with Valentinian, claimed them Valentinian.

1 Sid. car. v. p. 315. Idat. p. 24. m Gild. excid. Britan. c. 6. p. 118. n Usser. ecclef. Brit. antiq. p. 1204. Bed. hift. c. 13. p. 156. P Chron. Al. p. 734. Evagr. l. 1. c. 17. p. 275. Nicepii. l. xiv. c. 48. p. 543. 9 Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 44. p. 553. Theoph. p. 88. Chron. Al. p. 734. Prisc. p. 35, 76. r Pris. p. 34. Idem ibid. & p. 51—53. Theoph. p. 88. I Idat. p. 26. Vol. VI. No 7.

as stolen from him by Silvanus, and with great arrogance pressed the emperor either a to restore the vessels, or deliver up to him Silvanus. Hereupon count Romulus was fent with Promotus, governor of Noricum, and Romulus, an officer of diffinction, to the court of Attila, to convince him, if possible, that the vessels in dispute had never belonged to him; or if he continued to claim them, to pay him their value in gold. Attila received the embassadors in a very obliging manner, entertaining them at his own table with the embassadors of Theodosius, who arrived at his court much about the fame time. But the only answer that he returned to their reasoning and arguments was, that the veffels belonged to him, and that he was determined to do himself justice, and declare war, if Valentinian did not either restore them, or deliver up to him Silvanus, who had stolen them. But notwithstanding these menaces, b he did not make war upon Valentinian till three years after, tho' that prince could not by any means be prevailed upon to comply with either of his demands. The following year, when Protogenes and Asturius or Asterius were consuls, one Edecor being fent by Attila with the character of embassador to Theodosius, the eunuch Chry-Japhus, the emperor's great chamberlain, discovering him to be greatly taken with the splendor of the court, and desirous to continue among the Romans, promised him great wealth and preferments, provided he dispatched Attila; which he promising to do, Theodofius consented to the wicked attempt, and charged Vigilius, interattempts to get preter to the Roman embassadors at the court of Attila, to be assisting to him in that undertaking. But Edecon, either apprehensive of the dangers attending such a despe- c rate attempt, or deceiving the whole time the emperor and his minister, upon his return discovered the plot to Attila, who thereupon caused Vigilius to be seized, and dispatched his secretary Orestes to reproach Theodosius with his treachery, and demand Chrysaphus, the chief author and contriver of the conspiracy, to be delivered up to him. But Nomus, who was fent embasfador to the king of the Hunns on this occa-Who frares the fion, with several other persons of great distinction, gained his esteem and affection to such a degree, that he promised to live in peace and amity with Theodosius, parand makes doned Chrysaphus, set Vigilius at liberty, and dismissed the embassadors, loaded with rich presents. Thus Priscus, who was an eye-witness of what he wrote, having attended the embassadors to the court of Attila w.

Theodofius Atrila murdered.

conspirators, emperor.

Theologius

to public affairs.

THE following year, 450. when Valentinian was conful the seventh time, with Avienus, Theodofius was so bruised with a fall from his horse in hunting, that being with much ado carried in a fedan to Constantinople, he died there the next day, the twentieth of June, according to Theophanes , or the twenty-eighth of July, as we read in Theodorus, who is followed by most chronologers. According to this opinion, he died in the fiftieth year of his age, after having reigned forty-two years and near three months after the death of his father, and forty-eight fince he had received the title of Augustus. He was buried on the thirtieth of July, in the same Nis character. tomb with his father Arcadius 2. He is generally commended as a prince of exemplary piety; but all own him to have had but slender parts, and to have been intirely e guided by those about him, especially by the cunuchs of the court, who, abusing his authority, oppressed the people to such a degree, that many in his reign chose rather to abandon their native country, and live among the Hunns, and other barbarians, than bear the tyrannical government of those who, by the eunuchs, were Authors give us the following instance of his disattention to public fet over them. An inflance of affairs: As he had been used, when yet a child, to sign all the acts that were bis difactention brought to him by his ministers, without reading them, he continued the same custom even after he was married, till his fister Pulcheria, to apprise him of the evil consequences that might attend it, caused an act to be drawn up, whereby he yielded to her for ever the empress Eudocia as her slave. This act the emperor signed t without perufing it, or inquiring what it contained; which he had no fooner done, than Pulcheria defired him to read it, when, ashamed of his past indolence and neglect, he resolved to be upon his guard for the suture, and to sign no papers till he was well informed what they contained 2. He was a great friend to the church, but yet, misled by ill meaning men, countenanced the declared enemies of the orthodox faith, as the reader will find in the account which the ecclefiastic writers give us of the two councils held by his orders at Ephefus, and of the progress which the

PRISC. p. 57—68. w Idem, p. 72. ₹ Тнеорн. р. 568. 7 THEOD. p. 88. * THEOD ibid. • THEOPH. p. 87. CURSTANT. MANASS. p. 55. ZON. p. 36. SUID. p. 577.

χ.:

d

O

7.

1 TIS

Ü

j.

, OC

R M)

115 ad

T.

VO.

123

intig

COS.

z ji

87

1.6

187

7

1000

i II.

17 181

es cil

hilth

orte

KLI E. موندوا

a herefy of Eutyches made in his reign. Of the writers who flourished under Theodesius, we shall speak in note (S).

(S) We are chiefly indebted to the ecclefiastic writers Socrates, Sozomen, and Philostorgius, for the history of the reign of Theodosius the younger. So-crates was born in Constantinople about the year 380. and spent most part of his life in that city (1). He speaks of what happened after the year 395. as of things that had happened in his time (2). He tells us, that when he was yet very young, he knew a Novatian priest, by name Auxano, who remembered the council of Nice, and lived to the reign of Theodosius the younger, that is, to the year 408(3).
Socrates studied grammar under Helladius and Ammonius, two pagan pricits of Alexandria, who had retired to Constantinople, when the temples of the idols were pulled down in their own country, which happened in the year 389. He probably studied eloquence under Troilus, who in his time taught it with great applause at Constantinople; for he bestows mighty encomiums upon that sophist (4). He begins where Eusebius ended his history, but repeats the transactions of the first year of Constantine's reign, that is, of the year 306, and carries his work down to the seventeenth consulship of Theodosius 11, that is, to the year 439. So that it comprises the space of a hundred and thirty-four years. He addresses it to one Theodorus, by whose orders he undertook it. Theodorus was probably a bishop or priest; for he calls him a person consecrated to the worship of God (5). He writes in a familiar, but plain and easy style. At first he followed Rusinus, especially in his first two books, copying even his mistakes; but these he corrected, atter having perused the works of Athanasius. He informed himself with great care of the truth of what he relates, copying what had happened before his time from the authors that were most esteemed, and relating only fuch events of his own time as he himself had either seen, or learnt from persons of unquestionable veracity (6). As he speaks of the Novattans with great respect, and even pretends some of their bishops to have wrought miracles, several writers conclude from thence, that he himfelf held the tenets of Novatus. But on the other hand, he blames the Novatians for separating from the church (7), and in express terms disapproves the suppressing of the office of penitentiary in the church of Constantinople, against which office the Novatians had always exclaimed (8). Socrates wrote in Greek, but seems to have been acquainted with the Latin tongue. His history is quoted by Liberatus, and the seventh occumenical council. Sozomen, or Salaminus Hermias Sozomenes, as he is styled by Photius, was not, as some have conjectured from the first of these names, a native of Salamis in the island of Cyprus, but of a village in the territory of Gaza, named Bethelia, as appears from the account he gives of the convertion of his grandfather to the christian religion (9). The title of scholasticus, bestowed upon him by Photius (10) and others, gives us room to believe, that he was well versed in polite literature. He pleaded at the bar in Conflantinople (11), and was at the same time affection or countellor to Ifidorus, presect of the east in 435, and 436 (12). He was well acquainted with the civil law, as is plain from his works. He wrote first in two books the ecclesiastic history, from the ascension of our Saviour to the deposition of Licinius in 323(13), which work has been long fince intirely loft. He afterwards undertook his great history, which was to comprise whatever had hap-pened worthy of notice from the third consulship of Crispus and Constantine Casars, that is, from the year 324, to the seventeenth consulship of Theodo-sius the younger, in 439 (14). Whence it is mani-fest, that the work, which has reached our times, is imperfect, fince it ends in the year 415. Some think he was prevented by death from pursuing his design. St. Gregory writes, that the history of Sozamen was not received by the church of Rome on account of the many falshoods it contained, and of the great commendations the author bestowed on The design of Mathematical Has is not indeed without Theodorus of Mapsuestia. He is not indeed without faults; but notwithstanding some mistakes that are to be found in his work, he is commonly preserved to the other historians of those times. Whoever compares his history with that of Socrates, will find, that the one has an ideal and the sound to the sound the sound to the soun that the one has evidently copied from the other, most likely Society from Societies; for the latter seems to have written before the former. When Socrates wrote, the house in which Arius died was still standing; whereas Sozomen observes, that an Arian, having bought it, had pulled it down, and built another in its room (15). Besides, the candour and simplicity with which Socrates writes, would not, in our opinion, have allowed him to copy his history from another without owning it. Though Sozomen bestows great commendations on some Novatian bishops, as Socrates had done; yet he condemns in several places their tenets (16). About the beginning of the fixth century, Caffodorus caused the histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodores, to be translated into the Latin tongue by one Epiphanes, that Greece alone, says Caffiodorus, might not possess so valuable and necessary a work. He divided them, thus translated, into twelve books, commonly known by the name of Historia Tripartita. Before him, Theodorus, the reader, had begun to compile a history in Greek from the three above-mentioned historians. But of that work, only the two first books, com-prising the reigns of Constantine and Constantins, have reached our times. It does not appear, that the author wrote any more; and those, which he wrote, have never yet been printed. Philostorgius, born about the year 368. in the province of Cappa docia Secunda, wrote an ecclesiastic history, or rather, under that name, an apology for the Arians, especially the Eunomians, whose tenets he himself held. He began his work, which was divided into twelve books, with the death of Constantius Chlorus, the father of Constantine the Great, and carried it down to the accession of Valeatinian III. to the empire, that is, to the year 425. This work has been long fince loft; but an abstract of it, which may be called a large history, has been conveyed to us by Photius (17), who commends the style, but thinks the author often too diffuse and tedious. The whole is a continued fatire on the catholics, and a panegyric on the Arians. Philoflorgius feldom agrees with other writers, and relates several remarkable events, quite unknown to those who lived at the same time with him, fuch as the miracles wrought by Eusebius of Nicomedia, by Theophilus the Indian, by Leontius of Tripoli, &c. whence Photius styles him a fabulous and lying writer (18). However, he is often quoted by John of Antioch, who wrote about the beginning of the seventh century, by Nicetas Coniates, who flourished in the thirteenth century, by

(1) Socr. l.v. c. 24. p. 293. (2) Idem, l. vi. c. 1. p. 299. (3) Idem, l. i. c. 13. p. 41. (4) Idem, l. ii. c. 1. p. 79. & prol. p. 6. (5) Idem prol. p. 7. (6) Idem, l. ii. c. 1. p. 79. (7) Idem, l. ii. c. 38. p. 144. (8) Idem, l. v. p. 278. (9) Soz. l. v. c. 15. p. 617. (10) Phot. c. 30. p. 17. (11) Soz. p. 105. (12) Ifidor. Peluf. l. i. ep. 300. p. 880. (13) Soz. l. i. c. 1. p. 401. (14) Idem ibid. & p. 991, 397, 403. (15) Socr. l. i. c. 38. p. 74. Soz. l. ii. c. 30. p. 49. (16) Soz. l. vii. c. 16. p. 726. & l. viii. p. 754, &c. (17) Phot. c. 40. p. 25. (18) Idem, p. 16, 25.

Nicethorus

Nicephorus and others. Suidas likewise has copied several patlages from him. Philostorgius, besides his history, wrote a long panegyric on Eunomius, and an apology for the christian religion against Porphy-rius; but neither of these works has reached our times. About the same time flourished Philip of Sida in Pamphylia, who wrote a very diffuse history from the creation to his time, confifting of eight hundred and fixty-four books, which he intituled the Christian history. Of this voluminous work, which has been long since lost, Photius speaks with great contempt (19). The same author wrote another extensive work, wherein he consuted, or attempted to confute, the writings of the emperor Julian (20); but that performance has undergone the same sate as the other. The author was a deacon of the church of Constantinople, and thought himself highly injured, because he was not preferred to that see (21). Priscus, who attended Maximus, when sent embassador to Attila in 449. Wrote the history of the war between that prince and Theodosius; the history of Marcian's reign; an account of the journey of Anthemius to Rome; of the war carried on in the reign of Leo against Genseric; and of the unhappy end of Aspar and his children, put to death by the emperor Leo in 471 (22). Suidas ascribes to him eight books of the Byzantine hiflory, and of the war with Attilus, meaning, no doubt, Attila (23). Priscus was a native of Panes, or Panium, reckoned among the cities of the province of Europe in Thrace (24). He was a fophist, or protestor of eloquence (25). He vilited Rome, where he have the king of the Franks (26), no doubt Merouse, and travelled likewise to Thebais and Alexandria in Egyps. In the latter city he was an eyewitness of the disorders which attended the election of the holy bishop Proterms to that see, and greatly contributed to the appealing of them by the good advice he gave to Florus, present of Egypt. Euphemius, magister officiorum to the empeor Marcian, advised with him in all matters of importance (27). His history is said to be still extant, and lodged in fome libraries (28). Hitherto only some fragments of it, relating to emballies, have been published, which are to be found among the works of the other Byzantine historians. Some passiges of his history are quoted by Jornandes (29). He wrote with great exactness and elegance (30). Suidas mentions his declamations and letters (31). The history of Theodolius the younger was likewise written by one John. who is often quoted by Evagrius, and by him flyled orator, or professor of eloquence (32). He is thought to have been a native of Antioch, because he is frequently quoted by Evagrius in what relates to the history of that city (33). His history ended with the seventh year of Justin I. of the christian zera 525. whence we must distinguish him from another historian of the same name, whose history began with the death of Justinian, and was carried down to the reign of Mauritius (34). Another historian, named likewise John, a follower of Eutyches, wrote in five books the ecclefiaftic history, from the time of Nestorius to the defeat of Basiliscus; that is, from the year 428. to 477. To his eccleliastic history he added five books .35), the contents of which are to us quite unknown.

(19) Idem, p. 21. (20) Socr. l. vii. c. 27. p. 368. (21) Idem ibid. (22) Evagr. l. i. c. 17. p. 273. & l. ii. c. 1. p. 283. (23) Suid. p. 590. (24) Theoph. p. 100. Evagr. p. 74. (25) Evag. l. i. c. 17. p. 275. (26) Idem ibid. (27) Idem, l. ii. p. 295. Prifc. p. 41. (28) Voff. hift. Grace. l. iv. c. 18. p. 488. (29) Forn. rer. Goth. c. 24, 34, 35, 42, 49. (30) Evag. l. i. c. 17. p. 275. & l. ii. c. 16. p. 308. (31) Suid. p. 590. (32) Evag. p. 61. (33) Idem, l. i. c. 16. l. ii. c. 12. l. iii. c. 14, 28. (34) Idem, p. 274. & 383. (35) Phot. c. 41. p. 38.

C H A P. XXXI.

The Roman history, from the death of Theodofius II. to the total failure of the western empire in Augustulus.

If the laws at this time in force concerning private estates and inheritances, had obtained with respect to kingdoms and empires, the right of Eudoxia to the imperial crown had been indisputable, that princess being the only child of the deceased emperor; but not the least regard was had, either to her, or to the emperor Valentinian her husband: and truly neither of them seems to have laid any claim to the eastern empire, tho' Theodosius lest no issue male behind him. As Pulcheria had shared the sovereignty with her brother, and bore the title of Augusta, she remained by his death sole mistress of the empire; and no person was more capable of governing it well. However, as no woman had yet reigned alone in either empire, she resolved to marry, notwithstanding the resolution she had taken, or the vow she had made, to continue a virgin to her death. Pursuant to this resolution, as soon as the death of Theodosius was publicly known, she sent for Marcianus, a person samous for his exemplary piety, and extraordinary qualifications; and told him, that she designed to raise him to the sovereignty, by marrying him, on condition that he would suffer

Pulcheria refolves to marry Marcian. 0

gi

y Y

ĮCI. 70 2d

4

en De

13 <sup>(1</sup>2)

a her, agreeable to the resolution she had taken, to live and die a virgin. Marcianus readily complying with this condition, she sent for the patriarch Anatolius, and the fenate, and in their presence declared Marcianus emperor. Her choice being approved Who is declared by them, and applauded by all the officers at court, both civil and military, the emperor 4 new emperor was crowned at the palace of Hebdomon, on the twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth of August of the present year 450 b. His election was immediately notified to Valentinian; and he approving it, his images were, according to custom, sent into the west, and received at Rome on the thirtieth of March of the following year . After this, the marriage was celebrated with the utmost pomp and magnificence, Pulcheria being then in the fifty-first, and Marcian in the fiftieth year of his age d. He was a His birth, edub native of Thrace or Illyricum, and descended from a family of no great distinction, eatien, employbut remarkable for their attachment to the orthodox faith . As his father ferved in ments, and the army, he refolved to follow the fame profession, and pursuant to the orthodox faith. the army, he resolved to sollow the same prosession; and, pursuant to this resolution, fet out for Philippopolis in Thrace, in order to lift himself there. On his journey, he found the body of a man lately killed lying on the public road, and, prompted by his good nature, could not proceed, till he had decently interred it. This some persons, accidentally coming by, observed, and immediately acquainted the magistrates of Philippopolis with what they had seen; who thereupon caused Marcian to be seized and examined, and would have condemned him, had not the true author of the murder been seasonably discovered and convicted f. Marcian, thus set at liberty, lifted himself among the troops quartered at Philippopolis, and served still as c a private man in 421. when, upon the breaking out of the war between the Romans and Persians, the corps in which he served was ordered into Syria; but Marcian falling fick as they marched through Asia, continued a long time indisposed at a place called Sydema, and thence repaired to Constantinople, where he listed himself among the troops that were commanded by Ardaburius, and his fon Aspar, who discovering him to be a man of uncommon parts, raifed him to the post of their secretary. With that character he attended Aspar in 431. into Africa, where he was taken prisoner by Genseric, with many persons of distinction, Aspar himself having narrowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands. All the captives of note were, by Genferic's orders, brought into the palace, where while they were waiting in an open court till the king d was at leisure to view them, Marcian lying down on the ground, fell asseep, and an eagle at the same time appearing over him, says Evagrius, and intercepting with his extended wings the scorching rays of the sun, afforded him a friendly shade. This Genseric observed from his apartment, and concluding from thence, that he was destined by Heaven to the empire, he granted him his liberty, after having obliged him to fwear, that he would never make war upon the Vandals 8. From Africa he returned to Constantinople, where he was, according to Theophanes h, honoured with the senatorial dignity. Theodorus styles him only tribune; but adds, that he distinguished himself in war. He had by his first wife, who died before his accession to the empire, but one daughter, named Euphemia, whom, when he was raifed to the fovee reignty, he married to Anthemius, afterwards emperor of the west. All writers agree, that Marcianus was a prince of most exemplary piety, a zealous patron of the orthodox faith, a father to his people, a fincere friend to virtue, an enemy to all vice and irreligion; in short, a person endowed with every great and good quality becoming a prince. Some writers preser him even to Constantine and Theodosius the Great. He preferred none but persons of known abilities, and unblemished characters; whence the reader will find, in the writers of those times, great encomiums bestowed, not only upon him, but upon all those who were employed by him in the administration. In the west died the same year 450. Pulcheria, mother to the emperor Valentinian, Pulcheria, moand was interred at Ravenna, where her tomb is still to be seen k. She is blamed by ther to the emf some writers for yielding, or inducing her son to yield, West Illyricum to Theodosius. peror Valentinian, dies. She had governed the western empire with an absolute sway for the space of twenty-authority which she had enjoyed in his minority. THE following year 451. Attila affembled one of the most numerous and formidable armies we find mentioned in history. It consisted of Hunns, Gepida, Ostrogoths, bles a formi-fix years, Valentinian suffering her to rule, to the hour of her death, with the same

b Theod. p. 551. Evagr. l. ii. c. 1. p. 275. Theoph. p. 89. Chron. Alex. p. 738. Evagr. 285. d Idem ibid. e Idem, p. 283. Niceph. l. zv. c. 1. p. 595. f Evagr. p. 283. Idem, p. 284. b Theoph. p. 81. Theod. l. i. p. 551. k Prosp. chron. Idat. Mabil.. it. p. 185. 4 8 Idem, p. 284. Vol. VI. Nº 7. 6 K

Rugians,

Rugians, Gelonians, Burgundians, Belonatians, Squiri, Neurians, Bastarnæ, Turingians, & Brutterians, Franks dwelling on the Neckar, Marcomans, Suevians, Quadians, Heruli,

He resolves to Valentinian,

Whom he endeavours to deceive.

He defeats the Franks, and ensers Gaul.

stroys several cities.

Turcilingians, and in short, of all the northern barbarians, to the number of five, or, as others will have it, of seven hundred thousand men 1. Attila, in raising so formidable an army, had nothing less in view, than to make himself master of both empires. But Marcian returning no other answer to his embassadors, sent to demand the annual pension or tribute paid him by Theodosius, than that he had gold for his friends, and steel for his enemies, he thought it adviseable to turn his arms first against make war upon Valentinian, whom he held in the utmost contempt, being well apprised, that it would be no difficult undertaking to reduce, in spite of all opposition, the eastern, after he had made himself master of the western empire. Being therefore determined b to make war upon Valentinian, he fent a folemn embassy to that prince, demanding his fifter Honoria, whom he pretended to be his wife, and with her half the western empire, as belonging of right to her. We have observed above, that Honoria had maintained, by means of her eunuchs, a private correspondence with Attila, and even fent him a ring, which the embassador produced to prove their marriage. Valentinian answered, That, among the Romans, women had no right to the imperial crown, nor to any part of the empire; and at the same time dispatched Carpilio, the fon of Aetius, and several other persons of great distinction, to the court of Attila, to convince him of the injustice of his claim. Attila, to the great surprize, both of Valentinian, and the embassadors themselves, seemed to be fully satisfied with their reacc foning, and the arguments they alledged; but it was only the better to deceive the unwary prince, and put in execution a new scheme. Hemeric, the son of Genseric, king of the Vandals, having married the daughter of Theodoric king of the Goths in Languedoc, caused her nose to be cut off soon after, and sent her back, thus disfigured, to her father, upon a bare suspicion, that she designed to poison him. As he was well apprifed, that Theodoric would not fail to refent such an affront, he resolved to be before-hand with him; and therefore fent embassadors with rich presents to Attila, to engage him to fall upon Theodoric. Attila, who wanted only some pretence to enter Gaul, readily closed with the proposal, pretending at the same time, that he might meet with no opposition from the Romans, to be fully satisfied with the reasons d alledged by their embassadors, and to relinquish all claim to any part of the empire; nay, he fent to Valentinian embasfiadors, with a very friendly, in appearance, and obliging letter, affuring him, that his warlike preparations were defigned against Theodoric alone; that, as to the Romans, he should ever look upon them as his friends, provided they did not espouse the cause of his enemy. At the same time he wrote to Theodoric, affuring him of his friendship, and exhorting that prince to join him against the Romans, as their common enemy. The better to surprise Valentinian, he did not wait the return of the embassadors he had sent to him; but setting out immediately from Scythia, tho' in the midst of winter, and directing his march through Germany, he never halted till he reached, early in the spring, the banks of the Rbine. & There such of the Franks as still dwelt on the German side of that river, endeavoured to ftop him; but they were easily defeated, Childeric, the fon of Merouée, and grandfon of Clodion, being taken prisoner, with his mother, and other persons of distinction m. The Franks being thus overcome and dispersed, Attila caused an incredible number of boats to be built, cutting down for that purpose whole forests, and passing the Rhine without opposition, entered Gaul ". As he gave out, that he designed to live in friendship with the Romans, and only begged leave to march through their country, in order to make war upon the Visigoths in Languedoc, several cities opened their gates to him; but the rapines and violences which he suffered his men to commit in the cities that had received him, betraying his real design, the other cities f Takes and de shut their gates against him. Hereupon pulling off the mask, he besieged, took by ftorm, and pillaged Tongres, Treves, Strasbourg, Spires, Worms, Mentz, and all the cities in that neighbourhood. Advancing thence into the country, and dividing his numerous army into several bodies, he put all to fire and sword, and not only reduced and pillaged, but laid in ashes, the cities of Arras, Laon, Besançon, Toul, and Langres o. Attila, thus laying waste the country far and near, and committing everywhere unheard-of cruelties, arrived at length before Orleans, and laid siege to that

m VAL. rer. Franc. l. iv. p. 158. · GREG. TUR. hift. Franc. l. ii.

<sup>1</sup> PRISC. p. 40. JORN. C. 78. p. 666. SID. car. vii. p. 54. Du Chesne tom. 1. p. 726. Sid. car. vii. p. 541.

Idem ib c. 57. p. 275. IDAT. p. 28. Coint. annal. ecclef. Franc. p. 451. " Idem ibid.

.

1

25

[0

4,

CJ.

'n

-1

1

T)

:It

ä

:j.

12

rd

世世紀海田

) (125 ) (125 ) (125 )

かけた

ind.

Lil.

ever

to it

J. of

a city. In the mean time Aetius, arriving from Italy at Arles, affembled what forces Aetius arrives he could, having brought with him but a small number of troops, which however in Gaul, and is were reinforced by a great number of Visigoths, under the command of their king doric, and Theodoric, whom Aetius had persuaded to join the imperial troops, and, with their other princes. united forces, oppose the furious torrent, which threatened both alike. The example of Theodoric was followed by feveral other nations, namely, by the Franks, under the conduct of Merouée, who, by means of one of his own nation, named Wiomaud, had made his escape; by the Sarmatians, Burgundians, Saxons, the Armorici, the Lisians, the Riverins, the Ibrions, and several other nations of Celtic Gaul and Germany, who, apprehending themselves to be in no less danger than the Romans, readily joined b Aetius against the common enemy P. The Listans dwelt, according to Valesius 9, on the banks of the Lis in Flanders; the Riverins on the Rhine towards Cologne; and the Ibrions in Vindelicia, now Suabia and Bavaria. While Aetius was busied in assembling the Roman forces, and those of their allies, Attila pursued the siege of Orleans with Attila besieges. great fury, battering the place night and day with an incredible number of warlike and takes Oiengines. At length he carried it by affault, according to Apollinaris Sidonius; but leans; while his men were busied in plundering, without the least apprehension of danger, Actius and Theodoric, arriving with all their forces, entered the city, cut great numbers of the Hunns in pieces, before they could put themselves in a posture of desence, and obliged Attila to repass the Loire, in which many of his men were drowned, and But is driven c to retire towards the Rhine. Having passed Troyes, he halted in the Catalaunic or out with great. Mauriac fields, that is, in the plains of Chalons, which city was then known by the Actius. name of Catalauni. The same plains were called, according to Jornandes, Mauriaci or Mauritii, no doubt, from some neighbouring city or village. Valesius indeed distinguishes the Catalaunic from the Mauriac plains, and supposes two battles to have been fought, the one, which was not decifive, in the Mauriac, and the other, which put an end to the war, in the Catalaunic plains s. But all the antients mention only one battle, fought in the plains, called by some Mauriac and Mauritian, and by others Catalaunic. Attila chose that place, as the most advantageous for his Hunns, who were all horse, to engage in. Aetius, who followed him close, resolved, notd withstanding the enemy's advantageous situation, to put the whole to the issue of a battle. As he arrived late at night in the plains where Attila was encamped, the Gepidæ, who followed Attila, and the Franks, who ferved under Actius, meeting in the dark, engaged with fuch fury, that, on both fides, above fifteen thousand were Abloody enleft dead upon the spot . The next day Attila drew up his men in battle-array, counter beplacing the flower of his army in the centre, which he commanded in person, the tween the Franks and Ostrogoths in the left wing, and the Gepidæ, with other barbarous nations, in the right. Gepidæ. On the other hand, Aetius placed the Romans, whom he commanded himself, in the left wing; the Vifigoths, under the command of Theodoric and his eldeft fon Thorismond, in the right; and the Alans, with their king Sangiban, the Franks, and the other e auxiliaries, with their respective leaders, in the centre. That the Romans might not have time to pursue the victory, in case they gained it, Attila did not quit his camp till four in the afternoon, when the battle began, which, by all writers, is reckoned The battle of one of the most obstinate and bloody engagements mentioned in history. Actius, Chalons. Theodoric, and his son Thorismond, distinguished themselves in a most eminent manner. Theodoric, notwithstanding his great age, fought at the head of his Goths with a courage and resolution hardly to be expressed. But while he was thus animating his men, more by his example than his words, he unluckily fell from his horse, as some authors write, and was trod to death by his own people, who did not know him. Theodoric, Others write, that he was killed by a Goth, named Andagus, who ferved under king of the f Attila, and was descended from the royal family of the Analia. The Goths, not in Goths, killed. the least disheartened by the death of their king, charged the Hunns so vigorously, that they began, after a most obstinate resistance, to give ground; which Attila no sooner perceived, than he caused the retreat to be sounded, and retired to his camp. Attilaretires As it was already dark, Aetius, thinking it adviseable not to pursue the enemy, with- to his camp. drew likewise; but kept his men all night under arms, for fear of a surprize. The next morning, the extensive plains, in which the battle had been fought, appeared covered with heaps of dead bodies, and a neighbouring brook tinged with the blood

VAL. p. 161. г John. .... Vide Buch, hift. P Jorn. p. 664. Greg. Tur. hist. Franc. l. ii. c. 7. p. 277.

Q Val. p. Goth. c. 46. p. 664.

Val. notit. Gall. p. 324.

Jorn. c. 41. p. 671. Belg. c. 37-40.

of the flain. As Attila kept close in his camp, the Romans concluded from thence, that his army had suffered greatly, and that he owned himself conquered; but as his

the flain.

Thorismond returns beme with the Viligoths.

Attila quits Gaul.

And invades Italy.

and destroyed, with several osher cities.

Venice.

camp was well fortified, and furrounded with an incredible number of waggons, the Romans and Goths contented themselves with blocking it up, being well apprised, that the enemy would be foon obliged, for want of provisions, either to submit, or to quit their intrenchments, and venture a fecond battle in the open fields. In the mean time the body of Theodoric, found among the slain, was interred with extraordinary pomp; and his fon Thorismond, who had been dangerously wounded, proclaimed king of the Visigoths in his room w. Such is the account the antients give us The number of of this famous action. Idatius writes, that on both sides near three hundred thousand men were killed x; and Jornandes, according to the Amsterdam edition in 1655. h makes the number of the flain amount to two hundred and fifty-two thousand y. Both armies were greatly weakened, and the loss on each side perhaps equal; but as Attila flut himself up in his camp, and declined a second engagement, the Romans, who remained masters of the field of battle, challenged the victory. Cassiodorus, and Theodoric king of Italy, ascribe this victory to the courage and bravery of the Goths 1; but Gregory of Tours will have it to have been chiefly owing to the prayers of St. Agnan bishop of Orleans a. Thorismond, who had not been informed of his father's death till the day after the battle, was for revenging it on the Hunns, and attacking Attila in his camp. With this view he had already drawn up his Goths in battle-array; but Actius fearing, if the Hunns were intirely cut off, that the young prince, who was of c an aspiring genius, would turn his arms against the empire, advised him to return home with his forces, and take possession of his paternal dominions, lest his brothers, during his absence, should raise disturbances, and seizing on the royal treasures, give rife to a civil war. Thorismond followed his advice; which Attila no sooner knew, than he quitted his camp, and began to retire towards the Rhine. As he did not attack Actius even after the departure of Thorismond, Valesius concludes, that either the number of his troops was greatly increased by the writers of those times, or the loss he sustained in the battle lessened b; but the first is most likely. Actius pursued Attila as far as the Rhine; but never offered to attack him, being willing, some authors say, that he should make his escape, and, by awing the Franks and Goths, d divert them from raising disturbances in the empire. Attila, being thus driven out of Gaul, retired to Pannonia; and having there reinforced his army with supplies sent him out of Scythia, he refolved to make an irruption into Italy, where he hoped to meet with more booty, and less opposition, there being no Golbs, Alans, Franks, or Burgundians there to oppose him. Pursuant to this resolution he lest Pannonia, and finding the passes of the Alps unguarded, as no hostilities were expected on that fide, he entered Italy in the latter end of the present year 451. as Idatius and Jornandes seem to insinuate c, or in the beginning of the following year 452. when Herculanus and Sporacius were confuls. It is impossible to express the terror and consternation, which so sudden and unexpected an irruption occasioned, even in the most e distant provinces. Actius was at first for saving himself by slight, and retiring with the emperor into Gaul; but shame getting the better of his fear, he continued in Italy, and began to affemble the forces that were difperfed up and down the provinces. In the mean time Attila, advancing as far as Aquileia, the metropolis of the province called Venetia, invested that important place, battering it night and day with an incredible number of warlike engines; but as it was well fortified, and defended by the flower of the Roman troops, it held out, in spite of his utmost efforts, Aquileia taken for the space of three whole months, at the end of which it was taken by assault, pillaged for several days together, and laid in ashes, not one house being left standing, nor one person alive that fell into the enemy's hands, Attila designing, by this f barbarous and inhuman treatment, to strike terror into the other cities, and frighten them into submission. The cities of Trevigio, Verona, Mantua, Cremona, Brescia, and Bergamo, underwent the fame fate, the barbarians raging every-where with fuch fury, as can hardly be expressed or conceived, and putting all to the sword, without distinction of sex, age or condition. It is commonly believed, that on this occasion the inhabitants of the province of Venetia, to avoid falling into the hands of the Hunns, The founding of retired to the islands on their coast, and there laid the foundations of a city, which,

w John, rer. Goth. c. 40, 41, p. 669-672. * Idat. p. 28. * John C. 41, p. 672.

* Vide Du Chesne p. 277. & Val. rer. Franc. l. iv. p. 164.

* Gree Tur. l. ii. p. 277. borrowing À

al

ľ ŝ,

ũ

110

Ė,

1

Ģ.

Ţ. 127

mi:

: pn

世 山 西 山 世 山

可当

(id

وديااه

Harr,

112

: ():

11.3

M.g

a borrowing its name from the province, was called Venetiæ, and is now known by the name of Venice d. Cassiodorus, speaking of the Venetians, as he styles them, about fifty years after, says, that they inhabited the islands of the Adriatic; that they had no other fence against the waves but hurdles; no other food but fish; no wealth besides their boats; and no merchandize but salt, which they exchanged for other provisions c. To return to Attila: From the province of Venetia he advanced to Milan, then the metropolis of Liguria, which he took and pillaged; the city of Pa-Milan taken via, and several other places in that neighbourhood, he laid in ashes, after having and pillaged. plundered them, and put such of the inhabitants to the sword, as had not saved themselves by a timely slight. Seeing at Milan some pictures, representing the Roman b emperors sitting on thrones of gold, and the Scythians, that is, the Goths or Hunns, prostrate at their feet, he caused himself to be painted sitting on a throne, and the Roman emperors carrying on their shoulders sacks filled with gold, which they emptied at his feet '. From Liguria, Attila was for advancing to Rome, which city was not in a condition to withstand him; but his men, remembering the untimely end of Alaric, who died foon after he had plundered that metropolis, did all that lay in their power to divert him, notwithstanding their thirst after plunder, from that resolution. Attila despised that omen; but his troops being greatly diminished for want of provisions, and by the maladies that raged among them, and Actius having at the same time, with a reinforcement sent him by Marcian out of the east, deseated a party of Hunns, c he thought it adviseable to put off his march to Rome, and pursue his ravages in the neighbouring provinces. In the mean time Valentinian, having no other refource, fent a folemn embaffy to Attila, with proposals for an accommodation. At the head of this embassy was Leo bishop of Rome, a person famed for his eminent piety, eloquence and learning. His collegues were Albienus or Avienus, who had been conful in 450. and Trigecius, formerly prefect. They found Attila on the banks of the Menzo, not far from Mantua, and were by him received with uncommon demonstrations of kindness and esteem. He concluded with Leo, who surprised and softened him with his eloquence, a kind of treaty, which, it feems, was but a truce; for he Valentinian threatened to return to Italy, and pursue his ravages with more cruelty than ever, concludes a d unless the princess Honoria was sent him, with the share of the imperial treasures that Attila, was due to her. One of the articles of this treaty was, that the emperor should pay an annual penfion to Attila. It was no fooner figned, than he ordered his Hunns to forbear hostilities, and leaving Italy, retired beyond the Danube 8. Damascus, who Who retires out flourished about this time, writes, that a bloody battle was fought under the walls of of Italy. Rome between the Romans and the Scythians under the conduct of Attila; and that the flaughter was great on both fides, none but the chiefs, and a small number of their guards, being left alive; but as he adds, that the fouls of the flain purfued the engagement with great noise for three days and three nights, his whole account may be looked upon as fabulous. The following year 453. when Opilio and Vincomalus e were confuls, Attila, incapable of living himself, or suffering others to live in peace, crossing Rhatia, and following the course of the Rhone, entered unexpectedly the country now known by the name of Dauphiny, and fell upon the Alans, whom Actius And returns to had allowed to fettle in the Valentinois, under the conduct of Sangiban. But Thorif-Gaul, mond, king of the Vifigoths, whose dominions were divided from those of the Alans only by the Rhone, being well apprifed, that Attila, after having reduced the Alans, would not fail to invade his territories, joined his neighbours with the whole strength of his kingdom, and having gained a complete victory over Attila, obliged him to Where he is dereturn with shame and disgrace into his own country'. Jornandes and Sigebert are the fented by Thoonly writers who mention this fecond irruption of the Hunns into Gaul; and their f authority is suspected by Valesius, especially that of Jornandes, who seems not to have been well acquainted with the history of the Visigoths. Attila died soon after, that is, either in the present, or the following year 454. and with him ended the kingdom, or rather empire, of the Hunns in the north, a civil war being kindled, upon his death, among his numerous issue; which gave the several nations he had subdued an opportunity of shaking off the yoke, and recovering their ancient liberty, as we shall relate more at length in the history of the Hunns, and other northern nations. The same year, Thorismond, king of the Visigoths, was murdered in Toulouse, the capital of his Thorismond

d Por. de imp. c. 28, p. 69, 72. Val. rer. Franc. l. iv. p. 169. Cassiod. l. xii. c. Jorn. ibid. p. 673. Idem, p. 674-685. Phot. c. 242, p. 1040, 1041. CASSIOD. l. xii. ep. 14. p. 199. 42. p. 1040, 1041. 1 JORN. f JORN. ibid. p. 673. P. 674, 675. Vol. VI. Nº 7.

6 L

kingdom,

kingdom, by two of his brothers, viz. Theodoric and Frederic, and succeeded by a the former, on whom Apollinaris Sidonius, who was intimately acquainted with him, bestows great encomiums, extolling him even above his father, and styling him the protector and bulwark of the empire k.

The council of Chalcedon.

WHILE these things passed in the west, the council of Chalcedon was held in the east by Marcian's orders, who nevertheless seems to have affisted in person only at the session of the twenty-sisth of October. The council began on the eighth of October, of the year 451, and ended on the first of November. The same year the emperor enacted a law, forbidding, on pain of death, any one to facrifice to the gods, or even to adorn their temples with flowers, and condemning the governors and officers, who should wink at such wicked practices, to pay fifty pounds weight of b gold m. The following year, the Saracens, the Nubians, and the Blemmyes, broke into the empire; but were defeated by the troops of Marcian, and forced to sue for peace, which the emperor granted them upon terms highly advantageous to the empire, as Priscus assures us, who attended the Roman embassadors to Damascus, Several barba- where the treaty was concluded n. The following year, 453. Attila dying, several rous nations nations, formerly subdued by that conqueror, revolting from his children, begged fettle in Thrace and obtained leave of Marcian to settle in Thrace and Illyricum, almost intirely distributions. peopled by the frequent incursions of the Hunns and other barbarians. Among these mention is made of the Squiri, Satagaira and Alans, who, under the conduct of Candax, their king or leader, fettled in Leffer Scythia and Lower Masia: to the c Rugians, Sarmatians, and Cemandrians, lands were granted in Illyricum near a place called the caftle of Mars: to the Goths, commonly called Oftrogoths or Eastern Goths, to distinguish them from the Visigoths or Western Goths, who afterwards became masters of Spain, Marcian granted all Pannonia, from Sirmium, now Sirmish, in Sclavonia, to Vindobona, at present Vienna, in Austria, a large tract, comprising many cities. These Goths were then governed by three brothers, viz. Valemir, Theodomir, the father of Theodoric the Great, afterwards king of Italy, and Vidimir, who divided that extenfive country among them, Valemir settling in the eastern part of it, Theodomir in the western, and Videmir between the other two. The Goths, as well as the other barbarians, acknowledged the authority of the Constantinopolitan emperors, and were d subjects of the empire; but at the same time their princes claimed an uncontrolled authority over their own people, and frequently waged war with each other. Even one of the fons of Attila, named Ernac, and several other Hunns, submitted to the Romans, who granted them lands on the most distant borders of Lesser Scythia, in Dacia, and amongst the Sarmatians in Illyricum P. The same year died, in the month Pulcheria dies. of July, the empress Pulcheria, daughter to Arcadius, fister to Theodosius II. and wife to Marcian. She left by her will, which was confirmed and executed with great fidelity by Marcian, the immense wealth of which she was possessed, and her rich moveables, to the poor q. She was a woman of most extraordinary parts, and is, on account of her exemplary piety, honoured both by the Greeks and Latins with e the title of faint.

The empres

remarkable for the downfal and death of that great commander, owing chiefly to the malicious infinuations of an eunuch, by name Heraclius, who having gained an absolute ascendant over the emperor, easily persuaded the weak prince, that Aetius aspired at the empire, and maintained a private correspondence with the barbarians, in order to raise himself by their means to the imperial dignity. Actius, on his side, gave some occasion to the accusations of the euuuch, by pressing the emperor with too much eagerness to perform the promise he had made of marrying his eldest daughter Eudocia to Gaudentius, the general's son. His importunity gave weight to f the calumnies of Heraclius, and confirmed the weak and jealous emperor in his fuspicions, which, according to Gregory of Tours, and all the writers of those times, were altogether groundless. But after all, his treachery towards count Bonifacius, and several others, plainly prove, that he did not on all occasions scruple sacrificing his conscience and honour to his preferment and grandeur. Some pretend, but

THE following year, 454. when Aetius was conful the fourth time with Studius, is k Sid. car. vii. p. 347. & ep. ii—vi. p. 4. car. xiii. p. 400. 1 Concil. tom. iv. p. 574, 576. m Cod. Just. l. i. tit. 11. leg. 7. p. 105. 106. n Evagr. l. ii. c. 5. p. 295. Pris. p. 40. Niceph. l. xv. c. 9. p. 61. O Jorn. ret. Goth. c. 50—52. p. 688, 689. P Idem ibid. 9 Marc. chron. F Greg. Tur. hist. Fran. l. ii. c. 8. p. 277. Vales. p. 175.

without any politive proof, and probably without foundation, that he was at the bottom

The difgrace and death of Actius.

a bottom of all the disturbances that happened during his administration. Petronius Maximus is faid to have greatly contributed to the death of Actius, by prompting the ennichs of the court to perfuade the emperor, that he aimed at nothing less than the fovereignty. The view of Maximus therein was to remove out of the way the only person, who screened the prince from the vengeance he was resolved to take upon him for a late affront , of which anon. However that be, the death of Aetius being refolved on. Valentinian ordered him one day to attend him in the palace, pretending to have some affair of the utmost importance to impart to him. Aetius obeyed the furnmons, repairing without delay to the emperor's apartment, attended by Boëtius, the prafectus pratorio, his intimate friend, and several others. But Aetius b alone was admitted into the prince's chamber; which he had no fooner entered, than Valentinian ran him through with his fword; and with the affiltance of the officers Who is treaabout him, namely, of Heraclius, dispatched him in a most barbarous and inhuman cherously murmanner. Thus fell the best general of his age, the terror of Attila, the bulwark dered by Valentinian. of the western provinces, says Sidonius, by the hand of the greatest coward in the whole empire w. We are told, that Valentinian having one day asked a Roman whether he had done well in dispatching Aetius? the Roman answered, that he could not tell whether he had done well or no, but thought he had cut off his right hand with his left. The prefect Boëtius, and all those who had attended Aetius to the palace, were likewife dispatched, being called one after the other into the emperor's chamc ber 5. This bloody tragedy was acted, according to Theophanes, at Rome 2. Valentinian immediately dispatched embassadors to the Suevians, and other foreign nations, to acquaint them with the death of Aetius, and confirm the treaties that general had concluded with them 4. But the news of that great man's death encouraged, it feems, some of them to make irruptions into the empire. For in the beginning of the following year, the Armorici, that is, the inhabitants of the present Bretagne and Normandy, were under daily apprehensions of seeing the Saxons on their coasts; the Alemans passed the Rhine near Basle, and the Franks laid waste the territories of Menta and Rheims b.

THE following year, 455, when Valentinian was consul the eighth time with And themius, fon-in-law to the emperor Marcian, the western empire was involved in endless calamities. The emperor Valentinian was murdered on the seventeenth of March, and the empire seized by Petronius Maximus, grandson to Magnus Clemens Maximus, who having usurped the sovereignty in 383. was taken and put to death by Theodosius the Great in 388. Authors give us the following account of the unhappy end of Valentinian, and usurpation of Maximus. The latter having married a lady, equally famous for her beauty and chaftity, Valentinian, taken with her charms, fell passionately in love with her; but her virtue being proof against all his Valentinian presents, menaces and promises, he had recourse to the following artifice: He sent falls in love one day for Maximus to play with him at dice; and having won of him a confiderof Maximus.

e able fum, obliged him to leave his ring as a pledge for the payment of it. This ring he fent privately to the wife of Maximus, defiring her in her husband's name to repair to the palace, and wait upon the empress. The lady, knowing the ring, hastened to the palace, in compliance with the supposed orders of her husband; but was conducted by some persons employed for that purpose to a remote apartment, where Valentinian, without any regard to her tears and intreaties, robbed her by force of that which was infinitely more dear to her than her life. Upon her return home, the burst into a flood of tears, reproaching, in most bitter terms, her husband, whom she believed privy to her dishonour, and his own infamy. Maximus, on the other hand, then first apprised of the emperor's wicked artifice, acquainted f his wife with it, and resolved at all events to be revenged on Valentinian c. Pursuant to this resolution, he applied to the friends of Actius, whom the emperor had caused Maximus, to lately to be murdered, especially to Traustila and Optila or Occylla, two barbarians, revenge the who had served under that general, and had been distinguished by him with par-violence offered ticular marks of kindness and esteem. These readily undertook to revenge the death Valentinian of their old commander, and at the same time the dishonour offered to Maximus; and to be murdered. accordingly falling upon Valentinian, while he was diverting himself in the campus

* VAL. p. 176. Buch. Belg. p. 318.

** JORN. reg. Suc. p. 654.

** In Chron. Theoph. p. 92. Sid. car. v. p. 318.

** W Sid. car. vii. p. 342.

** C.4. p. 187.

** PROSP. IDAT. MARC. CASSIOD &c.

** Theoph. p. 92.

** Theoph. p. 92.

** On the order of the o " IDAT. P. 30. PROSP. MARC. * Perfec. Vand. hift. l.i. <sup>2</sup> IDAT. CASSIOD. &c. Sid. car. vii. p. 542. * PROCOP. bell. Vand. I. ii. c. 4. p. 186, 187.

Martius

Martius at Rome, they first killed his favourite eunuch Heraclius, who courageously a interposed, and endeavoured to fave his master, and then dispatched, with many wounds, the emperor himself in the fight of the whole court d. Procopius and John of Antioch, who evidently copies from him, are the only authors who mention the indignity offered to Maximus. Sidonius and Idatius, without taking the least notice of that outrage, ascribe the death of Valentinian to the unbounded ambition of Maximus, not to be fatisfied with any thing less than the empire itself o. Valentinian was murdered on the seventeenth of March of the present year 455. after having lived thirtyfour years, and reigned twenty-nine and about five months, reckoning from the twenty-third of October 425. when he was first declared Augustus f. His tomb is thought to be still extant at Ravenna 8. As he had but very slender parts, he was b intirely governed by the eunuchs of the court, who disposed, at their pleasure, of all the great offices, facrificing the good of the public, and the honour of the prince, The character to their private interest and ambition. He had not courage enough to head his of Valentinian armies in person; and besides was, by his effeminate education, become altogether incapable of bearing the toils of a military life. The only journies he undertook were from Ravenna to Rome, and from Rome back again to Ravenna, keeping himfelf in both places locked up in his palace with a herd of eunuchs, and indulging, without restraint, his most brutal inclinations, tho' married to one of the most beau-

Maximus assumes the purple.

And appoints

him, invites Italy.

tiful women of that age b. The day after his death, Maximus, the author of it, assumed the purple; and being saluted by the Roman people with the title of c Augustus, he immediately raised his son, by name Palladius, to the dignity of Casar. Maximus was sprung from an illustrious family in Rome, and had discharged with great applause and reputation the first offices in the state. He was possessed of immense wealth, which he shared and enjoyed with his friends, leading an easy and quiet life, and indulging himfelf in all the diversions and recreations, which his plentiful estate could afford him. Hence he no sooner began to feel the anxieties inseparable from a crown, especially when acquired by unlawful means, than he repented the step he had taken, panting after his former condition. Sidonius writes, that the very first night he lodged in the palace, he was heard crying out, Happy Damocles, whose reign began and ended with a dinner; nay, he had some d thoughts of abandoning Rome, of quitting the enfigns of majesty, and resuming in fome corner of Italy his former method of life. But being diverted from that refolution by his friends, he appointed Avitus, then in Gaul, commander in chief of the Roman armies, who immediately dispatched Messianus to acquaint Theodoric, king chief of all the of the Visigoths, with the accession of Maximus to the empire. That general went Roman forces. foon after to confer in person with the Gothish king, and entered Toulouse, attended by Theodoric himself on his right hand, and one of the prince's brothers on his left. He was upon the point of concluding a treaty with Theodoric, when he unexpectedly received the disagreeable tidings of the death of Maximus, which put him upon other measures k. The wife of Maximus dying soon after the outrage supposed to have e been offered her, the usurper, that he might have some title to the crown, obliged Eudoxia, being Eudoxia, the deceased emperor's widow, to marry him, contrary to her inclination, forced to marry a few days after the murder of her husband; and at the same time married her Genseric into daughter Eudoxia to his son Palladius. Eudoxia, who had loved Valentinian with great tenderness, highly provoked in seeing herself married against her will to the very person who had deprived him both of his life and empire, resolved, whatever it cost her, to revenge the death of her former husband, and the affront offered in her person to his bed. Blinded therefore with passion, and thirst of revenge, she took such measures as proved fatal to herself, to Rome, and all Italy. For expecting no assistance from Marcian, unwilling perhaps to engage in a civil war, she dispatched f a trusty messenger to Genseric in Africa, conjuring him to come and revenge the death of his friend and ally Valentinian, and to rescue her out of the arms of a tyrant, the murderer of her husband 1. Some authors affirm, that she wrote to the king of the Vandals with her own hand, affuring him, that he would meet with no great resistance in Italy, and promising to affist him to the utmost of her power. This message was very acceptable to Genseric, who had long wished for such an d Marc. Idat. Cassiod. chron. Evagr. c.7. p. 298. Jorn. reg. Suev. p. 654. Greg. Tur. p. 277.

e Sid. l. ii. ep. 13. p. 57. Idat. p. 31. f Idat. p. 30. g Mab. Itef. Ital. p. 40. h Theoph, p. 93. Zon. p. 40. Const. Manass. p. 51. Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 3. p. 182. l Sid. l. ii. ep. 13. p. 57, 58. g Idem, car. vii. p. 343, 344. l Evagr. l. ii. c. 7. p. 298.

a opportunity, which he embraced with great joy; and putting to sea without loss of time, steered his course strait to Rome. When his numerous sleet first appeared, the chief citizens, and all persons of distinction, struck with terror and dismay, instead of putting themselves in a posture of defence, thought only of consulting their safety by slight m. Among these was Maximus himself; but as he was slying with those of his court, the populace, highly incensed against him for thus shamefully abandoning those whom it was his duty to protect, rising all on a sudden, purfued him with showers of stones; which some of Valentinian's officers observing, they threw themselves upon him; and a Roman soldier, by name Ursus, gave him Maximus the fatal blow ". His body was ignominiously dragged through the chief streets of murdered. b the city; and after it had lain some time exposed to the insults of the incensed multitude, thrown into the Tiber. Such was the end of the usurper Maximus, after he had lived about fixty years, and borne the title of emperor three months wanting five days. His fon Palladius is supposed to have undergone the same sate. Three days after the death of Maximus, that is, on the fifteenth of June, Genseric entered Rome taket Rome without opposition, and abandoned it to the mercy of his Vandals, strictly and flundered injoining them however not to set fire to the city, nor shed the blood of the inhabit-by Genseric. ants, pursuant to the promise he had made to Leo the Great, then bishop of Rome, who had gone out to meet him. They continued in the city sourteen days, pillaging not only the private houses, but stripping the public buildings of all their rich ornaments, and even the churches of their sacred vessels. They took an increc dible number of captives, every one feizing fuch women as they liked best; and amongst the men, those who they thought would be of most use to them. Genserie himself forced the imperial palace; and having seized on the treasure, and all the rich moveables he found there, he caused them to be put on board a vessel, with the empress Eudoxia, her two daughters Placidia and Eudocia, and Gaudentius, the son Eudoxia and of Actius, and carried them all into captivity. Amongst the spoils, mention is made her daughters of a great many statues with which a vessel was loaded; of half the covering of the captivity. capitol, which was of brass plated over with gold; of sacred vessels of gold, enriched with precious stones; and of those which had been formerly taken by Titus out of the temple of Jerusalem, and brought to Rome. Genseric, having thus stripped the d city of all its wealth and valuable ornaments, returned with his fleet to Africa, but lost in his passage the ship that carried the statues P. Marcian, sensibly affected with the misfortune of Eudoxia, and the two princesses her daughters, dispatched embassadors to Genseric, earnestly intreating him to set them at liberty; but he, despising both his intreaties and menaces, kept them till the year 462. when he sent back Eudoxia, with her second daughter Placidia, to Leo, the successor of Marcian. As for Eudocia, he married her to Hunneric, his eldest son, who had by her Hilderic, afterwards king of the Vandals in Africa 9. In the east Marcian enacted this year a famous law, dated, according to some, the first of May, according to others, the twenty-fecond of April, wherein he allowed every one to bequeath to the ecclesiastics e and monks what they pleased, and revoked the laws of the other emperors his predecessors, forbidding widows and diaconesses to leave any thing by will to the church. This law is addressed to Palladius, the præsetus præsorio, to whom is likewise addressed another against the Eutychians, dated from Constantinople the first of August. Of the few writers who flourished under Valentinian III. we shall speak in note (T).

** Sid. p. 174. ** Procop. p. 186. Jornand. rer. Goth. c. 45. p. 677. ** Theoph. p. 93. Vict. rosp. chron. ** Theoph. p. 93. Evagr. p. 98. Procop. p. 189. ** Theod. l. i. p. 552. Prisc. 41. ** Cod. Theod. nov. l. iii. tit. 5. ** Concil. tom. iv. p. 886, 888.

(T) The chronicle of Idatius has been of great use to us in writing the history of Valentinian's reign. He was a native of Lamego, in the province of Beira, belonging then to Galicia, but at present to the kingdom of Portugal. His parents dying when he was very young, he left Spain, and retired to the east, where he saw St. Ferom, Eulogius of Casarea, John of ferusalem, and Theophilus of Alexandria. He owns himself to have been but indifferently versed in polite literature, and still less in the study of the holy scripture (1). But as to the latter Lea the Great. holy scripture (1). But as to the latter, Leo the Great, bishop of Rome, seems to have been of a different opinion, fince he employed him against the Prifcillianists (2). He was ordained bishop in the third or fourth year of the reign of Valentinian III. that is, about the year 427, for he reckons from the time that prince was created Cefar (3). Sigibers, and some other writers, suppose him to have been bishop of Lamego. And truly the words of his preface leave it doubtful, whether he was bishop, or only a native, of that city; but in his chronicle he tells us, that the bishop Idarius was taken in the

(1) Idat. chron. p. 2-10.

(2) Leo, ep. xxxii. c. 17. p. 162.

(3) Idem, p. 4.

charch

Avitus, or Flavius Macilius Avitus, as he is styled on an ancient medal', had a been appointed by Maximus commander in chief of all the Roman forces, and was at the court of Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, when news was brought him of the death of the usurper. He immediately acquainted Theodoric with what had happened, who thereupon pressed him to assume the purple, and even caused him to be proclaimed emperor by the Goths in Toulouse, on the tenth of July of the present year, promifing to support him in his new dignity with the whole strength of his kingdom ". loule, and after However, he did not, it feems, take upon him the title of emperor till he was proclaimed some time after, that is, on the eighth of August, by the Roman army at Arles, and by all the chief men in Gaul. Theodoric went immediately, attended by his brothers, to Arles, to congratulate the new prince on his accession to the empire, b and was received by him as one to whom he was chiefly indebted for the dignity Is received as he enjoyed w. From Arles the new emperor fet out foon after for Rome, where he such at Rome, was received by the populace with great demonstrations of joy. Marcian, who had nothing so much at heart as the public welfare and tranquillity, readily approved of his promotion, and acknowledged him for his collegue x. The following year, Avitus proclaimed emperor at Touat Aries.

ledged by Marcian.

> <sup>t</sup> Goltz. p. 135. * Greg. Tur.l. ii. c. 11. p. 280. w Idat. p. 31. Isidor, chron. * IDAT. p. 22.

church of Aqua Flavia, and returned after three months captivity to Flavia (4). As he evidently speaks in that place of himself, father Labbé concludes him to have been a native of Lamego, and bishop of Aqua Flavia (5); which last city Sanfon places in the territory of Braga, on the confines of Portugal, calling it Aque Lea Turodorum. bishop of Rome, only writes, that Idatius was bishop in Galicia (6). Dupin will have him to have been archbishop of Lugo (7), not reflecting that Idatius was ordained bishop in 427, and that fix years after the see of Lugo was held by Asterius (8). In the year 431. Idatius was fent by the natives of Galicia to implore the affistance of Actius, then in Gaul, against the Suevians, who, contrary to the articles of a late treaty, pillaged the country. He returned from Gaul the following year with count Censorius, fent by Aetius to treat with the Suevians. He was taken by the Suevians in the church of Aqua Fla-via on the twenty fixth of July 462, but after three months captivity was fet at liberty. Notwithstanding the wars and disturbances that reigned in his time all over the empire, especially in Spain, he wrote a chronicle, which is, properly speaking, a continuation of that of St. Jerom. What he wrote from the death of Valens, where his chronicle begins, to the third year of Valentinian's reign, and his own episcopacy, he either copied, as he assures us, from the best writers, or learnt of persons of unquestionable veracity: of all the rest, he was himself an eyewitness. He writes, that he had the misfortune to fee the Roman empire reduced within narrow bounds, and in great danger of losing the little it retained; that the discipline of the church was utterly neglected in Galicia, and the liberties of the people intirely loft, the barbarians, who prevailed there, acknowledging no other law but their arbitrary will and caprice. He carries his chronicle down to the third year of Anthemius's reign, that is, to the year 469, the forty-first of his episcopacy. The chronicle of Idatius gives great light to the history of those times, especially to that of Spain; whence Isidore and some others have copied it almost word for word. However, it is not quite free from faults, effecially in point of chronology, either the author himself, or his transcribers, reckoning sometimes the end of one emperor's reign, and the beginning of another's, as two distinct years, which is a very gross mistake. The years of the emperors are marked all along with the olympiads, and, in imitation of St. Ferom, the years of the supputation of Eusebius from the birth of Abraham. The ara of Spain, which is thirty years anterior to ours, is Eusebius from the birth of Abraham. marked in the beginning on the margin. Father Sirmond, to whom we are indebted for this chronicle, has annexed to it a book of confular tables, which he believes to have been done by the same author. Father Sirmond published only part of these tables. But father Labbé inserted the whole in his Bibliotheca nova, and Du Cange in his Chronicon Paschale (9), which extends from the consulship of Brutus, the first consul, to the second consulship of Anthemius in 468. so that the consular tables end about a year after the chronicle. In the tables no other zera is marked but that of Spain, which gives us room to believe that they were done by a native of that country (10). They are reckoned very exact; but yet some faults have crept into them, which, in all likelihood, is owing to the ignorance of the transcribers. In the time of Charlemagne, a French chronologer published an epitome of the chronicle of Idatius, which is to be found in Canisius (11). The work intituled Notitia imperii is supposed to have been written in the reign of Valentinian III. and Theodosius II. but by some in the very beginning, by others in the latter end of the reign of Theodosius. This notitia contains a succinct account of the state of the empire in those times, viz. of the provinces and their governors; of the other magistrates, both civil and military, their titles and officers; of their land and sea-forces; of their foot and horse; of their troops, both Roman and foreign, and the places where they were quartered, &c. This notitia was published by Guidus Pancirollus in 1902, with copious comments, of which father Labbe speaks with great contempt, ridiculing the cuts with which they are adorned, representing, as Pancirollus imagines, the habits and ornaments peculiar to each office and dignity. To the notition is added the description of Rome by an anonymous author, who is supposed to have wrote under Valen-tinian III. To this description of Rome, father Labbé adds one of Constantinople, done likewise by an anonymous writer, either in the reign of Area-dius, or of Theodofius the younger. The treatise de Rebus bellicis, which Labbé adds to it, is supposed to have been written about the same time; but the author, who feems to have been a private person, and to have professed the study of philosophy, is not known.

. (4) Idem, p. 39. (5) Labb script. tem. ii. p. 496. (6) Leo. tom. ii. p. 827, 828. tom. iv. p. 557. (8) Idat p. 20. (9) Labb. p. 3. Cange chron. Pasc. p. 439. Wilt. ad. not. p. 8. & Noris de Diocles. num. p. 11. (11) Canis. tom. ii. p. 640, 641.

(7) Dupin, (10) Vide

a when Varanes and Johannes were consuls, a bloody war broke out between the Sue-War between vians in Spain, and the Visigoths in Aquitain. Requiarius, king of the former, taking the Visigoths advantage of the distracted state of the empire, over-ran the province of Cartagena, which still belonged to the Romans, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Hereupon Avitus, dispatching count Fronto to him with the character of embassador, put him in mind of the treaties concluded between him and the Romans. likewise, whose sister Requiarius had married, interposed his good offices, conjuring his brother-in-law not to disturb the public tranquillity, and acquainted him with the engagements which he had entered into with Avitus. But Requiarius, without any regard either to treaties or remonstrances, pursued his ravages, laying waste, not b only the province of Cartagena, but that of Tarraco too, which likewise belonged to the empire. Upon this, Theodoric fent him a fecond embasfy, to which he answered with great haughtiness, that if Theodoric found fault with his conduct, he would foon give him an account of it at Toulouse. This answer piqued Theodoric to fuch a degree, that he immediately entered Spain at the head of a powerful army; and being met by Requiarius about twelve miles from Aftorga, a battle enfued, in which the Suevians were utterly defeated, and their king, who was dangerously The Suevians wounded, obliged to fly for shelter to a distant corner of Galicia. Theodoric pursued defeated. him close; and entering Braga on a Sunday, the twenty-eighth of October, gave that city up to be plundered by his foldiers. From Braga he advanced with all possible c expedition to a place called Portucal, whither the fugitive king had retired y. Some writers take Portucal for the present city of Porto, on the Douro, in the kingdom of Portugal, to which it is thought to have given name :. Fornandes writes, that Requiarius put to sea, in order to save himself by flight, but was driven back by a ftorm . Be that as it will, all authors agree, that he was taken, and delivered up to Theodoric, who, after having kept him fome time in prison, put him to death in the month of December b. The Suevians, disheartened by the death of their king, and destitute of a leader, submitted to Theodoric, who retaining for himself the country he had conquered, appointed one Aquiulphus to govern it. Aquiulphus, revolting foon after from Theodoric, caused himself to be proclaimed king of the Suevians in d Galicia, but died the following year in the month of June at Porto c. Jornandes writes, that a powerful army being sent against him by Theodoric, he was overcome in battle, taken, and beheaded d. Some Suevians, refusing to submit to the Goths, retired to a distant corner of Galicia, and there chose for their king one of their own nation, named Maldra. The same year, Genseric, putting to sea with a nume-Genseric derous fleet, and a confiderable army on board, with a design to ravage the coasts of feated at feat Italy or Gaul, was overtaken near Corfica by the Roman fleet, under the command by Ricimer. of Ricimer, and utterly defeated f. Ricimer, styled by some Richimer or Richemer, was fprung from the royal family of the Suevians; but as his mother was the daughter of Vallia, king of the Goths in 418. he is commonly looked upon rather as a Goth than a Suevian. He ferved from his youth in the Roman armies, and acquired fuch reputation by his warlike exploits, that Sidonius gives him the title of invincible, and Jornandes styles him the best commander of his ages; nay, Sidonius prefers him for courage to Sylla, for prudence to Fabius, for good nature to Metellus, for eloquence to Appius, for vigour and resolution to Fulvius, and for address to Camillus h. But these good qualities were not without the allay of as many bad ones; for he was a man without faith, honour or honesty; ambitious to fuch a degree, that, not fatisfied with being commander in chief of all the forces of the west, patrician, and son-in-law of an emperor, he took upon him to raise and depose emperors at his pleasure, and, since he was excluded by his f birth from wearing the imperial crown himself, to command and controul those who This unbounded ambition, this unbridled lust of ruling, prompted him to murder four emperors, three of whom had been raised by himself, and to stir up and affift underhand the avowed enemies of that empire, which he was by the strongest ties bound to protect and defend. Elated with his success over Genseric, instead of pursuing it, he returned to Rome, and revolting with Majorianus, Avitus deobliged the senate to declare Avitus unworthy of the empire; which no sooner came posed.

У Ірат. р. 33. Ізірок. chron. Jorn. р. 676. <sup>2</sup> Ваир. <sup>8</sup> Jorn. ibid. <sup>b</sup> Ірат. р. 34. Ізірок. chron. <sup>6</sup> Ірат. р. 37. <sup>4</sup> Jorn. р. 677. <sup>6</sup> Ірат. р. 34. <sup>6</sup> Іdem ibid. <sup>8</sup> Jorn. 6:45. р. 678. Sid. car. ii. р. 301. <sup>8</sup> Sid. car. v. p. 317.

The Burgun-

dians seize on

part of Gaul.

to the prince's ears, who was then in Gaul, than he hastened back to Italy; but 2 upon his arrival at Placentia, he was stopped by Ricemer, and stripped of all the badges of majesty i. Theophanes writes, that Avitus was overcome in battle by Ricimer, on the fixteenth of October k; fo that he had fcarce reigned fourteen months. Being thus divested of the purple, he caused himself to be ordained bishop of Placentia; but the senate insisting upon his being put to death, he withdrew from Placentia, with a design to take sanctuary in the church of St. Julian at Brioude in Auvergne, the place of his nativity. Gregory of Tours adds, that he died on the road, and his body was brought to Brioude, and buried near that of the holy martyr Julian. During his short reign, the Burgundians, who had been removed from the banks of the Rbine in 438. or, as others will have it, in 443. and had ever fince that time dwelt b amongst the mountains of Savoy, seized on part of Gaul, and made themselves masters of the city of Lions m. In 463, the city of Die in Dauphiny was subject to them, as appears from a letter of Gondiac their king to Hilarius bishop of Romen. The next confuls were Constantine and Rusus, belonging both to the eastern empire, no emperor being yet chosen in the west. In the beginning of this year 457, died the emperor Marcian dies. Marcian, after having reigned fix years, five months, and two days. His death, which Theodorus, furnamed the Reader, ascribes to his having assisted at a procession on the twenty-fixth of January o, must have happened about the end of that month; for Leo, who succeeded him, was proclaimed at Constantinople on the seventh of February. Marcian is commended by all the writers of those times, for the innocence and c fimplicity of his manners, for his extraordinary piety, and zeal for the purity of religion P. Leo, bishop of Rome, calls him a prince of blessed and venerable memory 4; and the Greeks honour him with the title of faint, celebrating his festival, with that of the empress Pulcheria, on the seventeenth of February. He was buried in the church of St. Zea at Constantinople, which he had built . Priscus, of whom we have spoken above, wrote the history of his reign; but of that work only some fragments have Leoproclaimed reached our times s. A few days after the death of Marcian, Leo was proclaimed emperor, with the unanimous confent of the senate, people and soldiery, and crowned by Anatolius, patriarch of Constantinople. This is the first instance we find in history of a prince's receiving the crown at the hands of a bishop. Leo, distinguished by the d

emperor.

ments, &c.

Greeks with the furname of the Great, was, according to the most probable opinion, His lirth, edue a native of Thrace, and is thence commonly called Leo the Thracian. He had served cation, employ- from his youth in the Roman armies, and commanded a body of troops encamped at Selymbria in Thrace, when he was raised to the empire. His prudence, moderation, impartiality in the administration of justice, exemplary piety, and zeal for the catholic religion, are greatly extolled by the writers who flourished in those times. Leo is faid to have owed his promotion to the patrician A/par, of whom we have made frequent mention, and his fon Ardaburius, who, not daring, the very powerful, to affume the purple themselves, as they were Arians by religion, and not Romans by birth, but Goths, or rather Alans, conferred it upon Leo, in whose name they hoped e to reign; nay, we are told, that Leo promised to raise one of Aspar's sons to the dignity of Cæsar". In the very beginning of his reign, great disturbances were raised by the Eutychians in Alexandria, who, hearing of the death of Marcian, rose in a tumultuous manner, murdered the catholic bishop Proterus, and chose in his room one of their own sect, named Timotheus Elurus. The tumult was soon quelled; but the authors of it, putting themselves under the protection of Aspar, a zealous patron of Arianism, were by him screened from the punishment due to their wickedness w. In the west, after an inter-reign of about three months, during which time Ricimer governed with an absolute sway, Majorianus was proclaimed emperor by the senate, the people, and the foldiery, Ricimer proposing him as a person in every respect well f qualified for that high station. All we know of his family is, that his father had ferved with great reputation under Aetius, and was afterwards raised to the office of treasurer of the empire. His mother was the daughter of Majorianus, appointed by Theodosius I. or rather by Gratian, in 379. general of the Roman horse and foot in Pannonia. From him the emperor took the name of Majorianus. He was raised to a the empire in the flower of his age, having already given several instances, not only of his courage and military abilities, but of his good-nature, generofity, moderation, and other amiable qualities. Procopius, speaking of him, says, that he surpassed in every virtue all the princes who had reigned before him x. He lived from his childhood in great intimacy with Ricimer, and therefore was easily prevailed upon by him to revolt from Avitus. Soon after the deposing of that prince, he was raised to the post of general in the room of Ricimer, who was created patrician, probably by Marcian, or Leo his successor; for the emperor of the east is supposed to have governed the western empire during the inter-regnum y. He had not been long general, when he was proclaimed emperor at a place about fix miles from Ravenna, called The little

Majorianus raised to the empire in the west.

THEOPH. p. 94. GREG. Tur. p. 70. EVAGE. 1. 1. 9. Theop. l. i. p. 650. P Idem. p. 70. EVAGE. 1. 1. 9. LEO, ep. 12. T Codin. orig. Constant. p. 48. Marc. chron. Zonar. p. 40. 1 GREG. Tur. l. ii. c. 11. p. 280. p. 210. Concil. tom. 4. p. 1043. p. 299. IDAT. MARC. & chron. Alex. p. 747. EVACR. l. ii. c. 1. p. 283. THEOPH. p. Theoph. p. 95. Theod. p. 568. Marc. chron. 75. W CEDREN. p. 346. Leo, ep 118. p. 671. Тнеор. р. 568. Тнеори. р. 575.

b pillars 1. In the beginning of his reign, Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, having Galicia almost almost intirely reduced the Suevians in Galicia, entered Lusitania, and made himself intirely reduced master of several cities there, and among the rest of Merida, the metropolis of that by the Visicountry; but receiving disagreeable tidings from Gaul, not mentioned in history, he goths. fet out from Lusitania the day after Easter, which fell this year 457. on the thirtyfirst, and not on the twenty-eighth of March, as we read in Idatius, and returned in great haste to Toulouse a. He lest a body of troops in Spain, with orders to reduce the Suevians in Galicia, who had not yet submitted to him. These forces being, on their march to Galicia, admitted as friends into the city of Astorga, which was held by the Romans, fell unexpectedly upon the inhabitants, put most of them to the c fword, plundered their houses, and setting fire to the place, carried all those, whose lives they had spared, into captivity, and among the rest the whole clergy, and two bishops, who happened to be there at that time. The city of Palentia met with the fame treatment; but the castle of Coviac, about thirty miles from Astorga, making a vigorous resistance, the Goths, after having lost great numbers of their men, thought it adviseable to raise the siege, and return to Gaulb. The Suevians had, upon the death of Requiarius their king, chosen Maldra in his room, as we have observed being thus kindled among them, they concluded a peace with the Romans, that is, with the natives, who still held several strong-holds in Galicia, and acknowledged d the authority of the emperor; but, notwithstanding this peace, the partizans of Maldra, entering Lusitania, made themselves masters of Lisbon, after having been Lisbon taken admitted into the place as friends c.

above; but some of them, revolting from him, set up one Frantan. A civil war

THE following year, when the two emperors, Leo and Majorianus, were confuls, the Vandals made a descent on the coast of Campania; but Majorianus marching against them, defeated them in the neighbourhood of Sinuessa, between the Gari- The Vandals gliano and the Volturno; put great numbers of them to the sword, among whom was defeated by the brother in-law of Genseric their commander; and obliged the rest to save them-Majorianus. selves on board their fleet, which failed immediately for Africa d. Majorianus, resolved to purfue them thither, and to attempt the recovery of that wealthy country, applied e himself to the fitting out of a powerful fleet, and had, before the end of this year, affembled a great number of troops, and above three hundred ships. But of this enterprize hereafter. Majorianus, leaving Ravenna in the depth of winter, passed the Alps, and entering Gaul, obliged the Burgundians, who had made themselves masters of the city of Lions, to deliver it up, and retire. From that city, where Sidonius pronounced his panegyric, Majorianus pursued his march to Arles, where he passed the remainder of the winter, and part of the spring; for he was still in that city on the seventeenth of April of the following year 459 f. In Spain, Frantan, one of the kings of the Suevians, dying, those who had followed him submitted to Maldra; fo that the whole nation was again united under one head. An army of Visigoths, f fent into Spain by Theodoric, ravaged the province of Batica, while the Suevians, not- Spain ravaged withstanding the peace concluded the preceding year with the natives, over-ran that by the Suevi part of Galicia, which borders on the Douro, putting all to fire and fword g. In the ans and Vision following consulship of Ricimer and Patricius, Theodoric, taking unexpectedly the field, goths.

chron.

IDAT. P. 35.

p. 325.

Idem, p. 324.

Cod. Theod. Nov. 9. p. 372.

VOL. VI. N° 7. 8 IDAT. P. 37.

surprised some cities in Gaul belonging to the Romans; but Majorianus marching from Arles against him, defeated him in a pitched battle, and obliged him to sue for peace; which was granted him, upon his promifing to affift the Romans against

the

the Suevians in Spain, and the Vandals in Africa 1. In the east, the city of Antioch a Majorianus resolves to pass over into Africa

His fleet furprifed by the Vandals.

Majorianus deposed by Rito death.

emperor.

was almost utterly ruined by an earthquake, which happened on the fourteenth of September. Scarce a single house was left standing in the new city, the most beautiful quarter of that metropolis m. The following year 460. when Magnus and Apollonius were consuls, Majorianus, leaving Arles, bent his march towards Spain, which he entered in the month of May, with a design to pass over from thence into Africa n. Procopius writes, that the better to inform himself of the strength of the enemy, the state of the country, and the disposition of the inhabitants, he went in disguise to the court of Genseric, pretending to be an embassador sent by the Roman emperor, with proposals for an accommodation o. This Procopius relates with such circumstances, as render the whole account altogether incredible. Genseric, alarmed at the vast pre- b parations that were carrying on in all the ports of the empire, fent deputies to fue for peace; but his proposals being rejected, he dispatched a squadron of his best ships, with orders to attack the Roman fleet riding in the bay of Alicant; which they did with fuch fuccess, that they took most of the Roman ships, and returned with them in triumph to Africa. This misfortune, which was chiefly owing to the treachery of some on board the Roman sleet, put a stop to the enterprize, and obliged Majorianus to return to Arles, whence he iffued out orders for the equipping of a new fleet. But in the mean time Genseric, dreading the arms and valour of Majorianus, dispatched embassadors to him, with new proposals; which in the end he accepted, as they were very advantageous to the empire P. Thus a peace was concluded between c Majorianus and Genseric; but the articles of the treaty have not been transmitted to posterity. In Spain, Maldra, king of the Suevians being killed, Remismond his fon, and Frumarius, probably another of his children, dividing his troops between them, the latter surprised Aquæ Flaviæ, and took Idatius, bishop of the place, prisoner, on the twenty-fixth of July, while Remismond laid waste the territies of Orenso on the Minho, and of Lugo. Sunieric and Nepotianus, two of Theodoric's generals, marched against them; and, after having ravaged part of Galicia, entered Lusitania, and made themselves masters of Scalabis, now Santarein on the Tagus 9. In the east nothing happened this year that deferves notice, except an earthquake, which overturned great part of the city of Cyzicus. The following year 461. Severinus and d Dagalaiphus being consuls, Ricimer, who had raised Majorianus to the empire, thinking himself neglected by him, and jealous of the great reputation the prince had gained by his wife and vigorous administration, resolved to depose him; and accordingly, having got him by treachery into his power, as he was returning from Gaul to Rome, he stripped him of the imperial ornaments at Tortona in the Milanese on the second of August, and caused him, on the seventh of the same month, to be put to death at Iria, now Voghera, after he had reigned three years, and some months. The account which Procopius gives us of his death, shews, that we must not lay great stress upon the authority of that writer'. Majorianus, in whose reign the empire seemed in Severus made a manner to revive, being thus removed, Ricimer caused Severus to be proclaimed at e Ravenna, on the nineteenth of November, hoping to reign in his name, the new prince being no-ways qualified for that high station. All we know of him is, that he was a native of Lucania ". In the east, Leo refusing to pay the usual pension to Valamir, Theodomir and Widemir, kings of the Ostrogoths, whom Marcian had allowed to fettle in Pannonia, as we have related above, they flew to arms, laid waste great part of Illyricum, and made themselves masters of several cities; but Anthemius, son-in-law to the late emperor Marcian, having obliged them to retire into Pannonia, they hearkened to the embasfadors that were sent by Leo to renew the antient alliance between them and the empire. A peace was accordingly concluded, and the famous Theodoric, afterwards king of Italy, then in the eighth year of his age, delivered up f to Leo as an hostage w. But of him we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the history of the Ostrogoths in Italy.

THE following year, when the emperor Leo was conful for the second time, with Severus emperor of the west, who nevertheless seems not to have been acknowledged

<sup>1</sup> Idem, p. 38. Vales. p. 190, 191.

*** Evag. l. ii. c. 12. Theoph. p. 95. Niceph. chron.

*** Idat. Marc. chron. Prisc. p. 42.

*** Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 7. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 7. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

** Procop. p. 194.

*** Procop. p. 194.

*

a by the Greeks, Genseric, pretending not to be bound by the late treaty with Majorianus, after that prince's death, sent a powerful sleet to pillage the coasts of Sicily and Italy, and made himself master of Sardinia'. In Gaul Ægidius, a native of that country, and commander in chief of the Roman forces there, provoked at the death of Majorianus, who had raised him to that post, resolved to march into Italy, and revenge it upon Ricimer and Severus. But in the mean time the Visigoths, in all likelihood stirred up by Ricimer, having made themselves masters of Narbonne, which was betrayed to them by one Agrippina, and besieged Arles, Ægidius turned his arms against them, obliged them to raise the siege and retire, tho' they were powerfully affisted by the Burgundians, under the conduct of Gondiae their king, whom b Severus had raised to the command of the Roman forces in Gaul, with the title of general y. The same year Marcellinus, or, as Procopius calls him, Marcellianus, who had served with great reputation in the Roman armies, no longer able to bear the haughty behaviour of Ricimer, revolted from Severus, and retiring into Dalma-Marcellinus tia, established there a new sovereignty, independent of the empire?. Hereupon establishes a the inhabitants of Italy, seeing themselves at the same time threatened by Marcellinus, newsovereignty by Ægidius, and by Genseric, had recourse to Leo, emperor of the east, who immediately dispatched embassadors to Genseric and Marcellinus. The latter, satisfied to fee himself acknowledged by Leo prince of the country which he had seized, promised not to molest the Romans. But Genseric openly declared, that he would hearken c to no terms, till the effects of Valentinian were delivered up to him; which he claimed, because his son Huneric had married Eudocia, that prince's eldest daughter. He likewise demanded the effects of Aetius, perhaps because Gaudentius, that general's eldest son, whom he had taken at Rome in 455. was then at his court. However, he sent back to Leo, Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, and Placidia her second daughter; who being foon after married to Olybrius, of whom anon, Genseric declared he would wage an eternal war with the western empire, unless Olybrius, brother-inlaw to his fon, was raised to the imperial dignity. To this low ebb was the Roman grandeur reduced by the death of Majorianus, and the administration of Ricimer. The following year 463. Flavius Cacina Basilius and Vivianus being consuls, Ægidius The Visigoths d gained a signal victory over the Visigoths in Gaul. The battle was sought between descated in Gaul by Ægithe Loire and the Loiret. The latter river, after a short course of about six miles, dius. falls into the former a little below Orleans. Great numbers of the enemy were cut in pieces, and among the rest Frederic, the king's brother, who in this action commanded in chief b. After this battle, Ægidius laid siege to the city of Chinon in Tauraine; but the vigorous resistance he met with, obliged him to drop the enterprize . The Visigoths were attended with better success in Spain, than in Gaul; for Idatius speaks of them as now masters of the whole country, except part of Galicia, which was still held by the Suevians, and the provinces of Tarraco and Cartagena, which belonged to the Romans. Such of the natives of Galicia, as had not yet submitted to e the Suevians, sent this very year one Palegorius, to implore the protection, not of Severus, but of Theodoric d; which plainly shews, that they acknowledged him, and not the Roman emperor, for their sovereign. The next year Rusticus, or Rusticius, and Olybrius being confuls, Remismond, king of the Suevians, surprised and plundered the city of Coimbra; but foon after concluded a peace with Theodoric . In the beginning of the year, Beorgor, king of the Alans, having entered Italy with a confiderable army, was met by Ricimer in the neighbourhood of Bergamo, and, on the fixth of The Alans de-February, cut off, with all his men f. Whence these Alans came, is uncertain. This feated by Ri-Jornandes supposes to have happened in the reign of Anthemius; but we have followed cimer.

Romans in 472. and were governed by one Paulus, distinguished with the title of counts. Syagrius, the son of Ægidius, held Soissons, and its territory, for several years, Different nahaving erected there a petty sovereignty, according to the French historians, who give tions settle in him the title of king. At the same time Childeric, king of the Burgundians, laid Gaul.

Idatius, who lived at that time. The same year died Ægidius in Gaul, being, f according to some, says Idatius, poisoned, according to others, murdered. That writer adds, that, upon his death, the Visigoths made themselves masters of the sar greater part of Gaul. However, Berri, Sens and Auvergne still belonged to the

* PRISC. p. 74. PROCOP. bell. Vand. l. iv. c. 6. p. 192.
PRISC. p. 42. IDAT. p. 41. CUSP. p. 452.
PROCOP. p. 191. IDAT. p. 43.
IDAT. p. 32. PRISC. p. 42. SID. car. ii. p. 349.
IDAT. p. 41. DU CHESNE, p. 211.
IDAT. ibid.
IDAT. ibid.
Idem, p. 42. Concil. tom. 4. p. 1062.
IDAT. ibid.
Idem, p. 285.

Severus dies.

Constantinople.

Theodoric. king of the Vitigoths, murdered by his

Anthemius raised to the empire,

ed at Rome.

Genseric ravages the Greek islands.

siege to Paris, and reduced it; the Franks made themselves masters of the provinces a bordering on the Rhine; the Saxons fettled at Nantes and Bayeux; the Alemans in the country of the Helvetii; and the Britons, driven out by the Angles and Scots, in the territories of Vennes and Treguier, which, with the adjacent country, took from them, according to the most probable opinion, the name of Bretagne 1. In 465. when Basiliscus and Hermenericus were consuls, died at Rome Severus, after having borne the name of emperor almost four years. He is supposed to have been poisoned by Ricimer k. His death was followed by an inter-regnum of almost two years, Ricimer ruling, during that time, with an absolute sway; but not daring, as he was by birth Agreat fire at a barbarian, to take upon him the title of emperor. The same year a violent fire breaking out in Constantinople on the second of September, reduced to ashes eight of b the fourteen quarters into which that city was divided. However, it was at last overcome, after it had raged with incredible fury for the space of fix whole days, and as many nights 1. The following year, when the emperor Leo alone was conful the third time, Ricimer affembled a powerful fleet, with a defign to attempt the recovery of Africa; but was, by contrary and violent winds, which continued blowing the whole summer, obliged to drop that enterprize . The same year Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, after having reigned near thirteen years, was murdered by his brother Euric, who immediately took possession of his dominions, and was proclaimed in Toulouse n. Jornandes, always favourable to the Goths, only writes, that Euric brother Euric.' was suspected of having contributed to the death of his brother o. The new king c fent embassadors to the emperor Leo, to Remismond king of the Suevians, and to Genferic king of the Vandals, acquainting them with his accession to the crown?. In the east the Hunns broke into Dacia; but were defeated, first by Anthemius, and afterwards by Anagastus, styled general of Thrace. They were commanded by Dengizic, one of Attila's fons, who was flain in the engagement. His head was fent to Constantinople, and there exposed for some days to public view q. In the following consulship of Pulaus and Johannes, the inter-regnum ended in the west. Anthemius was, with the confent and approbation of Ricimer, declared emperor, notwithstanding the great interest made by Genseric in favour of Olybrius, brother-in-law to his son. Anthemius was a native of Constantinople, descended of an antient, illustrious and wealthy family, d and was, at the time of his promotion, count of the east. He had some claim to the empire, having married Marciana, the only daughter of the late emperor Marcian, by whom he had three fons, and one daughter. He had been conful in 455. and was foon after, tho' yet very young, raised to the dignity of patrician, and the post of general. Sidonius, his panegyrist, writes, that, upon the death of Marcian, no one thought of conferring the empire on Leo, till Anthemius had refused it r. Theophanes styles him a most christian prince'. Soon after his nomination, he lest Constantinople, where he then was, and fet out for Italy, attended by a great number of chosen troops, and several counts, with other persons of distinction, among whom was Marcellinus, prince of Dalmatia, whom Leo had persuaded to join the new emperor, and, jointly e with him, make war upon the Vandals. Anthemius was received at Rome by the And proclaim- senate and people with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable, and proclaimed, according to some, on the twelfth of April, according to others, in the month of August, at a place about three miles from Rome, called Bontrota ". A few days after, he gave his daughter in marriage to Riciner, pursuant to a private agreement between that general and the two princes w. In the mean time Genseric, highly provoked against Leo, for having preferred Anthemius, and not Olybrius, to the empire, sent a powerful fleet, with orders to ravage Peloponnesus, and the Greek islands; which they did with great cruelty, destroying all with fire and sword. Leo resolved at all events to revenge the affront offered to the eaftern empire; and accordingly the following f year 468. when Anthemius alone was consul, he fitted out the greatest fleet, says Procopius x, the Romans had ever had. Cedrenus writes, it confisted of one thousand one hundred and thirteen ships, each ship having one hundred men on board s. Theophanes 2 and Nicephorus 2 will have no fewer than one hundred thousand ships to have a been employed in this expedition, a number altogether incredible. To the forces of Leo were joined all the best troops of the west, under the command of Marcellinus; who reinforced them with a chosen body of men raised in his own dominions b. Leo gave the chief command of this formidable fleet to Bastliscus, brother to his wife Verina, who had frequently overcome the barbarians in Thrace. Under him commanded one John, a person of extraordinary courage, and great experience in war c. The island of Sicily was appointed the place of the general rendezvous. From thence Marcellinus was to fail for Sardinia, which the Vandals had lately feized; Heraclius of Edessa, a brave and experienced officer, for Lybia; and Basiliscus, with the greatest part of the fleet, and the flower of the troops, to steer his course strait to Carthage. Marcellinus, b pursuant to this plan, landed in Sardinia, and made himself master of that island, while Heraclius, landing unexpectedly in Libya, deseated the Vandals, who attempted Sardinia and to oppose him, and reduced with incredible expedition Tripolis, and all the other cities Tripolis recovered from the of that province d. Genseric, receiving at the same time news of the loss of Sardinia Vandals. and Libya, and of the arrival of the Roman fleet at cape Mercury, about thirty miles from Carthage, began to look upon himself as irretrievably lost, and is even said to have had fome thoughts of yielding up Africa to the Romans, and retiring elsewhere; and indeed if Basiliscus had, during the panic which had seized the barbarians, marched directly to Carthage, he might have easily made himself master of that city, and put an end to the war at once; but his dilatory proceedings giving Genferis time to reco-e ver from his consternation, he began to despise the Roman admiral, and had even the confidence to fend deputies to him, begging a truce of five days, to fettle with him the conditions on which he was to submit to Leo. Some authors write, that, with the embassadors, Genseric sent privately an immense sum to Basiliscus, with whose avaricious temper he was well acquainted. Others tell us, that Appar, who had lately quarrelled with Leo, fearing that prince would become too powerful, if he overcame the Vandals, had promifed to raise Basiliscus, who was no less ambitious than covetous, to the empire, provided he spared Genseric s. Be that as it will, Basiliscus readily consented to the truce, during which Genseric taking one night advantage of a favourable wind, sailed unexpectedly out of the harbour with a great d number of fire-ships, which being by the wind driven full fail upon the Roman navy, fet fire to many of their ships, and threw the whole seet into the utmost contusion. The next morning Genseric's fleet appeared drawn up in line of battle, The Roman and falling upon the Romans before they could recover themselves from their fleet in Africa terror and consternation, took several of their ships, sunk others, and obliged the put to sight.

<sup>1</sup> Val. ret. Franc. p. 236, 237. Sid. l. i. ep. 7. p. 16. K Jorn. p. 654. Sid. car. ii. p. 317. Idat. p. 43. <sup>1</sup> Eyagr. l. ii. c. 13. p. 307. Theodor. p. 555. Cedren. p. 348. Prisc. p. 75. Idat. Isidor. Marc. chron. Jorn. c. 44. p. 677. Idat. p. 44. 45. Chron. Alex. p. 744. Jorn. c. 56. p. 688. Prisc. p. 44. Sid. p. 295. Theoph. p. 98. Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 6. p. 191. Jorn. c. 46. p. 654. Idat. p. 44. Marc. Cassiod. Cuspin. chron. w Sid. l. i. ep. 4. p. 21, 22. Procop. l. i. c. 6. p. 192. Cedren. p. 350. Theoph. p. 99. Niceph. l. xv. c. 27. p. 631.

rest to save themselves in the best manner they could. John, who commanded under Basiliscus, and was no-ways privy to his treachery, after having killed with his own hand an incredible number of barbarians, threw himself, when overpowered, on a plank into the sea. Genson, the son of Genseric, greatly taken with his courage, and gallant behaviour, offered him his life and liberty; but the brave commander answere ing, It shall never be said, that John owed his life to dogs, quitted his plank, and was drowned 8. As for Bafilifeus, Zonaras writes, that, in the heat of the engagement, he all on a fudden tacked about, and crowding all fails, betook himself to slight; which raised the courage of the enemy, and quite disheartened his own people b. Marcellinus, after the reduction of Sardinia, returned to Sicily, with a defign to pass from thence over into Africa; but, before he set sail, he was affassinated by an officer, who commanded under him, not without the privity, as was supposed, of Anthemius, to whom his power gave no small umbrage i. Heraclius, who was on full march from Libya to Carthage, upon the news of the bad success of Basiliscus, thought it adviseable to turn back, and hasten into the territories of the empire k. Basiliscus f returned to Sicily, with the few ships that had escaped, having lost above fifty thoufand men!. From Sicily he returned to Constantinople, and there, as his treachery was publicly known, took fanctuary in the church of St. Sophia. Tho' both the emperor and people were highly incenfed against him, yet, by the mediation of the empress Verina, his sister, his life was spared, and leave granted him to retire to Heraclea in Thrace. Such was the issue of this unhappy expedition, which is said to have cost both empires above an hundred and thirty thousand pounds weight of gold', a not only the two princes, but all governors, and other persons in employments,

b Procop. l. i. c. 6. p. 191. CIdem, p. 153. Idem, p. 192. Theoph. p. 101. Sid. car. p. 1196. Theoph. p. 100. Theodor p. 555. Suid. Phot. c. 242. p. 164. S Procop. l. i. c. 6. p. 192. Zonar. p. 42. Procop. p. 193. Phot. c. 242. p. 1048. Marc. chron. Idem ibid. Prisc. p. 193. Idem ibid. Cedren. p. 330. Theoph. p. 100.

Zeno.

cheerfully contributing large sums, to defray the charges of an enterprize so advantageous to the empire ". Priscus the historian, who slourished at that time, wrote a very minute and exact account of it w; but his work has not reached our time. The same year Leo married his daughter Ariadne to Zeno, descended from an illustrious his daughter to family in Isauria. His father's name was Rusumbladastes, and his, before his marriage, Trascalissaus, or Tarasicodisus. He took the name of Zeno from another Isaurian, who had been raised to great employments in the reign of Theodosius the younger y. Evagrius refers us to one Eustathius, a Syrian writer, who, he says, will inform us as to the motives that prompted Leo to prefer Zeno to many other persons b of great merit in the choice of a fon-in-law 2; but the works of Eustathius have been long fince loft. Theophanes and Candidus Isaurus write, that Leo, jealous of the too great power of Aspar, and apprised of his wicked practices, gave his daughter to Zeno, hoping by his means to gain over the Isaurians his countrymen, who were deemed the best soldiers of the empire a. However that be, Leo immediately raised his fon-in-law to the rank of patrician, appointing him at the fame time captain of his guards, and commander in chief of all the armies in the east. In the west, Remismond made himself master of Lisbon, betrayed to him by one Lusides, a native of Lusitania, who commanded in the place. About the same time the Goths surprised Merida, and committed dreadful ravages in the neighbouring country, sparing neither c Romans nor Suevians b. Here Idatius ends his chronicle, with telling us, that many prodigies appeared this year in Galicia, and among the rest, that several sishes were taken in the Minho, marked with Hebrew, Greek and Latin characters. The next confuls were Marcianus and Zeno, the two fons-in-law of the emperor Leo, the latter having married Ariadne, and the former, who was the fon of the emperor Anthemius, Leoncia. Nothing worthy of notice happened this year in either empire; but in the The Visigoths following confulship of Severus and Jordanes, Euric, king of the Visigoths, an ambihaving defeated a body of twelve thousand Britons dwelling on the Loire, who, under the conduct of Riothim or Riotham, came to the affiftance of the Romans d. At the d same time one Odvacer, who had commanded a body of Saxons under Ægidius in 464. made himself master of Angers; but was overcome by Childeric king of the Franks, who reduced not only the city of Angers, but all the neighbouring country c.

by the Suevians, and Merida by the Goths.

Lishon taken

extendibeir do- tious and warlike prince, made himself master of Auvergne, Berri and Gevaudan, after minions in Gaul, the Franks and Burgundians too, taking advantage of the weak and distracted state of the empire,

Burgundians. reduced the city of Lions, and the whole province called Lugdunensis Prima s. THE following year, when Leo was conful the fourth time, with Probianus, some misunderstanding arose between that prince and Aspar, who had raised him to the empire; but as Aspar was greatly beloved by the army, and commanded a separate and independent body, having one Quelcal, by nation a Hunn, for his lieutenant, the emperor thought it adviseable to diffemble for the present; and pretending to be reconciled with Aspar, gave one of his daughters in marriage to Patricius Secundus, Aspar created that general's eldest son, and soon after created Aspar Cafar. The inhabitants of Constantinople, knowing Aspar and his whole family to be greatly attached to the doctrine of Arius, were highly displeased at this promotion; but the emperor soon delivered them from the apprehension they were under of seeing an Arian raised to the empire; for being informed by some persons, privy to all the counsels of Aspar, that a plot was carrying on against him by that general and his children, he resolved to be before-Aspar and his hand with them; and accordingly caused Aspar, and his son Ardaburius, to be mur-Jon Ardaburius dered this very year. The antients only tell us, that they fell by the hands of the murdered. eunuchs of the palace, Leo having ordered them to be put to death, because they aspired at the empire 8. But the modern writers add several circumstances, which feem inconsistent with what we read in the authors who flourished in those times. Patricius was dangerously wounded, but found means to make his escape, as did likewise Aspar's third son, named Hermeneric b. The friends of Aspar, especially * Evage. l. ii. c. 16. p. 308. Theoph. p. 100.

* Zon. p. 42. Ågath. l. iv. p. 149.

* Theoph. p. 101.

* Theoph. p. 101.

* Evage. l. ii. c. 15. p. 308.

* Theoph. p. 101.

* Evage. l. ii. c. 15. p. 308.

* Idem, p. 47, 48.

* John. ret.

* Goth. c. 45. p. 678. Sid. l. iii. ep. 9. d. 73, 74.

* Greg. Tur. l. ii. c. 18. p. 282.

* Greg. Tur. ibid.

* Marc. chron. Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 6.

* Niceph. l. xv. c. 27. p. 733. Zonar. p. 20. t PROCOP. p. 191. EVAGR. P. 74. w Idem, l. ii. c. 16 p. 308. Тнеорн. р. 100.

a the Goths in the emperor's fervice, attempted to revenge his death, and committed great disorders in Constantinople, being headed by one of their countrymen, named Ostroui. But Zeno, who was then at Chalcis, hastening with a choice body of troops to the metropolis, the Goths were driven out of the city with great flaughter. However, they ravaged Thrace, and being joined by the Goths, fettled in Pannonia, made themselves matters of Philippi and Arcadiopolis; which they restored soon after, laying down their arms, upon the emperor's promising to pay them a certain sum, and to appoint Theodoric, son to Triarius, the brother of Aspar's wife, commander of the Golbs in the Roman service i. Upon the death of Aspar, who had been a zealous patron of the Arians, Leo published several rigorous laws against those heretics, deprivb ing them of all their churches, and forbidding them to hold any public or private affemblies k. The following year, when Festus and Marcianus were consuls, Ricimer, who was no less powerful in the west, than Aspar had been in the east, dreading the fame fate, refolved to be before-hand with the emperor Anthemius, who, he faw, began to mistrust him. Accordingly he openly revolted, and, at the head of the barbarians in the Roman service, but under his command, laid siege to Rome, where Rome besieged the emperor then was. The citizens, who were, generally speaking, well affected by Ricimer; to Anthemius, made a vigorous resistance, notwithstanding the famine and plague that raged in the city, depending upon the succours they daily expected out of Gaul, under the conduct of Bilimer, who commanded the Roman troops there, and was greatly c attached to the interest of Anthemius. Bilimer arrived at length with a considerable army, confisting partly of Romans, partly of barbarians; but having ventured an engagement, he was utterly defeated by Ricimer, who, encouraged with this fuccess, pursued the siege with fresh vigour, and breaking in the end into the city, raged Which is taken with no less fury than Alaric or Genseric had done, allowing his men not only to and plundered. plunder the houses of the unhappy citizens, but to commit all manner of cruelties!. As for the emperor Anthemius, Ricimer caused him to be put to death, and Olybrius Anthemius to be proclaimed in his room m. Zeno, who succeeded Leo, reproached the Roman put so death, fenate with the death of Anthemius. He is supposed to have died on the eleventh of and Olybrius July; but authors are quite silent as to the circumstances of his death, contenting peror. d themselves only with telling us, that, by the treachery of Ricimer, he lost both his life and the empire. Ricimer did not long outlive Anthemius; for being feized with violent pains in his bowels, he died on the eighteenth, or rather nineteenth, of Sep-Ricimer dies. tember P; and was followed foon after by Olybrius, who died a natural death at and the new Rome, on the twenty-third of Onober 9. This year mount Vefuvius in Campania brius. threw out such an immense quantity of ashes, as turned night into day, even at Constantinople, where the people were assembled in the circus, when the cloud first appeared. All the streets and houses were covered with ashes three inches deep r. This happened, according to Marcellinus, on the fixth, according to the chronicle of Alexandria, on the eleventh of November. The following year 473. when Leo alone was e consul the fifth time, Glycerius took upon him the title of emperor at Ravenna, on Glycerius the fifth of March, being supported by Gondibal, nephew to Ricimer, whom Olybrius usurps the emhad raised, during his short reign, to the rank of patrician. All we know of this fire. new prince is, that he had been comes domesticorum, and was, according to Theophanes, a man of some merit'. In the very beginning of his reign, the Goths, who had been allowed to settle in Pannonia, resolved, without the least provocation, says fornandes, to make war upon both empires. Pursuant to this resolution, Videmir broke into Italy, while his brother Theodomir invaded the eastern empire; but the former dying, his fon, bearing the same name, was, by the rich presents of Glycerius, prevailed upon to quit Italy; whence he retired into Gaul, and there joined f the Vifigoths, who, being thus reinforced, conquered foon after both that country and Spain . Theodomir likewise died as soon as he entered the territories of the eastern empire, and was succeeded by his fon Theodoric, surnamed the Great ". The same year 473. Leo, apprehending, either from his age or infirmities, that his end approached, was for naming Zeno to succeed him; but both the senate and people of Constantinople, who hated Zeno, strongly remonstrating against his promotion, the k Theodor. l. iv. c. 4. р. 273.

<sup>1</sup> Marc. chron. Тнеорн. р. 181.

Theodor. l. iv. c. 4. р. 273.

Marc. chron. Onuph. р. 57.

Concil. tom. 4. р. 1238.

Evagr. l. ii. c. 16. р. 308.

Marc. p. 94.

Cuspin. р. 457.

P Onuph. р. 57.

Idem ibid. John. р. 67.

Theodor. р. 555.

Procop. l. ii. c. 4. р. 398.

S Theoph. р. 102.

Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 56. р. 194, 195.

Idem de reg. fucc. c. 47. р. 655.

er created Cartar.

Loo the elder

collegue to his fon Lco.

Lco dies.

Glycerius deposed, and lu. lius Nepos railed to the empire.

Clerment yielded to the Goths.

Oreftes caufes his fon Augufulus to be declared em-· perer.

Leo the young emperor raised Leo the younger, the son of Zeno by his daughter Ariadne, to the a dignity of  $C\alpha far$ , and even declared him his partner in the empire, tho' he was then only five, or at most fix years old w. The following year, when Leo the younger was conful alone, the emperor, his grandfather, was seized with a bloody flux, which, being attended with a violent fever, carried him off in a short time. He died at Constantinople, in the month of January, after having reigned seventeen years, wanting some days x. Soon after his death, the empress Verina prevailed upon the Zeno declared senate and people of Constantinople to suffer her son-in-law Zeno to be declared collegue to young Leo in the empire. The ceremony was performed in the month of February, not in the palace of Hebdomon, as usual, but in the circus at Constantinople y. The young prince did not survive his grandfather above ten months; for he died b in the month of November of the same year . Victor Tununensis and Ado suppose, that he was dispatched by his own father; but neither the antient nor modern Greek writers, tho' highly prejudiced against Zeno, charge him with that unnatural murder. Les the elder, or, as he is commonly furnamed, the Great, not approving of the promotion of Glycerius, had, before his death, named to the empire of the west Julius Nepos, or, as some call him, Nepotianus, a native of Dalmatia, and nephew, by the mother, to Marcellinus, prince of that country, who was murdered in Sicily, as we have related above. Nepos, who, it feems, was then at Constantinople, failed from thence, without loss of time, for Italy, and landing at Porto, surprised Glycerius there, took him prisoner, and stripping him of the imperial ornaments, caused him c to be ordained bishop of Salonæ in Dalmatia, after he had borne the title of emperor a year, and some months a. In the mean time the Visigoths, under the conduct of Euric their king, broke into the territories which the Romans had still left in Gaul; but he was prevailed upon by Epiphanius, bishop of Pavia, whom Nepos sent to him with the character of embassador, to conclude a peace with the empire, whereof one of the articles was, that the city of Clermont, which Euric had not been able to reduce by force, should be delivered up to him b. Thus the whole country lying between the occan, the Rhone and the Loire, fell under the power of the Goths, who, it feems, had made themselves masters of all the open places, before Clermont was yielded to them. The following year, when Zeno alone was conful the fecond time, Nepos, d having raised Orestes to the post of general, appointed him commander of the Roman Orestes revolts forces in Gaul; but he, instead of hastening into that country, pursuant to his orders, bent his march towards Ravenna, with a design to depose Nepos, who, he knew, was not in a condition to oppose him. The emperor, suspecting his design, and distrusting the few troops he had with him, abandoned the city at his approach, and fled by fea Nepos flies in to Salonæ in Dalmatia, where he was entertained by the bishop Glycerius, whom he had lately deprived of the empire d. The flight of Nepos happened on the twenty-eighth of August of the present year 475°. Orestes was by birth a Roman, that is, he was born a subject of the empire. As he lived in Pannonia, perhaps his native country, when that province was yielded to the Hunns in 430. he lifted himself among the e troops of Attila, who, finding him to be a man of parts, made him his fecretary, and fent him at least twice to Constantinople with the character of embassador, viz. in 448. and 449 8. His father, by name Tatula, bore likewise some considerable employment at the court of Attila h. Orestes married the daughter of count Romulus, sent by Valentinian on an embassy to Attila in 449. and had by her a son, called by Males or Malus, Romulus Augustus', but, by all other historians, Romulus Augustulus, either by way of derision, or because he was very young when raised to the empire. Orestes, leaving the Hunns, ferved with great reputation in the Roman armies, and was raised to the rank of patrician, and appointed by Nepos general of the troops in Gaul; when turning his arms against the prince who had entrusted him with them, he drove him f from the throne, as we have related above, and caused not himself, but his son Augustus, or Augustulus, to be proclaimed emperor in his room, on the twenty-ninth of October of the present year k. The new prince styled himself Augustus Romulus Augustus, Augustus being both his proper name, and the title of his dignity! As w Zonar. p. 429. Theodor. p. 555. Evagr. p. 409. Goltz. p. 265. \*\* Marc. Theoph. p. 103. \*\* Evagr. l. vii. c. 17. p. 309. Theoph. p. 111. \*\* Chron. Alex. p. 751. Theoph. p. 103. \*\* Phot. c. 78. p. 372. Jorn. rer. Goth. p. 654. Evagr. l. ii. c. 16. p. 308. \*\* Jorn. c. 45. p. 679. Sid. l. iii. ep. 7. p. 72. \*\* Sid. l. iii. ep. 1. p. 62, 63. \*\* Jorn. c. 45. p. 679. Onuph. d 67. \*\* Onuph. Marc. chron. \*\* Jorn. ibid. \*\* Prisc. p. 37. \*\* h 1dem, p. 57. 60. \*\* Mal. leg. p. 93. \*\* Jorn. c. 45, 46. p. 679, 690. \*\* Jorn ibid. Evagr. l. ii. c. 16. p. 308.

a Augustulus was very young, his father took upon him the administration, contenting himself with the title of patrician, and governing only as tutor and guardian to his fon, during his minority 1. While these things passed in the west, the Saracens committed dreadful ravages in Mesopotamia; and the Hunns in Thrace put all to fire and fword, and afterwards retired unmolested, the emperor Zeno, a most leud and debauched prince, being wholly intent upon his scandalous pleasures and diversions m. However, he concluded a peace with Genseric, which was religiously observed by the Zeno concludes Vandals, till the reign of Justinian. The same year the empress Verina, who had Genseric. by her interest raised her son-in-law Zeno to the empire, highly provoked at his enormous vices, and scandalous indolence, formed a conspiracy against him, at the head b of which was her brother Basiliscus, of whom we have spoken elsewhere. Zeno was privately informed of the whole; but, instead of putting himself in a posture of desence, and defeating their measures, as he might have easily done, he betook himself to flight, retiring first to Chalcedon, and from thence into Isauria, his native country. Zeno driven Upon his retreat, Basiliscus was proclaimed emperor by the senate and people of Con-out by Basilisstantinople, to the great disappointment of Verina, who designed to confer the empire cus. on Patricius, magister officiorum to Zeno, with whom she is said to have maintained a criminal correspondence °. Bafiliscus immediately declared his wife Zenonides Augusta, and raised his son Marcus to the dignity of Casar P. The following year 476. when Basiliscus and Armatus were consuls, the barbarians who served in the Roman armies, c and were diffinguished with the title of allies, demanded, as a reward for their services, the third part of the lands in Italy, pretending, that the whole country, which they had so often defended, belonged of right to them. As Orestes refused to comply with this insolent demand, they resolved to do themselves justice, as they called it; and openly revolting, chose one Odoacer for their leader. Thus Procopius 1. He is called in the Roman by Theophanes a Goth; by Marcellinus, king of the Goths; and by Isidore, prince fervice revolt of the Ostrogoths; We cannot conceive what could induce Baronius, and several in the west, and others, to call him king of the Heruli. fornandes styles him in one place king of the chuse Odoacer Rugians, and in another king of the Turcilingians. The Rugians inhabited both for their leader. the banks of the Danube, near the city of Faviana, a little above Vienna. As for the d Turcilingians, we find no account in the antients of them, or their country. Odoacer, whether by birth a Goth, Rugian or Turcilingian, was, according to Ennodius, meanly born x, and only a private man in the guards of the emperor Augustulus, when the barbarians revolting, chose him for their leader y. However, he is said to have been His charafter. a man of uncommon parts, equally capable of commanding an army, and governing a state 2. Having left his own country, when he was yet very young, to serve in Italy, as he was of a stature remarkably tall, he was admitted among the emperor's guards, and continued in that station till the present year; when putting himself at the head of the barbarians in the Roman pay, who, tho' of different nations, had, with one confent, chosen him for their leader, he marched against Orestes, and his e fon Augustulus, who still refused to give them any share of the lands in Italy. As the Roman troops were inferior, both in number and valour, to the barbarians, Orestes took refuge in Pavia, at that time one of the best fortified cities in Italy; but Odoacer, investing the place without loss of time, took it soon after by assault, gave it up to be He besseges plundered by his soldiers, and then set fire to it, which reduced most of the houses, Orestes in Paand two churches, to ashes. Orestes was taken prisoner, and brought to Odoacer, Who is taken who carried him to Placentia, and there caused him to be put to death on the twenty-prisener, and eighth of August, the day on which he had driven Nepos out of Ravenna, and obliged put to death. him to abandon the empire. From Placentia Odoacer marched strait to Ravenna, where he found Paul, the brother of Orestes, and the young emperor Augustulus. The former he immediately put to death; but sparing Augustulus, in consideration of his youth, he stripped him of the ensigns of the imperial dignity, and confined him Augustulus to Lucullanum, a castle in Campania, where he was, by Odoacer's orders, treated simperial ornawith great humanity, and allowed an handsome maintenance to support himself and ments, and conhis relations b. Rome readily submitted to the conqueror, who thereupon caused fined to Lucul-

n Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 7. p. 195. reg. fucc. c. 47. p. 654. Italy and to Odoacer.

himself to be proclaimed king of Italy, but would not assume the purple, or any a other mark of the imperial dignity. Thus failed the very name of an empire in the west. Britain had been long since abandoned by the Romans; Spain was held by the Goths and Suevians; Africa by the Vandals; the Burgundians, Goths, Franks, and Alans, had erected feveral tetrarchies in Gaul; at length Italy itself, with its proud metropolis, which for so many ages had given law to the rest of the world, was enflaved by a contemptible barbarian, whose family, country and nation are not The end of the well known to this day. The downfal and ruin of the greatest state the world ever western empire. beheld were, no doubt, owing to the depravity of the people in general, and to the floth, luxury and ambition of their princes; but more immediately to their allowing fuch swarms of barbarians to settle within the empire, and to serve in the Roman b armies, under their own officers, in separate and independent bodies. Thus they became more numerous and powerful than the natives; controlled the emperors, difposed of the imperial crown as they pleased, and at length became absolute masters of those whom they were employed to defend and affift. This great revolution happened in the west in the year 476. of the christian zera, five hundred and seven years after the battle of Assium, when the Roman monarchy was first established, and one thousand two hundred and twenty-nine since the foundation of Rome. Most writers observe, that the empire began with Augustus, and ended in a prince of the fame name. Of the state of Italy under Odoacer, till he was overcome and slain by Theodoric the Ostrogoth, and under the Ostrogoths, from Theodoric to their expulsion c by Narses, we shall speak in the following volume; and in the mean time pursue the Roman history, that is, the history of the Constantinopolitan Roman empire, in which were preserved the same marks of sovereignty, the same ceremonies, titles, and employments, that had been first established at Rome.

C JORN. rer. Goth. c. 46. CANDID. ISAUR. C. 19. EVAGR. l. ii. c. 16. p. 308.

C H A P. XXXII.

The Roman history, from the dissolution of the western empire, to the death of Justinian the Great.

T the same time that the Roman empire failed in the west, it was usurped in d A the east by Basiliscus, who, upon the slight of Zeno, the lawful prince, had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, and his son Marcus to be acknowledged Cæsar. Zeno fled into Isauria, whither he was pursued by Illus and Trocondes, two of the usurper's generals, who having easily defeated the few troops he had with him, forced the unhappy prince to shut himself up in a castle, which they immediately invested. But in the mean time Basiliscus having by his cruelty, avarice, enormous extortions, and, above all, by his unseasonable zeal for the doctrine of Eutyches, highly disobliged the senate and people of Constantinople, as well as the soldiery, the two generals, informed of what passed in the metropolis, and privately encouraged, people and sol- as some write, by the senate, instead of pursuing the siege, openly declared for Zeno; e and joining him with all their forces, bent their march to Constantinople. Basiliscus no sooner heard of their revolt, than he dispatched Harmatius or Armatus, his kinsman, with a very numerous army against them, after having obliged him to swear, by his baptism, that he would not betray him. But, notwithstanding this oath, he had no fooner passed the Bosporus, than he joined Zeno, encamped with Illus and Trocondes, in the neighbourhood of Nice, upon that prince's promifing to appoint him general of the troops of his houshold, and to continue him in that office during his life; to raise his son, by name Basiliscus, who was yet very young, to the dignity

Zeno besieged in a castle of Ifauria.

Basiliscus difobliges the diery.

a of Casar, and to leave him the empire after his death d. Zeno, thus reinforced, Zeno restored. marched directly to Constantinople, which he entered without opposition, the usurper flying for refuge, with his wife Zenonides and his children, to the great church, where he is said to have laid down his crown upon the altar. Zeno ordered them to be immediately stripped of all the marks of the imperial dignity; and having foon after got them into his power, being either betrayed a fecond time by Harmatius, Bafilifeus as Candidus Isaurus writes e, or delivered up, as we read in Procopius f, by Acacius, taken, and conpatriarch of Constantinople, he confined them to a castle in Cappadocia, named Limin Cappadocia, nos, where they perished in a short time with hunger and cold g. Thus ended the where he perished in a short time with hunger and cold g. usurpation of Basiliscus, after it had lasted, according to most writers, twenty months, rishes. b that is, from October 475. to June of the present year 477. Zeno, pursuant to his promife, raised Harmatius to the post of general of the troops of his houshold, and his fon Basiliscus to the dignity of Casar; but soon after, distrusting the father, on account of his treachery and ingratitude to Basiliscus, who had preferred him to the first employments in the state, he caused him to be murdered in the palace, employ-Harmatius ing for that purpose one Onoulus or Onoulphus, by birth a barbarian, but brought murdered by up in the family of Harmatius, and by his interest raised from a mean condition to Zeno's orders. the dignity of count, and the post of general of Illyricum h. As for Basiliscus, the fon of Harmatius, he was deposed from the dignity of Casar, and made reader in a church near Constantinople. He was afterwards ordained bishop of Cyzicus, the c metropolis of the Hellespont, which church he governed with great prudence and piety, and affisted in 518. at the council of Constantinople i. During the usurpation of Basiliscus, a dreadful fire happened at Constantinople, which consumed great part A great fire at of the city, with the library, containing a hundred and twenty thousand volumes, Constantiand the works of Homer, written, as is faid, in gold characters on the great gut of nople. a dragon, an hundred and twenty foot long k. The following year, 478. when Illus alone was conful, Theodoric, the fon of Triarius, who had espoused the cause of Basilifeus, broke into Thrace with a numerous army of Goths, and advanced within four miles of Constantinople; which so terrified the emperor, that he concluded a peace with him upon his own terms; whereof one of the articles was, that Theodoric should d be appointed commander in chief of the Roman horse. The next year, Zeno being consul the third time, Marcian, the son of Anthemius, who had reigned in the west, Marcian claiming the empire in right of his wife Leontia, the eldest daughter of the late em-revolts; peror Leo, attacked unexpectedly the imperial palace in Constantinople, at the head of fome malecontents prepared for any desperate attempt. The emperor's guards, endeavouring to make head against them, were either dispersed or cut in pieces, and Zeno himself shut up with a small number of officers in the palace. Had Marcian purfued his defign, and without loss of time forced the gates of the palace, which in that consternation he might have easily done, the emperor must have fallen into his hands. But the attack being with the utmost imprudence put off till the next e morning, Zeno in the mean time gained over, what with presents, what with promises, most of Marcian's men, who thereupon distrusting the rest, withdrew all on But is abana sudden, and took sanctuary in the church of the apostles, whence he was dragged doned by his by the emperor's orders, ordained priest, and confined to a monastery in the neigh-own men, and bourhood of Casarea in Cappadocia. As Zeno had not for some years paid the forced to take Office their lines. The force the in A second had a second heard of refuge in a Ostrogoths in Pannonia their annual pension, Theodoric, their king, no sooner heard of church. the revolt of Marcian, than he broke into Macedon; and from thence advancing into Epirus, made himself master of Duras on the Adriatic sea, that important place being betrayed to him by a Goth named Sidimont. But Sabinianus, an officer of great experience and address, having surprised and cut in pieces a strong reinforcement f that was marching to the affiftance of Theodoric, under the conduct of his brother Theudimont, and taken all their baggage, and two thousand waggons loaded with provisions, the Goths, abandoning Duras, retired in great haste into Pannonia. The following year 480. when Basilius, surnamed the younger, was consul, Zeno, not only concluded a peace, but entered into an alliance with Huneric, the fon and fuccessor of Genseric, dead three years before o. In 481. when Placidius or Placitus was

d Candid. p. 19. Theoph. p. 106. Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 7. p. 295. Evagr. l. iii. c. 24. p. 354. Candid. p. 19. f Procop. bell. Vand. l. i. c. 7. p. 194. Evagr. l. iii. c. 8. p. 341. Procop. bid. Candid. p. 19. Evagr. l. iii. c. 24. p. 354. Procop. p. 195. Evagr. l. iii. c. 24. p. 354. Cedr. p. 35. Zonar. p. 43, 44. 1 Jorn. c. 57. p. 696. Candid. p. 20. Evagr. p. 335. Theoph. p. 109. Mall. p. 78—81. Mallel. p. 95.

and Meelia yielded to Theodoric, king of the Oftrogoths.

Leontius re-

Is joined by

They are both defeated, and besteged in Papyra.

Oftrogoth breaks into Thrace.

against Odoacer, king of Italy.

Leontius and Illus taken, and put to death.

conful, Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, renewed his ravages, laying waste the provinces of Macedon and Thessaly; which obliged Zeno in the end to comply with Lower Dacia his demands, that is, to yield to him part of Lower Dacia and Masia; to give him the command of the troops of the houshold, and to name him conful for the enfuing year 483. Upon these terms he withdrew in 482, when Severinus and Trocundus were consuls, out of Macedon and Thessaly, restored Larissa, the metropolis of the latter province, which he had taken, and promised to employ, when required, all his forces in desence of the empire P. The following year, when Theodoric was consul at Constantinople, and Venantius at Rome, (for Odoacer made no change in the government or magistrates of the city) Leontius, a native of Chalcis in Syria, and commander of the troops in that province, revolting, some say at the instigation of the b empress Verina, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. Against him Zeno immediately dispatched Illus, captain of his guards. But he, instead of opposing Leontius, joined him; and having ravaged the provinces of Syria and Isauria, advanced to Antioch, with a design to seize on that metropolis. Longinus, the emperor's brother, met them in that neighbourhood, at the head of a considerable army; but his troops were all to a man cut in pieces by the rebels, and he himself taken prifoner. After this victory, Leontius and Illus entered Antioch in triumph. Zeno, upon the defeat and captivity of his brother, dispatched John, an officer of great valour, and experience in war, into Syria, with what troops he could affemble, and prevailed upon Theodoric, the Oftrogoth, to join him with a numerous army of Goths. These c two commanders were attended with better fuccess; for meeting Leontius and Illus in the neighbourhood of Seleucia, they gained a complete victory, and the following year, when Symmachus was consul, obliged the two ringleaders of the revolt to fly for refuge to the strong castle of Papyra in Cilicia, which John immediately invested, while Theodoric returned, as the war seemed now ended, with his troops to Constantinople q. Trocundus, the brother of Illus, taken prisoner by John, as he was attempting to make his escape out of Syria, in order to stir up the barbarians, was, by his orders, beheaded . The same year Theodoric, upon some disgust, withdrew from Constantinople, and returned into Pannonia. Evagrius writes, that Zeno. jealous of the glory he had acquired by his late victory, and of the great esteem d persons of all ranks shewed him, attempted privately to dispatch him'. However. Theodoric the that be, it is certain that Theodoric, after having spent the following year, when Longinus and Decius were confuls, in raising troops, and making other military preparations, as if he defigned to make war upon the barbarians, broke fuddenly into Thrace at the head of a numerous army; and putting all to fire and sword, advanced within fifteen miles of Constantinople; but instead of laying siege to that metropolis, Turns his arms as was apprehended, he marched back into Pannonia, in virtue of a private treaty between him and Zeno, by which the emperor yielded to him, as fome authors write, all the provinces of Italy, held then by Odoacer, encouraging him to rescue them out of the hands of that barbarian, and promising to acknowledge him king e of Italy:. The Romans afterwards pretended, that Zeno had sent Theodoric to conquer Italy, not for himself, but for the emperor of the east, to whom of right it belonged. On the other hand, the Goths maintained, that Zeno had yielded it to be held for ever by the Goths. Some authors write, that, in virtue of this treaty, Theodoric was to hold Italy during his life-time, but that upon his death it was to be reunited to the empire. However that be, Theodoric, in the beginning of the autumn of this year 487. when Boetius was consul, returned to Novæ in Mæsia, which city he had chosen for the place of his residence; and having spent the winter in military preparations, he set out the following year, when Sifidius and Dinamius were consuls, at the head of a powerful army for Italy, and entering that country, overcame Odoacer in several battles, and established a new monarchy there, as we shall relate at length in the following volume. About the end of this year, Leontius and Illus, after having defended with incredible bravery the castle of Papyra for the space of four years, were in the end taken by treachery, and put to death. Their heads were sent to Constantinople, and there exposed for several days together to public view ". In the following confulship of Anicius Probinus and Chronion Eusebius, Zeno caused several persons of great distinction to be put to death, and banished others,

> P JORN. rer. Goth. c. 57. p. 696. MARCELL. ad ann. 483. Theoph. p. 142.
>
> LIBERAT. C. 18. p. 125.
>
> THEOPH. ibid.
>
> EVAGR. l. ii. c. 27. p. 356.
>
> THEOPH. p. 114. Phot. c. 242. p. 1072. Theodox. p. 558. 9 Тнеорн. р. 112. JORN. rer. Goth.

confiscating

a confiscating their estates, under pretence that they had favoured Leontius and Illus ". The following year, when Longinus was conful the second time with Faustus, Zeno, raging with more crulty than ever, caused Pelagius, a patrician of great distinction, Zeau's gruelis. to be strangled, for no other reason but because he had been told by an astrologer, that he was to succeed Zeno . The emperor did not long survive him; for in the month of April of the following year 491. when Olybrius was conful, he was seized with violent pains in his bowels, which carried him off in a few days, after he had His death. lived fixty-five years and nine days, and reigned seventeen years and three months x. The more modern Greek writers, and amongst the rest Cedrenus, tell us, that being feized with an epileptic fit, he was buried alive, his wife Ariadne, who hated him, b and was in love with Anastasius, whom she immediately married, not suffering him to be relieved, tho' he made a dreadful noise in his tomb; which being afterwards opened, he was found to have devoured the flesh of his own arms, and even his buskins y. But of this tragical end no mention is made by the more antient writers. He is painted by the antients as one of the most wicked and debauched princes recorded in history, as a person destitute of every good quality requisite in a prince, and equally incapable of governing a state, and commanding an army '. Of the writers, who flourished about this time, we shall speak in note (U).

Upon the death of Zeno, his brother Longinus laid claim to the empire; but he being univerfally abhorred on account of his lewdness and cruelty, Ariadne, widow c to the deceased emperor, easily prevailed upon the senate to acknowlege Anastrasius Anastrasius defor emperor, who was accordingly crowned on the eleventh of April in the circus, clared emperor according to fome, by Ariadne, according to others, by Euphemius, patriarch of Conftantinople, who absolutely refused to place the imperial crown upon his head, till he had bound himself by a solemn oath to protect the catholic church, and to hold the doctrine of the two councils of Nice and Chalcedon. He was no sooner proclaimed emperor, than he married Ariadne, being then in the fixtieth year of his He marries age c. He was a native of Duras, the metropolis of New Epirus in Illyricum d. All Ariadne. we know of his family is, that his father was born in the fame city; that his mother was a Manichee, and Clearchus, her brother, an Ariane. As for Anastasius himself, His birth, edud he is by some styled a Manichee, by others an Eutychian f. Magna, whom some cation, employwill have to have been the emperor's fifter, others to have been wife to his brother, ments, &c. named Paul, was a zealous catholic s. Anastasius had not yet attained to the rank of senator, when he was raised to the empire, being at that time one of the great chamberlain's officers, named Silentiaril, whose province it was to cause due silence to be observed in the palace. He is said to have led, while a private man, a very abstemious life, and to have given fignal instances of his integrity; whence, upon his receiving the purple and diadem in the circus, the people, applauding his promotion,

** Theoph. p. 116. Cedr. p. 354. w Zonar. p. 44. * Chron. Al. p. 758. Evagr. l. iii. c. 29. p. 357. y Cedren. p. 355. ** Procop. bell. Goth. l. i. c. 1. p. 308. Marc. p. 1232. ** Evagr. l. iii. c. 3. p. 334. ** Theoph. p. 117. Cedren. p. 357. ** Evagr. p. 361. Theoph. Zonar. p. 45. ** Evagr. p. 357. Theoph. p. 117. ** Theoph. p. 117. ** Theoph. p. 117. ** Theoph. p. 117. ** Theoph. p. 158. Theoph. bild. ** Evagr. l. iii. c. 37. p. 361. Theoph. p. 115. ** Niceph. chron. p. 305. Theoph. p. 131. ** Evagr. l. iii. c. 29. p. 357. Procop. bell. Perf. l. ii. c. 25. p. 138. р. 550. Тикори. р. 131.

· (U) Theodulus, a native of Syria, published in the reign of Zeno several pieces against the Manichees, and other heretics, a comment on the epiftle of St. Paul to the Romans, and a poem on the miracles related in the old testament, and on the fables of the poets (1). His comment has reached our times (2). John the grammarian published a book against the Eutychians, which has been long since lost (3). He was still alive, according to Gennadius, in 494 (4). Malus or Males, by profession a sophist, wrote the history of Zeno and Basiliscus; but of that work only some fragments have reached us (5). Candidus, by hirth an Haurian comprised in three books a by birth an Isaurian, comprised in three books a very particular and distinct account of what happened from the election of Leo to that of Anastasius. A short abstract of his work has been conveyed to us by Photius (6). Evagtius, in speaking of Zeno, often quotes and highly commends one Eustathius, a native of Philadelphia, who wrote an abridgment of the Roman history, from Eneas to the twelfth year of Zeno's reign (7). The same historian is mentioned by Nicephorus (8). Photius speaks of one Victorinus, who wrote some orations in commendation of the confuls, and of the emperor Zeno (9). He was a native of Antioth, and the son of one Lampadius. Photius commends the elegance, clearness, and propriety of his style (10).

(1) Marc.chron. Gennad. c. 91. Sixtus Senenf. l. iv. p. 381. Possevin. p. 469. Sigebert. c. 134. blioth. patr. tom. i. p. 495. (3) Trith. p. 40. Marc.chron. ad ann. 486. (4) Genn (5) Phot. c. 78. p. 172. Zonar. p. 44. Evagr. p. 78. (6) Phot. c. 78. p. 172. (7) Erc. 15. p. 308. c. 37. p. 367. 6 l. v. c. 24. p. 442. Suid. p. 1096. (8) Niceph. l. xiv. c. 5 (9) Phot. c. 101. p. 276. (10) Idem ibid. (2) Bi-(4) Gennad. p. 93. (7) Evagr. l. iii. (8) Niceph. l. xiv. c. 57. p. 579. cried out with one voice, Reign, Anastasius, as you bave lived i. And truly the a the chryfargyrum.

The nature of

beginning of his reign was not undefervedly applauded by persons of all ranks; for he immediately remitted whatever to that time was due to the exchequer, and utterly abolished the infamous tax called chrysargyrum, which was levied every fifth year upon those, even common beggars not excepted, who sold any thing, of how little value soever; whence it was called the gold of tribulation. To pay it, parents were often obliged to fell their children, after they had been stripped of every thing else. It was not only raised on all traders, in what kind soever of merchandize they dealt, but on the public proftitutes, who, by paying to the prince a confiderable share of what they earned by their infamous profession, seemed to have purchased a right to pursue with impunity their scandalous practices k. Alexander Severus being b ashamed, tho' a pagan, to suffer the money thus raised to be lodged in the exchequer, ordered it to be kept apart, and to be employed in repairing the public edifices. Theodosius the younger utterly suppressed this infamous tribute in 439. but it was soon after revived through the avarice of his successors. Zosimus will have this tax to have been first established by Constantine the Great m; which is denied by Evagrius as a calumny, without any other foundation but the implacable hatred which that pagan writer bore to the deliverer of the christian religion . And indeed it is evident from the ancient writers, that long before Constantine's time a tax was laid on all traders, as well as infamous women; and that Constantine, to fave charges, caused it to be levied, not annually, as it had been till his reign, but every fourth c or rather fifth year. However that be, Anastasius, looking upon it as no less burdenfome to the people than shameful in the prince, not only utterly abolished it, with the consent and approbation of the senate, but, to prevent its ever being revived, caused all the papers relating to it to be publicly burnt in the circus. This abolition of the chyfarg yrum is recorded by all the historians, who speak of Anastasius, as an action truly great, heroic, and almost divine, worthy of being transmitted to the latest posterity, and capable of covering the many faults, which are but too deservedly laid to that prince's charge P. Timotheus of Gaza wrote a tragedy on the chrysargyrum, which he inscribed to Anastasius. Cedrenus, who styles that writer a man of univerfal knowledge, tells us, that the emperor was in great measure induced d by the reading of that piece to propose to the senate the suppressing of such an infamous tax 1. The same writer adds, that Anastasius abolished two kinds of chrysargyrums, one of which was raised on the poor, on the beggars, slaves, freedmen, harlots, and divorced women, who, without distinction of sex, age, or condition, paid every fourth year a certain fum for themselves, and another for their horses, mules, dogs, asses, oxen, &cr. At the same time the new prince drove all informers out of Constantinople, and put a stop to the enormous abuse introduced by Zeno of exposing to fale all public offices, and bestowing, to the great oppression of the unhappy people, the best governments on the highest bidders s. Anastasius having by these and several other acts of generosity and good-nature, gained the affections of the people, e they all to a man joined him against Longinus, the deceased emperor's brother, who in the beginning of the following year 492. when the emperor Anastasius and Rusus Longinus and were confuls, raised some disturbances in Constantinople, but was immediately seized, deprived of all his employments, and fent back into Isauria, his native country, with orders to continue there. With him were driven out of Constantinople all the Haurians, who had borne great sway in the late reign. The Isaurians, thus banished the city, espoused the cause of Longinus, and openly revolting, kindled a civil war in the bowels of the empire. They were headed by Longinus, the late emperor's brother, by another Longinus, surnamed Selinontius, no doubt from the city of Selinus in Isauria, the place of his nativity, by Indus, Theodorus, Ninilinghus, and several other Isaurians of great f distinction, who had been raised by Zeno to the first employments in the state. Conon, bishop of Apamea in Syria, abandoning his flock, joined his countrymen, for he was by birth an Isaurian, and became one of the ringleaders of the revolt. Under these heads the rebels seized on an immense quantity of arms, and vast sums lodged by Zeno in a strong hold of Isauria, which enabled them to raise and arm above an hundred and fifty thousand men. The emperor, alarmed at the progress they made, a dispatched the flower of his troops against them, under the conduct of two of the most renowned generals of that age, viz. of John the Scythian, and John, surnamed Gibbus, or the bunch-backed, who coming up with the robels in the neighbourhood of Cotycea in Phrygia, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to They are distake refuge amongst the inaccessible mountains of Isauria, where they maintained feated, but themselves for the space of six years, in spite of the utmost efforts of the best generals of the empire. Niniling bus, one of their chief leaders, was killed in the abovementioned battle. The following year, when Eusebius was consul the second time with Albinus, furnamed the younger, the emperor, who, notwithstanding the generosity he affected on his accession to the empire, was naturally of a most avaricious b temper, laid a heavy tax on the inhabitants of Constantinople, called by Evagrius chrysotelia, which, as it was no-ways expected, incented them to such a degree, that, rifing all on a fudden, they pulled down the emperor's statues, and dragged them A tumult in through the chief streets of the city with those of the empress Ariadne, uttering most Constantiinjurious invectives both against her and Anastasius . How this tumult ended, we nople. are no-where told. The same year Theodoric the Goth, having completed the conquest of Italy, by the reduction of Ravenna after a three years siege, as we shall relate more at length in the following volume, caused himself to be proclaimed king of Theodoric that country, without waiting the return of the embassadors, whom he had sent to acknowledged Constantinople for the ensigns of royalty. However, he dispatched Festus or Faustus, king of Italy. and Ireneus, two persons of rank, to solicit the emperor's approbation, and excuse the liberty he had taken. Anastasius received his excuses, promised not to molest him in the possession of the country he had conquered, and sent him the ensigns of the royal dignity. Hence it appears, that he acknowledged in some degree, as Odoacer had done, the authority of the emperor. Besides, he suffered the Romans to receive the consulship from the emperor of the east. 'Tis true he named in 511. one Felix to that dignity; but at the fame time he wrote to Anaftafius, begging him to confirm what he had done v. In 494. when Afterius and Prafidius were confuls, Diogenes, one of the emperor's generals, having surprised the city of Claudiopalis in Isauria held by the rebels, he was closely belieged in it by the bishop Conon, and reduced to fuch streights, that he must have soon either perished with hunger, or d been cut in pieces with all his men, had not John, surnamed Gibbus, opening him- The Issurians felf a way over mount Taurus, and falling unexpectedly upon the rebels, obliged defeated a them to retire with great flaughter. The bishop, fighting with great resolution and some to intrepidity at the head of his men, received a wound, of which he died foon after 2. Stythian. The two following years, in the first of which Viator, or, as some style him, Victor, was conful, and in the other Paul, the emperor's brother, some inconsiderable advantages were gained over the Isaurian rebels, who were utterly defeated the following year, when the emperor Anastasius was consul the second time, by John the Scythian. Longinus, brother to the late emperor Zeno, and Theodorus or Albenodorus, being Longinus, and taken prisoners, they were both put to death by that general's orders, and their the other heads e heads fent to Constantinople, where they were exposed to public view in the suburbs of the rebels, called 8ycæ. The head of Albenodorus was afterwards sent to Tarsus, and set up to death. on a pole before the gate of that city a. The other ringleaders of the rebellion, namely Longinus Salinontius and Indus, were taken the following year, when John the Scythian was conful with Paulinus, and fent loaded with chains to Constantinople. Longinus was afterwards racked to death at Nice. As several cities in Ijauria were utterly ruined during this war, which had lasted six years, the inhabitants of Isauria were removed into Thrace, and the annual pension of five thousand pieces of gold, paid to them by Zeno, taken away for ever b. This year the emperor narrowly escaped being murdered in the circus by the populace, upon his resulting to cause A tumult in fome prisoners to be set at liberty, who had been concerned in a late riot. It was Constantiwith the utmost difficulty that the guards screened him from the sury of the enraged nople. multitude, and the showers of stones discharged against him. When the multitude found themselves repulsed by the soldiery, they set fire to the hippodrome, which confumed that and several other stately edifices, with the square of Constantine, in which not a fingle building was left standing. The fame year the Arabs and Sara-

Informers Constantinople.

gewolt.

* Niceph. chron. p. 308. Cedren. p. 357. * Theoph. p. 566. Evagr. l. iii. c. 39. Zos. l. ii. p. 691. * Lamprid. in Al. p. 212. * Zos. l. ii. p. 691. * Evagr. l. iii. c. 40. p. 370. * Evagr. l. iii. c. 40. p. 370. * Evagr. l. iii. c. 40. p. 370. Const. Manass. p. 63. Suid. p. 913. * Cedren. p. 357. * Idem ibid. * Idem, p. 358. * Evagr. l. iii. p. 366. Theoph. p. 118.

Evagr. Тнеорн. ibid. Marc. chron. Jorn. p. 655. w Marc. chron. p. 408. * Амміан. anonym. p. 408. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1181. У Ряссот. р. 402. Castiodor. l. ii. ep. 1. * Магс. chron. Тнеорн. р. 119. * Evagr. l. iii. c. 35. р. 366. Тнеорн. р. 120. Vict. Тин. р. 127. * Cassiod. l. i. ep. 23. l. ii. ep. 3. Evagr. l. iii. c. 35. p. 366. Marc. chron. * Chron. Al. p. 760.

cens, named Scenitæ, broke into Palestine and Syria Euphratesiana; but in Syria they a were defeated by Eugenius, who commanded the Roman troops there, and in Palefine by Romanus, governor of that province, who on that occasion recovered to the empire the island of Jotape in the Red Sea, which the Arabs Scenita had seized, and re-established there the Roman merchants trading to India 4.

The Romans

A tumu!t in the circus at

The Perfins empire,

Constanti-

nople.

And take Amida.

The Roman generals defeated, and pu: to flight.

to the Romans,

In 499. when Joannes Gibbus and Asclepion were confuls, the Bulgarians breaking into Thrace, Arifius, commander of the troops in Illyricum, marched against them at the head of fifteen thousand men, engaged them on the banks of the Zurta or Zorta; but was defeated with the loss of four thousand men, amongst whom were the counts defeated by the Nicostratus, Innocentius, and Aquilinus, and several other officers of distinction. The barbarians, after having plundered all the open places in Thrace, returned of their b own accord beyond the Danube. The same year Neocasarea, and several other cities in Pontus, were almost utterly ruined by an earthquake. The year 500. when Patritius and Hypatius were consuls, is quite barren of events. In the following confulship of Pompeius and Avienus, the blue and green factions quarrelling in the circus at Constantinople, above three thousand of the former were killed 8. The following year, Probus and Avienus being confuls, the Bulgarians breaking anew into Thrace, and the Saracens into Palestine, committed dreadful ravages in those two The same year Cabades, king of Persia, being highly provoked at the provinces h. emperor's refusing to lend him a certain sum, which he owed to the king of the Nephthalite or Epthalite Hunns, entered unexpectedly Armenia at the head of a nume- c break into the rous army; and having easily reduced the cities of Theodosiopolis and Martyropolis, laid close siege to Amida, which the inhabitants (for there was no garison in the place) defended with fuch vigour and resolution, that the king, despairing of being ever able to reduce it, had already ordered his troops to retire; but the inhabitants, especially some women, probably common prostitutes, reviling and rallying him from the walls in a manner not to be expressed by a modest writer, he resolved at all events to pursue the siege, which he did accordingly, and in the end made himfelf master of the place, after having lain before it eighty days, or, as others write, four months. Most of the inhabitants were put to the sword, and the town pillaged. In the mean time Anastasius dispatched a powerful army against the enemy, d commanded by Patritius, Hypatius, and Areobindus, who had married Juliana, the daughter of the emperor Olybrius. Under them commanded Celer, Justin, afterwards emperor, his fon Vitalianus, Patritiolus, Romanus, and several other officers of distinction. But the Persians having reduced Amida before they reached that place, they divided the army into two bodies, the one, under the command of Patritius and Hypatius, attempting to make an irruption into the enemy's country on the fide of Amida, and the other marching, under the command of Areobindus, to Nisibis, with a design to surprise that important place. In the mean time, Cabades, having drawn his troops together, went to meet Areobindus, who, upon his approach, abandoning his camp and baggage, fled in the utmost confusion to Constantina, after having pressed in vain Hypatius and Patritius to join him, and with their mutual forces to oppose the enemy, who was far superior in number to either of the parties they commanded. Areobindus being thus put to flight, Cabades, without loss of time, marched against Hypatius and Patritius; and coming upon them unexpectedly, cut their whole army in pieces, the two generals having with much ado escaped by a timely slight the common slaughter. Cabades, having now no enemy to oppose him, over-ran Mesopotamia, extending his ravages to the very borders of Syria, till he was obliged, by the approach of winter, to return into Persia k. The following year, when Celbegus was conful, Celer, entering the province of Arzanene, belonging to the Persians, at the head of a considerable army, laid it waste far and near, while the other generals f undertook the siege of Amida, the Persians being diverted by a sudden irruption of the Hunns. The place held out till both the Romans and Persians being quite tired out with the fatigues of a fiege in the depth of winter, it was agreed, that Amida reflored the Persians should deliver up the city to the Romans, upon their paying to the king of Persia fifty talents, which was immediately done. Thus the Romans recovered the important city of Amida, in the consulship of Sabinianus and Theodorus.

d Тнеорн. р. 21. Evagr. l. iii. с. 36. р. 366. f THEOPH. Marc. chron. Zonar. p. 47. p. 123. Marc. chron. & Marc. chron. b Idem ibid. Тнеорн. Perf. l. i. c. 7. p. 20, 21. Тнеорн. p. 124, 125. Evagr. l. iii. c. 37. p. 367. i Procor. bell. h Idem ibid. THEOPH. p. 153. <sup>к</sup> Ркосор. р. 22. Тикорн. р. 125.

a after it had been held two years by the Persians!. Upon their entering the place; they found that the enemy had not fufficient provisions to support them seven days longer, though they had lived very sparingly during the slege. Not long after, a truce for seven years, which lasted about twenty, was concluded between the two A truce with empires, Cabades being engaged in a war with the Caduceans, Hunns, and other bar-the Persians. barians m. The same year one Mondon or Mondo, by nation a Goth, having settled with some of his countrymen in such places beyond the Danube as he found uninhabited, seized on a strong hold called Heria; and thence, by frequent incursions into the Roman territories, continued for some time harassing the subjects of the empire, giving himself the title of king. Anastasius dispatched against him Sabinianus, the b fon of the famous general of that name, at the head of ten thousand chosen men, which obliged Mondon to have recourse to Theodoric, the Goth, king of Italy, who the year before had reconquered Pannonia, and recovered Sirmium out of the hands of the Gepidæ. As Mondo had entered into an alliance with Theodoric, Pitzia, one of that prince's generals, marched to his affiftance, defeated Sabinianus in a pitched The Romans battle near Margus in Lower Dacia, and obliged him to shut himself up in the castle defeated by of Nato. This occasioned a missinderstanding between Theodoric and Anastasius, as Goth. we shall relate in the history of the Ostrogoths in Italy. The next consuls were Arcobindus and Messala, who were succeeded in 507. by the emperor Anastasius, the third time conful, and Venantius. This year Anastasius, to defend not only the city of c Constantinople, but the adjacent country, against the sudden irruptions of the barbarians, built the famous wall, called the Long-wall, and the wall of Anastasius, of Anastasius which frequent mention is made by the Byzantine historians. It was distant from builds the Constantinople two hundred and eighty furlongs, extended from sea to sea, being four Long-wall. hundred and twenty furlongs round, and inclosed not only the metropolis, but the city of Selymbria, and the neighbouring country, which was a continued garden, with an incredible number of stately villa's and houses of pleasure, richly furnished and adorned. The wall was twenty foot in breadth, and defended by towers at small distances from each other; by which means the inhabitants, upon the shortest warning, had an opportunity of putting themselves in a posture of defence, and repulsing d with great ease the barbarians. In the following consulship of Celer and Venantius, styled the younger, Anastasius caused the city of Daras, a frontier-town towards Daras recaired Perfia, to be repaired and fortified, in order to prevent the Perfians from breaking and fortified. into the empire on that side. Daras stood on the Cardus, about sisteen miles from Nisibis, and three from Carrba P. The same year Chovis, king of the Franks in Gaul, having gained a complete victory over Alaric, king of the Visigoths in Langueauc and Aquitain, Anastasius, who was at variance with Theodoric, whose daughter Alaric had married, fent embassadors to the king of the Franks, to congratulate him upon his victory, and to prefent him with the confular ornaments, and a diadem, which he received in the church of St. Martin at Tours, taking upon him thencee forth the title of conful, and likewise that of Augustus. He removed foon after from Tours to Paris, where he fixed his residence, declaring that city the metropolis Clovis fixes of his kingdom 4. Nothing remarkable happened the two following years 509. his residence at 510. in the first of which Importunus was consul, and in the second the famous Bog- Paris. tius, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the history of the kingdom of Italy. In 511. when Secundinus and Felix were confuls, the Heruli, after The Heruli having long roved about from one country to another, passed the Danube, and were admitted into received the following year, when Paulus and Muschianus were confuls, into Thrace, Thrace. where lands were allotted to them, upon their promifing to serve with fidelity in the Roman armies, when required. In the next consulship of Probus and Clementinus, f the emperor, at the instigation of the Eutychians, whom he favoured, drove Macedonius, the orthodox patriarch of Constantinople, from his see, and preferred one Timotheus, an avowed follower of Eutyches, in his room, who, by attempting to introduce novelties in the public worship, raised great disturbances in Constantinople. Great diffur-Many of the inhabitants, some say ten thousand, were killed in a tumult between bances in Conthe catholics and Eutychians, and several houses burnt, amongst the rest that of the stantinople.

Vol. VI. Nº 7.

Vitalianus espouses the tause of the tatholics against the Eutychians.

The emperor promi/es to comply with bis demands.

Justin procation, &c.

prefect Martinus, with its rich furniture, he himself having narrowly escaped being a confumed in the flames s. The following year 514. when Cassiodorus Senator was conful, Vitalianus, one of the emperor's generals, espouling the cause of Macedonius, and the other orthodox bishops, persecuted by Anastasius, approached Constantinople, at the head of a numerous army, raised in three days time, threatening to depose the emperor, if he did not restore the banished bishops to their sees, and drive out the Eutychians. Anastasius, who was a zealous patron of the doctrine of Eutyches, refuling to comply with his request, he made himself master of Massia and Thrace, took Cyril, governor of the latter province, prisoner, defeated Hypatius, the emperor's nephew, who likewise fell into his hands; and returning before Constantinople with his victorious army, Anastasius, who was no-ways in a condition to oppose him, b folemnly promifed to comply with his demands, viz. to put an end to the perfecution, which he had raised against the catholics, to restore Macedonius, and the other orthodox bishops, to their sees, and to call an occumenical council, and stand to the decisions of the prelates of the church. Anastasius had no sooner signed these articles, than Vitalianus withdrew from the neighbourhood of Constantinople; and disbanding his troops, fent Hypatius, whom he had taken prisoner, back to his uncle, and retired to his government in Thrace. Anastasius, thus delivered from his sears, pursued the perfecution against the catholics with more cruelty than ever, as the reader will find related at length by the ecclesiastic writers. In 515. when Anthemius and Florentius were consuls, and 516. when Petrus alone bore that dignity, nothing happened which c historians have thought worthy of notice. In 517, when Anastasius was consul the The Getz break fourth time with Agapetus, the northern barbarians, called by Marcellinus Getæ, breakinto Illyricum, ing into Illyricum, laid waste Macedon and Epirus, defeated Pompeius, the emperor's nephew, in the neighbourhood of Adrianople; and penetrating as far as Thessaly, returned from thence beyond the Danube unmolested, with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives ". The following year, when Magnus alone was Anastasius dies. consul, the emperor Anastasius was found dead in his chamber on the 9th of July. Authors vary as to the circumstances of his death: some write, that a violent storm arifing, the dread and terror with which he was feized, as being conscious to himfelf of many cruel and unjust murders, put an end to his life w; others suppose him d to have been killed by a flash of lightning . He died in the eighty-eighth year of his age, after having reigned twenty-feven years, and three months, wanting two or three days y. No prince perhaps was ever more beloved in the beginning, nor more hated in the end of his reign. He gave at first several instances of generosity, good-nature, moderation, and application to public affairs, seeming to have nothing so much at heart as the welfare of his subjects. But he soon abandoned himself to all manner of wickedness, felling the public offices, and sharing with the governors of provinces the spoils of the unhappy people, whom he suffered them to oppress with most enormous exactions. The ecclesiastic writers paint him in the blackest colours imaginable; but as he perfecuted the catholics, and countenanced, to the utmost of his power, the Eutychians, they were perhaps so far prejudiced against him as to overlook the few good qualities, which other authors allow him, and take notice only of his vices.

Anastasius being dead, Justin, then prafessus pratorio, was by the foldiers of the claimed empe- houshold proclaimed emperor in his room. He was descended of an obscure and His birth, ednafterwards lifted himself among the troops that guarded Thrace; and having on feveral occasions given signal proofs of an extraordinary valour and address, he was raised from the low station of a common soldier to the post of a tribune, and from that soon after to the office of præsectus prætorio, which he held when he was f preferred to the empire. Evagrius writes, that Amantius, the deceased emperor's great chamberlain, having intrusted Justin with large sums to purchase the votes of the foldiery in favour of Theocritus, his intimate friend, Justin distributed the money in his own name; and having by that means fecured the army to his interest, he was by them faluted with the title of Augustus, as soon as the death of Anastasius was known 2. Thus Evagrius, whose account does not at all agree with what we

* MARC. chron. Vict. Tununensis, p. 132. * MARC. chron. Jorn W Theod. p. 505. MARC. chron. Chron. Al. p. 764. * Zonar. Fevaer. l. iv. c. 1. p. 381. Chron. Al. p. 764. * Evaer. l. iv. c. 1, 2. Surius, p. 173. fucc. c. 48. p. 655. MARC. chron. JORN. reg. CEDREN. p. 362.

ibid.

a read in the letters faid to have been written by Justin himself to Hormisda bishop of Rome soon after his promotion; wherein he tells him, that he had been preferred, contrary to his expectation, and against his will, to the imperial dignity 2. But by what means foever he attained the purple, he governed with great equity and moderation; and by his fleady adherence to the orthodox faith, and prudent administration, healed in great measure the divisions which had long rent the church, as well as the state, into factions and parties. He was scarce warm in his throne, when Amantius, Theocritus, and several of the deceased emperor's relations, persons some conspired of great interest and authority in the empire, conspired against him; but the con-against him, spiracy being discovered by some who were privy to it, the chief authors of it, and covered and among the rest Amantius and Theocritus, were publicly executed, to the great satisf-punished faction of the people, who hated them as the avowed patrons of the Eutychians, and the chief promoters of the late persecution against the catholics. The following year 519. Justin being consul with Eutharic, the son-in-law of Theodoric, king of Italy, all the orthodox bishops, who had been banished by Anastasius, were by the emperor's orders restored to their sees, and several synods assembled, in which the doctrine of the church was established, and that of Eutyches condemned b. following year, Vitalianus, of whom we have made mention above, was raised to Vitalianus the consulship with Rusticus, but was soon after dispatched in the palace by the put to death. emperor's orders, upon his attempting to gain over some of the chief officers, with c a defign to depose Justin, and cause himself to be proclaimed emperor in his room. He had espoused the catholic cause in the reign of Anastasius; but his caballing against Justin, a zealous patron of the true faith, and his courting the Eutychians, convinced the world, that it was not merely on account of religion he had taken arms against his sovereign. The following year, Justinian, the emperor's nephew, being consul with Valerius, Cabades, king of Persia, sent a solemn embassy to Justin, offering to conclude a lasting peace with him, provided he would adopt Cosrboes, the Persian king's youngest son, whom, to the prejudice of his eldest son Caoses, he had declared his fuccessor. This he looked upon as the only means of engaging the Roman emperor to espouse his cause, and of firmly establishing him in the kingdom. d The proposal was received at first with great joy both by Justin and his nephew Justinian; but Proclus, the quæstor, a man of great integrity, and well skilled in the laws, demonstrating, that, in virtue of that adoption, Cosrboes might claim the Roman empire as his inheritance, it was rejected; which so piqued Cavades, that he immediately entered Iberia, with a design to invade from thence the Roman territo. The Persian ries. Gurgenes, king of the Iberians, had recourse to Justin, who dispatched a body war. of troops to his affiftance, under the conduct of Sittas, and the famous Belisarius, who was then but a youth, and served in the guards of Justinian, lately declared commander in chief of all the forces of the empire. Sittas and Belisarius broke into that part of Armenia which belonged to the Persians, and laid it waste; but being e met by Narses and Aratius, they were by them put to flight, and obliged to retire into the Roman dominions. Narses and Aratius revolted soon after from the Perfians, and ferved under Belisarius in Italy. The emperor, well pleased with the conduct of Belisarius, gave him the command of the forces in Daras, on the frontiers of Belisarius Persia d. These things happened in the third consulship of Severinus Boëtius, and commander of the first of Symmachus, who were succeeded in 523. by Maximus alone in the west, Daras. and he by Justin, the second time consul, and Opilio, during whose consulship we find nothing transacted in the empire that deserves notice. In 525. when Probinus or Probus, and Philoxenus, were consuls, Justin, by an edict, deprived the Arians of The Arians all their churches in his dominions; which occasioned a misunderstanding between deprived of f him and Theodoric, king of Italy, who was a zealous patron of the doctrine of Arius. But what relates to that prince, we reserve for the history of the Ostrogoths in Italy. The same year the city of Antioch was almost utterly overturned by an earthquake, A great and great numbers of the inhabitants buried, with their bishop Euphrasius, under the ruins. The cities of Epidamnus, Corinth, and Anazarbus in Cilicia, underwent the same fate, but were at a vast expence restored, as well as Antioch, to their former condition by the good-natured emperor, who was so affected with their missortune, that, putting off the purple, and laying aside the diadem, he appeared for Wide Baron. 2d ann. 518. Soriid. Procop. bell. Per C c. 11, 12. I Jorn. reg. fucc. c. 48. p. 132. Evagr. l.iv. c. 3.

several.

the empire.

several days in sack-cloth f. In 526. Olybrius alone was conful, and succeeded in a Justin assumes that dignity by Mavortius, during whose consulthip, Justin, on the first of April, declared his nephew Justinian his partner in the empire. He was the son of Sabatius by Bigleniza, the sister of Justin, called by the Romans Vigilantia. He was a native of Tauresium, but brought up at Bederina, the birth-place of his uncle Justin, both cities on the confines of Thrace and Illyricum; whence he is by some styled a Thracian, by others an Illyrian. He was sent, when yet a youth, by Justin, then commander in chief of the Roman army, as an hostage to Theodoric, king of Italy, who, upon the news of his uncle's preferment, suffered him to return to Constantinople, where he was immediately honoured with the title of nobilifimus, and upon the death of Vitalianus, raised to the chief command of the army in his room 8. Some b authors write, that Justin, at the request of the senate, took him for his partner in the empire; whereas others pretend, that the senate were awed by threats and menaces. Be that as it will, it is certain that Justinian was this year declared emperor; and upon his entering the circus with the purple, and other enfigns of the imperial dignity, the populace received him with loud acclamations: he was then, as Zonaras observes, in the forty-fifth year of his age. The emperor Justin died about four months after, that is, in the latter end of September, or the beginning of August, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, after having reigned nine years, one month, and fome days. His death is generally ascribed to a wound received in battle many His character. years before. He could neither read nor write, having been employed by his parents & in keeping cattle, till he listed himself in the army; but was nevertheless a man of extraordinary penetration, and uncommon address, in the management of the most difficult affairs, well skilled in the art of war, and in every respect equal to the high luftin dies.

What gave rife

The Romans

defeased,

turn by Belifa-

armenia.

Narses and station to which he was raised. Justinian, now fole master of the empire, made it his first and chief business to the Persian to secure the frontiers towards Persia. With this view he ordered Belisarius, commander of the troops in Daras, to build a fort in the neighbourhood of Mindon, which might be as a curb upon the Persians, and prevent them from breaking into the empire on that side. Belisarius had no sooner begun the work, than Cabades, who still reigned in Persia, after having attempted in vain, by threats and d menaces, to divert him from it, dispatched a body of troops against him. On the other hand, Justinian ordered the two brothers Curtzes and Buzes, who commanded the troops quartered in the neighbourhood of mount Libanus, to join Belisarius. But notwithstanding this reinforcement, the Romans, in the battle which ensued, were utterly defeated, and great numbers of them taken prisoners, and among the rest Curtzes, to whose rash and imprudent conduct the defeat was chiefly owing. After this victory, the Persians, finding the fort abandoned by the Romans, levelled it with the ground h. War being thus declared, Justinian appointed Belisarius general of the east, ordering him to make an inroad into Persia. Perozes, the Persian general, met him at the head of a very numerous and powerful army in the neighbourhood e of Daras; whereupon a battle enfuing, the Persians were defeated, with the loss of five thousand men. As the Persians fled in great confusion, the Romans would, in all likelihood, have cut most of them in pieces, had not Belisarius, apprehending they might rally, and return to the charge, founded a retreat. The like success attended the Roman arms in Armenia, where Mermeroes, who commanded another And by Doro- army, confisting of Persarmenians, Sunites and Hunns, was surprised and defeated by theus in Pers- Dorotheus, the Roman governor of Armenia, and Sittas, general of the forces quartered in that province. Mermeroes being put to flight, the Romans made themselves masters of several strong holds in Persarmenia, and among the rest of Pharangium, which commanded the royal mines, and was betrayed to them by one Simeon. About f this time, Narses and Aratius, two brothers, who, in the latter end of Justin's reign, Aratius revolt had commanded the Persian army in Armenia, and gained some advantages over to the Romans. Belisarius and Sittas, as we have related above, revolting from the Persians, came over to the Romans, who were now masters of the greatest part of Persarmenia, their native country. Narses, the emperor's quæstor in those parts, who was likewife a Persarmenian, received them with extraordinary marks of kindness and esteem. making them rich presents in the emperor's name; which encouraged their younger

f Idem ibid. c. 8. 1 Idem, c. 15.

<sup>5</sup> Vide not. ALAM. in Procop, secret. hist.

PROCOP. bell. Perf. c. 13.

a brother, by name Isaac, to follow their example, after having held a private correspondence with the Romans, till he found an opportunity of delivering up to them a strong-hold in the territory of Theodosiopolis, named Bolus k. Justiman, notwithstanding the advantages gained by his troops in Mesopotamia and Armenia, dispatched embassadors to Cabades, with proposals for an accommodation; but the treaty being foon broken off, the Persians, early in the spring of 530. invaded the Roman territories under the command of Azarethes, who was joined by an incredible number of Saracens, commanded by Alamundarus their king, who, as he was a person of great experience in war, and well acquainted with the country, advised the Persians to break into the Roman territories, not by the way of Mejopotamia and Ofrhoene, as b they usually did, but to march directly into Syria, which country they might lay waste, and plunder Antioch itself, before the army in Mesopotamia could receive the least intelligence of their motions. The Persian generals approving the scheme, the The Persians, army began to march; but Belisarius, apprifed of their design, slew with a strong attempting to detachment to the frontiers of Syria, where the Persians finding him, to their great Syria, are furprize, ready to dispute their passage, they resolved to proceed no farther, but prevented by rather to retire, thinking it dangerous to hazard a battle. On the other hand, Beli-Belifarius. Jarius, judging it imprudent to provoke a flying enemy, far superior to him in numbers, was for suffering them to retire unmolested. But his men upbraiding him The Romans, with cowardice, he led them on against the enemy, by whom, after a most obsti-engaging c nate dispute, they were put to the rout, Belisarius, with a small body of horse, who against the opinion of Bewere ashamed to forsake him, keeping the field, and by that means preventing the hitarius, are enemy from pursuing the sugitives. The next day the Persians, who had lost in defeated. the engagement the flower of their army, not thinking it adviseable to venture a fecond battle, retired in good order, the Romans, who were greatly disheartened by their defeat, not daring to attack them 1. The following year 531. Justinian being desirous of concluding a peace with the Persians, that he might be at leisure to make war upon the Vandals, and reunite to the empire the many rich provinces they had seized, dispatched Hermogenes to the king of Persia, with very reasonable proposals. But Cabades, instead of hearkening to them, sent early in the spring a fresh army d into Mesopotamia, under the command of Chanaranges, Aspendes, and Mermeroes, who, after having ravaged the country, putting all to fire and fword, fat down before Martyropolis, a city about thirty miles north of Amida on the river Nymphius, which The Persians parted the Persian and Roman dominions. The place was no-ways in a condition besiege Martyto maintain a fiege, being destitute both of soldiers and provisions. The emperor ropolis. had recalled Belifarius to advise with him about a war with the Vandals, on which he was chiefly bent; and Sittas, who had succeeded him in the command of the troops in the east, had not sufficient strength to attempt the relief of the place. While affairs stood thus, the emperor was informed, that a numerous army of Majfagetes was marching into Persia, with a design to invade from thence the Roman e dominions. This intelligence Justinian turned to his great advantage, by persuading the Persian deserter, who brought it, to spread a report in the army before Martyropolis, that the Massagetes were in the Roman pay, and their true design was to fall upon the Persians, and raise the siege. This report, with the news that was foon after brought of the death of Cabades, inclined the Persian generals to hearken to the overtures that were made them by Sittas and Hermogenes, with whom they first concluded a truce, retiring from before Martyropolis, and soon after a peace upon the following terms: 1. That the Roman emperor should pay to Costboes, who A perpetual had succeeded his father Cabades, a thousand pounds weight of gold. 2. That both peace concluded princes should restore the places they had taken during the war. 3. That the com-between the Romans and f mander of the Roman forces in Mesopotamia should no longer reside at Daras, but Persians. at Constantina, as he had formerly done. 4. That the Iberians, who had sided with the Romans, should be at liberty to return to their own country, or stay at Constan-Upon these terms the Romans and Persians concluded an eternal peace, as it was styled, in 532. the fixth year of Justinian's reign, which, as it was without consuls, as the preceding year had been, is thus marked in the sasti 3. The second year after the consulship of Lampadius and Orestes. About this time happened at A great two Constantinople the greatest tumult we find mentioned in history. It began amongst mult at Constantinople.

Lidem, c. 15, 16. Idem, c. 18. Evagr. l. iii. c. 38. Agath. l. iv. c. 13. Niceph.l. xvii c. 10. Theoph. ad ann. Just. 5, 6. Cedren. p. 366. Hist. miscell. l. xvi. Procop. bell. Pers. ibid.

The tumult quelled with the death of

The Hunns commit great ravages in Illyricum.

Cosrhoes in-

Antioch besieged, taken, and laid in ashes.

the different factions in the circus, but ended in an open rebellion, the multitude, a highly diffatisfied with the conduct of John the præfettus prætorio, and of Trebonia nus, then questor, forcing Hypatius, nephew to the emperor Anastasius, to accept the empire, and proclaiming him with great folemnity in the forum. As the two above-mentioned ministers were greatly abhorred by the people, on account of their avarice, the emperor immediately discharged them, hoping by that means to appeare the tumult; but the populace growing more outrageous, and most of the senators joining the rebellious multitude, the emperor, alarmed and disheartened, would have aban-The manly cou doned the city, and made his escape by sea, had not the empress Theodora, with a manly press Theodora courage, persuaded him to part with his life, rather than with the empire, by seasonably putting him in mind of the old faying, How glorious a sepulchre is a kingdom! b Justinian, thus encouraged, resolved to continue in the palace, and, with the affistance of the few fenators who had not yet abandoned him, defend it to the last. In the mean time the rebels, having attempted in vain to force the gates, carried Hypatius in triumph to the circus; where while he was beholding the sports from the imperial throne, among the shouts and acclamations of the people, Belisarius, who had been recalled from Persia, entering the city with a considerable body of troops under his command, and apprifed of the usurpation of Hypatius, marched strait to the circus, fell fword in hand upon the difarmed multitude; and being feafonably joined by Mundus, governor of Illyricum, at the head of a band of Heruli, cut above thirty thousand of them in pieces, took Hypatius the usurper, and Pompeius, another of the c 30000 persons, nephews of Anastasius, prisoners, and carried them to the emperor, by whose orders they were both beheaded, and their bodies cast into the sea. Their estates were confiscated, and likewise the estates of such senators as had joined them; but the emperor caused great part of their lands and effects to be afterwards restored, together with their honours and dignities, to their children . Marcellinus supposes, that this tumult was raised by Hypatius, Pompeius, and Probus, all three nephews to the emperor Anastasius, each of them setting up for himself; by which means the city was rent into factions, an incredible number of citizens was murdered, and many stately buildings laid in ashes. The tumult being thus appealed, and a peace concluded with the king of Persia, the emperor applied his thoughts wholly to the war d in Africa, which he had been long bent upon. But of the wars that were by the renowned Belisarius carried on with amazing success in the reign of Justinian, first with the Vandals in Africa, and afterwards with the Gotbs in Italy, we shall speak at length in the following volume. These two wars lasted from 533. to 541. a year remarkable for the triumphant return of Belisarius to Constantinogle, and no less on account of its being the last that is marked by confuls, time being thenceforth computed, not by confulships, tho' confuls were still created for some time, but by the years of the emperor's reign. During the war with the Goths in Italy, the Hunns, probably stirred up by them, passed the Danube, and entering Illyricum, laid waste the whole country, took above thirty-two castles, destroyed Cassandria, and returned e home unmolested, carrying with them an immense booty, and an hundred and twenty thousand captives. At the same time the Armenians, shaking off the Roman yoke, gained fome advantages over the emperor's forces in that province; which, with a groundless report spread abroad, that the emperor, grown jealous of Belisarius, would no longer trust him with the command of his armies, encouraged Costrboes to invade the Roman dominions with a very powerful army, in defiance of the treaty mandominions. folemnly concluded a few years before. Buzes, who commanded in the east, instead of affembling his forces, and providing for the defence of the provinces, disappeared all on a fudden, and retired, no one knew whither, leaving the enemy at full liberty to plunder the country at their pleasure. As Cosrboes met with no opposition, he bent f his march to Syria; and having taken and plundered Berwa, Hierapolis, and several other cities, he laid siege to Antioch itself, which he soon mastered, and gave up to be plundered by his foldiers, who, without distinction of sex or age, put all they met to the sword. The king himself seized on all the gold and silver vessels belonging to the great church; caused all the valuable statues, pictures, and other pieces of art, to be taken down, and conveyed into Persia; and having thus stripped the proud metropolis of the east of all its wealth and ornaments, he ordered his men to fet fire to it, and lay it in ashes; which was done accordingly, none of the build-a ings, even without the walls, being spared by the outrageous and insulting enemy. Thus perished the most wealthy, beautiful and populous city of the east. Such of the inhabitants as escaped the common slaughter, and afterwards fell into the enemy's hands, were carried into captivity, and fold in Persia to the highest bidder o. Justinian, upon the first news of the Persians entering the Roman territories, had dispatched embassadors to Costboes, to put him in mind of the articles of the treaty concluded a few years before. The king alledged feveral frivolous pretences for the hostilities he had committed, in order to lay the whole blame on Justinian; but after he had wasted Syria, and enriched himself and his army with the spoils of that province, and its wealthy metropolis, he began to hearken to an accommodation; and accordingly a h peace was concluded on the following terms: 1. That the Romans should, within A peace contwo months, pay to the Persian king five thousand pounds weight of gold, and an cluded with the annual pension of five hundred. 2. That the Persians should relinquish all claim to king of Persia, Daras, and maintain a body of troops to guard the Caspian gates, and prevent the barbarians from breaking into the empire. 3. That, upon the payment of the abovementioned fum, Cost boes should immediately withdraw his troops out of the Roman The treaty being figned, and the stipulated sum paid, Cosrboes began to march back; but in his retreat plundered, as if the war had still continued, the cities of Apamea and Chalcis; and croffing the Euphrates, laid waste Mesopotamia, carrying Who neverthewith him from thence an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. less ravages

Hereupon Fustivian now well apprised that with Castron po treaties were hinding Mesopotamia. Hereupon Justinian, now well apprised, that with Cost boes no treaties were binding, refolved to pursue the war with the utmost vigour, and with that design sent for Belifarius, then employed against the Goths in Italy, and, upon his arrival at Constantinople, appointed him general against the Persians. While that brave commander was making the necessary preparations to take the field early in the spring of the ensuing year 542. the Lazians, no longerable to brook the arbitrary and tyrannical conduct of the commander of the Roman troops in that country, revolted to the Per- The Lazians fians, and delivered up to them all their castles and strong-holds. Lazica, formerly revolt to the part of Colchis, lay between the Euxine and Caspian seas, and was governed by its own kings, who were under the protection of the Roman emperor, and received at his hands the enfigns of royalty. Their present king's name was Gubazes, who had ferved the Romans with great fidelity, and continued attached to their interest, till Joannes Tzibus, commander of the Roman troops quartered in his dominions to awe the neighbouring Iberians, by erecting a fort, as a curb upon the Lazians, and exacting exorbitant contributions for the payment of his foldiers, forced, in a manner, both the prince and his subjects, tho' otherwise well affected to the empire, to have recourse to the king of Persia, who, upon the first invitation, entered their country, and being assisted by the natives, drove out the Romans, and placed every-where Persian garisons in their room q. In the mean time Belisarius, not apprised of the revolt of the Lazians, entered Persia at the head of a powerful army; and having Belisarius enmade himself master of a strong-hold called Sisibranum, laid waste Assyria; but was ters Persia, e obliged, by the violent heats, and the distempers that began to rage in his army, Assyria. to return, before the end of the summer, into the Roman dominions. Cost was no sooner informed of the invasion of Belisarius, than quitting Lazica, he hastened into Affyria; but being informed on his march, that the Romans were retired, he put his army into winter-quarters, and withdrew to Ctefiphon r. The fpring following, he invaded anew the Roman territories, bending his march through Comagena, with a Costhoes asdesign to enter Palestine, and enrich himself with the spoils of that fertile and wealthy tempts to in-province. Belisarius, who was returned to Constantinople, upon the first news of this vade Palestine; invalion, flew to Europus on the Euphrales, and there drew together what forces he could some time after Costboes had passed that river; which so alarmed the Persian But, dreading f king, dreading an enemy at his back, that he thought it adviseable to drop his Belisarius, drops that enintended expedition into Palestine, and return to his own dominions, before Belisa- surprize. rius was in a condition to cut off his retreat. The emperor being foon after obliged to recal Belisarius, and send him into Italy, where the Goths had gained great advantages over the Romans, as we shall relate hereafter, Costhoes resolved once more to invade the Roman territories, notwithstanding the dreadful plague that raged in Persia, being encouraged thereunto by the magi, and by a shameful overthrow of thirty

• PROCOP. bell. Pers. l. ii. c. 12. Evagr. Agath. ibid. 1 Idem ibida P PROCOP. l. ii. c. 2. r Idem ibid. c. 15, 29.

The Lazians revolt to the Romans.

The Romans obliged to raife the fiege of Petra.

The Persians put to flight.

The Persians

Petra taken by she Romans.

thousand Romans, who, attempting to break into Persarmenia, had been deseated by a four thousand Persians. Upon this success he invaded Mesopotamia, and sat down before Edeffa; but not being able to master the place, after several unsuccessful attempts, he agreed to raise the siege, and soon after concluded a truce for five years. upon the emperor's paying him two thousand pounds weight of gold, and sending him a celebrated physician, by name Tribunus, who had formerly cured him of a dangerous diftemper . Not long after the conclusion of the truce, Costboes, observing the Lazians no-ways pleased with their late change, and apprehending they would soon revolt from him to the Romans, resolved to prevent a second revolution, by causing Gubazes their king to be murdered, by transplanting the natives into Persia, and peopling the country, which opened him a passage into the Euxine sea, with Persians, and other b nations well affected to his interest. But his design being discovered to Gubazes, by those who were to put it in execution, that prince had recourse, in the most submissive manner imaginable, to Justinian, who, forgetting his past conduct, received him anew under his protection, and, without loss of time, dispatched eight thousand men, under the command of Dagistaus, to his affistance, who being joined by a numerous body of Lazians, laid siege to Petra, one of the strongest places in Lazica, defended by a Persian garison, and stored with all manner of provisions. Cost boes, alarmed at this sudden revolution, sent a powerful army, under the conduct of Mermeroes, to the relief of the place. At their approach, Dagistaus, who was a young unexperienced officer, abandoning his camp and baggage, fled in the utmost consternation c towards the Phasis. Upon his retreat, Mermeroes advanced to Petra, the garifon of which place, confisting at first of fifteen hundred men, was now reduced to three hundred and fifty, of whom an hundred and fifty were quite disabled, and unfit for fervice. Mermeroes repaired with great expedition the breaches in the walls, garifoned the place with three thousand men, and returned with the rest of his army into Persarmenia, not thinking it safe to continue in Lazica, whither, he was informed, fresh forces were marching, under the conduct of Recithangus, by birth a Thracian, who had ferved in the army from his childhood, and was deemed one of the best commanders of his age. At his departure, he left a body of five thousand men encamped on the banks of the Pha/is, to watch the motions of the Romans and Lazians. Of d these Gubazes and Dagistaus surprised one thousand, as they were straggling about in quest of booty; and having cut them all off to a man, fell unexpectedly in the dead of the night upon the main body, put most of them to the sword, and obliged the rest to save themselves by a precipitous slight. The Romans made themselves mafters of their camp, in which, befides their enfigns and baggage, they found a great quantity of arms, and a confiderable number of mules and horses. They purfued the fugitives to the confines of Iberia, intercepted feveral other parties that were conveying provisions into Petra; and having blocked up all the avenues leading to the place, returned with their booty and captives. Costboes was no sooner informed of this overthrow, than he dispatched Corianes, with an army of Alans as well as Persians, into Lazica. But Corianes was attended with no better success than the other Persian generals; for being met on the banks of the Hippus in Colchis by Gubazes and Dagistaus, his army was, after a most obstinate dispute, utterly defeated, utterly defeated and he himself stain'. These advantages were chiefly owing to the courage and conduct of Gubazes, at whose request Dagistaus, who had shamefully abandoned the fiege of Petra, as we have related above, was recalled, and Bessa, an officer of great experience, appointed to command in his room. He immediately invested Petra, and in the end reduced that important place, tho' defended by the Persian garison with such obstinacy, as savoured of madness and despair. Bessas ordered Petra to be difmantled; and leaving only twelve thousand men in Lazica, viz. three f thousand in Archaepolis the metropolis, and nine thousand encamped on the banks of the Phasis, under the command of Odonachus, he retired with the rest into Armenia. his own government. Upon his retreat, Mermeroes entered Lazica; and having first obliged Odonachus to withdraw into the Roman territories, he laid siege to Archaopolis, which however he was forced to raise, having, in several assaults, been repulsed with great loss by the garison. Notwithstanding these hostilities, the Persian embassadors, who had been sent to Constantinople the preceding year, continued still there, and foon after the reduction of Petra, concluded a five years truce with the emperor,

A truce besween the Romans and Per-

Sians.

PROCOP. L. ii. c. 12. EVAGR. l. iv. c. 27. . Idem, l. iv. c. 25, 26. PROCOP. l. ii. c. 10.

a upon his paying to the Persian king an immense sum, which raised great complaints among the people, who were rather for pursuing the war, than submitting to pay a tribute, as they styled it, to the king of Persia. But Justinian was glad to come to an agreement with the Persians upon any terms, that he might not be diverted from pursuing the advantages he had gained over the Goths in Italy, of which we shall speak in a more proper place. The truce was no fooner expired, than the Persians, invading anew Lazica, took by stratagem the strong castle of Telepsis; and then falling upon the Roman army, which lay encamped at a small distance, put them to slight at the first onset. Gubazes, king of Lazica, provoked at the cowardice of the Roman generals, acquainted the emperor with their shameful behaviour; which incensed b them to fuch a degree, that they agreed to dispatch him: and accordingly, having accused him at court of treachery, as if he privately corresponded with the Persians, by wresting the instructions sent them by the emperor, they murdered him, giving The king of out, that he designed to betray them, and deliver all the Romans into the hands of the Lazica barba Persons. The Lazicans, highly incensed against the authors of his death, would have roughy murdered. Persians. The Lazicans, highly incensed against the authors of his death, would have by the Romans. revolted from the Romans, and joined the Persians, had not Justinian appealed them, by causing all those, who were any-ways accessory to the murder, to be publicly executed, and the deceased king's brother to be immediately proclaimed in his room. In the mean time the Persians, to the number of sixty thousand men, advanced, under the command of Nachoragan, into Lazica, and laid fiege to Phasis; but Justin, c who commanded the Roman troops, falling upon him unexpectedly, cut twelve thou. The Persians fand of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest, with their general, to save themselves defeated. within the Persian dominions. This defeat so disheartened Costrboes, that he immediately dispatched embassadors to Constantinople to sue for a peace; which was A peace con-accordingly concluded upon terms equally honourable to both princes ". The public cinded. rejoicings for the peace with Persia, after such a long and destructive war, were disturbed by a dreadful earthquake, which continued for several days, and overturned a great many stately edifices, and several churches, in which perished an incredible number of people, who had crouded to them during the public confusion. About the same time the plague, which had raged a few years before with great fury all over d the empire, broke out anew at Constantinople, and swept off many thousands of people. The same year 558. the Hunns, passing the Danube in the depth of winter, marched The Hunns in two bodies directly for Constantinople, and laying waste the countries through break into which they passed, came, without meeting with the least opposition, within an hundred and fifty furlongs of the city. But Belifarius, tho' now weakened by old age to fuch a degree, that he was scarce able to hold a shield, or brandish a sword, marching out against them with a handful of men, put them to flight, and delivered both Are put to the emperor and the city from the dangers that threatened them w. However, the flight by Beliemperor, to prevent them from breaking anew into the Roman dominions, agreed to iarius. pay them an annual pension, upon their promising to defend the empire against all e other barbarians, and to serve, when required, in the Roman armies x. This was the last exploit performed by Belisarius, who, upon his return to Constantinople, was Belisarius disdifgraced, stripped of all his employments, and confined to his house. Agathias ascribes graced. his disgrace to the malice of his enemies at court, who, envying him the great reputation he had deservedly acquired, and the favour he was in with the people, persuaded the emperor, whose jealousy increased with his years, that Belisarius aspired at the fovereignty; that the people, who preferred him to the most renowned heroes of antiquity, were all to a man ready to second him in his ambitious views; that the foldiery were still more attached to him than the people, &c. Upon these malicious and groundless infinuations, the emperor, forgetting the past services of the most f deserving of all his subjects, of one who had been the bulwark of the empire, and the restorer of the antient military discipline, recalled him, according to Agathias, without so much as suffering him to pursue his late victory over the Hunns; and upon his arrival at Constantinople, which he deserved to enter in triumph, confined him to his house, after having, with the utmost ingratitude, divested him of all his authority, honours and employments y. The more modern writers pretend, that Justinian caused his eyes to be put out, and reduced him to such poverty, that he was forced to beg from door to door in the streets of Constantinople. But the antient authors affure

* Idem, l. ii. c. 17, 28, 29.

* Idem ibid. & bell. Goth. l. iv. c. 3, 9. Адатн. l. iii. p. 81—90.

* Адатн. l. v. p. 155.

* Idem, p. 156, 157.

* Адатн. hift. Justin. c. 9.

A conspiracy against Justinian.

His code.

His institutes.

petita præle-ctione.

us, that the year following, the emperor, fully convinced of his innocence, restored a him to all his employments, which he enjoyed, without any farther difgrace, to his death. About this time, three of the emperor's chief officers, viz. Ablavius, Marcellus, and Sergius, conspired against him, upon what provocation we know not; but the plot being discovered by some persons, whom Ablavius had attempted to draw into it, the conspirators were seized, before they could put their design in execution. Marcellus, after having defended himself with great resolution against the officers who were fent to arrest him, stabbed himself with his own sword. Ablavius and Sergius were publicly executed, and the rest of the conspirators banished 2. The emperor escaped the conspiracy; but did not long outlive it, being soon after Justinian dies. carried off by a natural, but sudden death, in the thirty-ninth year of his reign; that b is, according to the most probable opinion, after he had reigned thirty-eight years, and seven months. His public works, the wars which were, in his reign, carried on with furprifing fuccess by his two renowned generals Belisarius and Narjes, and the new form which he gave to the Roman jurisprudence, have deservedly procured him the furname of Great. Of his public buildings, the reader will find a diffinct account in Procopius, who assures us, that there was scarce a city in his dominions, in which he did not erect some stately edifice, nor a province, wherein he did not built or repair fome city, fort, or castle a. In war he recovered, and reunited to the empire, Africa and Italy, after they had been long held, the former by the Vandals, and the latter by the Goths, as we shall relate in the history of these two nations. In peace he signalized c his reign by many excellent laws, but chiefly by the famous code, called from him the Justinian code. In the very beginning of his reign he published an edict, directed to the fenate of Constantinople, for the compiling of a new code. For this work he chose the most famous and learned men of his age, at the head of whom was the celebrated civilian Tribonianus, who were to collect into one volume all the constitutions contained in the Gregorian, Hermogenian, and Theodofian codes, and join to them fuch as had been published by Theodosius the younger, and the other lawful emperors his fuccessors, down to Justinian himself. Whatever in those laws seemed superfluous was to be retrenched, with the prefaces; their sense and meaning was to be rendered more clear, and the names of the princes who published them, the place, the time, d and the persons to whom they were directed, to be prefixed to each constitution. In this form and method was the new code compiled in little more than a year; so that it was published in the beginning of the third year of Justinian's reign, with an edict, commanding that code alone to be quoted by pleaders at the bar, and declaring all laws that were not contained in it to be of no force or authority. It was divided into twelve books, and contained the constitutions of fifty-four emperors, from Adrian to Justinian; whereas the Theodosian code began with Constantine the Great. Justinian, not fatisfied with the code alone, undertook foon after a more noble, and far more difficult work, which was to collect, and digest into order, the opinions and answers, of all the celebrated civilians, their remarks and comments on the Roman laws, especially on the edistum perpetuum, their different treatifes, &c. in all above two thousand volumes. This hard and crabbed task was completed in the space of three years by Tribonianus and fixteen other able civilians, and called by the Latins digesta, because the opinions of the antient civilians were there digested into order, and by the Greeks pandette, as containing all the antient jurisprudence. When this great work was near completed, Justinian ordered Tribonianus, Theophilus and Dorodeus to compile, for the benefit of the youth, the institutes, or first principles of the law, which were published about a month before the pandects b. As many things were found to be wanting in the code, and Justinian himself had, after the publication of it, enacted several laws, in the eighth year of his reign, that is, in 534. he ordered a second code to be made, f in which were inferted all the constitutions, about two hundred in number, which he had enacted fince the publication of the first, and several others contained in the former His code de re- code, either corrected or annulled. This second code, styled de repetita prælectione, was published five years after the first, and at the same time a decree, declaring the first to be of no force, and forbidding any constitutions or laws to be quoted in the courts of justice, that were not contained in the new code de repetita prælectione c. Thus was the first code, in a manner, abolished, and all authority given to the second, a viz. to that which has reached our times, divided into twelve books, and seven hundred and feventy-fix articles, containing the conftitutions of fifty-four emperors, from Adrian to Justinian. After the publication of the institutes, pandeds and code, Justinian enacted feveral laws, which were joined together in a distinct volume, called the novella His novella. constitutiones. These were published from time to time by Justinian, not in the Latin, excepting some few, but in the Greek tongue, and collected into one volume after his death d. Justinian is not only commended for his indefatigable care in reforming the Roman jurisprudence, but for his piety, prudence, justice, clemency, and every virtue becoming a person in his high station. As for the secret history, filled with most bitter invectives against Justinian, and the empress Theodora, it is, by the ablest crib tics, looked upon as not the work of Procopius, but as a scandalous libel fathered upon that writer. It is true, he loaded the people with heavy taxes; but the money thus raised was neither hoarded up by him, nor applied to the gratification of any unlawful passion, but employed in paying his numerous forces; in carrying on the many wars in which he was engaged; in repairing the public buildings, and embellishing with stately edifices the cities of the empire. In the latter end of his reign, he feemed to countenance the Eutychians, no doubt, at the instigation of the empress Theodora, who held their doctrine; which has given occasion to many bitter invectives against her memory. Justinian may deservedly be called the last Roman emperor; for in his reign the majesty of the empire seemed to revive, but soon vanished e again, as we shall see in the sequel of the present history.

* PROCOP. hift. fecr. c. 13. b Vide Balduin. in Justinian. p. 497. Ritters. a Idem, de ædif. in jure Justin. in procem. c. 1. num. 4. EDMUND. MERIL. ad 50 decis. Justin.

d Cujac. I. viii. obs. c. ult. Balduin. Justin. p. 573. Ritters. in procem. c. 4. num. 9.

C H A P. XXXIII.

The Roman history, from the death of Justinian the Great, to the deposing of Irene, and the promotion of Nicephorus.

d JUSTINIAN dying without iffue, Justin, the son of his sister Vigilantia, whom, in his life-time, he had designed for his successor, was by the senate proclaimed Justin proemperor, and crowned, with great folemnity, by John patriarch of Constantinople. claime peror. As the people were highly displeased with the deceased emperor, for abolishing the office of consul, the only mark they had left of their antient liberty, Justin promised to restore it; and accordingly took upon him that title on the first of January of the year 566. distributing on that occasion large sums amongst the people, according to the antient custom. During his consulship, the Avari, or Abari, a Scythian nation, fent embassadors to demand the pension formerly paid them by Justinian; but the Massagetes, who at this time began to be called Turks, and inhabited the country e bordering on the Tanais to the east, pressing the emperor not to comply with the demands of the Avari, their declared enemies, nor take them under his protection, Justin not only refused to pay them the usual pension, but threatened to make war He refuses to upon them, if they offered to disturb the peace of the empire. The courage and pay the usual tesolution which the emperor exerted on this occasion, gave so great satisfaction to pension to the the people, that they began to prefer him even to Justinian, who, they said, had, with the spoils of his own subjects, enriched the barbarians, the avowed enemies of the empire. But Justin soon forseited, by his cruelty, and insatiable avarice, the good opinion which the people entertained of him; for the following year he caused Justin his kinsman to be seized in his house, and conveyed to Alexandria, where he was, by his orders, inhumanly murdered, for no other crime but because he was He causes Just beloved by the people. The empress Sopbia, niece to the late empress Theodora, a tin his kinst mante he murte oman of a cruel, haughty and suspicious temper, is thought to have put him upon dered.

The Librards this, and several other bloody executions. The following year 569. is remarkable a for the irruption of the Lombards into Italy, where they founded a new kingdom, which continued for the space of two hundred years, and upwards. But of their wars with Justin and his successors, till the total reduction of Italy, and of the kings of the Lombards who reigned there, from Alboin to Defiderius, taken prisoner by Charlemagne, we shall speak at length in the following volume. Italy was anew dismembered from the empire, and great part of it lost in the reign of Justin; but some amends was

The Performe- made for so great a loss by the acquisition of Performenia, the inhabitants, who were ni ns revolt to cruelly persecuted by the Persians, on account of the christian religion, which they professed, shaking off the yoke, and recurring to the protection of the Roman emperor, to whom they submitted, upon certain articles sworn to by both parties. Cosrhoes, b informed of their revolt, dispatched embassadors to Constantinople, to divert the emperor from espousing their cause, which, he said, was contrary to the treaties fubfifting between the two empires. Justin, despising their menaces, resolutely answered, that the truce was expired, and that he could not deny his protection and affiftance to a brave nation, who, professing the same religion with himself, were on that score cruelly persecuted and oppressed. Hereupon Costboes, having with incre-

The Perfians invade the Roman dominions.

abandon the

The Pertians take several places.

dible expedition raised a powerful army, divided it into two bodies, ordering the one to march directly into Syria, under the conduct of Artabanus, while he himself with the other invaded Mesopotamia. Justin in the mean time, utterly neglecting the necesfary preparations to oppose so formidable an enemy, wallowed in his usual pleasures, c till news was brought him, that the Persians had already broken into his dominions.

He then dispatched Martianus, captain of his guards, into the east, but without men, money or arms; so that he was forced to inrol such vagabonds, thieves and robbers, as offered themselves to him in his way. With these however he surprised and put to flight a small body of Persians, and, elated with that advantage, however inconfiderable, he had the confidence to fit down before Nifibis, the inhabitants, who scorned to shut their gates, rallying him from the walls, and asking him, Whether he had been placed there with his men to watch sheep, or besiege the town? The emperor nevertheless, highly incensed against him for protracting, as he said, the siege, deprived him of his command, and fent one Acacius to succeed him; which so displeased the d officers, who were well acquainted with the haughty and imperious temper of Aca-The Romans tius, that they abandoned the siege, and retired into Syria. In the mean time Artasiege of Nisibis. banus, having passed the Euphrates, advanced to Antioch; but not being able to reduce that metropolis, he sat down before Heraclea, which he took by assault, and laid in ashes. From Heraclea he marched to Apamea, which submitted upon terms; but was nevertheless by his orders pillaged and burnt. After the reduction of Apamea, he joined the king, who had undertaken the siege of Daras, which being now carried on with fresh vigour, the garison was in the end obliged to submit, after having held out with great resolution and intrepidity for the space of five months. The loss of Daras, a place of the utmost importance, and the wonderful progress of the Lombards e in Italy, affected the emperor, now convinced of his imprudent conduct, to fuch a degree, that he was seized with a kind of madness, which rendering him altogether

Juftin feized with a kind of incapable of managing the public affairs, Tiberius, by birth a Thracian, who had madness. discharged, with great reputation, the first employments in the state, was, by the advice and interest of the empress Sopbia, with the unanimous consent of the senate, appointed to govern in his room. Tiberius immediately dispatched Trajan, a person Tiberius governs in his highly esteemed for his wisdom and address, to Cosrboes, with a letter from the room. empress Sopbia, wherein she acquainted him with the missortune that had befallen her husband, laid before him the deplorable state of the empire, and conjured him by all that was facred, to forbear infulting a helpless woman, or invading a weak and f defenceless state. She ended her letter by putting him in mind of the humanity formerly shewn him by the emperor Justinian, who, upon his being seized with a dangerous malady, sent the best physicians of the empire to attend him. Costrboes was so

The generolity of Coirhoes.

fensibly affected with this letter, that looking upon it as highly ungenerous to pursue the war, he immediately consented to a truce for three years?. The following year 573. the emperor, who continued still indisposed, by the advice of the empress Sophia, raised Tiberius to the dignity of Casar, resigning to him the whole management of affairs, and referving for himself the bare name of emperor. Tiberius's first Tiberius deelared Cafar.

> e Evagr. l. ii. c. 14. Phot. c. 113. F EVAGR. 1. V.C. 7-13. CEDREN. 1. iii. C. 18. MENAND. C. 16.

a care was to put himself in a condition of making head against the Persians, who, he apprehended, would not fail to invade the empire, as foon as the truce was expired. With this view he raised a very numerous and formidable army; but at the same time endeavoured, by means of his embassadors, to change the truce into a lasting perce, and to establish a good understanding between the two empires. Cosrboes, deal o all proposals, would not so much as admit the embassadors to his presence, being bent upon recovering Perfarmenia; which accordingly he over-ran upon the Coffhoes expiration of the truce, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties, and was already breaks into the marching into Cappadocia, with a defign to besiege Cæsarea, the metropolis of that Roman domi-province; but Justinian, the brother of Justin, who had been basely murdered at b Alexandria, as we have related above, meeting him at the head of a numerous army, obliged him to venture an engagement, in which great numbers of his troops were cut Is defeated, in pieces, and the rest forced to save themselves by a precipitous and disorderly flight. and dies of Cosrboes was so grieved for this overthrow, that he fell sick, and died, after a long grief. and glorious reign of forty-eight years. Justinian in the mean time, entering Persia with his victorious army, continued there, putting all to fire and sword, till the latter end of June, when he returned in triumph to the Roman territories F. The following year the emperor Justin died, after having reigned fixteen years, nine months, and Justin dies. some days. He is painted by all the writers of that age as a voluptuous prince, so addicted to his pleasures, as utterly to neglect public affairs; whence the state is said to have suffered no less from his inactivity and indolence, than from the tyranny and c cruelty of any of his predecessors ". Upon his death, Tiberius, who had for some Tiberius deyears governed the empire with an absolute sway, was by the senate and people clared emperor. declared emperor. The new prince immediately conferred the title of Augusta upon Anastasia, whom he owned for his wife, to the extreme disappointment of Sophia, who, having greatly contributed to his preferment, upon a prefumption that he would marry her, grew his implacable enemy, when the found him married to another, and The empress attempted to raise Justinian to the empire. But the plot being seasonably discovered, Sophia conthe emperor caused all her treasures to be seized, which was the only punishment he him. inflicted upon her; and depriving Justinian of the command of the army in the east, fent Mauritius to succeed him. Mauritius was descended from an antient Roman family; d but born in Arebiffus, a city of Cappadocia, had ferved in the army from his infancy, and was no less esteemed for his exemplary piety, and attachment to the orthodox faith, than for his courage and experience in war. Upon his arrival in the east, he found Hormifda, who had fucceeded Cofrhoes in the kingdom of Perfia, obstinately bent upon war, and deaf to the advantageous proposals offered him by the emperor. Hereupon, having drawn together his forces, he marched with incredible expedition to the confines of Persia, and falling unexpectedly upon the Persian army, commanded by the · king in person, gave them a total overthrow, took their camp, with all the royal The Persians plate and treasure, which he immediately sent to Constantinople, and made an incredible defeated by number of prisoners, who were likewise sent to the emperor, by whose orders they Mauritius. e were richly cloathed, and suffered to return to Persia, Tiberius hoping, by that generous behaviour, to incline the young prince to an accommodation. But Hormisda, determined to pursue the war at all events, dispatched his two generals, Tamochofroes and Aduasmanes, to the borders, at the head of the most numerous army that had been seen for many years in Persia. Mauritius however, according to the fuccinct and confused account which Evagrius gives us of this war, gained a complete He gains a sevictory over them, dispersed their numerous forces, took several castles, strong-holds cond victory, and towns, enriched his army with an immense booty, and made such numbers of places, &c. captives, as were sufficient to people the islands and countries that had been long uninhabited, and to form armies against other nations at enmity with the empire i. Upon f his return to court, he was received with the greatest demonstrations imaginable of esteem and affection by Tiberius, who soon after gave him in marriage his daughter He marries the Constantia, and raised him to the dignity of Cæsar; which was declaring him his emperor's successfor k. In the mean time Hormisda, quite disheartened after the great losses he is declared had sustained, sent embassadors to sue for peace, which was in the end concluded; but Carlar. not long observed by that faithless prince, as we shall see anon. The year following the Avari or Abari, dwelling on the banks of the Danube, made a sudden irruption into The Avari break into the E Evag. l.v. c. 17. Agath. l. iv. c. 13. h Pa v. c. 9. k Niceph. l. xviii. c. 6. Evag. ibid. h Paul. Diacon, de gest. Langeb. l. iii. c. 11.

Pannonia, under the conduct of their Chagan, or king, and made themselves masters of a Sirmium. Chagan, elated with this success, dispatched embassadors to Constantinople to demand the annual pension, which the emperor had neglected to pay the year before, and besides, an immense sum by way of interest. But Tiberius, highly provoked at the arrogance of the embassadors, instead of complying with their exorbitant demands, ordered his troops to take the field. The Avari, not caring to venture an engagement, retired beyond the Danube, watching an opportunity of invading anew the Roman The year following, that is, according to the most probable opinion, Tiberius dies, in 586, died the emperor Tiberius, after having reigned four years alone, and three years and eleven months with Justin. All the antients speak of him as a prince of extraordinary abilities, and one who proved a true father to his people. Some time b Mauritius suc- before his death, he had caused Mauritius to be declared emperor, in the presence of John the patriarch of Constantinople, of all the nobility, and the chief citizens, as a person the best qualified in the whole empire for that high station. Hormisda, king of Persia, no sooner heard of the death of Tiberius, than he broke into the empire, at the head of a numerous and powerful army, pretending that the peace he had lately concluded with Tiberius was no longer binding. Against him the emperor dispatched one John a Thracian, who at first gained some small advantages over the enemy; but being foon after defeated, he was recalled, and Philippicus, who had married the emperor's fifter, fent in his room. The new general was attended with better success; for having engaged the Persians, who, encouraged by the pre- c dictions of their magi, and confiding in their numbers, advanced to battle as to a certain triumph, he obliged them to retire with great loss to their camp. The next morning the Persians renewed the fight, but were again descated with a far greater loss than they had sustained the day before. After this victory, Philippicus detached Heraclius, his lieutenant, with part of the army, ordering him to enter and lay waste the enemy's country. The Persian general, named from his office Cardariga, being informed by some deserters, that the Roman army was divided, rallied his forces;

The Persians defeated by Philippicus,

Who is defeated and falling in the dead of the night upon Philippicus, put him to flight, and took

A general

The Perfians defeated by

The mutiny appeased by of Antioch.

by them in his a great number of prisoners. Heraclius, in the mean time, having passed the Tigris, laid waste the country far and wide, made himself master of several strong-holds, d and then returned, loaded with booty, to Philippicus, who was drawing all his forces together with a delign to retrieve the reputation of the Roman arms with some remarkable exploit. But in the mean time, the emperor, being informed of his late misconduct, ordered him to relign the command of the army to Priscus, and return to Constantinople. Priscus was an officer of great courage and experience; but as he was universally abhorred by the soldiery, on account of his severity, and imperious temper, a few days after his arrival, they rose up in a general mutiny against him, mutiny in the plundered his tent, and would have cut him in pieces, had he not faved himself by Roman army, a timely flight, and taken refuge in the neighbouring city of Edessa. Upon his retreat the mutineers obliged Germanus, governor of Phanicia, to take upon him the command of the army, which he had not held long, before the emperor, informed of the mutiny, fent Philippicus again into the east to bring them back to their duty. Germanus was for refigning the command to him; but the mutinous foldiery openly declaring they would obey no other leader, he was forced, both against his own will and the emperor's, whom he was unwilling to disoblige, to continue in the post to which they had raised him. In the mean time, the Persians, taking advantage of these disturbances, broke into the empire, destroying every thing with fire and sword. But Germanus, marching against them, engaged them, according to Evagrius, with fuch success, that scarce one was left alive to carry the news of their defeat into Perfiam. Not long after this victory, the mutiny was at length appealed, after it had f lasted a year and upwards, by Gregory, hishop of Antioch, a person greatly beloved and revered by the foldiery for the fanctity of his life, and the kindness he had on feveral occasions shewed them. Moved by his tears and eloquence, they submitted in the end to Philippicus, who, after having published a general act of oblivion, Gregory, bishop marched without loss of time against the Persians, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, in which the general himself, by name Marazas, and almost the whole army, were cut in pieces, only two thousand two hundred of so great a multitude having escaped the general flaughter ". The same year the city of Antioch was once more

1 MENAND. C. 23. THEOPHYL. Simocat. c. 3. m EVAGR. ibid. THEOPHYLACT. C. 8, 9. " EVAGR. ibid. THEOPHYLACT. C. 10, 15.

almost

a almost utterly destroyed by a dreadful earthquake, in which above thirty thousand persons were either buried under the ruins, or swallowed up by the earth o. The following year 588. Sittas, one of the citizens of Martyropolis, having betrayed that important place to the Persians, Philippicus early in the spring laid siege to it; but not being able to reduce it, he was recalled, and Gommentiolus appointed to command in his room, who falling upon the Persians soon after his arrival, gained a The Persians complete victory over them, made himself master of a castle called Ochas, built on defeated by a high rock over-against Martyropolis, and from thence so annoyed the garison with Commentihis warlike engines, that they were in the end obliged to submit, and deliver up the place. Hormisda, ascribing the bad success of his arms to the cowardice of his general, b by name Barames, deprived him of his command, sending him at the same time the habit of a woman, as more becoming him than the military attire. Barames, to revenge this affront, conspired against Hormifda, who was universally hated on account of his cruelty; and having eafily gained over the greater part of the army, and amongst the rest Ferrochanes, who had been sent to command in his room, he fell upon the king with the other conspirators, and pulling him down from his throne, Hormida, tore the diadem from off his head, and conveyed him under a strong guard to the king of Persia, public prison. The next day the nobility, whom he had provoked with his cruel- deposed, and Costrhoes, his ties, ordered his wife, and one of his fons, to be fawed a funder in his prefence ; fon, raifed to and then putting out his eyes, they threw him into a dungeon, where he was treated the throne.

c with great humanity by his eldest son Cost boes, whom the rebels had raised to the throne. But the deposed king, not able to bear so great a change, instead of acknowledging the kindness shewn him by his son, who dared not release him, trampled under foot whatever was fent him; which provoked Cofrhoes to fuch a degree, that in the transport of his passion he caused him to be beaten to death. Though the Persians abhorred Hormisda, yet the aversion they conceived against Cost boes, on account of this unnatural murder, was so great, that the nobility, people and soldiery, conspiring against him, drove him from the throne, and obliged him to take Cossiboes, drirefuge in the Roman dominions. Mauritius, touched with compassion, and reflecting ven out, is on the uncertainty of all human grandeur, received him at Constantinople with all restored by Mauritius.

d possible demonstrations of kindness, entertained him in a manner suitable to his condition, and, having prefented him with immense sums, sent him back at the head of a powerful army, which, entering Persia, deseated the rebels in a pitched battle, obliged Barames, their ringleader, to take refuge amongst the neighbouring barbarians, and, restoring the banished prince to the throne of his ancestors, returned in triumph to the Roman territories P. Upon the restoration of Cosrboes, a profound peace enfued in the east, so that the emperor was at leifure to pursue the war against the Avari, who, passing the Danube, had entered Thrace, and made themselves The Avari inmasters of several strong-holds in that province. Mauritius marched against them in vade the emperson at the head of the army lately returned from the east; but after several bat. pire.

e tles fought with dubious fucces, he was in the end obliged to purchase a peace, which however the king of the Avari did not long observe; for entering into an alliance with the Gepidæ, the Sclavi, and other neighbouring barbarians, he returned the following year, bragging, that he would utterly abolish the Roman name, and establish a new empire over all people and nations. After he laid waste Thrace, he approached Constantinople with his numerous army; which struck such terror into the inhabitants, that they were for quitting Europe, and retiring with their families and effects to Chalcedon, and other places in Asia. But the emperor, unmoved at the impending storm, prevailed upon them not to abandon their native country to the fury of the barbarians, affuring them, that heaven would not suffer f the peace, which Chagan had confirmed with the most solemn oaths, to be thus violated with impunity. The citizens, encouraged by the words and example of the pious prince, began to prepare for a vigorous defence: but at this juncture their preparations proved unnecessary; for a violent plague breaking out in the enemy's Obliged by a camp, swept off daily great numbers of them, and amongst the rest seven of Cha-plague to regan's fons; which so terrified the barbarians, that they resolved to abandon the turn to their Roman territories, and return beyond the Danube. Chagan, when upon the point of own country. departing, offered to fet at liberty the Roman captives, of whom he had twelve thousand, for a very inconsiderable sum a head. But the emperor resusing to ran-

Muritius dif fom them, because they had been for the most part concerned in the mutiny, which a happened in the beginning of his reign, Chagan, transported with rage, put them all to the fword. This occasioned a mutiny in the army, and a great tumult at Constantinople, where the populace insulted the emperor in a most outrageous man-The following year the Avari, under the conduct of their warlike king, renewed their ravages, but were in five successive battles overthrown by Priscus, with the loss of above thirty thousand men, and obliged to quit the Roman dominions. Priscus returned to Constantinople; but Peter, the emperor's brother, who commanded an army on the Danube, was ordered to cross that river, and winter in the enemy's country. This order the foldiers, who had conceived an irreconcileable aversion to Mauritius ever since he refused to ransom the captives, would by no means h comply with, looking upon it as given on purpose to expose them to new hardships. Hereupon a general mutiny ensuing, they declared a centurion, by name Phocas, emperor, bestowing upon him, with repeated acclamations, the title of Augustus. News of the revolt of the army, and the promotion of Phocas, being brought to Constantinople, the populace, ever fond of change, rose against Mauritius, who, finding himself abandoned by his guards, embarqued on a small vessel with his wife and

The army on the Danube declare Phocas emperor.

Mauritius retires.

Constantinople.

dren pis: 10 death.

The emteror's Phocas.

children, proposing to retire in disguise to some place of safety; but being driven back by contrary winds, he took refuge in the church of the martyr Autonomus, Phocas crown- about an hundred and fifty furlongs from Constantinople. In the mean time Phocas, arriving with his army, entered the city amidst the loud acclamations of the populace, and was folemnly crowned in the church of St. John Baptist, with his wife Leontia, by the patriarch, after he had promifed to maintain the rights of the church, and to defend the faith of the councils of Nice and Chalcedon. The following days he exhibited public sports, during which warm disputes arising between the two factions, viz. the blue and the green, Phocas fent his guards to appeale the tumult, who having used roughly a tribune of the blue faction, those of the same party, threatening the emperor, cried out, that Mauritius, who would do them justice, was not yet dead. This awakened the jealoufy of the tyrant, who thereupon imme-Mauritius, and diately ordered Mauritius to be dragged from his afylum to Chalcedon, where, by five of his chil- the tyrant's orders, five of his children were first inhumanly murdered in his presence, d and then he himself beheaded. He beheld the death of his children with such firmness, and christian resignation, as can hardly be matched in history, frequently repeating the words of the royal prophet, Just art thou, O Lord, and righteous in all thy judgments; nay, he was so far from uttering any complaints, that the woman, who was charged with the care of his little children, having concealed one of them, and placed her own in his room, the emperor would not fuffer this kind fraud to take place, but discovered it to the executioners. The heads of the emperor and the young princes were for some days left exposed to public view, and then buried with the bodies near the tomb of St. Mamasr. Such was the end of Mauritius, after he had lived fixty years, and reigned fixteen years, three months, and fome e days'. The tyrant, not fatisfied with the death of Mauritius, cauled Peter his brother, and brother, Commentiolus, who had the chief command of the many feveral others, Philippicus, and Prasentinus, an officer of great distinction, and much attached to brother, Commentialus, who had the chief command of the army, George the fon of the family of the deceased emperor, to be inhumanly massacred. Theodofius, the eldest son of Mauritius, had been sent by his father in the beginning of the troubles to folicit fuccours from Cosrboes, whom he had restored to the throne of his anceftors; but before the young prince reached the confines of the empire, he was seized, and executed at a place called Leucasta, at a small distance from Nicaa in Bithynia'.

> Phocas, thus proclaimed and acknowledged at Constantinople, fent, according to custom, his own image, and that of his wife Leontia, to Rome, where they were f received in the month of April of the present year 603. with loud and joyful acclamations, the people there being highly incenfed against Mauritius on account of the cruel exactions of the exarchs, and his other ministers in Italy. Gregory, furnamed the great, then bishop of Rome, caused the images to be lodged in the oratory of the martyr Cafarius, and wrote letters to the new emperor, congratulating him upon his advancement to the throne, which he faid was effected by a particular providence to deliver the people from the innumerable calamities, and heavy oppressions, <sup>9</sup> THEOPHYLACT. I. vii. c. 1-17. & I. viii. c. 2. CEDREN. ann. Maur. 19. ZONAR. p. 137. I. viii. c. 10. NICEPH. I. XVIII. C. 41. CEDREN. ZONAR. ibid. * EVAGR. 1, V. C. 23. CEDREN. annal, ann. Phoc. 1.

k 111,

ich a ćm.

at

n-

g,

u,

ni-

ho

t in

able

IPS.

:4S, us.

ing

and

ора- с

wife

ch,

ays

WO

ılt,

ty, W2S

me-, by nce, d

irm-

1616-

lby

Who

and ake

the

ied

į::,

ome e

r his

on of

d 10

the

ibles

nce-

ed,

۲.

10

a-

the

ed

ot

pon

0vi-

ons,

MH.

ind.

Ċſ

ere f

eans b

under which they had long groaned ". Had we no other character of Phocas and Phocas': cha-Leontia, but that which has been conveyed to us in Gregory's letters, we should rank rader. him amongst the best princes mentioned in history. But all other writers paint him in quite different colours; and his actions, transmitted to us by several historians, evidently speak him a most cruel and blood-thirsty tyrant. He was of middling stature, says Cedrenus w, deformed, and of a terrible aspect: his hair was red, his eye-brows met, and one of his cheeks was marked with a scar, which, when he was in a passion, grew black and frightful: he was greatly addicted to wine and women, blood-thirsty, inexorable, bold in speech, a stranger to compassion, in his principles a heretic. His wife Leontia was no better than he; in their reign thereb fore, continues the same writer, the unhappy people were overwhelmed with all manner The calamities of calamities, both public and private; great numbers of people were swept off either of his reign. by famine or pestilence; the earth resuled her fruits in season; the winters were so fevere, that the seas were frozen, and the fish destroyed. He endeavoured in the beginning of his reign to gain the affections of the people by celebrating the circensian games with extraordinary pomp, and distributing on that occasion large sums amongst the people; but finding that, instead of applauding, they reviled him as a drunkard, he ordered his guards to fall upon them, who wounded some, killed others, and seizing great numbers of them, dragged them to prison: but the popu- He is hated by lace rifing, fet them at liberty, and thenceforth conceived an irreconcileable aver- the people. fion to the tyrant . The death of Mauritius was no fooner known in the east, than c the celebrated Narses, who at that time commanded the troops quartered on the Narses revolts. frontiers of Persia, revolted; and seizing on the city of Edessa, easily persuaded Cosrhoes to join him, in order to depose the tyrant, and revenge the death of a prince, to whom he was indebted for his crown. Cosrboes, upon the first invitation, entered the Roman territories at the head of a mighty army, and over-ran without oppo-fition all Mesopotamia. Hereupon Germanus was sent into the east; but Narses meet- And deseats ing him not far from Edessa, engaged him, and put him to flight. Germanus dying Germanus sense a few days after of a wound he received in the engagement, Leontius, who was fent against him. to fucceed him, having, upon his arrival, fuffered himself to be furprised by Narses, was in like manner defeated, and his army dispersed; which provoked the tyrant to d fuch a degree, that he not only recalled him, but ordered him to be led about in chains, exposing him thus to the outrages and insults of the populace. Phocas, despairing of success so long as Narses continued in the Persian interest, lest no stone unturned to gain him over; but after he had in the end, with the most solemn oaths, Phocas gains and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour, perfuaded him to return home, over Narfes, and repeated affurances of indemnity and favour perfuses and repeated him to return home. he no sooner had him in his power, than, unmindful of his promises and engagements, orders burns he caused him to be burnt alive, to the great grief and dissatisfaction of the Romans, alive. by whom he was in a manner adored on account of the eminent services he had rendered the empire, and to the no less satisfaction of the Persians, who dreaded the very name of Narfes, and besides were highly provoked against him for his having lately e forfaken them 7. Though destitute of forenowned a leader, they pursued the war with great vigour, over-ran this year all Mesopotamia and Syria; and having committed every-where enormous cruelties, returned home with an immense booty, without meeting with the least opposition. Phocas finding himself universally hated by the people on account of his cruelties at home, and the advantages gained by the enemies of the empire abroad, to strengthen and secure his authority by alliances with the nobility, in the fifth year of his reign, that is, in 607. married his daughter Domitia to Priscus, a patrician, and captain of the guards. But in the magnificent shews that were exhibited on occasion of the nuptials, the people having saluted the bride and bridegroom with the title of Augusti, the jealous emperor ordered The emperor's f Theophanes and Pamphylus, who superintended the sports, and had exposed the images cruelty. of Priscus and Domitia, without any evil design, to be beheaded in the circus; and would have likewise put Priscus to death, had not the people interposed in his behalf?. The jealousy of the tyrant being thus awakened, one Peronia, who was privy to all the fecrets of Constantina, the widow of Mauritius, informed the emperor, that the maintained a private correspondence with Germanus, a man of great authority in the former reign, with a design to raise her son Theodosius, whom she believed

* Idem ibid.

many others,

still living, to the empire. Hereupon Constantina was immediately seized, and being a Constanting, put to the rack, confessed, that Romanus, by rank a patrician, was privy to the conspiracy. Romanus discovered upon the rack several others, and among the rest daughters, and Theodorus, presect of the east, Helpidius, John, Ziza, and many other persons of great put to death, distinction, who were all, by the emperor's orders, put to death, together with Romanus and Germanus, the tyrant not sparing even the daughter of the latter. As for

Syria, Pale-

Priscus conspires against the emperor.

of the Jews at Antioch.

Constantinople.

A conspiracy against the emperor dif-

Constantina, she was carried to the place where her husband had been put to death five years before, and there publicly executed with her three daughters a. The jealoufy of the suspicious tyrant being heightened by these discoveries, incredible multitudes of persons of all ranks were daily dragged to prison, which by that means was fo crouded, that great numbers died daily suffocated with the stench and noi- b fomeness of the place, till a pious matron, touched with compassion for the unhappy persons detained there, yielded her house adjoining to it to inlarge it b. Phocas thus raged at home, Cosrboes in the east laid waste without opposition Syria, stine and Phoe- Palestine and Phanicia, putting all to fire and sword; and the following year having by the Persians. put to slight the troops that were sent against him, he entered Galatia, and committing dreadful ravages both in that province, and in Paphlagonia, advanced as far as Chalcedon . In the mean time Phocas, instead of protecting his people against an implacable and insulting enemy, raged with greater fury than Cosrboes himself; for this year, the sixth of his reign, he not only put to death all those who were any-ways related to Mauritius, but caused Commentiolus, governor of c Thrace, and one of the best officers of the empire, with several other persons of great distinction, to be inhumanly murdered. These cruelties alarmed Priscus, sonin-law to the tyrant, who, apprehending fooner or later the fame fate, refolved by fome means or other to provide for his own fafety, and to rid the world of fo great a plague. Accordingly, being informed that Heraclius, governor of Africa, was privately carrying on a conspiracy in that province, instead of discovering it to his father-in-law, he drew over the chief men in the senate to the party of the conspirators, and at the same time dispatching persons, in whom he could conside, to Heraclius, advised him to send, without loss of time, his son Heraclius, and Nicetas, the fon of Gregoras his lieutenant, with what forces he could spare, to support the d people and nobility, who were ready to revolt d. Phocas, in the mean while, not apprifed of the danger that threatened him, dispatched Bonosus, whom he had lately appointed count of the east, with a considerable army to make head against the Persians; but while he was on his march, he received fresh letters from the emperor, An infarrection injoining him to haften to Antioch, where the Jews, rifing against the christians, had massacred great numbers of them, and among the rest Anastasius, the celebrated patriarch of that city, whose dead body they had ignominiously dragged thro' the streets, and insulted in a most outrageous manner. Bonosus having attempted in vain to appeale the tumult by fair means, fell upon the mutineers sword in hand, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and drove the rest out of the city. Thus was the e tumult suppressed at Antioch; but at the same time far greater disorders happened A tumult at at Constantinople, where the people, reviling the emperor at the public shews for his cruelty, drunkenness and debaucheries, provoked him to a degree, that, transported with rage, he caused several of them to be seized, who were either beheaded on the spot, or by his orders thrown headlong into the sea; which so enraged the rest, that they set fire to the palace, and the public prison; by which means those who were detained there made their escape. The tyrant's own court growing at length tired of him, a conspiracy was formed against him by those in whom he most confided. The chief authors of it were Theodorus, a Cappadocian, the prafeetus prætorio, Helpidius, who had the care of the warlike engines, and Anastasius, f the comes largitionum. These, with several others of great authority near his person, agreed to fall upon him in the hippodrome; but the conspiracy being discovered by Anastasius, the emperor ordered all those who had been privy to it, Anastasius himself not excepted, to be put to death f. Phocas escaped this danger; but the following year 610, the eighth of his reign, he was overtaken by the bloody doom Heraclius pro- he had long deserved. For Heraclius, the son of the governor of Africa, who bore claimed empe- the same name, taking upon him the title of emperor, and being acknowledged as e Glic. in annal. p. 170.

THEOPH. hift. misc. l. xviii. Седкен. in annal. Phocas. Glic. Theoph. C. Phoc. 7. Cedren. ann. 7. f Hist. miscel. an. 7. Phoc. b Glic. annal. in Conft. mag. Glic. in Phocas. Glic. Theoph. Cade. ibid.

fuch

a fuch by the people of Africa, failed from thence with a mighty fleet, and a powerful army on board, for Constantinople, while Nicetas marched thither by way of Alexandria and the Pentapolis. Heraclius steered his course to Abydus, where he was received with great demonstrations of joy by several persons of rank, who had been banished by Phocas. From Abydus he sailed to Constantinople, where he engaged and Phocas, overutterly defeated the tyrant's fleet. Phocas took refuge in the palace; but one Pho-come in a featinus, whose wife he had formerly debauched, pursuing him with a party of soldiers, and put 10 forced the gates, dragged the cowardly emperor from the throne, and having death. stripped him of the imperial robes, and cloathed him with a black vest, carried him in chains to Heraclius, who commanded first his hands and feet, then his arms b and privy parts, and at last his head, to be cut off. The remaining part of his body was delivered up to the foldiers, who burnt it in the forum. We are told, that Heraclius having reproached him with his evil administration, he answered with great calmness, It is incumbent upon you to govern better 8. Such was the deserved end of this cruel and bloody tyrant, after he had reigned seven years and some months. Upon his death, Heraclius was with loud acclamations proclaimed emperor; and Heraclius probeing crowned by Sergius, the patriarch of Constantinople, he placed the imperial crown claimed empeon the head of Fabia, thenceforth called Eudocia, the daughter of Rogatus, an African, ror. who had been formerly betrothed to him. Heraclius was descended of a noble and opulent family in Cappadocia, of a majestic aspect, well skilled in the art of war, c courageous, and able to bear the fatigues attending a military life. The people, who had long groaned under the tyrannical yoke of his predecessor, were highly pleased with the change: but their joy was somewhat allayed by dismal tidings from the east, where the Persians made themselves masters of Edessa and Apamea, The Persians and penetrating as far as Antioch, cut off almost to a man a body of Romans, who make themattempted to stop them, committing every-where, without controul, most dreadful effectives masters ravages, and unheard-of cruelties. Heraclius, to answer the expectation the world had conceived of him, caused new levies to be made throughout the empire, the old corps being fo intirely exhausted, that, of the many thousands who had seven years before revolted from Mauritius, and declared for Phocas, only two foldiers were d now living, the rest being cut off, says Cedrenus, by the avenging hand of providence, for their treachery to their lawful prince h. The new raised troops were sent into Cappadocia under the command of Crispus, who nevertheless could not prevent the Persians from over-running that province the following year, and making themfelves masters of Casarea, which they sacked, and laying waste both that province Ravage Capand Armenia, returned home loaded with booty, and carrying with them an incre-padocia and dible number of captives i. On the third of May of the same year 611. the empress Armenia, Eudocia was delivered of a fon; but she died soon after, and was interred with extraordinary pomp. The fon was called Heraclius, and afterwards Constantine the younger k. Heraclius, not finding himself in a condition to restrain the Persians by force of arms, e dispatched embassadors to Cosrboes, offering to pay him a yearly pension, and to conclude a peace upon his own terms. But Costrhoes, deaf to all proposals, fent the next year a formidable army into Syria, under the conduct of Rasmizsus, who, after over-run having ravaged without opposition that country, broke into Palestine, and took the Egypt and city of Jerusalem, where they committed unheard of cruelties. They are said to Paleitine, have fold ninety thousand christians to the Jews, who purchased them not with a And take design to use them as slaves, but to vent their inveterate hatred, and implacable rage against the christians, by racking them with all the torments cruelty itself could invent. Zacharias, the patriarch, was carried into Persia, with an immense booty, and part of the cross, as was believed, on which our Saviour suffered. The same f year Heraclius married Martina, his brother's daughter, and caused her to be crowned with the usual pomp by Sergius, the patriarch of Constantinople m. To this incestuous marriage Zonaras and Cedrenus ascribe all the calamities that afterwards besel him. The following year the Persians over-ran all Egypt, took and pillaged the city of Alexandria, and advancing from thence, as they met with no opposition, into Africa, laid siege to Carthage; but not being able to reduce it, they returned unmolested into Persia, carrying with them infinite numbers of captives, and the spoils of the feveral provinces, through which they passed. Herachus, who continued all this miscel. ann. 2. Heracl.

* Niceph. l. xviii. c. 26. Miscel. ann. 7. Phoc.

* Zonar. p. 140.

Theoph. ad ann. H

Hist. miscel. l. iv. Cedren. ann. Heracl. 6. Leont in vit. Joan. Elecmos. h CEDREN. Heracl. ann. 1. 1 THEOPH. hift. 1 THEOPH. ad ann. Heracl. 5. Idem ibid.

bearken to no serms.

Heraclius railes a powerful army.

the Pertians.

The treachery of their general.

Heraclius invades Perlia, and gains a great victory.

to flight.

Ravages the Perlian dominions, and sakes several places.

time at Constantinople, where he created his fon Constantine Casar, and gave the title a of Augusta to his daughter, being well apprifed, that he had not sufficient strength to make head against so formidable an enemy, sent once more embassadors to Cofrboes, putting him in mind of the kindness formerly shewn him by Mauritius, and offering to conclude a lasting peace with him upon what terms he himself should judge reasonable. But Cosrboes, elated with his success, and aiming at nothing less Costhoes will than the utter destruction of the Roman name, returned the embassadors the following blasphemous answer; Let your master know, that I will bearken to no terms, till be bas, with all his subjects, renounced his crucified God, and adored the sun, the great god of the Persians . Heraclius, by this impious and insulting answer, awaked as it were from a lethargy, concluded a peace with the Chagan or king of the Avari; b and having, with the confent of the clergy, coined into money the gold and filver vessels belonging to the churches, as the treasury was quite drained, he raised a powerful army, confisting not only of Romans, but of Hunns, Avari, and other barbarous nations. With these forces he resolved to march in person against Cost bases and accordingly having appointed his fon to govern in his absence, and under him Sergius the patriarch, and the patrician Bonus, a person of great wisdom and expe-He marches in rience, he fet out from Constantinople the day after Easter, training on his march such of his men as were raw and unexperienced. In the mean time Saes, the Persian general, who had ravaged all Cappadocia, taken by florm the city of Ancyra, and penetrated as far as Chalcedon, hearing that Heraclius was advancing with a mighty c army, fent deputies to him to invite him to an interview, which he hoped, faid the treacherous Persian, would end in a lasting peace between the two empires. The emperor complied with his request; and believing him in earnest, sent seventy persons of distinction on an embassy to the king of Persia. But these the Persian general, with the utmost treachery, loaded with chains, and carried them thus bound into Persia, where they were thrown into prison, and treated with great inhumanity by Cosrboes. Saes met with the punishment his treachery deserved; for the king, highly provoked against him for having seen the Roman emperor, and not brought him away prisoner with the rest, caused him to be flayed alive. One Sarbaras was appointed to command in his room, who entering Asia at the head of d a numerous army, made a dreadful havock in that province. Heraclius, in the mean time, bent his march to the confines of Armenia; and having put to flight a party of Persians, who guarded the streights leading into that province, he pursued his rout towards Pontus. As the year was far spent, the Persians, imagining he designed to take up his winter-quarters in Pontus, withdrew to theirs; which they had no fooner done, than Heraclius broke into their territories, destroying all before him with fire and fword. This sudden irruption obliged the Persians to quit Cilicia, which they had entered, and haften to the defence of their own country. Heraclius, apprifed of their approach, drew together his men dispersed about the country, and offered them battle, which they readily accepted, but were intirely defeated, the Romans remaining masters both of their camp and baggage. The emperor being, by the feafon, that was already far advanced, prevented from pursuing the advantages of this victory, put his forces into winter-quarters, and returned himself to Constantinople P. The following year Cosrboes sent early in the spring Sarnabazas or Sarmanazaris to lay waste the Roman provinces, which obliged Heraclius to quit Constantinople, and hasten into the east. Upon his arrival in Armenia, he dispatched embaffadors to Cofrhoes with new proposals for an accommodation; which being by the Persian monarch rejected with great pride and arrogance, he invaded Persia anew, took several towns, which he levelled with the ground, and ravaged the country without controul. Being informed, that the king lay encamped with forty f thousand chosen men near the city of Gazacum or Gazacotis, he directed his march thither with a design to surprise him. But Cosrboes, receiving timely notice of his Puts Cossibles approach, instead of making the necessary preparations to receive him, betook himto fight. Upon his retreat, the emperor entered Gyzacum without opposition, where he is said by Theophanes and Cedrenus to have found the immense treasures of Crasus, king of Lydia, which he seized; and having secured it, with the many rich ornaments of a celebrated temple of the fun, he fet fire to the city, > n Hift, miscel. l. xviii. • Тиеори. ibid. Серген. annal. aon. 4. P NICEPH. in Heracl. c. 5. THEOPH. & CEDREN. ad ann. 13.

a and marching with all possible expedition in pursuit of the king, he arrived at Thebatman, where Theophanes places the above-mentioned temple; and laying waste the countries through which he passed, continued his march to the frontiers of Media. But the fummer being far spent, he thought it adviseable to give over the pursuit. Accordingly having fet apart three days to return public thanks for the fuccess of this glorious campaign, and implore the further protection of heaven, he opened the book of the gospels, pursuant to a custom which began to obtain about this time, and imagining he was injoined there to winter in Albania, he directed his march to that province. In his retreat the Persians, desirous of recovering the immense booty which he carried with him, fell often upon his rear, but were constantly b repulsed with great loss. As the weather proved very severe, and the captives, fifty thousand in number, were more affected with it than the rest, as being accustomed An instance of to a warmer climate, the good-natured emperor ordered them all to be released his good nawithout ransom, giving them leave to return unmolested to their respective countries q. ture. The following campaign proved no less successful to the Romans, Heraclius having He gains great defeated the enemy in two pitched battles, and cut off great numbers of them, with advantages their general Sarablacas, tho' the Lazians and other auxiliaries had shamefully aban-sians. doned him, and marched home. Encouraged with this fuccess, he took the field next year early in the spring; and crossing the Euphrates, made himself master of Samofata, and several other places. Sarabazas, at the head of a numerous army, e attempted to check the progress of his arms, but was utterly defeated on the banks of the Sanis. In this last battle the emperor gave fignal proofs of his conduct, and personal courage. After this victory, Heraclius took up his winter quarters at Sebastia, placing his troops in the neighbouring towns. Cost hoes, transported with rage on feeing his armies thus shamefully defeated, seized on the wealth of all the churches within his dominions, and, out of hatred to Heraclius, raised a cruel persecution against the catholics, sparing none but such as embraced the doctrine of Nestorius. At the same time, by his embassadors, he engaged in his cause the Avari, Costhoes sire

the Hunns, the Sclavonians, and other barbarous nations, who, by invading Thrace, up the barba-and laying fiege to Constantinople, were to divert the emperor from pursuing the d war in Persia. Heraclius, apprised of these negotiations, tho' carried on with great fecrecy, divided his forces into three armies, of which one was appointed to defend the city of Constantinople; the second, under the conduct of Theodorus, the emperor's brother, was to watch the motions of Sais, who threatened to invade Asia, while the emperor himself led the third into Lazica, in order to invade from thence the Persian dominions. Pursuant to this plan, Heraclius advanced into Lazica, and being there joined by forty thousand Chazari, or, as Cedrenus calls them, eastern Turks, he entered Persia in the depth of winter; and meeting with no opposition, laid waste feveral provinces. On the other hand the chagan, or king of the Avari, and the other barbarous nations in alliance with the king of Persia, breaking into Thrace,

e committed dreadful ravages there, and in the end laid fiege to Constantinople; but Who sit down being in feveral attacks repulfed by the garison, and having lost the flower of their before Constanarmy, they thought it adviseable to drop the enterprize, and retire. About the are forced to fame time Sais, who had under his command the flower of the Persian army, received raise the siege. a dreadful overthrow from Theodorus, who lost but a very small number of men. The following year 626. Heraclius, invading Persia in the depth of winter, advanced as far as Nineveb, where he was met by Razastes, to whom Costboes, distrusting his other generals, had committed the whole management of the war. Hereupon a battle ensuing, the Persians, after an obstinate dispute, were put to flight, and their The emperor general himself slain, the Romans having lost on that occasion but fifty men; which gains other f the ecclesiastic writers ascribe to the miraculous assistance of Heaven. In this battle villeries.

the emperor behaved with his usual bravery, having killed three Persian commanders with his own hand r. Cofrhoes, upon the news of this defeat, fled to Seleucia on the Tigris, and there shut himself up with his wives, children and treasures, while Heraclius, having now no army to oppose him, made a dreadful havock of the most fertile provinces of the Persian dominions, destroying all with fire and sword. At Distagerda he found the ensigns and standards, which at different times had been taken from the Romans, and in other places rescued incredible numbers of Roman captives. In the mean time Sarbarazes, to divert Heraclius from ravaging Persia,

9 THEOPH. CEBREN. NICEPH. ibid.

Idem ad ann. Herael. 17.

. Vol. VI. Nº 7.

6 Y

laid

fian generals revolts.

Cosrhoes deposed, and his fon Syroes put

Who concludes a peace with the Romans.

falem.

Perfia conquered by the Saracens.

laid siege to Chalcedon; but, after he had continued some time before the place, without being able to reduce it, Cosrboes sent private orders to Chardarichas, another officer, to murder the general, and lead the army back into Persia. But the king's letter was intercepted, and brought to the emperor's fon at Constantinople, by whom One of the Per- it was immediately fent to Sarbarazes, who thereupon revolted with his whole army. About the same time the king, being taken ill, declared his younger son Merdasa his successor; which Seroes, his eldest son, no sooner understood, than he joined Chardarichas; and being affifted by the Roman captives, whom he fet at liberty pursuant to the advice given him by Heraclius, he seized on his father, and loading him with chains, threw him into a dungeon, where he was inhumanly murdered with Merdasa, and his other children, after he had been, by the orders of his b unnatural fon, most outrageously insulted by all the nobility . Syroes, thus raised to the throne, concluded a perpetual peace with Heraclius, upon terms no less honourable than advantageous to the empire; for he restored all the provinces than had been seized by his predecessor, with three hundred ensigns, and the wood which was supposed to have been part of the cross on which our Saviour died, and had been carried by Cosrboes in triumph from Jerusalem into Persia. He likewise set at liberty all the Roman captives, and among the rest Zacharias, patriarch of J rujalem. A peace being thus concluded, Heraclius returned to Constantinople, which he entered in a kind of triumph, being met at some distance by his son Constantius, the patriarch, and almost all the nobility and people, who attended him to the palace with c songs of triumph, and repeated acclamations. And truly no prince ever deserved better of the empire; for in the space of six years he recovered the several provinces which had been dismembered from it by the Persians, fully revenged all the indigmities offered to the Roman name by that haughty nation, obliged their king, and his numerous armies, to fly before him, and brought the most potent and formidable of all the enemies of the empire to such a low ebb, that they were never after-wards capable of attempting any memorable exploit. These things Heraclius performed, though, upon his accession to the empire, he found it over-run by several barbarous nations, the exchequer quite drained, the military discipline decayed, and the army confifting of raw and unexperienced levies, scarce deserving the d name of foldiers. Heraclius, having passed the winter at Constantinople, in the spring Heraclius ear- of the following year 628. took a progress to Jerusalem, carrying with him that ries back the part of the cross which had been taken by the Persians sourteen years before. He entered the city in great pomp; and having returned in the chief church folemn thanks to the Almighty for the many fignal victories he had been pleased to grant him, and for chusing him to rescue that sacred pledge out of the hands of the enemies of the christian name, he restored it with great solemnity to its sormer place. Upon this occasion was instituted the festival of the enaltation of the boly eross, which is celebrated to this day by the church of Rome on the fourteenth of September ". Of the miracles that are said to have happened on this occasion, the reader will find a • particular account in Cedrenus, and other ecclesiastic writers. When the ceremony was over, the emperor published an edict banishing all the Jews from Jerusalem, and forbidding them, under fevere penalties, to come within three miles of the holy city. From Jerusalem, Heraclius took a farther progress into the eastern provinces. Upon his arrival at Hierapolis in Phrygia, he received news of the death of Syroes, the new king of Persia, murdered, according to some, by Sarbaras, one of his generals, according to others, by his own fon Adeser, who succeeded him, but was affaffinated in the seventh month of his reign by Barrazas, whom the Persians, a few months after, deposed, and put to death, raising Barahanes, the son of Costboos, to the throne in his room. Barabanes, after a short reign of seven months, was f fucceeded by Hormisda, the last Persian king of the race of Artaxerxes; for in his reign the Saracens put an end to the Persian monarchy, and established the kingdom of the Arabians in its room, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. From Hierapolis the emperor removed to Edessa, where he received embassadors from the king of India in the east, and from Dagobert, king of the Franks, in the west, sent to congratulate him on his late success against the Persians, and to court his friendship and alliance w. While the emperor continued at Edessa, Athanasmis,

THEOPH. hoc 2011. & CEDREN. 1 Idem ibid. w Theoph. 2ng. 22. Heracl. Almoin. l.iv. с. 21.

* THEOPH. CEDREN. ad ann. Heracl. 10.

III,

гd

ŭ-

his 🕽

èd

0-20 ¢

11

ered

117ivith c

red

ces

g-

nd

mi-

ci-

M.

eve-

yed,

the d

ring

that

He

emn

тапК

ene-

2CC.

hich

Of

nony

والعام

e holy

rinco.

Tree!

gene-

Was

15, 2

boes, Was f

n his

ing-

ace.

idors

n the court

na iri,

K. 19.

nd a 🕏

z the patriarch of the Jacobites, a man of great address, having infinuated himself into his favour, brought him by degrees to acknowledge but one will in Chrift, Heraclius emwhich created a dangerous schism in the church, and gave rise to warm disputes, braces the de-Heraclius ever after maintaining it to the utmost of his power, and countenancing trune of the Monothelites. the Monothelites, that is, those who acknowledged but one will in Christ. This heresy however did not prove so prejudicial to the church as the pestilent and impious doctrine of the importor Mobammed, which was first broached in the reign of Heraclius, and Mohammed by him suffered to take so deep a root, that his successors were never able to sup-preaches his destrine. prefs it. The impostor died this year, the twenty-first of the reign of Heraclius, and 630th of the christian æra, after having reduced, with the assistance of the rabb ble, whom he had feduced, and of the Saracens, who had joined him, the cities of Mecca and Medina, and part of Arabia, Heraclius, in the mean time, neglecting the He reduces the affairs of the state, to promote and establish the heresy of the Monothelites, which cities of Mecca he had lately embraced. Mohammed, who, by a double usurpation, had declared Medina.

himself both the king and prophet of the Saracens, was succeeded by Eububezer, his kinfman, who reduced great part of Persia, and breaking into Palestine in 632. laid waste the territory of Gaza, after having deseated and cut in pieces the governor The Saracens of that province, with all his troops. The following year Eububezer died, and was make themfucceeded by Haumar, who made himself master of Bostra, and several other cities of of several pre-Arabia, and gained a complete victory over Theodorus, the emperor's brother, sent vinces. e to oppose him. Hereupon Heraclius appointed Boanes to command in the room of his brother, and at the same time dispatched Theodorus Sacellarius into Arabia. The latter was met near Emesa by the Saracens, under the command of Haumar; but he prudently declined an engagement, being informed, that the emperor had injoined Boanes, who lay encamped at Damascus, to join him. In the mean time Heraclius, dreading the issue of the war, leaving Edessa, hastened to Jerusalem, and repaired from thence to Constantinople, carrying with him the cross, and whatever else was of value in the city, which, he feared, would foon fall into the enemy's hands. The following year Boanes having engaged the Saracens, was by them intirely defeated, Heaven They defeat the itself seeming to espouse their cause; for a violent wind arose in the very beginning Romans, and

d of the engagement, which blowing the dust in the faces of the Romans, rendered fakeDaniascus. them quite incapable of managing their arms; so that they were driven headlong into the Jerinochta, in which river most of them perished. After this victory they made themselves masters of Damascus; and advancing from thence into Phanicia, reduced that province without meeting with the least opposition. Haumar, encouraged with this success, took the field early next spring; and dividing his numerous army into two bodies, he fent one to invade Egypt, and led the other in person against Jerusalem. They were met upon the borders of Egypt by Cyrus, bishop of Alexandria, who, by promising in the name of the people to pay them an annual pension of two hundred thousand denarii, prevailed upon them to spare the country, e and retire. This agreement was observed for three years, during which the Saracens never offered to molest the Egyptians. But in the mean time the emperor being advised to break the agreement, one Manuel, by birth an Armenian, was appointed governor of Egypt, and fent thither with a strong body of troops; so that the commissioners from the Saracens, when they came at the year's end to demand the usual pension, were received with contempt and disdain by the governor, who told them, that he was not a prieft, but a Roman general, at the head of an army, and therefore would not submit to such ignominious conditions. The Saracens, provoked at this answer, flew to arms; and invading Egypt, put Manuel to flight, and made They reduce themselves masters of the whole country. The emperor, not having sufficient strength Egypt and f to drive them out, fent Cyrus to them, promising to stand to the former agreement, provided they withdrew out of Egypt. But the Saracens refused to quit upon any terms their new conquest z. The loss of Egypt, which had continued subject to the empire ever fince the time of Augustus, happened in the twenty-fifth year of Heraclius's reign, and 634th of the christian æra. Egypt being thus reduced, the troops which had been employed in that expedition were by Haumar sent into Syria; which province they conquered in the space of two years, making themselves masters of all the strong holds there, and of Antioch itself, the metropolis of the east. Haumar in the mean time entering Palestine, marched without opposition to Jerusalem, which pleged and taken by the Saracens,

× Тивори, ad ann. Heracl. 24, 25.

Jesusslem be- city he took in 636. after a two years siege. Thus were the most wealthy and beau- a tiful provinces of the empire torn from it by the Saracens, an upstart nation, hitherto looked upon with a contempt suitable to their original. But of them we shall speak at length in a more proper place. Heraclius in the mean time, who wanted neither courage nor abilities to check the progress of this new enemy, was so taken up with unseasonable disputes about religion, with public festivals and entertainments, that he had not time, or perhaps was unwilling, to reflect on the dangers that threatened The ecclefiaftic writers look upon his fupine and unaccountable fecurity, as a punishment inflicted upon him by Heaven for countenancing the Monotbelites, and persecuting the catholics; for, not satisfied with holding the doctrine of those heretics himself, he endeavoured to establish it in all the provinces of the empire, by the b samous edict called ecthesis, or exposition. But, before he could put his wicked design in execution, he died of a dropfy, which was attended with strange and unaccount-His death happened in the month of May, after he had reigned able fymptoms.

Heraclius dies.

thirty years, and some months y. Heraclius was succeeded by his son Constantine, who died after a short reign of seven months, poisoned, as was supposed, by his step-mother Martina, to make room for her own fon Heracleonas; who was accordingly proclaimed, and crowned with the usual folemnity. But he had not held the empire quite six months, when the senate revolting, deposed him; and after having cut off his nose, and pulled out Martina's tongue, sent them both into banishment. Pyrrhus, the heretical patriarch c of Constantinople, supposed to have been privy to the death of Constantine, abandoning his see, sled into Africa. The senate, having thus delivered the empire from the usurper Heracleonas, advanced Constans, the son of Constantine, and grandson of Hera-

Africa conquered by the Saracens, wajle.

clared emperor. clius, to the throne. The first years of this prince's reign are almost quite barren of events; for Theophanes, and the other Greek writers, only tell us, that, in his fecond year, Haumar began to build a temple at Jerusalem; that in his third happened an eclipse of the fun, and violent storms in his fixth; which were looked upon as the forerunners of more violent concussions: for the same year the Saracens, not satisfied with Syria, Mesopotamia, Egyst, Phanicia, Arabia, and Palestine, broke, like a torrent, into Africa; and having defeated the imperial prefect, by name Gregory, made d themselves masters of that spacious and fruitful country. The following year 648. Mahias or Mahuvias, one of their captains, with a great fleet, fell upon the island of

And likewife the islands of Cyprus, Aradus, and Rhodes.

Cyprus; which he easily reduced, and laid in ashes the city of Constantia. From Cyprus he failed to the island of Aradus, which he took, together with the city; and from thence steering his course to Rhodes, made himself master of that island, destroying the famous colosius of the Sun, one thousand three hundred and fixty years after it had been fet up by Laches or Chares. It had been overturned fixty-fix years after Rhodians, pretending the prohibition of an oracle, had never attempted to erect it anew; yet looking upon the brass as in a manner sacred, they had never presumed to apply it to any other use; but Mahuvias caused it to be broken in pieces, and sold it to a Jewish merchant of Emesa, who, with the metal, loaded nine hundred camels.

it was erected, by a violent earthquake, which shook the whole island; and the

Armenia laid While Mahuvias was thus employed in the island of Rhodes, his countrymen, breaking into Armenia, laid waste that country far and wide, the emperor in the mean time continuing idle at Constantinople, or busying himself only in matters of religion, and promoting, as his grandfather had done, the doctrine of the Monothelizes, which he had imbibed from his infancy. His supine negligence, and unaccountable indolence, encouraged Mahuvias to make an attempt upon Constantinople itself. With this view he fitted out a strong fleet at Tripolis in Phanicia, and would, in all likelihood, have succeeded, had he not been prevented by two brothers, both christians, f and the fons of a Grecian trumpeter, who having found means to break open the public prison, crouded with christian captives, with their affistance killed the ameras, as the Saracens called him, or the governor of the place, fet fire to the fleet, destroyed

all the naval preparations, and then escaped, in a ship provided for that purpose, into the Roman dominions. Mahuvias, having with incredible expedition fitted out another fleet, failed to Phanice in Lycia, where he engaged and defeated the imperial navy, commanded by Constans in person, who with much-ado escaped in disguise to Constantinople 7, whence, to retrieve his reputation, he marched the following year against the Sclavi or Sclavonians, who had seized on that country, which to this 7 Theorem ad ann. Herael. 31. 2 Idem ad ann. Const. 15-13.

The emperor's fleet defeated.

d

en

ш

g

f

d

ŧά

١.

S.

of

m

nd

ij.

ď

ì

C

it

old

els.

ak-

ean

т,

ch

0-th

i-

ne

d

c,

JU(

e

s, f ed e

de d

ch c

a day is called from them Sclavonia. The emperor defeated them in feveral encounters; but not being able to drive them quite out, he returned to Constantino; le, where he found embaffadors from the Saracens, now divided among themselves, come to solicit a peace; which the indolent and unwarlike prince readily granted them, yielding to A peace with them the many provinces they had feized, upon their paying to him and his fuccef- the Saracens. fors, by way of tribute, a thousand nummi a year, with a horse and a slave. The following year 659. the emperor, looking with a jealous eye upon his brother Theodojius, who, on account of his virtue and integrity, was the darling of the people, caused him to be ordained deacon, and received the holy cup at his hands; but his fears not being yet quite appeased, he ordered him soon after to be murdered; which The emperor b he had no fooner done, than he was feized with dread and terror, imagining that he murders his faw his brother constantly standing before him, with a cup of blood in his hand, commanding him to quench his inhuman thirst. Haunted and terrified with this imagination, and the remorfe of his conscience, he lest Constantinople, where the murder had been committed, and repaired to Sicily, resolving to transfer the seat of the empire to Syracuse; but the inhabitants of Constantinople, apprised of his design, kept in that metropolis his wise and children. From this time forward he wandered, like a fecond Cain, from place to place; but his guilt pursuing him whithersoever he went, he became an object of compassion even to his most inveterate enemies. In the mean time Mahuvias, who had caused his competitor Hali to be murdered, and now c reigned alone, without any regard to the late treaty, sent his son Izod to lay waste the Roman territories, who advancing as far as Chalcedon, and having made himself master The Saracens of Amorium, a strong city of Phrygia, left a garison in the place, and returned with man territories an immense booty to his father. Amorium however was soon after surprised, and retaken by Andreas, one of the emperor's officers, who put all the Saracens he found in the place to the sword. During the emperor's stay in Sicily, a war broke out between the Franks and Lombards; which he looking upon as a favourable opportunity of driving the latter out of Italy, fitted out a mighty fleet, and landing at The emperor's Tarentum, marched directly to lay siege to Beneventum, taking Luceria, and several unsuccessful exother cities belonging to the Lombards, in his way. But Grimoald, duke of Bene-pedition against the Lombards. d ventum, marching, after a fignal victory over the Franks, to the relief of the place, the emperor, raising the siege in great haste, retired to Naples. Not long after, a body of twenty thousand Romans was almost intirely cut off, with Saburrus their general, by Romoald, the fon of Grimoald 2. After this defeat, the emperor, laying aside all thoughts of dispossessing the Lombards of that part of Italy which they held, took a progress to Rome, which he entered in great pomp, being met six miles from the city by Vitalianus, bishop of the place, and his clergy. After he had continued twelve days in Rome, and caused the most remarkable rarities he found there to be removed to Constantinople, he returned to Naples, and from thence to Syracuse, where he resided for the space of five years, oppressing his people with most enormous exactions, and His avarice. e even plundering the churches of their rich ornaments, and facred vessels. Having thus rendered himself both edious and contemptible to all his subjects, one Andrew, the fon of Troilus, resolved to rid the world of so great a plague; and accordingly dispatched him in the bath of Daphne at Syracuse, by repeated blows on the head with He is murdered the vessel that was made use of to pour hot water upon him. Thus perished Conflans II. in the twenty-seventh year of his reign, and 668. of the christian æra. Upon his death, the people of Syracuse proclaimed one Mezizius, by birth an Armenian, who had no other qualifications to recommend him to their favour but the comeliness of his person. The news of his promotion no sooner reached Constantinople, than Constantine, the son of the deceased emperor, having, with the utmost expedition, f equipped a fleet, sailed to Sicily; and having deseated, taken, and put to death the He must have His son Conuturper, caused himself to be acknowledged emperor in his room 2. continued some time in the west, settling the provinces that were still subject to the stantine Pogoempire there; for we are told by Zonaras, that he was, by the people of Constanti-natus made nople, furnamed Pogonatus, because, at his departure from thence, only a little down appeared on his chin; whereas he returned with a beard. The people of Constantinople received him, on his return from Sicily, with loud acclamations; but he had not not been long in the city, when some, missed by a strange notion, that as there were three persons in the trinity, so there ought to be three emperors on the throne, pressed him to take his two brothers, Tiberius and Heraclius, for his partners in the empire.

PAUL. DIAC. l. iv. c. 6. THEOPH. annal. ad ann. Conft. 27. PAUL. DIAC. l. v. prope fin.

Vol. VI. Nº 7.

They be lege Conflantinople;

enterprize. feated.

empire.

break into Thrace.

menical coun-

Constantine

Justinian II.

This alarmed the young emperor, who, having got the broachers of this new doctrine into his power, put them to death, and caused the noses of his two brothers to be cut off, that deformity rendering them incapable of the empire b. While these things passed at Constantinople, the Saracens, entering Africa, where the people had insulted vinces ravaged some of their garisons, committed unheard-of barbarities, and having ravaged the by the Saracens country, returned with eighty thousand captives. The following year they made a descent upon Sicily, took and plundered the city of Syracuse, and over-ran the whole island, destroying every thing with fire and sword. They laid waste in like manner Cilicia; and having passed the winter at Smyrna, they entered Thrace in the month of April of the following year 672. and laid siege to Constantinople itself; but were received with fuch vigour and resolution by the emperor, who had already, with b indefatigable pains, reformed both the court and army, that they thought it adviseable to withdraw in the month of September to Cyzicus. However, the ensuing spring they renewed the fiege, continuing thus to attack the city in the fummer, and retire to Cyzicus in the winter, for the space of seven years, say the Greek writers, though from some of them it appears, that, in the fourth year of the siege, a peace was concluded between the Romans and Saracens, as we shall relate anon. In this long siege, the Saracens lost incredible numbers of men, and many ships consumed by seafire, as it was called, because it burnt under water, being the invention of one Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis in Egypt. The enemy at length, despairing of success, But drop that abandoned the enterprize; but as they were returning home, their fleet was shipwrecked c Their fleet ship-wize. Their fleet ship-wiz. Florus, Petronius, and Cyprianus, gained a fignal victory in Syria over Supbianus, their army de-who commanded there a numerous body of Saracens; but lost in the engagement thirty thousand of his men . These misfortunes encouraged the Mardaites, or Maronites, to seize on mount Libanus, where they fortified themselves; and being joined by multitudes of christian captives flocking to them from all parts, they reduced the whole country between mount Taurus and Jerusalem, made frequent incursions into Syria, and so harassed and terrified the Saracens, that Mahuvias, not thinking himfelf able to contend with them and the Romans at the same time, sent embaffadors to treat of a peace with Constantine; which was in the end concluded upon the follow-They conclude a ing terms: 1. That it should be inviolably observed by both nations for the space of peace with the thirty years. 2. That the Saracens should retain the provinces they had seized. 3. That they should pay yearly, by way of tribute, to the emperor and his successors three thousand pounds weight of gold, fifty slaves, and as many choice horses. This peace was thought, as affairs then stood, very advantageous and honourable to the empire d. The Bulgarians It was scarce concluded, when the Bulgarians, leaving their native seats on the banks of the Volga or Bulga, whence some think they took their name, advanced as far as the Danube, which they passed without opposition, to the number of one hundred thousand persons; and entering the territories of the empire, ravaged far and wide the countries through which they passed. The emperor sent a considerable army e against them; which being put to flight by the barbarians, he chose rather to conclude a peace, by promifing to pay them an annual penfion, than to purfue an expenfive and doubtful war. The emperor, being now diverted by no wars either foreign or domestic, laboured with indefatigable pains to establish in the church that peace and tranquillity which reigned in the state. In order to this, he assembled the sixth gene-The fixth acu- ral or occumenical council, which was opened at Constantinople on the twenty-second of November of the year 680. In this council, the doctrine of the Monothelites was condemned, and by that means tranquillity, in a great degree, restored to the church, the abettors of that doctrine not daring, under a prince who had so much at heart the purity of the faith, to raife disturbances, as they had done under the preceding empe-Constantine enjoyed the remaining part of his reign in that peace and quiet, which his piety, justice and moderation well deserved, the Saracens religiously observing the treaty between them and the empire, and the Lombards being, by their intefline broils, diverted from extending their conquests in Italy. In the beginning of the year 685, he was feized with a lingering diffemper, of which he died in the month of September, after having reigned seventeen years, and some months of

HE was succeeded by his son Justinian, a youth but sixteen years old. With him Abdelmelech, the new prince of the Saracens, confirmed the peace made with the

b THEOPH. CEDREN. ad hunc ann. e Idem ibid. ad ann. Conft. 5. 4 Idem ad ann. Conft. 9. e Cedren. ad ann. Conft. 17. NICEPH. C. 3.

empire,

a empire, and at the same time proposed by his embassadors a new treaty, in virtue of which Justinian was to repress the Maronites, who, by their frequent excursions from mount Libanus, greatly harassed the Saracens; and Abdelmelech to pay him for this fervice a thousand nummi a day, a horse, and a slave. To this treaty the young and unwary prince readily agreed, and immediately dispatched Magistrianus, with a chosen body of troops, against the Maronites, whom he overcame, and put out of a condition of molefting the Saracens for a long time after. In the fecond year of his reign, he marched in person against the Bulgarians, who had been allowed to settle in Lower Masia, from them afterwards called Bulgaria, and, without any regard to the treaty concluded with them by his father, ravaged their country, and took feveral b of their strong-holds. But the Bulgarians, soon recovering from their consternation, drew together their forces; and falling upon the emperor, drove him out of their 1s put to flight country, and obliged him to abandon the places, and restore the captives he had by the Bulgataken. He was attended with better success against the Sclavi or Sclavonians, whom rians. he defeated in several battles; which encouraged him to break the treaty he had lately concluded with the Saracens, tho' Abdelmelech had faithfully performed every thing required of him by that agreement, and did all that lay in his power to prevent a rupture. At length, finding the emperor obstinately bent upon a war, he raised a Makes war uppowerful army, and gave the command of it to one of his generals named Mobammed; on the Saracens who, causing the articles of the late treaty to be carried before his men on the point of a spear, met the emperor in the neighbourhood of Sebastopolis; but in the engagec ment that enfued, was obliged to give ground, and retire to his camp, where he must have perished with hunger, or submitted to the conqueror, had he not in the mean time gained over the commander of the Sclavi in the emperor's fervice; whose unexpected desertion, with twenty thousand of his men, caused such a consternation in the Roman army, that they immediately betook themselves to a precipitous flight, He is defeated being pursued with great slaughter by the enemy. The emperor with much-ado by them. reached Leucate, where, transported with rage, he caused the Sclavi or Sclavini who had continued with him, to the number of ten thousand, to be cut in pieces, with their wives and children, and their bodies to be thrown into the sea. From Leucate he returned to Constantinople, where, without betraying the least concern for his late disd grace, or attempting to restrain the victorious Saracens, by whom the abandoned provinces were harasted in a most cruel manner, and Armenia intirely reduced, he was wholly taken up in embellishing his metropolis with new buildings. Among the rest he erected a magnificent banquetting-house, from him called Justinianeum, and a theatre near the palace, causing a church, dedicated to the virgin Mary, to be pulled down, to make room for it. This unchristian and unpopular action gained He renders him the ill-will of the people, whose aversion to him was heightened by the tyran- himself odious nical, arbitrary and cruel conduct of his two chief ministers Stephen and Theodotus. to the people. The former, by nation a Persian, caused several persons of distinction to be put to The cruelty of death, upon suspicions altogether groundless; and in the end came to such a pitch of his ministers. e arrogance, as to threaten in a most disrespectful manner Anastasia Augusta, the emperor's mother. Theodotus was by profession a monk; but being by the emperor taken out of his cell, and intrusted with great power, he exceeded in cruelty Stephen himfelf, cauting, under various pretences, such of the nobility as feemed to despise him, to be put to no less cruel than ignominious deaths. The emperor, dreading the dangerous effects of the hatred, which the people had on feveral occasions shewn to him, and his two favourite ministers, resolved to be before-hand with them; and accord-He orders ageingly ordered Stephen the eunuch, and Rufus, one of his generals, to fall upon the neral massacre. inhabitants of Constantinople in the night-time, and massacre them in their houses, beginning with the patriarch Callinicus. But this bloody and inhuman massacre was f happily prevented in the following manner: Leontius, a patrician, and formerly commander of the forces in the east, after he had been by the jealous emperor kept three years in prison, was at this time set at liberty, and appointed governor of Greece, with orders to embarque immediately for his government; but while he was waiting for a favourable wind, several of his friends came to visit him, and among the rest two monks, Gregory the superior of a monastery, and Paul, who, as they were skilled in astronomy, says Cedrenus, had foretold him, while he lay in prison, expecting every moment his last doom, that he should attain to the empire before his death. These, upon his expostulating with them for having deceived him with vain prog miles, encouraged him to lay hold of the present opportunity to make good their prediction;

Justinian de-

Leontius

The Saracens masters of Africa.

Leontius deposed, and Aptimor made emperor.

200,000 Saracens cut in pieces.

Armenia betrayed to the Saracens,

Who are defeated in Cilicia. prediction; which, they said, he might easily do, the emperor being universally a abhorred, both by the nobility and people, and ready to receive him as their deliverer. Leontius hearkened to them; and taking with him his own soldiers, that is, those who had been appointed to attend him into Greece, he broke open the prison, and being joined by many others, who had been long detained there, he led them to the forum, inviting the people, as he went, to meet him in the church of St. Sophia; which being soon crowded, the patriarch appearing, cried aloud to the assembled multitude, This is the day which the Lord hath made. The people, thus animated by the patriarch, proclaimed Leontius emperor, and hastening to the palace, seized on Justinian, carried him to the circus, and there, after many other indignities, cut off his nose, and with one voice banished him to Chersona. At the same time Theodotus b and Stephen were dragged to the forum, where they were burnt alive. This revolution happened in the tenth year of Justinian's reign, and 694. of the christian æra.

The first year of Leontius's reign was not disturbed by any foreign wars, or domestic troubles. In the second Sergius, who commanded the Roman troops in Lazica, betrayed that province to the Saracens, who the following year invaded Africa, made themselves masters of Carthage, and over-ran the whole country; but they were driven out by John the patrician, a man of great valour, and experience in war, whom the emperor had fent against them. The Saracens, to repair the great losses they had fustained, equipped another fleet, and returning to Africa, obliged John to fly to the fea-coast, where he embarqued with the troops under his command for Constantinople. c But the fleet having touched at Crete, some of the chief officers, apprehending the emperor would call them to an account for thus abandoning Africa to the enemy, prevailed upon the foldiers to revolt, and proclaim Apfimar, one of Leontius's generals, emperor. Apsimar, or, as he was afterwards called, Tiberius, readily accepted the imperial dignity; and failing without loss of time to Constantinople, surprised the city, took Leontius prisoner, and having caused his nose to be cut off, confined him to a monastery in Dalmatia, after he had reigned scarce three years 8. Tiberius, thus raised to the empire, sent his brother Heraclius into Cappadocia, to watch the motions of the Saracens. He, taking advantage of some divisions that reigned among them, penetrated into Syria as far as Samosata, wasting all before him, and returned to Cap- d padocia loaded with booty, after having put to the sword, as we are told, no fewer than two hundred thousand of the enemy h. Notwithstanding this loss, the Saracens broke into the Roman territories the following year, and laid siege to Antaradus in Syria; but not being able to master that place, they sat down before Mopsuestia in Cilicia, which they reduced and fortified. In the fourth year of Tiberius's reign, Boanes, surnamed Hepsadæmon, betrayed Armenia to the Saracens. The same year Tiberius banished Philippicus a patrician, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his promotion, into Cephalenia, for relating a dream, which Tiberius interpreted as portending the empire to him. The following year, the nobility of Armenia, taking arms against their new masters, drove them out with great slaughter, and sent to Tiberius, demand- e ing his affistance. But in the mean time Mohammed, entering Armenia with a mighty army, recovered the country; and having got the authors of the revolt into his power, burnt them alive. Encouraged with this fuccess, they invaded Cilicia once more, under the conduct of Azar; but were, to the number of ten thousand, either cut in pieces by Heraclius, or taken prisoners, and fent in chains to Constantinople i. In the mean time Justinian, the deposed emperor, who had been confined to a monaftery at Chersona, having betrayed a great desire of recovering his former dignity, the inhabitants of the place, dreading the indignation of Tiberius, and the evils attending a civil war, resolved to prevent them, by either killing Justinian, or sending him in chains to Constantinople; but he, suspecting their design, sled privately to the cha- f gan or king of the Chazari, who received him in a manner fuitable to his rank, and gave him his fifter Theodora in marriage. But being foon after gained by the rich prefents and large promifes of Tiberius, he undertook either to deliver up to him the unfortunate prince alive, or to fend him his head. The defign was revealed by one of the king's domestics to Theodora, and by her to her husband, who thereupon fled to Trebelis king of the Bulgarians, by whom he was received with great demonstrations of kindness. We are told, that being overtaken, on his slight from the country

f Theoph. Cedren. ann. Just. 10. Niceph. c. 4.
c. 5. h Theoph. Cedren. ad ann. Tib. Aps. 2. ldcm ad ann. Tib. Aps. 3, 4, 5.

a of the Chazari, by a violent storm near the streights of Danaprium, Myaces, one of his domestics, apprehending the vessel to be in imminent danger, and therefore conjuring him to make a vow, that he would forgive his enemies, if it ever pleafed Heaven to restore him to his throne, he answered sternly, Let God drown me this moment, if I spare any of them k. Trebelis not only entertained the sugitive prince Trebelis, king with extraordinary magnificence, but having raifed a powerful army, marched with of the Buigahim strait to Constantinople, and laid siege to that metropolis, the inhabitants, who rans, spenies the cause of looked upon their city as impregnable, rallying, and reviling both princes from the Justinian, walls; but the third day of the siege, some Romans having got into the city through an aqueduct, opened the gates to the rest; which Tiberius no sooner knew, than he b fled with his treasures to Apollonias, leaving Justinian once more master of the imperial 1820 is reflered, city, and the empire. Being thus restored to his former dignity, he dismissed Trebelis, loaded with rich presents, and bestowed upon him part of the Roman dominions, called afterwards Zagoria. Having, after a diligent fearch, got into his power Tiberius, Leontius, by whom he had been driven out, and Heraclius the brother of Tiberius, he led the two former in triumph through the city, and carrying them to the circus, beheld the shews sitting on the imperial throne, with his feet upon their necks, the inconstant multitude repeating in the mean time that verse of the pfalmist, Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder, &c. After this insulting pageantry, he caused their heads, and that of Heraclius, to be cut off. As for Callinicus the Leontius and e patriarch, he ordered his eyes to be put out, and then banished him to Rome, that he Tiberius tut might have the cruel mortification of depending for his subsistence upon the bishop of to death. that city, whose authority he had always opposed to the utmost of his power. The emperor, having now got rid of those whom he most dreaded, began to rage with implacable fury against all who had adhered to them, putting to death incredible multitudes of citizens and foldiers, and dispeopling, in the heat of his revenge, whole provinces at once. In the third year of his restoration, unmindful of the obligations which he owed to Trebelis king of the Bulgarians, he broke the alliance concluded with that prince, and invaded Thrace, at the head of a mighty army, with a design to recover the country he had yielded to him. But he was attended with no better d fuccess than his ingratitude deserved, his army being utterly deseated, and he himself Justinian de-obliged to make his escape in a light vessel to Constantinos le. The following year he Buigarians. equipped a mighty fleet, not with a defign to oppose the Bulgarians, who ravaged the provinces of the empire without controul, but to be revenged on the inhabitants of Chersona, and the Bosporans, who had resolved to dispatch him, or deliver him up to Tiberius, while he lived in exile among them. On board this fleet was embarqued a numerous army, with express orders to put all the inhabitants of those parts to the His cruelty. fword, without distinction of sex or age, of guilty or innocent. These cruel orders were executed with the utmost barbarity; multitudes of that unhappy people were put to the fword; fome were by the cruel foldiery roasted alive, others cast into the sea, e &c. The children however were spared; which the inhuman emperor no sooner understood, than, transported with rage, he dispatched fresh orders to his officers, commanding them not to leave a child alive in the place. They were accordingly all massacred; but some of the leading men among the Bossorans having made their escape, and taken refuge in the country of the Chazari, with the assistance of that neighbouring nation, they defeated in feveral encounters the emperor's forces; and renouncing their allegiance to him, proclaimed Philippicus, the son of Bardanes, Philippicus who had been banished by Tiberius to Cephalenia, as we have related above, but proclaimed em-The troops that were fent against them by feror. happened to be then at Chersona. Justinian, finding they could not reduce the city of Chersona, pursuant to his orders, f and dreading the implacable humour of the tyrant, resolved to consult their own fasety, by acknowledging Philippicus; which they did accordingly, joining those against whom they had been sent. Philippicus, thus proclaimed and supported by two powerful armies, marched strait to Constantinople, which he entered without opposition, the emperor being then at Sinope in Paphlagonia with a body of Thracians, against whom Philippicus dispatched Elias prince of the Bostorans; who having gained over the Thracians, took the emperor prisoner, and cutting off his head, fent it to Justinian killed Philippicus, by whose orders it was conveyed to Rome. Tiberius, the emperor's son by Theodora, took fanctuary in a church; but was dragged from the altar, which he

k NICEPH. C. 5.

1 THEOPH. CEDREN. ad ann. Tib. Apf. 7. NICEPH. ibid.

Vol. VI. Nº 7.

7 A

grasped,

grasped, and sain by Maurus a patrician, in the presence of Anastasia his grand- a mother m. Such was the deserved end of Justinian II. in the eighth year after his restoration, and 711. of the christian æra.

Philippicus.

break into Thrace.

Philippicus deposed.

Anastasius/wc-

The seamen mutiny, kill their admiral, Theodosius emperor.

Leo revolts

Philippicus had no fooner taken possession of the throne, than openly espousing the cause of the Monothelites, he summoned a council of bishops, who were all intected with that herefy, and confequently eafily prevailed upon to condemn and revoke all the acts of the fixth general council. The emperor was induced to fummon this council by a Monot belite monk, who had foretold him he should one day attain the empire, if Cedrenus is to be credited, and now promised him a long and happy reign, provided he abolished the fixth general council, and established the doctrine of the Monothelites. But while Philippicus was thus busying himself in matters relating to reli-The Bulgarians gion, the Bulgarians, breaking unexpectedly into Thrace, advanced to the very gates of Constantinople; and having laid waste the country, and put to the sword an incredible multitude of people, returned, without meeting with the least opposition, loaded At the same time the Saracens, invading the Roman territories, committed dreadful ravages, took the city of Medæa, and several other places, and returned likewise unmolested, carrying with them great numbers of captives. These calamities rendering Philippicus odious to the people, one Rufus, at the instigation of two patricians, viz. Theodorus, and Georgius commander of the troops in Thrace, entering the palace with a company of Thracians, while the emperor was reposing after dinner, put out his eyes, and withdrew undiscovered n. Nicephorus writes, that c Rufus, seizing the emperor, dragged him to the hippodrome, and there caused his eyes to be plucked out. Be that as it will, the next day, being Whitfunday, the people affembling in the great church, proclaimed Artemius, chief secretary to Pbilippicus, emperor; who was accordingly crowned by the patriarch P. Artemius, or, as he was afterwards called, Anastasius, was a man of great learning, and had been from his youth employed with uncommon fuccess in the management of public affairs. As he was a zealous catholic, he made it his chief study to heal the divisions of the church, without neglecting the affairs of the state; for, in the very beginning of his reign, he appointed Leo, an Isaurian, a person of great experience in war, commander in chief of all his forces, and fent him with a powerful army to the frontiers of Syria, d to protect Asia, Minor against the inroads of the Saracens. Being informed, that the Saracens designed to lay siege to Constantinople, he caused a great number of light ships to be built, the walls to be repaired, and having filled the public granaries, ordered such of the citizens as had not laid up provisions for three years, to depart the city. But news being brought in the mean time, that the enemy's fleet was failed to Phanicia, he ordered his to assemble from the different ports of the empire at Rhodes, appointing John, deacon of the great church, his admiral. The fleet met accordingly; but the admiral punishing with more severity than prudence some refractory seamen, the rest mutinied, and killed him; and being well apprised they could by no other means avoid the punishment due to their crime, but by openly revolting, c they declared Anastasius unworthy of the empire, and obliged one Theodosius, a person of a mean extraction, and then receiver of the revenue at Adramytium, to accept of the purple. Anastasius, upon the first notice of the revolt, fled to Nice in Bithynia, leaving a strong garifon in Constantinople; which city Theodosius immediately besieged by sea and land, and reduced, after having continued six months before it. He had no fooner entered the city, than he dispatched the magistrates and the patriarch to acquaint Anastasius with what had happened, who, upon promise of his life, renounced all claim to the empire, and taking the habit of a monk, delivered himself up to the new prince, by whom he was banished to Thessalonies, after he had enjoyed the title of emperor about two years q. But Leo, whom Anastasius had appointed commander f from Theodo- in chief of all his forces, refusing to acknowledge Theodosius, drew together all the forces in the east, with a design, as he gave out, to restore the deposed emperor; but being persuaded by Masalnias, prince of the Saracens, to assume the purple, and powerfully affisted by Artavasdes, an Armenian, a man of great interest in that country, he marched, at the head of a considerable army, to Nicomedia, where he met, deseated, and took prisoner the son of Theodosius, who had been sent against him. From Nicemedia he pursued his march to Constantinople, being acknowledged emperor in all the

ď

g.

40

C4

th

fai

in]

Дj

рb

D

Ú

ţ

m Theorn, ad ann. Just. 8. Niceph. с. 6. п Тнеори. ad a ldem ibid. ч ldem, с. 8. Тнеори. Серкен. ad ann. Anast. 2. <sup>п</sup> Тиєори. ad ann. Phil. 2. º NICEPH. C. 7.

```
a places through which he passed. Hereupon Theodofrus, finding it was in vain to contend with fo powerful a rival, dispatched to him Germanus the patriarch, and some of the chief men in the senate, offering to resign the purple, on condition his life was spared. To this Leo readily agreed; and Theodofius, divesting himself of Theodofius the purple, entered, with his fon, into orders, after having reigned one year. Thus abdicates.
   Theophanes and Cedrenus. But Nicephorus writes, that the officers of the army, finding Theodosius unequal to the high station to which he had been raised, persuaded him to abdicate, and chose Lee in his room'. Be that as it will, Lee was received with loud acclamations at Constantinople, and crowned on the twenty-fifth of March Leo crowned of the present year 716. by the patriarch Germanus, after he had bound himself by a b folemn oath to preferve, and, to the utmost of his power, defend the orthodox faith.
   He was a native of Isauria, of a mean extraction, and had served some time in the low station of a common soldier, from which he was raised by Justinian II. and admitted, on account of the tallness of his stature, and comeliness of his person, amongst the spatarii, that is, the emperor's guards. Anastasius appointed him commander in chief of all his forces, which post he held when he assumed the purple. He is diffinguished from the other emperors bearing the name of Leo by the surname of Iconomachus, which was given him on account of his combating the worship of images. In the first year of his reign, Masalnias, prince of the Saracens, at whose instigation he had assumed the purple, took by surprize the city of Pergamus; which pergamusta.
e is looked upon by the historians, as a punishment justly inflicted by Heaven upon the ken by the Sa-wicked and barbarous inhabitants, who, hearing the Saracens were preparing to invade racens, Asia, had ripped up the belly of a woman big with child, and boiling the infant in a kettle, had dipped their right hands in the water, being persuaded by a magician, that they would by that means become invincible, and defend their city against all the attempts of the enemy. In the second year of Leo's reign, Solyman, one of the generals of the Saracens, broke into Thrace; but he dying, Humar was appointed to command in his room, who lost most of his men by the severity of the winter. However, in the following spring he approached Constantinople, and invested it by land, who before while Supbiam and Izeth, arriving with two mighty fleets, the one from Egypt, and Constantinod the other from Africa, blocked it up by sea; but most of their ships being destroyed, ple; but are either by the artificial fire, of which we have spoken above, or by storms, they thought don the enterit adviseable to abandon the enterprize, and retire, after having lain before the prize. city thirteen months, or, as others will have it, two years. The calamities which the inhabitants suffered during the siege, can hardly be expressed; thirty thousand of them are faid to have perished with hunger, and the like number to have been swept off by the plague". Haumar, prince of the Saracens, highly provoked at the disappointment of his armies and fleets before Constantinople, began to rage with great fury They perfectle against the christians in his dominions, forbidding them at first the exercise of their the christians.
  religion, and foon after commanding them, on pain of death, to renounce it, and e embrace the abominable fect of Mobammed. Many, to avoid death, made an outward profession of the religion, if we may so call it, of their insulting masters, while fome few, notwithflanding the ignorance and depravity of that age, maintained, with unshaken constancy, the true religion, at the expense of their lives w. The same year Sergius, governor of Sicily, revolting, declared one Basilius, the son of Onoma-Sergius revolts gulus, emperor, changing his name into that of Tiberius; but Paul, an officer of the in Sicily; but houshold, who was sent against the usurper, having got him into his power, and is cut off.
  caused his head to be struck off, restored the island to its former tranquillity. Sergius, the chief author of the revolt, took refuge amongst the Lombards in Italy x. The fame year the empress Maria was, to the unspeakable joy of the emperor, and the I inhabitants of Constantinople, delivered of a son, named Constantine, and commonly Constantine nicknamed Copronymus, from his having defiled the facred font at his baptism. Thea. Copronymus phanes, the true author of the history intituled miscella, which is fally ascribed to Paulus born.
  Diaconus, tells us, that Germanus the patriarch foretold from that accident, that the infant would one day prove a great plague to the church. The joy for the birth of the young prince was fomewhat allayed by the approach of a numerous army of Bulgarians, headed by the late emperor Anastasius, who, weary of a private life, had Anastasius at-prevailed upon those barbarians to acknowledge him for emperor, and support his tempts to re-PH. CEDREN. ad ann. Leon. 1. S. Niceph. c. 9. Idem fbid.

"CEDREN. ann. Leon. 2. Beda de fex ætat. Paul. Diacon. l. vi. c. 47.

"Niceph. c. 10. Theoph. Cedren. fbid. "Hift. maifeel.
                                                              t Idem ibid. Theoph. Cedren. ubi pire.
     THEOPH. CEDREN. ad ann. Leon. 1.
                                                                                 w Theoph. ad
```

7 Hift. mifcel. p. 74.

claim

Conflantine crowned empe-

Leo's edict against images.

A tumult at Constantinople.

The people revolt in Italy.

Gregory II. opposes the emperor's edict.

Leo attembts upon his life.

They laid siege to Constantinople, hoping, by means of the 2 claim to the crown. partizans of Anastasius, among whom were several persons of great distinction, to make themselves soon masters of the city; but meeting, contrary to their expectation, with a vigorous opposition, they seized on the unfortunate Anastasius, and delivered him up to the emperor, who put him to death, with all his accomplices, among whom was the bishop of Thessalonica 2. Leo, having happily weathered this storm, caused his fon Constantine to be solemnly crowned emperor, in order to secure the empire to The ceremony, was performed by the patriarch Germanus, on Easterday in 720. the fifth of Leo's reign 2. In the mean time the Saracens, under the conduct of their new prince Ized, who had succeeded Haumar, having equipped a mighty fleet, ravaged the coasts of Italy and Sicily; and landing in Sardinia, raged there with b unspeakable fury, destroying all with fire and sword; but being soon after diverted from molesting the empire by the intestine divisions that arose amongst them, another Ized, surnamed Mualabis, having set up for himself in Persia, the emperor was more at leifure to reform several abuses, that had crept into the court and state under the former emperors. In the tenth year of his reign, and 725. of the christian æra, he published the famous edict, commanding all images to be removed out of the churches, and forbidding any kind of worship to be paid to them. This edict was, with great vigour, opposed in the east by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, and Johannes Damascenus; but Leo, having deposed Germanus, and raised Anastasius to the see of Constantinople in his room, caused his edict to be put in execution at Constantinople, and c the images to be pulled down and destroyed by his officers throughout the city, without sparing the statue of our Saviour, which had been placed above the gate of the imperial palace by Constantine the Great. The people, struck with horror in seeing the images of our Saviour and his faints thus infulted, and either torn in pieces, or burnt by the emperor's officers, affembled in a tumultuous manner, and having first vented their rage upon Leo's statues and images, slew to the palace; but being repulsed and pursued with great slaughter by the emperor's guards, they were forced to disperse, and suffer the edict to take place. But in the west, especially in Italy, it was had in such abhorrence, that the people openly revolted; which gave Luitprand, king of the Lombards, an opportunity of seizing on Ravenna, and several other cities d of the exarchate. He was however foon after driven out by the Venetians, who, at that time, made no small figure in Italy. Gregory II. then pope, or bishop of Rome, jealous of the growing power of the Lombards, had, by a letter to Ursus duke of Venice, prevailed upon him to espouse the interest of the emperor, and lead his forces against Ravenna; which city he surprised, before Luitprand, who was then at Pavia, had the least notice or suspicion of his design. Gregory had, from the very beginning, opposed with great warmth the emperor's edict forbidding the worshipping of images; and now, prefuming upon the eminent fervice he had rendered the empire, he wrote a long letter to Leo, earnestly intreating him to revoke it. But the emperor, well apprised, that Gregory had been prompted by his own interest, and not by that of e the empire, to prevent the Lombards from making new conquests in Italy, was exasperated to such a degree against him, for continuing still to oppose his edict, that he fent private orders to his officers in Italy, especially to Paul exarch of Ravenna, and to Mauritius, governor, or, as he was then styled, duke of Rome, injoining them to get Gregory, by some means or other, into their power, and send him dead or alive to Constantinople. But the people of Rome, who had a great veneration for their bishop, discovering the plot, guarded him so carefully, that the emperor's officers could never find an opportunity of putting their orders in execution. Three affaffins undertook to murder him; but two of them were apprehended, and put to death, which the third escaped, by taking fanctuary in a monastery, and there embracing a f religious life. Gregory, finding himself thus supported by the people of Rome, solemnly The exarch ex- excommunicated the exarch, for publishing, and attempting to put in execution, the communicated emperor's edict, writing at the same time letters to the Venetians, to king Luitprand, to the Lombard dukes, and to all the cities of the empire, exhorting them to continue stedsast in the catholic saith, and oppose, with all their might, the execution of the impious, as he styled it, and heretical edict. These letters made such an impression upon the minds of the people, that the inhabitants of Italy, tho' of different interests, and often at war with each other, viz. the people of Rome, the Venetians, and the

. Lombards, entering into an alliance, refolved to act in concert, and prevent, to the The people of utmost of their power, the execution of the imperial edict. The people of Rome, and Italy revolt. those of the Pentapolis, now Marca d'Ancona, did not stop here; but pulling every-where down the emperor's statues, openly revolted, and refusing to acknowledge an iconoclast, that is, a breaker of images, for emperor, they chose magistrates of their own; nay, they had some thoughts of electing a new emperor, and conducting him with a strong army to Constantinople: but this scheme was opposed by the pope as impracticable. In Ravenna the people rose in defence of the images against Paul the exarch; and having killed him, and all the iconoclasts in the city, submitted to Luitprand king Ravenna subof the Lombards, a cunning prince, who took care to improve to his advantage the mits to the Lombards. b general discontent that reigned among the subjects of the empire. In Naples the people took arms against Exhilaratus their duke, (for Naples was then governed by dukes sent from Constantinople) and murdered him, with his son Adrian, and one of The inhabithis chief officers, for pressing the inhabitants to receive the edict, and conform to the ants of Naples religion of their prince. However, as they hated the Lombards, with whom they had been almost constantly at war, they continued firm and constant in their obedience to Leo, and received Peter, who was appointed duke of Naples in the room of Exhilaratus. The people of Rome, finding the emperor inflexible in his design against the worship of images, and the life of the pope, whom he looked upon as the chief author of all the diffurbances, refolved at length to renounce their allegiance to Leo, and to conti- The Romans nue united under the pope as their head, binding themselves by a solemn oath to revolt. c defend him against all the attempts both of the emperor and the Lombards, whom they had but too much reason to mistrust b. Theophanes, Cedrenus, Zonaras, Nicephorus, and other Greek writers, tell us, that the Romans, withdrawing their obedience to Leo, chose pope Gregory for their prince, taking an oath of allegiance to And chuse the him. They add, that the pope accepted of the principality, forbidding the Romans pope for their to pay thenceforth tribute to the emperor; that he publicly excommunicated Leo as head. an heretic, absolved his subjects from their allegiance to him, and solemnly declared him fallen from the empire. Hence, fay they, had the temporal and independent The rife of the dominion of the pope over Rome its rife, which was afterwards inlarged by Pepin and temporal domi-Charles the Great, and extended to the exarchate of Ravenna, the Pentapolis, and nion of the pope. d feveral other cities of Italy. But it appears from Paulus Diaconus, Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Joannes Damascenus, who all flourished nearer those times, and in the places where the things they relate happened, nay, and from the letters of Gregory himself to Leo, that he acknowledged him for his lawful fovereign as long as he lived, as did his wife Gregory III. his fucceffor. The Latin writers take no notice of Gregory's excommunicating and deposing the emperor, or absolving his subjects from their oath of allegiance; but only tell us, that when Leo deposed the patriarch Germanus, and appointed Anastasius in his room, Gregory excommunicated the latter; and rebuking the emperor by letters, earnestly intreated him not to abuse the power with which he had been trusted, to introduce innovations in the church d. However, the authority e of the Greek historians has been preferred to that of the Latins, by all the protestant, and most of the Roman catholic writers; but with very different views. testants followed them, that they might thence take occasion to make a comparison between our Saviour and the pope. When the multitude, fay they, offered to make our Saviour king, he rejected their offers, saying, My kingdom is not of this world: when the Romans offered the principality to Gregory, he readily accepted it, and from the servant of servants became the lord and master. Our Saviour expresly commanded tribute to be paid to Cæsar: the pope would suffer no more tribute to be paid to Leo his lawful fovereign, &c. c. On the other hand, the Roman catholics, by flanding to what the Greeks write, think they can defend the pope from all usurpation, and f establish his temporal power and jurisdiction upon a better and more plausible foundation, viz. the unanimous confent of the people, conferring upon him freely, and without constraint, the principality f; not reflecting, that those who thus chose him for their prince, had revolted from their lawful fovereign; and consequently that Gregory, by accepting the principality, became guilty both of rebellion and uturpation. But from what we shall relate in the history of the Lombards in Italy, it will hist. Neap. l. v. p. 91. Vol. VI. No 7.

* Anast. Bibl. in Greg. II. Paul. Diac. l. vi. Sigon. ad ann. 725, 726. Epift. 1 & 2 Greg. ad Leon. Anast. Bibl. in Greg. II. Greg. II. in epift. 1. ad Leon. & Greg. III. epift. 2. ad Bonifac. d. Vide Anastas. ad ann. 658. e. Vide Spanh, contra Maimburg. in histor, imag. p. 52. f. Giannetas.

plainly

Confranting married to wrecked.

Irene.

Leo dies, and is succeeded by Constantine Copronymus

Artabazdus revolts;

Conffantine.

plainly appear, that the pope did not acquire the fovereignty of Rome at this time, but a many years after; nay, that his temporal dominion had not its rife in Rome, but in the exarchate of Ravenna, and the Pentapolis, which were taken by the celebrated Pepin from Astulphus king of the Lombards, and given to pope Stephen, whom some call the fecond, others the third, of that name. As for the fovereignty of Rome, the popes did not enjoy it, as we shall demonstrate in a more proper place, till the year 876. when it was yielded to the apostolic see, as it began then to be called, by Charles furnamed the Bald. But to return to Leo: He was wholly taken up, during the remaining part of his long reign, in suppressing the worship of images throughout his dominions, and raging with great cruelty against those, who resused to comply with his edict; while the Saracens, breaking into the eastern provinces, laid them waste b without controul, carrying yearly back with them an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. In the seventeenth year of his reign, and 732. of the chriftian æra, he married his fon Constantine to the daughter of the king of the Chazari, after the had been instructed in the principles of the christian religion, and received at her baptism the name of Irene, a word signifying in the Greek tongue peace. The fame year the emperor caused a mighty fleet to be equipped, with a design to chastize and bring back to their duty the Romans, and other people of Italy, who had revolted Leo's fleet ship- on occasion of the edict against images; but the fleet being shipwrecked in the Adriatic fea, Leo could by no other means be revenged on the pope, who continued to oppose the execution of his edict, than by caufing the revenues of the Roman fee in Calabria c and Sicily to be confiscated 8. In the last year of Leo's reign, a dreadful earthquake happened at Conflantinople, which overturned many churches, monasteries and private houses, burying great numbers of people under the ruins. Not long after Leo died, having reigned twenty-five years, two months, and twenty days, and was succeeded by his fon Constantine, who no fooner faw himself sole master of the empire, than he led an army against the Saracens, who had made an irruption into Asia. In his absence Artabazdus, who had married his fifter, gave out, that he was dead; and being thereupon acknowledged by the people, and proclaimed emperor, he caused the sons of Constantine to be secured; but as he was well apprised, that the report he had industriously spread of Constantine's death would be soon contradicted, he began to consult d with the patriarch Anastasius, by what other means he might keep the people steady in their allegiance to him. Anastasius had been a zealous iconoclast in the late reign; but to curry favour with Artabazdus, who had a great veneration for images, and to estrange the minds of the people from Constantine, he assembled them in the great church, and holding in his hand the wood of the holy cross, he took the following oath: By bim who died upon this wood, I swear, That Constantine one day addressed me with these words; I do not believe him to be the fon of God, who was born of Mary, and is called Christ, but a mere man; for Mary was delivered of him after the same manner, as Mary my mother was delivered of me. This deposition of the patriarch, whether true or false we cannot take upon us to determine, made such an impression on the minds of the multitude, that they immediately deposed Constantine with one consent, and, with repeated acclamations, faluted Artabazdus again emperor, who took Nicephorus his eldeft fon for his partner in the empire h. This gave rife to a civil war, the greatest, fays Cedrenus, perhaps not without fome exaggeration, that had happened fince the But is defeated, beginning of the world. But all we know of it is, that Artabazdus, and his for and Combanti- Nice; borus, being defeated by Constantine in several encounters, were in the end nople taken by befreged in Constantinople; which city held out, till the inhabitants were forced by famine to submit. Artabazdus and his two sons were taken, and delivered up to the emperor, who caused their eyes to be pulled out, gave the city up to be plundered by his foldiers, and either banished, maimed, or put to death, all those who had been any-ways f concerned in the revolt. Anastasius the patriarch was, by the emperor's orders, publicly beaten with rods, and then carried in an ignominious manner through the most frequented streets of the city on an ass, with his face to the tail. However, the time-ferving prelate was continued in his fee, because the emperor could not find a worse, says Theophanes, to prefer to it in his room i. Constantine, having thus got rid of his enemies at home, refolved to march once more against the Saracens, who were at war among themselves. Accordingly, having raised a powerful army, he entered Syria; and having overthrown the enemy in feveral encounters, made himself master

a of Germanicia, and some other strong-holds, which had been long in their hands. Constantine The Saracens, notwithstanding their dom: this quarrels, to divert the emperor from recovers several pursuing his conquests in Syria, assembled a mighty fleet, which steered its course to the Stracens. the island of Cyprus, where it was to be joined by other ships of war, and a great number of transports with land-forces on board. But the Roman sleet coming unex- Destroys their pectedly upon them, while they were riding at anchor in one of the ports of that island, feet. destroyed the whole navy, except three ships, which they suffered to escape with the news of fo great a calamity k. However, the emperor was diverted from pursuing the advantages that might have thence accrued to the empire, by the frequent earthquakes Dreailful that happened about this time, and were by far the most destructive that had been earthquakes. known in any age. In Syria and Palestine several cities were swallowed up, others intirely ruined, and some, if we may give credit to Nicephorus, removed, without any considerable damage, six miles and upwards from their former seats. At the same time happened an extraordinary darkness, which lasted from the fourth of August to the first of October, there being little or no distinction, during that time, between day and night1. This calamity was followed by another still more terrible, viz. a plague, which breaking out in Calabria, foon spread all over Sicily, Greece, the Aviolent islands in the Ægean sea, and at length reached Constantinople, where it raged for Plugue. three years together with fuch fury, that the living were scarce sufficient to bury the dead m. The plague no fooner ceafed, than Constantine, having caused his fon Leo, c then scarce a year old, to be proclaimed emperor, marched with what forces he could draw together into Armenia; and taking advantage of the divisions that still reigned among the Saracens, made himself master of Miletene, Theodosiopolis, and several other places. But he was diverted from pursuing his conquests in the east, by a sudden irruption of the Bulgarians, who, provoked at the emperor's causing some forts to be built on the frontiers of Thrace, broke into that province, and advancing as far as the long wall, laid waste the whole country. Constantine, having recalled his forces out of the east, marched against them in person; but being surprised by the enemy in a Constantine narrow paffage called Beragaba, his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to fave defeated by the himself by flight to Constantinople a. Soon after his return to that metropolis, he Bulgarians. d renewed the edict published by his father against images, forbidding at the same time any worship to be paid to the faints, or their relies, and commanding their images to be removed out of the churches, and publicly burnt. Such of the bithops as opposed the execution of this edict, were driven from their fees; and the monks, who preached against either, sent into banishment, or sentenced to death. At the same time an He persecutes edict was published in Constantinofle, and in all the cities of the empire, forbidding, the worthippers under the severest penalties, any one to embrace a monastic life; nay, at Constanti- of images. nople most of the religious houses were suppressed, and the monks not only obliged to marry, but to lead their brides publicly through the streets. But of this persecution the reader will find a more particular and distinct account in the ecclesiastic wrie ters, than it may be proper for us to give in this place o. The twenty-third year of A surprising Constantine's reign, and 763. of the christian æra, is remarkable for an extraordinary freji. frost, which began on the first of Oslober, and lasted till the latter end of February. At Constantinople both seas were frozen for an hundred miles from the shore, the ice being so thick as to bear the heaviest carriages, and covered with snow twenty cubits deep. When the frost broke, mountains of ice and frozen snow being driven by the winds through the streights, did a great deal of damage to the walls and the castle of Constantinople. The reader will find a surprising account of this frost in Theophanes, who, with thirty others, passed the streights upon one of these stoating islands, as he styles it P. The month following several prodigies appeared, or were thought to f appear, in the air. At the fame time a comet, which the Greeks called docites, because several proit resembled a beam, was seen for ten days in the east, whence it moved to the west, digies. and shone there for one-and-twenty days more, the people being struck with terror and amazement at the fight of these prodigies, and apprehending the last day to be at hand. Constantine in the mean time continued to perfecute with great severity those who appeared most zealous and forward in the worship of images, till he was diverted by a new irruption of the Bulgarians; who, breaking into the territories of the empire, committed every-where unheard-of cruelies. But Conftantine marching in person k N. :ры. in Conft. c. 13. 1 Idem ibid. Тигорн ad a Tнеорн. Cedren, ibid. п Тнеорн. ad ann. Conft. 19. 1 Idem ibid. Thtoph ad ann. Const. 6. Genres. ibid.

O Vide THEOPH. CEDREN. &c. ad ann.

against

Conit. 9-23.

P Vide THEOPH. ad ann. Conft. 23, 24.

Constantine defeats the Bulgarians.

Is deluded by their king.

He marches against them; but dies.

given to the pope.

Leo III.

ans, embraces the christian religion.

against them, cut them all off to a man, and then returned in triumph to Constan- a This the emperor styled his noble war, because not one christian perished in However, he owed the victory, it seems, to the treachery of some Bulgarians, whom Elerich their king discovered by the following device: He wrote to Constantine, pretending a defire to refign the crown, and lead a private life at Constantinople; for which purpose he begged the emperor to send him a safe conduct, and at the same time to acquaint him what friends he had among the Bulgarians, that he might repair with them to Constantinople, being unwilling to trust his person or design to others. Hereupon Constantine, not suspecting any deceit, sent him a list of the names of those who held intelligence with him; which the crafty prince no fooner received, than he caused them all to be put to death. The emperor, finding himself thus deluded, b resolved at all events to be revenged on the treacherous prince; and accordingly, having spent the winter in warlike preparations, he marched early in the spring against Elerich; but being seized on his march with a violent sever, he returned to Achadiopolis, whence he was conveyed to Selymbria, and from thence by fea to Strongylum, where he died on the fourteenth of September of the year 775. after he had reigned His character. twenty-four years, two months, and twenty-fix days g. As Constantine was a most zealous iconoclast, and did all that lay in his power to suppress the worship of the faints, their images and relics, Theophanes, Cedrenus, and the other writers of those times, paint him in the blackest colours, biassed in some measure, as we may reasonably suppose, by passion, interest and prejudice. However, standing even to the c accounts of his declared enemies, we must allow him to have been a prince of great temperance and moderation, well skilled in war, and in every respect equal to the high station to which he was raised. As for the great severity which he exerted against such as continued, in defiance of his decree, to worship images, it was, no doubt, owing to his zeal for the purity of the christian religion. After all, his severity against the worshippers of images did not exceed that of other emperors, highly commended by all christian writers, against the worshippers of idols. He defended the empire with equal bravery and success against the Saracens and Bulgarians; but was not in a condition to prevent the loss of the far greater part of his dominions in Italy, Astulphus, king of the Lombards, having reduced in 751. the city and exar- d chate of Ravenna, with the Pentapolis, which were foon after wrested from him by The exarchate Pepin king of France, and given to pope Stephen III. and hence sprung the temporal and Pentapolis dominion of the pope in Italy, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. The exarchate of Ravenna comprehended Ravenna, Bologna, Imola, Faenza, Forlimpopoli, Forli, Cesena, Bobbio, Ferrara, Commachio, Adria, Cervia, and Secchia; the Pentapolis, now Marca d'Ancona, comprised Rimini, Pesaro, Conca, Fano, Sinogaglia, Ancona, Osimo, Umana, Jesi, Fossombrone, Monteseltro, Urbino, Cagli, Luceoli, and Engubio, as appears from the grant of Lewis the Pious, confirming the donation of Pepin. The pope, thus enriched with large territories and dominions, would no longer be deemed a subject of the empire; but adding the sovereignty to the priesthood, and the sceptre to the keys, he created a new principality in Italy, on the ruins of the eastern empire, to which nothing now remained in that country, except the provinces of Calabria and Brutium, with the dukedoms of Naples, Amalfi, and Gaeta. But of the state of Italy at this time, and the great revolutions that happened there, we shall speak at length in the history of the Lombards. Constantine was succeeded in the empire by his son Leo, who, soon after his accesfron, took his fon Constantine, whom he had by Irene, for his partner in the empire, causing him to be solemnly crowned by the patriarch in the hippodrome, and bestowing at the same time the title of nobilissimi on his two brothers Anthemius and Eudoxius, Nicephorus, his fecond brother, having received that honour in his father's life-time h. Constantine was crowned in the latter end of April of the year 776, and the following month Nicephorus, Leo's brother, formed a conspiracy against the emperor and his son; but the plot being discovered, he was apprehended, and banished, with his accom-Elerich, king plices, to Cherfona. The fame year Elerich, king of the Bulgarians, who had done of the Bulgari- great mischief to the empire in the preceding reign, moved with an earnest desire of embracing the christian religion, refigned his crown, and repaired to Constantinop'e, where he was received by Leo with extraordinary demonstrations of kindness and esteem, and, after he had received the sacrament of baptism, created a patrician, and married to a relation of the empress Irene 1. In the third year of Leo's reign, some advantages were gained by the emperor's forces over the Saracens, who, by way of revenge, began to persecute the christians in a most cruel manner, causing all their churches in Syria to be pulled down, and levelled with the ground. The following Leo an enemy year Leo, who had hitherto diffembled his real fentiments concerning the worship of to images. images, openly declared against that superstitious, as he styled it, and idolatrous practice, reviving the edicts of his father and grandfather, and punishing, with the utmost severity, such as presumed to pay any kind of worship to the saints, the virgin Mary, or their images. Having found two images in the closet of the empress Irene, he never after admitted her to his bed, and caused those who had conveyed them to b her to be racked to death k. He did not long outlive them, being foon after seized with a violent fever, of which he died on the fixteenth of September 780. after having reigned five years and ten days. Theophanes writes, that Leo, having taken out of the great church a crown, which had been deposited there by the emperor Heraclius, and was enriched with carbuncles of an inestimable value, while he was one day wearing it, a carbuncle broke out on his head, and he was at the same time seized with a fever, which, by a just judgment, soon put an end to his life.

Leo was fucceeded by his fon Constantine, furnamed Porphyrogenitus, because he was Constantine born while his father was emperor; but as he was then only ten years old, his mother Porphyroge-Irene took upon her the administration. The young prince had scarce reigned forty nitus and days, when some of the senters and great officers consisted against him, with a linear c days, when some of the senators and great officers conspired against him, with a design to prefer his uncle Nicephorus to the imperial dignity; but Irene, having seasonably discovered the plot, caused the chief authors of it to be seized, and confined to discovered, and different islands, after they had been publicly beaten with rods. Awakened by this the conspirators danger, to prevent any future attempts of the like nature, she obliged all the late punished.

emperor's brothers to take holy orders, and administer the sacrament to the people on Christmas day, when she and her son restored to the church the crown of Heraclius, which Leo had feized. The same year 780, the Saracens, upon the news of Leo's death, broke into the eaftern provinces; but were driven back with great loss by the troops, which Irene had, upon the first notice of their motions, dispatched against d them m. The following year the empress, to procure a strong alliance by the marriage of her fon, sent embassadors into France, to propose a match between him and the daughter of Gbarles king of that country, who was afterwards furnamed the Great, and crowned emperor of the west. The proposal being well received by Charles, an eunuch, by name Elisaus, was left at his court to teach his daughter, named Roldrudris, the Greek tongue, and instruct her in the manners and customs of the Greeks n. The same year Helpidius governor of Sicily revolted; but was driven out of the island Helpidius reby Theodorus a patrician, whom Irene had fent with a powerful fleet against him, and volis. obliged to take refuge among the Saracens in Africa, who, acknowledging him for emperor in opposition to Constantine, fell with such sury upon the eastern provinces,

e that Irene was glad to avert the danger that threatened the empire, by obliging herself An annual to pay them an annual pension. The peace with the Saracens was scarce concluded, pension paid to when the Sclavi or Sclavini, breaking into Greece and Peloponnesus, seized on those the Stracens. countries. Against them the empress dispatched Saturacius a patrician, who overcame them in feveral battles; but fuffered them to continue in the contries they had feized, upon their promising to acknowledge the authority of the empire, by the payment of an annual tribute. In 788, the match between Constantine and Rotdrudris, which had been approved of by both parties, was broken off by Irene, who obliged her fon, much against his inclination, to marry a woman of a mean descent, named Mary, by birth an Armenian or Paphlagonian, and the niece or daughter of one Philaretus, f remarkable for his good nature and charitable disposition. Some ascribe the breaking off of the match with Rotdrudris to the ambition of Irene, apprehending, that Constantine would no longer be governed by her, but by his father-in law. Others tell us, that the empress was provoked against Charles, on account of his invading the dukedom of Benevento in Italy, which she had taken under her protection. Be that as it will, the conduct of the empress on that occasion disobliged her son to such a Missunderstanddegree, that he was never after truly reconciled to her. The young prince's courtiers, ing between apprised of the misunderstanding that passed between him and his mother, and desirous and Irene.

Idem ad ann. 2. * Idem ad ann. 5. CEDREN. in comp. annal. 1 THEOPH. ibid. m Idem ad ann. Const. 1. <sup>n</sup> Idem ad ann. 2. Idem ibid.

of getting the power into their own hands, took care to put him in mind, that he a was no longer a minor, but of an age to govern without the directions or counfels of a woman. Constantine hearkening to their infinuations, they resolved to seize on

Constantine deprives her of Bulgarians.

His cruelty.

legions broken and dispersed.

Saturacius, who governed with an absolute sway, as Irene's first minister, and after having banished him, to oblige the empress to resign the administration. But Saturacius, having notice of their design as soon as it was concerted, immediately imparted it to Irene, who caused all those who had been privy to it to be beaten with rods, and sent into banishment. As for her son, she chastized him with her own hands, and having confined him to his apartment, obliged the senate and soldiery to bind themselves by a solemn oath not to acknowledge Constantine, but her alone, for their foldiery to take fovereign, fo long as she lived. This oath was taken by all the forces quartered in b an oath of al- the different provinces, except some legions in Armenia, who resolutely declared they legiance to her. would adhere to Constantine, pursuant to the oath which they had already taken. The resolution of the Armenian legions encouraged the rest, notwithstanding their late oath, to proclaim Constantine anew, and demand with unanimous consent, that he might be forthwith vested with the whole power and authority. Irene, dreading the fury of the incensed multitude, immediately released her son from his confinement, who, being received with the repeated acclamations of the citizens and foldiery, took the reins of the empire into his own hands. Constantine, now at liberty to act without controul, recalled, and advanced to the first employments, such as had been banished on his account, sending into exile Saturacius, and his mother's other favour- c ites, after they had been publicly beaten with rods. As for Irene, he led her with great respect out of the palace, and attended her in person to a house built by herself, in which she had laid up an immense treasure P. The same year 790. a dreadful fire the administra- happened at Constantinople, which consumed great part of the city, with the patriarch's palace, in which were the comments of St. Chrysostom on the scripture, written with The following year the city was alarmed with a violent earthquake, his own hand. which obliged the inhabitants to quit their habitations, and retire to the open fields 4. The same year the emperor marched at the head of a considerable army against the Bulgarians, who had broken into the empire, and engaged them in Thrace; but with what success, is uncertain: for Cedrenus writes, that he gained a great victory; but d Zonaras will have the two armies to have parted upon equal terms. Upon his return to Constantinogle, the friends of Irene, what by extolling her wisdom, prudence and experience in public affairs, what by intreaties and arguments drawn from filial duty, Irene recalled. prevailed upon him to recal his mother to court, and restore her to her former authority; which however the Armenian legions could never be induced to acknowledge. Being thus reconciled to his mother, he marched anew against the Bulgarians, encouraged thereunto by some mathematicians, who promised him certain victory; but while, depending upon their vain predictions, he neglected the proper means to defeated by the obtain it, the Bulgarians, taking advantage of his ill-grounded security, gave him a dreadful overthrow. Besides a great number of common soldiers, the best officers of e the army, and the most considerable men in the empire, lost their lives in the battle, with Pancratius the mathematician, who, by his lying predictions, had given occafion to the overthrow . The emperor growing jealous and distrustful upon this defeat, some malicious and designing courtiers took care to improve that disposition, by infinuating to him, that the foldiers quartered in Constantinople had formed a defign of preferring Nicepborus to the empire; which heightened his jealoufy to such a degree, as he was conscious to himself of his evil conduct, that he not only caused his eyes to be put out, but those likewise of his other uncles, Nicetas, Anthimus, and Eudocimus, tho' nothing had been alledged against them. Alexius Mosoles, whom the Armenian legions had demanded for their leader, when they refused to consent to the restoration f of Irene, was, at her instigation, treated with the like severity; which so provoked those legions, that they refused to obey Camilianus, appointed by the emperor to command them. Hereupon Constantianus, Artaseras and Chrysochires were sent against them at the head of a strong party; but the mutinous legions having defeated them, and taken them prisoners, caused, by way of retaliation, their eyes to be pulled out; which fo provoked Constantine, that he marched against them in person; and having The Armenian defeated them in a pitched battle, put all their officers to death, caufing the com-

P Idem, & Cedren. ad ann. Conft. 10. Idem ad ann. 10, 11. I Idem ad ann. Conft. fol. 2. Idem ibid.

a mon foldiers to be led in chains to Constantinople, and conveyed from thence into different islands. The Armenian legions, who had always suspected, and been ready to oppose the ambitious designs of Irene, being thus broken and dispersed, she began to put the emperor, now destrute of that support, upon such measures, as, she thought, would render him odious to the people. As he had no great affection for the empress Mary, whom she had forced him to marry, contrary to his inclination, she advised him to divorce her, and marry Theodota or Theodotta, one of the maids of her cham-Constantine ber; who was accordingly crowned empress at Constantinople, where the nuptials were and marries folemnized with extraordinary pomp and magnificence for three days together. This Theodota. marriage occasioned great contests among the clergy concerning the lawfulness of it; b in which Irene artfully fided with those who opposed her son, encouraging them underhand to estrange the minds of the people from him. However, the success which attended his arms against the Saracens and Bulgarians, prevented the people from revolting, the privately stirred up by Irene, and her emissaries, to depose him. The Saracens had broken into Cilicia; but were driven back with great loss by the troops which Constantine scasonably dispatched against them. As for the Bulgarians, Cardames their king having fent embassadors to demand a tribute, threatening to come as far as the golden gate of Constantinople, and there take it by force, if it was refused him, Constantine replied, that fince he was stricken in years, he would save him the trouble of fo long a journey, by coming in person to wait upon him. Accordingly the marched against him at the head of a considerable army; upon the sight of which the barbarians, struck with a panic, fled in the utmost consternation. Upon his Heputs the return to Constantinople, he attended his mother from thence to the baths of Prusa in Bulgarians to Bithynia, where he had not been long, when news was brought him, that the empress flight. Theodota was delivered of a fon; at which he was so overjoyed, that he returned in great haste to Constantinople. Irene, taking advantage of his absence, gained over the chief officers of the army, who promised to depose Constantine, and commit the government to her alone. Pursuant to this promise, some of them, returning to Constantinople, seized on the unhappy prince, and carrying him to the palace of Porphyra, where he was born, pulled out his eyes in fuch a cruel and barbarous manner, He is murdered d that he died a few days after in the utmost agony, having reigned seven years alone, and ten with his mother p. Our historian observes, that five years before his uncles lost their eyes by his orders, on the same day of the same month, and in the same chamber v. Nicephorus and Christopher, her husband's brothers, hearing of the death of Constantine, took fanctuary in the great church; but were dragged from thence, and banished to Athens, where they are said to have been killed by the inhabitants, upon their attempting to raife disturbances in the empire. In them ended the family of Leo Isauricus; fo that no one was now left to dispute with Irene her title to the empire. She no fooner received intelligence of the death of her son, than leaving Prusa, the repaired to Constantinople; which she entered in a gilded chariot, drawn by four Irene proclaie horses, being attended by several patricians, who waited as her slaves on either side, medempress. while she threw money among the people, as was usual at the solemnity of a coronation x. In the mean time the Saracens, hearing the empire was governed by a woman, broke into the eastern provinces; and having defeated the forces Irene sent against them, entered Thrace, made their excursions to the very gates of Constantinople, destroying all with fire and sword, and returned home unmolested, carrying with them an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. In 798, the second of Irene's reign, her great favourite Saturacius, prompted by his boundless ambition, Saturacius conspired against her, with a design to deprive her of the crown, and to place it upon conspires his own head; but his design being discovered before it was ripe for execution, Irene, against her. f after upbraiding him with treachery and ingratitude, contented herself, in consideration of his former services, with forbidding any one to keep him company. The partiality which the empress shewed him, joined to a lively sense of his ingratitude to her, made such a deep impression upon his mind, that he died of grief soon after y. Irene, finding she could not depend even upon those whom she thought she had most she studies to reason to conside in, made it her chief study to gain the hearts of her people. With sain the afferthis view she remitted an annual tribute, which had been long paid by the citizens of the people. Constantinople, encouraged commerce, and, what most of all obliged the people,

t Idem ad ann. 3. u Idem ad ann. 7. Const. fol. w Idem ibid. u Idem ad ann. Iren. 1.
Idem ad ann. Iren. 2.

promoted,

A match proposed between Irene and Charles the Great.

Which is opposed by Actius.

up Nicepho-

Irene deposed, and Nicephorus created emperor.

promoted, to the utmost of her power, the worship of images, causing them to be set a up anew in the churches, and annulling the edicts enacted against them by former emperors z. In 802. Charles, surnamed the Great, who had been crowned emperor of the west by pope Leo III. on Christmas-day of the year 800. sent a solemn embassy to Constantinople, with proposals of a firm and lasting peace between him and Irene. To these embassadors were joined legates from the pope, who were received with extraordinary pomp at Constantinople. The embassadors of Charles, among their other instructions, were ordered to propose a match between him and Irene, that the two empires might be once more happily united in their persons. Irene readily entered into the negotiation; but Aetius an eunuch, who bore the chief sway at court, by daily starting new difficulties, put off from time to time the conclusion of the treaty. b As he was excluded from the empire himself, on account of his condition, he had been long labouring under-hand to prefer to it his brother, by name Leo, at that time governor of Thrace and Macedon; but being well apprised, that his design would be unavoidably defeated, should the treaty between Irene and so powerful and warlike a prince take place, he left no stone unturned to divert the empress from it, at least to get the conclusion of it suspended, till a favourable opportunity offered of putting in execution his private design. In the mean time the nobility, who hated Aetius, on revolt, and fet account of his haughty and imperious conduct, suspecting his design, and apprehending the empress, over whom he had gained a great ascendant, might by him in the end be prevailed upon to take Leo for her partner in the empire, resolved to set up & Nicephorus, a patrician of great wealth and interest among the people. Accordingly, having first disposed the minds of the citizens to a revolt, by giving out, that Irene not only designed to marry Charles, but to transfer the seat of the empire to the west, by which means the eastern empire would foon become a province to the new empire of the west, they assembled one night, and went in a large body to the palace, where they feized on Irene without opposition; and confining her under a strong guard to her chamber, conducted Nicephorus, their new emperor, with the usual folemnity to the great church, where he was crowned in a tumultuous manner, the populace, whom Irene had obliged by feveral acts of generofity and good nature, uttering reproaches and curfes against him. Nicephorus treated Irene with great civility and respect, till d he had, by his obliging behaviour, prevailed upon her to discover to him the place where her treasures lay concealed; which she had no sooner done, than, contrary to his folemn promife, he confined her to a monaftery, which she herself had built in an island; but soon after removed her from thence to the island of Lesbos, where she died of grief 2. She is greatly extolled, notwithstanding her unnatural conduct towards her fon, by all the writers of those times, no doubt, on account of her zeal for the worship of images, and the great pains she took utterly to suppress the herefy, as it was then called, of the iconoclasts. She built a great many monasteries, and hospitals for the relief of the poor and aged, and, by many other acts of piety, gained, if the writers of those times are to be credited, both the esteem and affections of her subjects. Her great attachment to the see of Rome, and the indefatigable pains she took to get the doctrine of the iconoclasts condemned in the second council of Nice, by her assembled for that purpose, have so far biassed some writers of that party, that they have not been ashamed to vindicate, even by texts of holy scripture, her unnatural and barbarous conduct towards her son, who perhaps well deserved such treatment, but not at the hands of his mother. Irene was thus deposed in 802, after having reigned ten years with her son, and five alone.

> # Idem ad ann. 4. • THEOPH. ad ann. Niceph. 1.

C H A P. XXXIV.

The Roman history, from the promotion of Nicephorus, to the death of Basilius II.

HE embassadors who had been sent, as we have related in the foregoing Nicephorus. chapter, by Charles the Great to propose a marriage between him and the chapter, by Charles the Great to propose a marriage between him and the empress Irene, in order to unite by that means once more the two empires, were, no doubt, greatly concerned at the unexpected revolution, which happened during their stay in Constantinople, and utterly disconcerted the ambitious views of their master. However, as they were injoined to conclude a firm and lasting peace with the eastern empire, they readily made their court to the new prince, who being well apprised of the advantages that might accrue to him from the friendship of Charles, received his embassadors in a very obliging manner, and the year following concluded a treaty with him, in virtue of which Charles was acknowledged emperor of Concludes a b the west, and all Italy to the rivers Vulturnus and Ausidus yielded to him. Nicephorus, treaty with in the third year of his reign, caused Nicetas Triphyllius, to whom he was chiefly in-Gharles the debted for his promotion, to be taken off with poison, for no other crime but because he was beloved by the army. He gave several other instances of a most cruel, suspicious and covetous temper, which, as they rendered him odious to the people, encouraged Bardanes, governor of one of the eastern provinces, to revolt, and assume the Bardanes title of emperor. Michael and Leo, two officers of great reputation in the army, revolts; joined him at first; but soon after finding him unequal to so great a charge, they abandoned him, and went over to Nicephorus, who raised them to the first posts in the army. Bardanes, thus forfaken by his friends, fent a submissive message to Nice- But submission c phorus, and, upon his promifing to pardon him, retired to a monastery, and there embraced a religious life. The emperor, pretending to be intirely reconciled to him, invited him in a friendly manner to Constantinople; but on his way to that city, his eyes were plucked out by persons sent for that purpose. The emperor, to prevent any future attempts of the like nature, and fecure the crown to his family, took his fon Saturacius for his partner in the empire, and caused him to be crowned with the usual folemnity. Having thus settled his affairs at home, he marched against the Saracens, who had broken into the eastern provinces; but his army was Nicephorus utterly defeated, and he obliged to fave himself by a shameful slight, having nar-defeated by the rowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands. The following year the Saracens, Saracens, d to the number of three hundred thousand men, invaded the empire anew; and advancing without opposition as far as Tyana, the metropolis of Cappadocia Minor, made themselves masters of that city, and several other fortified places, extending their ravages to the very gates of Ancyra in Galatia. Nicepborus marched against them with what forces he could raise; but not daring to venture an engagement, he dispatched embassadors with rich presents to Aaron, their kalif, who with much ado was prevailed upon to grant a peace upon the following terms: That the em- Nicephorus peror should pay to the Saracens a yearly tribute of thirty thousand pieces of gold, concludes a disbesides three thousand for his own head, and as many for that of his son; and that honourable he should not presume to repair such forts as had been dismantled. Nicephorus agreed them. e to these terms; but the enemy was no sooner retired, than, with an open breach of the treaty, he rebuilt the forts that had been demolished; which so provoked the Saracens, that they returned the same year, and raged with more fury than ever, They invade putting all to fire and sword, both on the continent, and in the island of Cyprus, the empire where they demolished the churches, and put an incredible number of the inhabit-anew. ants to the fword. The following year they made a descent upon the island of Rhodes, and took a great number of prisoners; but their fleet suffered much by a violent florm, which overtook them as they were returning home. The fame year Nicephorus married his son Saturacius to Theophania, a near relation of the late

A match proposed between Irene and Charles the Great,

Which is op-

The nobility up Nicepho-

Irene deposed, and Nicephorus created emperor.

promoted, to the utmost of her power, the worsh up anew in the churches, and annulling the edic emperors z. In 802. Charles, furnamed the Gre of the west by pope Leo III. on Christmas-day of to Constantinople, with proposals of a firm and To these embassadors were joined legates from extraordinary pomp at Constantinople. The other instructions, were ordered to propose a n two empires might be once more happily united into the negotiation; but Aetius an eunuch, daily starting new difficulties, put off from time As he was excluded from the empire himself been long labouring under-hand to prefer to it governor of Thrace and Macedon; but being unavoidably defeated, should the treaty bety prince take place, he left no stone unturned posed by Aetius. get the conclusion of it suspended, till a faexecution his private design. In the mean revolt, and fet account of his haughty and imperious con ing the empress, over whom he had gainend be prevailed upon to take Leo for Nicephorus, a patrician of great wealth having first disposed the minds of the not only defigned to marry Charles, by which means the eastern empire w of the west, they affembled one night they feized on Irene without opposit her chamber, conducted Nicephorus the great church, where he was cro-Irene had obliged by feveral acts of and curses against him. Nicephor he had, by his obliging behaviour where her treasures lay concealed his folemn promise, he confined h island; but soon after removed died of grief 2. She is greatly exher fon, by all the writers of t worship of images, and the gr was then called, of the iconoci for the relief of the poor and : writers of those times are to be Her great attachment to the the doctrine of the iconoclast bled for that purpose, have not been ashamed to vindic barbarous conduct towards not at the hands of his mot ten years with her fon, a purple, which required a person of a

a cloyster. Accordingly he earnestly as he was free from all ambition, inviotime fensible of the dangerous state of diery, and the patriarch. Michael no effered himself to be proclaimed emperor, his children, to the monastery of Pharus, eventh of July 813. after having reigned . Thus Theophanes, who lived at this wrote. But Cedrenus gives us a very dif-According to that writer, Michael had the garians, till Leo, who aspired at the empire, which so disheartened the Romans, that they , leaving the Bulgarians masters of the field. to Adrianople, and from thence to Constanti-... In his absence Leo, by exclaiming against dy prince, prevailed upon the army to revolt mielf; which however he pretended to decline, Leo raifed to he chief officers of the army, drawing his fword, the empire. threatened him with present death, if he did mpire, in him alone. When news was brought e army, and the usurpation of Leo, some of the antain his title, and prepare for a vigorous defence. carply reprimanded them, declaring he had rather in a civil war, which would be inevitably attended a blood. Accordingly he fent to Leo the diadem, thoes, the enligns of fovereignty, requiring him hension of danger, to Constantinople, and take pos-Thus Cedrenus, to whose authority we should, withthat of Theophanes, were we fure that the latter part er his name, was done by him; but as some able d it with the reign of Nicephorus, and that the remainmer writer, who, favouring Leo, concealed his ambiempire, we will not take upon us to decide whether , or was raised to it by the voluntary abdication of , upon his arrival at Constantinople, took care to have ad retired to the same monastery, separated; and thereaftery on the island Prota, and banished Procopia, with lace, having first caused Theophylast, their eldest son, to might have no iffue d. He had scarce taken possession Sulgarians, elated with their late success, entered Thrace, and fword. Leo having drawn together what forces he nit them, and offered them battle; which they not declinere flain on both fides, but at length the Romans, overwere put to the rout. As they were pursued by the enemy who beheld all from a neighbouring eminence, falling unexcomplete vicabarians with a referve of chosen men, who attended him, tory over the in the end obtained an intire victory. Great numbers of the Bulgarians. d more taken prisoners. Some reckon the king himself, by the former; but others will have him to have been only that be, the Bulgarians were so disheartened by this overthrow, inroads into the empire for some years after. The emperor to fear either from the Bulgarians, or the Saracens, who were nemicives, applied himself wholly to the suppressing of the wor- He opposes the to images. In order to this, he enforced the observance of the worship of l'antinople in 754. under Constantinus Copronymus, and published imagei. any worship to be paid to images, and commanding them to be

11:

____

: :_

d ZONAR. CEDREN. in Mich. e Idem ibid. CEDREN. in Lcon. removed

A tumult at Constantinople.

Nicephorus ravages with

He is defeated

and flain.

Saturacius.

empress Irene, though she had been some time before contracted to another, which a gave occasion to great complaints, and encouraged some to conspire against him: but they were all detected and punished with the utmost severity; nay, many persons of great distinction, ecclesiastics as well as laymen, were, upon bare suspicions, dragged to prison, and there either put to death, or racked with the greatest cruelty. In the The Bulgarians seventh year of his reign, the Bulgarians, making an irruption into the empire, under the conduct of Crumus, their king, surprised Sardica, a city of Masia, and put the whole garison, consisting of six thousand men, to the sword. Nicephorus marched against them with a considerable army; but the enemy retiring with their booty at his approach, instead of pursuing them, he returned to Constantinople, and imposed a new tribute upon the city for the repairing of Sardica; which incenfed them to b fuch a degree, that they rose in a tumultuous manner, and attacked the palace, but were repulsed by the emperor's guards with great slaughter. In the ninth year of his reign he raised a powerful army, and marching at the head of it, entered the country of the Bulgarians, destroying all with fire and sword. Crumus, their king, alarmed at his approach, fent embaffadors to fue for peace, which he offered to conclude upon terms highly honourable to the empire. But Nicephorus, rejecting them with indignation, pursued his ravages, wasting the country, destroying the cities, and putting all the inhabitants to the sword, who had the misfortune to fall the country of into his hands, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. Crumus, sensibly affected the Bulgarians, with the calamities of his subjects, fent the emperor a second submissive message, c offering to agree to any terms, on condition he would quit his country. But Nicephorus difiniffing the embaffadors with scorn, Crumus, pushed on by despair, attacked unexpectedly the emperor's camp; and having forced it, in spite of all opposition, cut off almost the whole army, with the emperor himself, a great number of patricians, and most of the chief officers. Saturacius received a dangerous wound in the neck, but escaped in a litter to Adrianople. All the arms and baggage fell into the enemy's hands; and the body of Nicephorus being found among the flain, Crumus caused his head to be cut off; and after having kept it for some time exposed to the view of the foldiery, he inclosed the scull in silver, and made use of it instead of a cup y. Such was the end of Nicephorus, after having reigned eight years, as d many months, and twenty-fix days. He is faid to have been strongly inclined to the execrable doctrine of the Manichees, to have denied providence, and to have exceeded all the princes who reigned before him, in lewdness, cruelty, avarice, and all manner of debaucheries 2.

Saturacius fled, as we observed above, to Adrianople, where he was acknowledged emperor by some of the officers, who had escaped the general slaughter. But as he was not in a condition, on account of his wound, to appear in public, and at the same time knew himself to be universally hated both by the nobility and people, he resolved to confer the empire on his wife Theophania. But in the Michael pro- mean time the senate caused Michael, who had married Procopia, lister to Saturacius, e claimed emper to be proclaimed emperor in the circus; which Saturacius no sooner understood, than he retired with his wife to a monastery, where he embraced a religious life, and died foon after, having reigned two months and ten days. Michael, mindful of the oath he had taken to Nicephorus and his fon, declined at first the imperial dignity; but being afterwards informed, that Saturacius, the better to secure the crown to his wife, had resolved to deprive him of his sight, he accepted the offer, and was crowned in the great church by Nicephorus, the patriarch, after he had by a folemn promise under his own hand obliged himself to maintain the privileges of the church, and to abstain from shedding christian blood a. The new emperor a few days after Takes his for caused his wife Procopia to be likewise crowned by the patriarch with his son Theo- f for his collegue, phylast, whom he took for his partner in the empire. He was scarce warm in his throne, when the Saracens broke into the empire on one side, and the Bulgarians on the other. The former were defeated and driven back by Leo, who governed the eastern provinces, with the loss of two thousand men. Against the Bulgarians Is defeated by Michael marched in person; but having, after several slight skirmishes, ventured an the Bu garians, engagement, his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to fly back with shame and difference to Conflantinople. The emperor was affected with this misfortune to a fuch a degree, that he resolved to quit the purple, which required a person of a more warlike and active genius, and retire to a cloyster. Accordingly he earnestly pressed Leo to accept of the empire, who, as he was free from all ambition, inviolably attached to Michael, and at the same time sensible of the dangerous state of affairs, was with much ado prevailed upon to comply with his request, tho' backed by the intreaties of the magistrates, the foldiery, and the patriarch. Michael no sooner understood, that Leo had in the end suffered himself to be proclaimed emperor, than he retired with his wife Procopia, and his children, to the monastery of Pharus, where he took the monastic habit on the eleventh of July 813. after having reigned one year, nine months, and as many days b. Thus Theophanes, who lived at this b time, and was an eye-witness of what he wrote. But Cedrenus gives us a very different account of the promotion of Leo. According to that writer, Michael had the advantage in the engagement with the Bulgarians, till Leo, who aspired at the empire, drew off the forces under his command; which so disheartened the Romans, that they betook themselves to a disorderly slight, leaving the Bulgarians masters of the field. The emperor, with much ado, escaped to Adrianople, and from thence to Constantinople, attended by a small body of horse. In his absence Leo, by exclaiming against him as a weak, effeminate, and cowardly prince, prevailed upon the army to revolt from Michael, and offer the empire to himself; which however he pretended to decline, Leo raifed to till Michael Traulus or Balbus, one of the chief officers of the army, drawing his fword, the empire. as it had been agreed on beforehand, threatened him with present death, if he did e not immediately comply with the earnest intreaties of the whole army, who, he said, placed their fafety, and that of the empire, in him alone. When news was brought to Constantinople of the revolt of the army, and the usurpation of Leo, some of the emperor's friends advised him to maintain his title, and prepare for a vigorous defence. But the good-natured emperor sharply reprimanded them, declaring he had rather lose his life, than involve the state in a civil war, which would be inevitably attended with the effusion of much christian blood. Accordingly he fent to Leo the diadem, the purple robes, and the scarler shoes, the ensigns of sovereignty, requiring him to come, without the least apprehension of danger, to Constantinople, and take pos-fession of the imperial palace. Thus Cedrenus, to whose authority we should, withd out the least hesitation, preser that of Theophanes, were we sure that the latter part of the history, which goes under his name, was done by him; but as some able critics pretend, that he concluded it with the reign of Nicephorus, and that the remaining part was added by some other writer, who, favouring Leo, concealed his ambitious practices in obtaining the empire, we will not take upon us to decide whether Leo usurped the sovereignty, or was raised to it by the voluntary abdication of Michael. The new emperor, upon his arrival at Constantinople, took care to have Michael, and his wife, who had retired to the fame monastery, separated; and therefore confined him to a monastery on the island Prota, and banished Procopia, with her children, to another place, having first caused Theophylast, their eldest son, to e be cruelly maimed, that he might have no issue d. He had scarce taken possession of the throne, when the Bulgarians, elated with their late success, entered Thrace, destroying all with fire and sword. Leo having drawn together what forces he could, marched out against them, and offered them battle; which they not declining, great multitudes were slain on both sides, but at length the Romans, overpowered with numbers, were put to the rout. As they were purfued by the enemy in great disorder, Leo, who beheld all from a neighbouring eminence, falling unex-He gains a pectedly upon the barbarians with a referve of chosen men, who attended him, tory over the renewed the fight, and in the end obtained an intire victory. Great numbers of the Bulgarians. enemy were slain, and more taken prisoners. Some reckon the king himself, by f name Crumus, among the former; but others will have him to have been only wounded. However that be, the Bulgarians were so disheartened by this overthrow, that they made no inroads into the empire for some years after. The emperor having now nothing to fear either from the Bulgarians, or the Saracens, who were at variance among themselves, applied himself wholly to the suppressing of the wor- He opposes the thip that was paid to images. In order to this, he enforced the observance of the worship of council held at Constantinople in 754. under Constantinus Copronymus, and published images. an edict forbidding any worship to be paid to images, and commanding them to be removed

<sup>7</sup> THEOPH. ad ann. Niceph. 9. * CEDREN. ZONAR. in Niceph. THEOPH. ibid. * THEOPH. ad ann. Niceph. 9.

b Idem ad ann. Mic. 2. d ZONAR. CEDREN. in Mich. CEDREN. in Leon. e Idem ibid.

conspires against him.

removed out of the churches. Nicephorus the patriarch, Nicetas a patrician, and a one of the empre's Irene's relations, Theodorus a monk in great reputation, Theophanes the historian, and many others, were banished for refusing to comply with the emperor's edict. But while the emperor was wholly intent upon redressing the Michael Balbus abuses both in the church and state, Michael, surnamed Balbus, or the stammerer, whom he had preferred to the first employments, conspired against him with a design to deprive him of the crown, and place it upon his own head. But the plot being But is seized discovered, Michael was apprehended, tried, and condemned to be burnt alive. But and condemned as the officers were leading him on Christmas eve to the place of execution, the empress Theodosia, by upbraiding her husband with cruelty and irreligion for not respecting that holy time, when he was to partake of the holy sacrament, prevailed b upon him to respite the execution. However, that the criminal might not in the mean time make his escape, the emperor ordered him to be loaded with irons, of which he kept the keys himself. But Michael having, by means of some religious persons, who had been admitted to him, with the emperor's permission, acquainted his accomplices, that he was determined to discover them to Leo, unless they speedily procured his release, alarmed them to such a degree, that they resolved, without loss of time, to put their design in execution. Accordingly, mixing themselves with those who performed divine service in the emperor's chapel, they were admitted early in the morning into the palace, and lay concealed in a corner of the chapel, till the emperor came to his devotions, when, upon a fignal agreed on beforehand, c they started up; but by mistake, as it was not yet day-light, fell upon the person who presided over the clerks, or, as we may call him, the dean of the chapel. Leo. in the mean time, well appriled of their delign, retired to the altar, where he was attacked by the conspirators, now sensible of their mistake; but defended himself with the chain of the incenfory, or, as some write, with the cross, till one of his hands being cut off, he fell to the ground, when the conspirators rushing upon him, Leo murdered. dispatched him with many wounds, and in the end struck off his head f. Such was the end of Leo IV. after he had reigned seven years, five months, and sourceen days. suppressing the worship of images, to have been a vigilant and active prince, and to d

His character. He is allowed, even by such as were his avowed enemies on account of his zeal in have reformed many abuses, that had long prevailed in the state. In conferring employments, he had regard to merit alone, was quite free from avarice, and endowed with many princely qualities; whence the patriarch Nicephorus, who had been banished by him, in hearing the news of his death, could not help owning him to have been a great, tho' a wicked prince. The body of the unhappy emperor was dragged to the circus, and there exposed for some time to public view. After this, the conspirators, having seized on the empress Theodosia, confined her to a monastery, and banished her four fons, viz. Sabbatius, called also Constantine, Basil, Gregory, and Theodosius, to the island Prota, where they were afterwards made eunuchs by Michael's Michael Balbus order, in which cruel operation Theodofius died. Michael in the mean time being e proclaimed em- fet at liberty, and conducted by the conspirators from the prison to the palace, placed himself upon the imperial throne, loaded, as he still was, with his irons, the keys being no-where found: at length the bolts being knocked off with a hammer, he repaired to the great church, where he was crowned by the patriarch.

Michael, thus raised to the empire, was a native of Amorium, a city of Phrygia, inhabited chiefly by Jews, and fuch christians as had been driven from their own countries on account of their heretical opinions. Michael himself observed the Jewish fabbath, denied the refurrection of the dead, and held several other tenets condemned by the catholic church &. In the first year of his reign he recalled a great number of bishops, monks, and others, who had been banished by Leo for not complying f with his edict forbidding the worship of images, but at the same time summoned them to dispute in a council at Constantinople the point in question. With this summons they refused to comply, alledging, that as the worshipping of images had been already approved of and established by a general council, it could admit of no dispute. This answer greatly provoked the emperor, who nevertheless was so far from proceeding with rigour against them, that he indulged them in the use of images without the city. In the second year of his reign, and 823d of the christian æra, a civil war broke out in the east, which involved the empire in endless calamities.

to images.

a It was raised by one Thomas, concerning whom authors are greatly divided in their Thomas reaccounts. According to fome, he was meanly born, and at first a menial servant roles in the to a senator at Constantinople, whose wife he debauched, and then, to avoid the punishment due to his crime, fled to the Saracens, among whom, after he had continued for the space of twenty-five years, protessing their religion, he obtained of their kalif a considerable body of troops, boasting, that he could easily subdue the whole Roman empire. The better to intice the Romans over to his interest, he gave out, that he was Constantine, the son of Irene. Others will have him to have been a man of great power in the east, and inviolably attached to Leo, whose death he resolved to revenge, and with that view took arms. However that be, he was a man of a b grave aspect, of extraordinary strength and courage, and acceptable to the soldiery on account of his affable and engaging behaviour. Being well received in the eastern provinces by the inhabitants, who hated Michael, he foon raifed a very numerous army, and over-ran, without controul, all Asia, seizing every-where on the public Mikes himself revenues, and plundering such cities as resused to submit to him. And now being master of Asia master of all Asia and Syria, he assumed the purple and diadem, and caused himself and Syria. to be acknowledged as emperor by the patriarch of Antioch. Michael, in the mean time, dispatched all the troops he could assemble against him; but Thomas, meeting them in Afia, gave them a total overthrow; and having with incredible expedition fitted out a strong sleet, he engaged and defeated that of the emperor; and then c croffing over into Thrace, appeared unexpectedly before Constantinople, not doubting Besieges Conbut the inhabitants would open their gates to him at his first approach. But to his stantinople. great furprize, they received him with most opprobrious language, repulsed him in two successive attacks, and in several fallies killed great numbers of his men. Thomas made the necessary preparations for a third assault, being resolved to make an utmost effort, and attack the city at the same time by sea and land. But a most violent storm arising, when he was upon the point of giving the signal, his fleet was dispersed, and his battering engines overturned, and rendered quite useless. This disappointment, and some successful fallies of the besieged, obliged him, as the season was already far advanced, to raife the siege, and put his troops into winter-quarters, but d with a resolution to return before the city early in the spring; which he did accordingly: but Michael having in the mean time equipped a fleet, and raifed a landarmy, he met with far greater opposition at his return than he had done before. His army was routed with great flaughter in a fally, and his fleet driven ashore by that of the emperor. The usurper had in his army a commander of great valour and experience, named Gregory, who having been banished by Michael to the island of Scirus, because he was a near relation of Leo, the late emperor, had in the beginning of the war declared for the usurper, and been entrusted by him with the command of twelve thousand men; but now observing, that fortune, which had hitherto attended Thomas in all his undertakings, began to forfake him, he resolved to make e his peace with Michael, the rather because his wife and children were in his hands. This negotiation was not carried on fo privately, but Thomas had timely notice of it, who thereupon leaving a sufficient number of troops before Constantinogle to carry on the siege, led the rest against Gregory; and coming up with him, while he was marching away with the forces under his command to join the emperor, defeated He defeats and his whole party, took him alive, but put him immediately to death, and then puts to death returned in triumph to pursue the siege. But in the mean time Mortagon, king of Gregory, who the Bulgarians, hearing the emperor was belieged in his metropolis, and either betray him. pitying his condition, or desirous of gaining his friendship, marched at the head of a numerous army to his assistance. Thomas, when informed of his approach, was f some time in suspense, whether he should continue the siege, or march with all his forces against the barbarians, but at length resolved on the latter; and accordingly breaking up the siege, he met and engaged the Bulgarians at a place called Cedostus, He is defeated but was by them put to flight with great flaughter. Upon the news of his defeat, by the Bulgari-his fleet before Constantinople revolted to the emperor; which obliged him to lay aside all thoughts of pursuing the siege, and to retire to Diabesis, a place distant a few furlongs from the city; whence by his parties he laid waste all the neighbouring country. While he lay encamped there, the emperor ordered all his troops to march out against him, under the command of Catacelas and Olbianus, whom he received with great bravery, but was overthrown by the treachery of his own men, most of g whom went over to the emperor in the heat of the engagement. Thomas, with much Vol. VI. Nº 8.

and put to death.

ado, escaped to Adrianople, where he was immediately belieged by the emperor's a Is delivered up forces, and at length delivered up to Michael by his own people, no longer able to to the emperor, endure the famine, and the unspeakable hardships, to which they were reduced. The emperor, having caused his hands and feet to be cut off, ordered him, thus maimed, to be carried upon an afs round the camp. He died foon after in the utmost agony. Anastasius, his adopted son, who for that honour had forsaken the monastic life, which he professed before, being delivered up to the emperor by the inhabitants of Byria, met with the same treatment as his father had done. Pavium and Heraclea, two maritime cities of Thrace, which Thomas had seized, refused to submit, not so much out of affection to him, as out of hatred to the emperor, on account of his opposing the worship of images. But the walls of the former city were overturned b by an earthquake, and the latter was taken by storm. Some other cities and castles continued to hold out for fome time, but they were all in the end reduced, and the civil war intirely extinguished b. In the mean time the Saracens, who had fettled in Spain, and were grown too

The Saracens

And settle there.

land in Crete,

The city of Candia built.

The emperor's forces defeated, and cut in pieces.

numerous for that country, taking advantage of the distracted state of the empire; having equipped several ships, dispatched them in quest of some fruitful island, in which they might plant a colony. Apochapsus, who commanded this squadron, having ravaged most of the islands in the Mediterranean without opposition, all the ships and garisons being gone to the affishance of Thomas, touched in the end at Crete; and being greatly taken with the fertility and pleasantness of that island, described it to e his countrymen upon his return as a place, to use his expression, flowing with milk and honey. Hereupon the Saracens having equipped, during the winter, a fleet confifting of forty ships, well armed and manned, put to sea early in the spring; and landing in the island, encamped on the promontory Charax, whence Apochapsus sent spies to discover the country, who upon their return informed him, that the island was quite destitute of soldiers, and that he would no-where meet with the least oppofition. Hereupon he ordered the fleet to be fet on fire, that his men, laying afide all thoughts of returning home, might look upon that island as their native country. The emperor, upon the first notice of this descent, dispatched Damianus with a considerable body of troops to drive the Saracens out of the island. Damianus, being d joined by Photinus, advanced, as foon as he had landed his forces, against the enemy, who killed him at the first onset, and put his whole army to slight, Photinus having with much ado made his escape in a light vessel, and carried the news of the overthrow to the emperor. The Saracens, having now no enemy to oppose them, built and fortified a city in a very convenient place, called Chandax, pointed out to them by a monk. From thence they made frequent excursions, and in a short time reduced the whole island, which by its new masters was thenceforth called Chandax, and by others Candia, from the above-mentioned city i. This happened in the second year of the reign of Michael Balbus, and the 822d of the christian æra. Michael, thinking it would reflect eternal ignominy, if he suffered the Saracens to settle in Crete, as soon e as he had put an end to the civil war, dispatched Craterus, with a powerful fleet, and a numerous army, to recover the island. Craterus, having landed his men without opposition, fell upon the enemy with great resolution, who received him with equal intrepidity. The fight continued from day-break to noon, the victory inclining to neither side; but soon after the Saracens, great numbers of them being slain, and more taken prisoners, began to give ground, and towards the evening fled in great confusion. Had the Romans pursued them, they might have easily, in that consternation, cut them all off to a man, and made themselves masters of their city. But instead of following the fugitives, and affaulting, without loss of time, the place whither they had all retired, they spent the night in riot and drunkenness, as if the war had f been already concluded, without so much as placing a guard or centry, to prevent their being surprised. The enemy, apprised of their security, resolved, however fatigued with the duty of the preceding day, not to neglect so favourable an opportunity of being revenged on their conquerors. Accordingly fallying out in the dead of the night, they fell upon them while they were partly intoxicated with wine, and partly affeep, and cut them off almost to a man. Craterus, their general, with great difficulty escaped on board a small vessel to the island of Cos. But the prince of the Saracens, not finding his body among the flain, dispatched some vessels with a troops after him, who landing on the island, surprised him, and nailed him to a cross. After this defeat, the emperor, despairing of being able to recover the island of Crete, contented himself with defending the other islands, and restraining the piracies of the Cretan Saracens k. Besides the loss of the pleasant and fruitful island of Crete, several other public calamities happened in this wicked emperor's reign, viz. Several public great conflagrations, destructive earthquakes, which overturned whole cities, inun-calamities. dations, strange phænomena in the heavens, general dearth and scarcity of provisions, violent storms, &c. which are all ascribed by Cedrenus to the contempt of images. But these calamities did not reclaim him from the loose and dissolute life which he led without any regard to religion, or the laws. In the fixth year of b his reign, his wife being dead, he forced Euphrosyna, the daughter of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, out of a monastery, where she had led from her infancy a recluse life, and married her. Soon after, Euphemius, an officer of great interest and authority in the army, falling in love with another facred virgin, and encouraged by the example of the prince, took her by force out of the monastery, and debauched her. Of this outrage her brothers made loud complaints to the emperor, who thereupon ordered the governor of Sicily, where the fact was committed, to examine into the matter; and if he found what was alledged against Euphemius to be true, to cut off his nose. To avoid this punishment, Euphemius drew several other officers of the army into a conspiracy; repulsed the governor, when he came to execute his orders; c and then flying to the Saracens in Africa, promised to betray Sicily into their hands, and pay them a large tribute, provided they would declare him emperor of the Romans. To this the Saracen governor of Africa readily confented; and having acknowledged him emperor, fent him back with a fufficient number of troops to Euphemius make good his title. He landed in Sicily without opposition; and advancing to emperor by the Syracuse, endeavoured, by a flattering speech, to persuade the inhabitants, who stood Saracens. on the walls, to open their gates to him, and own him for emperor. Among the rest he observed two brothers, who were men of great interest in the city, to pay him greater respect, and hear him with more attention, than the rest; which encouraged him to call them to him. But as he advanced from the rest of his company d to meet and salute them, one of them, taking hold of him by the hair, held him till the other cut off his head. The Saracens however did not quit the advantage He is killed. which he had put into their hands; but being thus introduced by him, made themfelves by degrees masters of the whole island; and passing over into Italy, landed at The Saracens Taranto; whence they drove the Romans, and got possession of Calabria, and the reduce Sicily. adjoining provinces. The emperor died soon after of a flux, having reigned eight Michael dies. years, nine months, and feven days; and was buried in the church of the apostles. His death happened on the first of October 829. HE was succeeded by his fon Theophylus, who, in the beginning of his reign, to Theophylus.

gain the affections of the people, and prevent conspiracies, pretended to be a strict e observer of justice, and a severe affertor of the laws of the empire. Tho' his father owed both his life and dignity to the murder of Leo, yet he refolved to punish all those who had been any-ways accessary to it, in order to deter others from attempts of the like nature. With this view he fummoned the chief of the nobility, and the great officers of the empire, to attend him in the palace Magnaura, or, as it was called from the five towers, Pentapyrgium. When they were affembled, he told them, that his father had in his life-time refolved to reward the eminent fervices of those, who had been instrumental in his promotion; but since death had prevented him, he thought it incumbent upon himself, as the executor of his father, to pay that debt. He therefore defired them to withdraw from the rest into a particular f room, where he would examine the merit of each person, and reward him accordingly. Hereupon those, who had been accessary to the murder of Leo, readily discovered themselves, in expectation of some great reward. But the emperor having thus got them, convicted by their own confession, into his power, he ordered one of his officers to put the laws against murder in execution, and to punish, according He punishes the to their deferts, those who had not only shed innocent blood, but had inhumanly murderers of massacred the anointed of the Lord within his temple. He then dismissed the assemble. bly, and the officer, pursuant to his orders, punished all those who had conspired against Leo as murderers . After this he sent Euphrosyne back to the monastery,

* ldem ibid. 1 CEDREN. in Mich. ann. 8. ZONAR. P. 173. m JOANN. CUROPUL. in Theophyl.

Constantine crowned empe-

Leo's edict against images.

A tumult at Conflantinople.

The people revolt in Italy.

Gregory II. opposes the emperor's edict.

Leo attempts sepon his life.

They laid fiege to Constantinople, hoping, by means of the a claim to the crown. partizans of Analtalius, among whom were feveral persons of great distinction, to make themselves soon masters of the city; but meeting, contrary to their expectation, with a vigorous opposition, they seized on the unfortunate Anastasius, and delivered him up to the emperor, who put him to death, with all his accomplices, among whom was the bishop of Thessalonica 2. Leo, having happily weathered this storm, caused his fon Constantine to be solemnly crowned emperor, in order to secure the empire to The ceremony was performed by the patriarch Germanus, on Easterhis posterity. day in 720. the fifth of Leo's reign 2. In the mean time the Saracens, under the conduct of their new prince Ized, who had succeeded Haumar, having equipped a mighty fleet, ravaged the coasts of Italy and Sicily; and landing in Sardinia, raged there with b unspeakable fury, destroying all with fire and sword; but being soon after diverted from molesting the empire by the intestine divisions that arose amongst them, another Ized, surnamed Mualabis, having set up for himself in Persia, the emperor was more at leifure to reform several abuses, that had crept into the court and state under the former emperors. In the tenth year of his reign, and 725. of the christian æra, he published the famous edict, commanding all images to be removed out of the churches. and forbidding any kind of worship to be paid to them. This edict was, with great vigour, opposed in the east by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, and Johannes Damascenus; but Leo, having deposed Germanus, and raised Anastasius to the see of Constantinople in his room, caused his edict to be put in execution at Constantinople, and c the images to be pulled down and destroyed by his officers throughout the city, without sparing the statue of our Saviour, which had been placed above the gate of the imperial palace by Constantine the Great. The people, struck with horror in seeing the images of our Saviour and his faints thus infulted, and either torn in pieces, or burnt by the emperor's officers, affembled in a tumultuous manner, and having first vented their rage upon Leo's statues and images, slew to the palace; but being repulsed and pursued with great slaughter by the emperor's guards, they were forced to disperse, and suffer the edict to take place. But in the west, especially in Italy, it was had in such abhorrence, that the people openly revolted; which gave Luitprand, king of the Lombards, an opportunity of seizing on Ravenna, and several other cities d of the exarchate. He was however foon after driven out by the Venetians, who, at that time, made no small figure in Italy. Gregory II. then pope, or bishop of Rome, jealous of the growing power of the Lombards, had, by a letter to Ursus duke of Venice, prevailed upon him to espouse the interest of the emperor, and lead his forces against Ravenna; which city he surprised, before Luitprand, who was then at Pavia, had the least notice or suspicion of his design. Gregory had, from the very beginning, opposed with great warmth the emperor's edict forbidding the worshipping of images; and now, presuming upon the eminent service he had rendered the empire, he wrote a long letter to Leo, earnestly intreating him to revoke it. But the emperor, well apprised, that Gregory had been prompted by his own interest, and not by that of c the empire, to prevent the Lombards from making new conquests in Italy, was exasperated to such a degree against him, for continuing still to oppose his edict, that he fent private orders to his officers in Italy, especially to Paul exarch of Ravenna, and to Mauritius, governor, or, as he was then styled, duke of Rome, injoining them to get Gregory, by some means or other, into their power, and send him dead or alive to Constantinople. But the people of Rome, who had a great veneration for their bishop, discovering the plot, guarded him so carefully, that the emperor's officers could never find an opportunity of putting their orders in execution. Three affaffins undertook to murder him; but two of them were apprehended, and put to death, which the third escaped, by taking sanctuary in a monastery, and there embracing a f religious life. Gregory, finding himself thus supported by the people of Rome, solemnly The exarchex- excommunicated the exarch, for publishing, and attempting to put in execution, the communicated emperor's edict, writing at the same time letters to the Venetians, to king Luitprand, to the Lombard dukes, and to all the cities of the empire, exhorting them to continue stedsast in the catholic saith, and oppose, with all their might, the execution of the impious, as he styled it, and heretical edict. These letters made such an impression upon the minds of the people, that the inhabitants of Italy, tho' of different interests. and often at war with each other, viz. the people of Rome, the Venetians, and the

Lombards, entering into an alliance, resolved to act in concert, and prevent, to the The people of utmost of their power, the execution of the imperial edict. The people of Rome, and Italy revolt. those of the Pentapolis, now Marca d'Ancona, did not stop here; but pulling every-where down the emperor's statues, openly revolted, and refusing to acknowledge an iconoclast, that is, a breaker of images, for emperor, they chose magistrates of their own; nay, they had some thoughts of electing a new emperor, and conducting him with a strong army to Constantinople: but this scheme was opposed by the pope as impracticable. In Ravenna the people rose in defence of the images against Paul the exarch; and having killed him, and all the iconoclasts in the city, submitted to Luitprand king Ravenna subof the Lombards, a cunning prince, who took care to improve to his advantage the mits to the Lombards. b general difcontent that reigned among the subjects of the empire. In Naples the people took arms against Exhilarctus their duke, (for Naples was then governed by dukes sent from Constantinople) and murdered him, with his son Adrian, and one of The inhabithis chief officers, for pressing the inhabitants to receive the edict, and conform to the anti of Naples religion of their prince. However, as they hated the Lombards, with whom they had kill their duke or governor. been almost constantly at war, they continued firm and constant in their obedience to Leo, and received Peter, who was appointed duke of Naples in the room of Exhilaratus. The people of Rome, finding the emperor inflexible in his defign against the worship of images, and the life of the pope, whom he looked upon as the chief author of all the disturbances, refolved at length to renounce their allegiance to Lco, and to conti- The Romans nue united under the pope as their head, binding themselves by a solemn oath to revelt. c defend him against all the attempts both of the emperor and the Lombards, whom they had but too much reason to mistrust b. Theophanes, Cedrenus, Zonaras, Nicephorus, and other Greek writers, tell us, that the Romans, withdrawing their obedience to Leo, chose pope Gregory for their prince, taking an oath of allegiance to And chase the him. They add, that the pope accepted of the principality, forbidding the Romans pope for their to pay thenceforth tribute to the emperor; that he publicly excommunicated Leo as head. an heretic, absolved his subjects from their allegiance to him, and solemnly declared him fallen from the empire. Hence, fay they, had the temporal and independent The rife of the dominion of the pope over Rome its rife, which was afterwards inlarged by Pepin and temporal domi-Charles the Great, and extended to the exarchate of Ravenna, the Pentapolis, and nion of the pope. d several other cities of Italy. But it appears from Paulus Diaconus, Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Joannes Damascenus, who all flourished nearer those times, and in the places where the things they relate happened, nay, and from the letters of Gregory himfelf to Leo, that he acknowledged him for his lawful fovereign as long as he lived, as did lik wife Gregory III. his fucceffor . The Latin writers take no notice of Gregory's excommunicating and deposing the emperor, or absolving his subjects from their oath of allegiance; but only tell us, that when Leo deposed the patriarch Germanus, and appointed Anastasius in his room, Gregory excommunicated the latter; and rebuking the emperor by letters, earnestly intreated him not to abuse the power with which he had been trusted, to introduce innovations in the church d. However, the authority e of the Greek historians has been preferred to that of the Latins, by all the protestant, and most of the Roman catholic writers; but with very different views. testants followed them, that they might thence take occasion to make a comparison between our Saviour and the pope. When the multitude, say they, offered to make our Saviour king, he rejected their offers, faying, My kingdom is not of this world: when the Romans offered the principality to Gregory, he readily accepted it, and from the servant of servants became the lord and master. Our Saviour express commanded tribute to be paid to Cafar: the pope would fuffer no more tribute to be paid to Leohis lawful fovereign, &c. c. On the other hand, the Roman catholics, by standing to what the Greeks write, think they can defend the pope from all usurpation, and establish his temporal power and jurisdiction upon a better and more plausible foundation, viz. the unanimous confent of the people, conferring upon him freely, and Anast. in Greg. II. Paul. Diac. l. vi. Sigon. ad ann. 725, 726. Epift. 1 & 2 Greg. ad Leon.

Anast. Bibl. in Greg. II. Greg. II. in epift. 1. ad Leon. & Greg. III. epift. 2. ad Bonifac.
Vide Spanh. contra Maimburg. in hiftor. imag. p. 52.
Giannetas. hist. Neap. 1. v. p. 94. Vol. VI. No 7. plainly without constraint, the principality i, not reflecting, that those who thus chose him for their prince, had revolted from their lawful fovereign; and consequently that Gregory, by accepting the principality, became guilty both of rebellion and ulurpation. But from what we shall relate in the history of the Lombards in Italy, it will plainly appear, that the pope did not acquire the fovereignty of Rome at this time, but a married to

Constantine

wrecked.

Leo dies, and is succeeded by

Copronymus

Constantine

Artabazdus

revolts;

Irene.

many years after; nay, that his temporal dominion had not its rife in Rome, but in the exarchate of Ravenna, and the Pentapolis, which were taken by the celebrated Pepin from Astulphus king of the Lombards, and given to pope Stephen, whom some call the fecond, others the third, of that name. As for the fovereignty of Rome, the popes did not enjoy it, as we shall demonstrate in a more proper place, till the year 876. when it was yielded to the apostolic see, as it began then to be called, by Charles furnamed the Bald. But to return to Leo: He was wholly taken up, during the remaining part of his long reign, in suppressing the worship of images throughout his dominions, and raging with great cruelty against those, who resused to comply with his edict; while the Saracens, breaking into the eastern provinces, laid them waste b without controul, carrying yearly back with them an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. In the seventeenth year of his reign, and 732, of the chriftian æra, he married his fon Constantine to the daughter of the king of the Chazari. after she had been instructed in the principles of the christian religion, and received at her baptism the name of Irene, a word signifying in the Greek tongue peace. The fame year the emperor caused a mighty fleet to be equipped, with a design to chastize and bring back to their duty the Romans, and other people of Italy, who had revolted Leo's fleet ship- on occasion of the edict against images; but the fleet being shipwrecked in the Adriatic fea, Leo could by no other means be revenged on the pope, who continued to oppose the execution of his edict, than by caufing the revenues of the Roman fee in Calabria c and Sicily to be confiscated 8. In the last year of Leo's reign, a dreadful earthquake happened at Conflantinople, which overturned many churches, monasteries and private houses, burying great numbers of people under the ruins. Not long after Leo died, having reigned twenty-five years, two months, and twenty days, and was succeeded by his fon Conflantine, who no fooner faw himself sole master of the empire, than he led an army against the Saracens, who had made an irruption into Asia. In his absence Artabazdus, who had married his fifter, gave out, that he was dead; and being thereupon acknowledged by the people, and proclaimed emperor, he caused the sons of Constantine to be secured; but as he was well apprised, that the report he had industriously spread of Constantine's death would be soon contradicted, he began to consult d with the patriarch Anastasius, by what other means he might keep the people steady in their allegiance to him. Anastasius had been a zealous iconoclast in the late reign; but to curry favour with Artabazdus, who had a great veneration for images, and to estrange the minds of the people from Constantine, he assembled them in the great church, and holding in his hand the wood of the holy cross, he took the following oath: By bim who died upon this wood, I swear, That Constantine one day addressed me with these words; I do not believe him to be the son of God, who was born of Mary, and is called Christ, but a mere man; for Mary was delivered of him after the same manner, as Mary my mother was delivered of me. This deposition of the patriarch, whether true or false we cannot take upon us to determine, made such an impression on the minds of the multitude, that they immediately deposed Constantine with one consent, and, with repeated acclamations, faluted Artabazdus again emperor, who took Nicephorus his eldest son for his partner in the empire h. This gave rise to a civil war, the greatest, fays Cedrenus, perhaps not without some exaggeration, that had happened since the But is defeated, beginning of the world. But all we know of it is, that Artabazdus, and his fon and Combanti- Nice; borus, being defeated by Constantine in several encounters, were in the end nople taken by besieged in Constantinople; which city held out, till the inhabitants were forced by famine to fubmit. Artabazdus and his two fons were taken, and delivered up to the emperor, who caused their eyes to be pulled out, gave the city up to be plundered by his foldiers, and either banished, maimed, or put to death, all those who had been any-ways f concerned in the revolt. Anastasius the patriarch was, by the emperor's orders, Conftintine.

THEOPH. ad ann. Leon. 17. b Idem ad ann. Conft. 4. 1 Idem ad ann. Const. 3.

publicly beaten with rods, and then carried in an ignominious manner through the most frequented streets of the city on an ass, with his face to the tail. However, the time-ferving prelate was continued in his fee, because the emperor could not find a worse, says Theophanes, to prefer to it in his room i. Constantine, having thus got rid of his enemies at home, refolved to march once more against the Saracens, who were at war among themselves. Accordingly, having raised a powerful army, he entered Syria; and having overthrown the enemy in feveral encounters, made himself master

THEOP CEDREN. ibid.

Conit. 13-23.

P Vide THEOPH. ad ann. Conft. 23, 24.

a of Germanicia, and some other strong-holds, which had been long in their hands. Constantine The Saracens, notwithstanding their domestic quarrels, to divert the emperor from recovers levepursuing his conquests in Syria, assembled a mighty fleet, which steered its course to the Saracens. the island of Cyprus, where it was to be joined by other ships of war, and a great number of transports with land-forces on board. But the Roman sleet coming unex-Destroys their pectedly upon them, while they were riding at anchor in one of the ports of that island, flees. destroyed the whole navy, except three ships, which they suffered to escape with the news of fo great a calamity k. However, the emperor was diverted from pursuing the advantages that might have thence accrued to the empire, by the frequent earthquakes Dreadful that happened about this time, and were by far the most destructive that had been earthquakes. b known in any age. In Syria and Palestine several cities were swallowed up, others intirely ruined, and fome, if we may give credit to Nicephorus, removed, without any confiderable damage, fix miles and upwards from their former feats. At the same time happened an extraordinary darkness, which lasted from the sourth of August to the first of Oslober, there being little or no distinction, during that time, between day and night. This calamity was followed by another still more terrible, viz. a plague, which breaking out in Calabria, foon spread all over Sicily, Greece, the Aviolent islands in the Agean sea, and at length reached Constantinople, where it raged for plugue. three years together with fuch fury, that the living were scarce sufficient to bury the dead m. The plague no fooner ceased, than Constantine, having caused his fon Leo, c then scarce a year old, to be proclaimed emperor, marched with what forces he could draw together into Armenia; and taking advantage of the divisions that still reigned among the Saracens, made himself master of Miletene, Theodosiopolis, and several other places. But he was diverted from pursuing his conquests in the east, by a sudden irruption of the Bulgarians, who, provoked at the emperor's causing some forts to be built on the frontiers of Thrace, broke into that province, and advancing as far as the long wall, laid waste the whole country. Constantine, having recalled his forces out of the east, marched against them in person; but being surprised by the enemy in a Constantine narrow paffage called Beragaba, his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to fave defeated by the himself by slight to Constantinople ". Soon after his return to that metropolis, he Bulgarians. d renewed the edict published by his father against images, forbidding at the same time any worship to be paid to the faints, or their relies, and commanding their images to be removed out of the churches, and publicly burnt. Such of the bithops as opposed the execution of this edict, were driven from their fees; and the monks, who preached against either, sent into banishment, or sentenced to death. At the same time an Hepersecutes edict was published in Constantinople, and in all the cities of the empire, forbidding, the worthingers under the feverest penalties, any one to embrace a monastic life; nay, at Constanti- of images. nople most of the religious houses were suppressed, and the monks not only obliged to marry, but to lead their brides publicly through the streets. But of this persecution the reader will find a more particular and diftinct account in the ecclefiaftic writers, than it may be proper for us to give in this place. The twenty-third year of A surprising Constantine's reign, and 763. of the christian æra, is remarkable for an extraordinary freji. frost, which began on the first of Ollober, and lasted till the latter end of February. At Constantinople both seas were frozen for an hundred miles from the shore, the ice being so thick as to bear the heaviest carriages, and covered with snow twenty cubits When the frost broke, mountains of ice and frozen show being driven by the winds through the streights, did a great deal of damage to the walls and the castle of Conflantinople. The reader will find a furprifing account of this frost in Theophanes, who, with thirty others, passed the streights upon one of these floating islands, as he styles it P. The month following several prodigies appeared, or were thought to f appear, in the air. At the same time a comet, which the Greeks called docites, because several proit resembled a beam, was seen for ten days in the east, whence it moved to the west, digies. and shone there for one-and-twenty days more, the people being struck with terror and amazement at the fight of these prodigies, and apprehending the last day to be at hand. Constanting in the mean time continued to perfecute with great severity those who appeared most zealous and forward in the worship of images, till he was diverted by a new irruption of the Bulgarians; who, breaking into the trritories of the empire, commetted every-where unheard-of cruelies. But Conflantine marching in person k N. :PH. in Conft. c. 13.

Chenken, ibid.

Theoph. ad ann. Conft. 19.

Conft. 22, 24. 1 Idem ibid. THLOPH ad ann. Conft. 6. CEDREN. ibid.

° Vide THEOPH. CEDREN. &c. ad ann.

against

Constantine 4 8 1 Bulgarians.

Is deluded by their king.

He marches against them; but dies.

given to the pope.

Leo III.

ans, embraces the christian religion.

against them, cut them all off to a man, and then returned in triumph to Constan- a This the emperor styled his noble war, because not one christian perished in However, he owed the victory, it seems, to the treachery of some Bulgarians, whom Elerich their king discovered by the following device: He wrote to Constantine, pretending a desire to resign the crown, and lead a private life at Constantinople; for which purpose he begged the emperor to send him a safe conduct, and at the same time to acquaint him what friends he had among the Bulgarians, that he might repair with them to Constantinople, being unwilling to trust his person or design to others. Hereupon Constantine, not suspecting any deceit, sent him a list of the names of those who held intelligence with him; which the crafty prince no sooner received, than he caused them all to be put to death. The emperor, finding himself thus deluded, b resolved at all events to be revenged on the treacherous prince; and accordingly, having spent the winter in warlike preparations, he marched early in the spring against Elerich; but being seized on his march with a violent sever, he returned to Achadiopolis, whence he was conveyed to Selymbria, and from thence by fea to Strongylum, where he died on the fourteenth of September of the year 775. after he had reigned His character. twenty-four years, two months, and twenty-fix days g. As Constantine was a most zealous iconoclast, and did all that lay in his power to suppress the worship of the faints, their images and relics, Theophanes, Cedrenus, and the other writers of those times, paint him in the blackest colours, biassed in some measure, as we may reasonably suppose, by passion, interest and prejudice. However, standing even to the c accounts of his declared enemies, we must allow him to have been a prince of great temperance and moderation, well skilled in war, and in every respect equal to the high station to which he was raised. As for the great severity which he exerted against such as continued, in defiance of his decree, to worship images, it was, no doubt, owing to his zeal for the purity of the christian religion. After all, his feverity against the worshippers of images did not exceed that of other emperors, highly commended by all christian writers, against the worshippers of idols. He desended the empire with equal bravery and success against the Saracens and Bulgarians; but was not in a condition to prevent the loss of the far greater part of his dominions in Italy, Aftulphus, king of the Lombards, having reduced in 751. the city and exar- d chate of Ravenna, with the Pentapolis, which were foon after wrested from him by The exarchate Pepin king of France, and given to pope Stephen III. and hence sprung the temporal and Pentapolis dominion of the pope in Italy, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. The exarchate of Ravenna comprehended Ravenna, Bologna, Imola, Faenza, Forlimpopoli, Forli, Cesena, Bobbio, Ferrara, Commachio, Adria, Cervia, and Secchia; the Pentapolis, now Marca d'Ancona, comprised Rimini, Pesaro, Conca, Fano, Sinogaglia, Ancona, Osimo, Umana, Jest, Fossombrone, Monteseltro, Urbino, Cagli, Luceoli, and Eugubio, as appears from the grant of Lewis the Pious, confirming the donation of Pepin. The pope, thus enriched with large territories and dominions, would no longer be deemed a subject of the empire; but adding the sovereignty to the priesthood, and the sceptre to the keys, he created a new principality in Italy, on the ruins of the eaftern empire, to which nothing now remained in that country, except the provinces of Calabria and Brutium, with the dukedoms of Naples, Amalfi, and Gaeta. But of the state of Italy at this time, and the great revolutions that happened there, we shall speak at length in the history of the Lombards. Constantine was succeeded in the empire by his son Leo, who, soon after his acces-

fron, took his fon Constantine, whom he had by Irene, for his partner in the empire, causing him to be solemnly crowned by the patriarch in the hippodrome, and bestowing at the same time the title of nobilifimi on his two brothers Anthemius and Eudoxius, Nicephorus, his fecond brother, having received that honour in his father's life-time 1. Constantine was crowned in the latter end of April of the year 776, and the following month Nicephorus, Leo's brother, formed a conspiracy against the emperor and his son; but the plot being discovered, he was apprehended, and banished, with his accom-Elerich, king plices, to Chersona. The same year Elerich, king of the Bulgarians, who had done of the Bulgari- great mischief to the empire in the preceding reign, moved with an earnest desire of embracing the christian religion, refigned his crown, and repaired to Constantinopic, where he was received by Leo with extraordinary demonstrations of kindness and esteem, and, after he had received the sacrament of baptism, created a patrician, and a married to a relation of the empress Irene 1. In the third year of Leo's reign, some advantages were gained by the emperor's forces over the Saracens, who, by way of revenge, began to persecute the christians in a most cruel manner, causing all their churches in Syria to be pulled down, and levelled with the ground. The following Leo an enemy year Leo, who had hitherto diffembled his real fentiments concerning the worship of to images. images, openly declared against that superstitious, as he styled it, and idolatrous practice, reviving the edicts of his father and grandfather, and punishing, with the utmost severity, such as presumed to pay any kind of worship to the faints, the virgin Mary, or their images. Having found two images in the closet of the empress Irene, he never after admitted her to his bed, and caused those who had conveyed them to b her to be racked to death k. He did not long outlive them, being foon after feized with a violent fever, of which he died on the fixteenth of September 780. after having reigned five years and ten days. Theophanes writes, that Leo, having taken out of the great church a crown, which had been deposited there by the emperor Heraclius, and was enriched with carbuncles of an inestimable value, while he was one day wearing it, a carbuncle broke out on his head, and he was at the same time seized with a fever, which, by a just judgment, soon put an end to his life.

Leo was fucceeded by his fon Constantine, surnamed Porphyrogenitus, because he was Constantine born while his father was emperor; but as he was then only ten years old, his mother Porphyroge-Irene took upon her the administration. The young prince had scarce reigned forty nitus and days, when some of the source and great officers considered against him with a Irene. c days, when some of the senators and great officers conspired against him, with a design to preser his uncle Nicephorus to the imperial dignity; but Irene, having season-Aconspiracy ably discovered the plot, caused the chief authors of it to be seized, and confined to discovered, and different islands, after they had been publicly beaten with rods. Awakened by this the conspirators danger, to prevent any future attempts of the like nature, she obliged all the late punished. emperor's brothers to take holy orders, and administer the sacrament to the people on Christmas day, when she and her son restored to the church the crown of Heraclius, which Leo had seized. The same year 780, the Saracens, upon the news of Leo's death, broke into the eastern provinces; but were driven back with great loss by the troops, which Irene had, upon the first notice of their motions, dispatched against

d them m. The following year the empress, to procure a strong alliance by the marriage of her fon, fent embassadors into France, to propose a match between him and the daughter of Charles king of that country, who was afterwards furnamed the Great, and crowned emperor of the west. The proposal being well received by Charles, an eunuch, by name Elifaus, was left at his court to teach his daughter, named Rotdrudris, the Greek tongue, and instruct her in the manners and customs of the Greeks n. The same year Helpidius governor of Sicily revolted; but was driven out of the island Helpidius reby Theodorus a patrician, whom Irene had fent with a powerful fleet against him, and volts. obliged to take refuge among the Saracens in Africa, who, acknowledging him for emperor in opposition to Constantine, fell with such fury upon the eastern provinces,

e that Irene was glad to avert the danger that threatened the empire, by obliging herself An annual to pay them an annual pension. The peace with the Saracens was scarce concluded, pension paid to when the Sclavi or Sclavini, breaking into Greece and Peloponnesus, seized on those the Satacens. countries. Against them the empress dispatched Saturacius a patrician, who overcame them in feveral battles; but suffered them to continue in the contries they had seized, upon their promising to acknowledge the authority of the empire, by the payment of an annual tribute. In 788, the match between Constantine and Rotdrudris, which had been approved of by both parties, was broken off by Irene, who obliged her fon, much against his inclination, to marry a woman of a mean descent, named Mary, by birth an Armenian or Paphlagonian, and the niece or daughter of one Philaretus,

f remarkable for his good nature and charitable disposition. Some ascribe the breaking off of the match with Rotdrudris to the ambition of Irene, apprehending, that Constantine would no longer be governed by her, but by his father-in law. Others tell us, that the empress was provoked against Charles, on account of his invading the dukedom of Benevento in Italy, which she had taken under her protection. Be that as it will, the conduct of the empress on that occasion disobliged her son to such a Misunderstanddegree, that he was never after truly reconciled to her. The young prince's courtiers, ing between apprised of the misunderstanding that passed between him and his mother, and desirous and Irene.

1 Idem ad ann. 2. * Idem ad ann. 5. CEDREN. in comp. annal. ad ann. Const. 1. <sup>n</sup> Idem ad ann. 2. · Idem ibid.

1 THEOPH. ibid. m Idem of getting the power into their own hands, took care to put him in mind, that he a

Constantine deprives her of

The emperor defeated by the

His cruelty.

legions broken and dispersed.

was no longer a minor, but of an age to govern without the directions or counsels of a woman. Constantine hearkening to their infinuations, they resolved to seize on Saturacius, who governed with an absolute sway, as Irene's first minister, and after having banished him, to oblige the empress to resign the administration. But Saturacius, having notice of their design as soon as it was concerted, immediately imparted it to Irene, who caused all those who had been privy to it to be beaten with rods, and sent into banishment. As for her son, she chastized him with her own hands, and having confined him to his apartment, obliged the fenate and foldiery to bind themselves by a solemn oath not to acknowledge Constantine, but her alone, for their foldiery to take fovereign, fo long as she lived. This oath was taken by all the forces quartered in b an oath of al. the different provinces, except some legions in Armenia, who resolutely declared they legiance to her. would adhere to Constantine, pursuant to the oath which they had already taken. The resolution of the Armenian legions encouraged the rest, notwithstanding their late oath, to proclaim Constantine anew, and demand with unanimous consent, that he might be forthwith vested with the whole power and authority. Irene, dreading the fury of the incensed multitude, immediately released her son from his confinement, who, being received with the repeated acclamations of the citizens and foldiery, took the reins of the empire into his own hands. Constantine, now at liberty to act without controul, recalled, and advanced to the first employments, such as had been banished on his account, sending into exile Saturacius, and his mother's other favour- c ites, after they had been publicly beaten with rods. As for Irene, he led her with great respect out of the palace, and attended her in person to a house built by herself, in which she had laid up an immense treasure P. The same year 790. a dreadful fire the administra- happened at Constantinople, which confumed great part of the city, with the patriarch's palace, in which were the comments of St. Chrysostom on the scripture, written with The following year the city was alarmed with a violent earthquake, his own hand. which obliged the inhabitants to quit their habitations, and retire to the open fields 4. The same year the emperor marched at the head of a considerable army against the Bulgarians, who had broken into the empire, and engaged them in Thrace; but with what success, is uncertain: for Cedrenus writes, that he gained a great victory; but d Zonaras will have the two armies to have parted upon equal terms. Upon his return to Constantinosle, the friends of Irene, what by extolling her wisdom, prudence and experience in public affairs, what by intreaties and arguments drawn from filial duty, Irene recalled. prevailed upon him to recal his mother to court, and restore her to her former authority; which however the Armenian legions could never be induced to acknowledge. Being thus reconciled to his mother, he marched anew against the Bulgarians, encouraged thereunto by fome mathematicians, who promifed him certain victory; but while, depending upon their vain predictions, he neglected the proper means to obtain it, the Bulgarians, taking advantage of his ill-grounded fecurity, gave him a dreadful overthrow. Besides a great number of common soldiers, the best officers of e the army, and the most considerable men in the empire, lost their lives in the battle, with Pancratius the mathematician, who, by his lying predictions, had given occa-The emperor growing jealous and distrustful upon this fion to the overthrow :. defeat, some malicious and designing courtiers took care to improve that disposition, by infinuating to him, that the foldiers quartered in Constantinople had formed a defign of preferring Nicepborus to the empire; which heightened his jealoufy to fuch a degree, as he was conscious to himself of his evil conduct, that he not only caused his eyes to be put out, but those likewise of his other uncles, Nicetas, Anthimus, and Eudocimus, tho' nothing had been alledged against them. Alexius Mosoles, whom the Armenian legions had demanded for their leader, when they refused to consent to the restoration f of Irene, was, at her instigation, treated with the like severity; which so provoked those legions, that they refused to obey Camilianus, appointed by the emperor to command them. Hereupon Constantianus, Artaseras and Chrysochires were sent against them at the head of a strong party; but the mutinous legions having defeated them, and taken them prisoners, caused, by way of retaliation, their eyes to be pulled out; which so provoked Constantine, that he marched against them in person; and having The Armenian defeated them in a pitched battle, put all their officers to death, caufing the com-

> P Idem, & CEDREN. ad ann. Conft. 10. Idem ad ann. 10, 11. I Idem ad ann. Conft. fol. 2. Idem ibid.

a mon foldiers to be led in chains to Constantinople, and conveyed from thence into different islands. The Armenian legions, who had always suspected, and been ready to oppose the ambirious designs of Irene, being thus broken and dispersed, she began to put the emperor, now destrute of that support, upon such measures, as, she thought, would render him edious to the people. As he had no great affection for the empress Mary, whom the had forced him to marry, contrary to his inclination, the advised him to divorce her, and marry Theodota or Theodotta, one of the maids of her cham-Constantine ber; who was accordingly crowned empress at Constantinople, where the nuptials were and marries folemnized with extraordinary pomp and magnificence for three days together. This Theodota. marriage occasioned great contests among the clergy concerning the lawfulness of it; b in which Irene artfully fided with those who opposed her son, encouraging them underhand to estrange the minds of the people from him. However, the success which attended his arms against the Saracens and Bulgarians, prevented the people from revolting, tho' privately stirred up by Irene, and her emissaries, to depose him. The Saracens had broken into Cilicia; but were driven back with great loss by the troops which Constantine scasonably dispatched against them. As for the Bulgarians, Cardames their king having fent embaffadors to demand a tribute, threatening to come as far as the golden gate of Conftantinople, and there take it by force, if it was refused him, Constantine replied, that fince he was stricken in years, he would save him the trouble of so long a journey, by coming in person to wait upon him. Accordingly the marched against him at the head of a considerable army; upon the sight of which the barbarians, struck with a panic, fled in the utmost consternation. Upon his Hepatisthe return to Constantinople, he attended his mother from thence to the baths of Prusa in Bulgarians to Bithynia, where he had not been long, when news was brought him, that the empress flight. Theodota was delivered of a fon; at which he was fo overjoyed, that he returned in great haste to Constantinople. Irene, taking advantage of his absence, gained over the chief officers of the army, who promised to depose Constantine, and commit the government to her alone. Pursuant to this promise, some of them, returning to Constantinople, seized on the unhappy prince, and carrying him to the palace of Porpbyra, where he was born, pulled out his eyes in fuch a cruel and barbarous manner, He is murdered d that he died a few days after in the utmost agony, having reigned seven years alone, and ten with his mother ". Our historian observes, that five years before his uncles lost their eyes by his orders, on the same day of the same month, and in the same chamber v. Nicephorus and Christopher, her husband's brothers, hearing of the death of Constantine, took fanctuary in the great church; but were dragged from thence, and banished to Athens, where they are said to have been killed by the inhabitants, upon their attempting to raise disturbances in the empire. In them ended the family of Leo Isauricus; so that no one was now lest to dispute with Irene her title to the empire. She no fooner received intelligence of the death of her fon, than leaving Prusa, the repaired to Constantinople; which she entered in a gilded chariot, drawn by four Irene proclaie horses, being attended by several patricians, who waited as her slaves on either side, medempress. while she threw money among the people, as was usual at the solemnity of a coronation x. In the mean time the Saracens, hearing the empire was governed by a woman, broke into the eastern provinces; and having defeated the forces Irene sent against them, entered Thrace, made their excursions to the very gates of Constantinople, destroying all with fire and sword, and returned home unmolested, carrying with them an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. In 798, the second of Irene's reign, her great favourite Saturacius, prompted by his boundless ambition, Saturacius conspired against her, with a design to deprive her of the crown, and to place it upon conspires his own head; but his design being discovered before it was ripe for execution, Irene, against her. f after upbraiding him with treachery and ingratitude, contented herself, in consideration of his former fervices, with forbidding any one to keep him company. The partiality which the empress shewed him, joined to a lively sense of his ingratitude to her, made such a deep impression upon his mind, that he died of grief soon after y. Irene, finding the could not depend even upon those whom the thought the had most she studies to reason to confide in, made it her chief study to gain the hearts of her people. With gain the asset this view she remitted an annual tribute, which had been long paid by the citizens of store feetles. Constantinople, encouraged commerce, and, what most of all obliged the people,

t Idem ad ann. 3. t Idem ad ann. 7. Conft. fol. t Idem ibid. t Idem ad ann. Iren. 1.
Idem ad ann. Iren. 2.

promoted,

A match proboled between Irene and Charles the Great.

Which is opposed by Actius.

The nobility up Nicephorus.

Irene deposed, and Nicephorus created emperor.

promoted, to the utmost of her power, the worship of images, causing them to be set a up anew in the churches, and annulling the edicts enacted against them by former emperors z. In 802. Charles, furnamed the Great, who had been crowned emperor of the west by pope Leo III. on Christmas-day of the year 800. sent a solemn embassy to Constantinople, with proposals of a firm and lasting peace between him and Irene. To these embassadors were joined legates from the pope, who were received with extraordinary pomp at Constantinople. The embassadors of Charles, among their other instructions, were ordered to propose a match between him and Irene, that the two empires might be once more happily united in their persons. Irene readily entered into the negotiation; but Aetius an eunuch, who bore the chief sway at court, by daily starting new difficulties, put off from time to time the conclusion of the treaty. b As he was excluded from the empire himself, on account of his condition, he had been long labouring under-hand to prefer to it his brother, by name Leo, at that time governor of Thrace and Macedon; but being well apprised, that his design would be unavoidably defeated, should the treaty between Irene and so powerful and warlike a prince take place, he left no stone unturned to divert the empress from it, at least to get the conclusion of it suspended, till a favourable opportunity offered of putting in execution his private design. In the mean time the nobility, who hated Aetius, on revolt, and set account of his haughty and imperious conduct, suspecting his design, and apprehending the empress, over whom he had gained a great ascendant, might by him in the end be prevailed upon to take Leo for her partner in the empire, refolved to fet up & Nicephorus, a patrician of great wealth and interest among the people. Accordingly, having first disposed the minds of the citizens to a revolt, by giving out, that Irene not only designed to marry Charles, but to transfer the seat of the empire to the west, by which means the eastern empire would foon become a province to the new empire of the west, they assembled one night, and went in a large body to the palace, where they seized on Irene without opposition; and confining her under a strong guard to her chamber, conducted Nicephorus, their new emperor, with the usual solemnity to the great church, where he was crowned in a tumultuous manner, the populace, whom Irene had obliged by feveral acts of generofity and good nature, uttering reproaches and curfes against him. Nicephorus treated Irene with great civility and respect, till d he had, by his obliging behaviour, prevailed upon her to discover to him the place where her treasures lay concealed; which she had no sooner done, than, contrary to his folemn promise, he confined her to a monastery, which she herself had built in an island; but soon after removed her from thence to the island of Lesbos, where she died of grief a. She is greatly extolled, notwithstanding her unnatural conduct towards her fon, by all the writers of those times, no doubt, on account of her zeal for the worship of images, and the great pains she took utterly to suppress the herefy, as it was then called, of the iconoclasts. She built a great many monasteries, and hospitals for the relief of the poor and aged, and, by many other acts of piety, gained, if the writers of those times are to be credited, both the esteem and affections of her subjects. • Her great attachment to the see of Rome, and the indefatigable pains she took to get the doctrine of the iconoclasts condemned in the second council of Nice, by her assembled for that purpose, have so far biassed some writers of that party, that they have not been ashamed to vindicate, even by texts of holy scripture, her unnatural and barbarous conduct towards her son, who perhaps well deserved such treatment, but not at the hands of his mother. Irene was thus deposed in 802, after having reigned ten years with her fon, and five alone.

> E Idem ad ann. 4. • Тнеорн. ad ann. Niceph. 1.

C H A P. XXXIV.

The Roman history, from the promotion of Nicephorus, to the death of Basilius II.

HE embassadors who had been sent, as we have related in the foregoing Nicephorus. chapter, by Charles the Great to propose a marriage between him and the empress Irene, in order to unite by that means once more the two empires, were, no doubt, greatly concerned at the unexpected revolution, which happened during their stay in Constantinople, and utterly disconcerted the ambitious views of their master. However, as they were injoined to conclude a firm and lasting peace with the eastern empire, they readily made their court to the new prince, who being well apprised of the advantages that might accrue to him from the friendship of Charles, received his embassadors in a very obliging manner, and the year following concluded a treaty with him, in virtue of which Charles was acknowledged emperor of Concludes a b the west, and all Italy to the rivers Vulturnus and Ausidus yielded to him. Nicephorus, treaty with in the third year of his reign, caused Nicetas Triphyllius, to whom he was chiefly in-Grant. debted for his promotion, to be taken off with poison, for no other crime but because he was beloved by the army. He gave several other instances of a most cruel, suspicious and covetous temper, which, as they rendered him odious to the people, encouraged Bardanes, governor of one of the eastern provinces, to revolt, and assume the Bardanes title of emperor. Michael and Leo, two officers of great reputation in the army, revolts; joined him at first; but soon after finding him unequal to so great a charge, they abandoned him, and went over to Nicephorus, who raised them to the first posts in the army. Bardanes, thus forfaken by his friends, fent a submissive message to Nice- But submits. c phorus, and, upon his promifing to pardon him, retired to a monastery, and there embraced a religious life. The emperor, pretending to be intirely reconciled to him, invited him in a friendly manner to Constantinople; but on his way to that city, his eyes were plucked out by persons sent for that purpose. The emperor, to prevent any future attempts of the like nature, and secure the crown to his family, took his fon Saturacius for his partner in the empire, and caused him to be crowned with the usual folemnity. Having thus settled his affairs at home, he marched against the Saracens, who had broken into the eastern provinces; but his army was Nicephorus utterly defeated, and he obliged to fave himself by a shameful slight, having nar-defeated by the rowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands. The following year the Saracens, Saracens. d to the number of three hundred thousand men, invaded the empire anew; and advancing without opposition as far as Tyana, the metropolis of Cappadocia Minor, made themselves masters of that city, and several other fortified places, extending their ravages to the very gates of Ancyra in Galatia. Nicephorus marched against them with what forces he could raise; but not daring to venture an engagement, he dispatched embassadors with rich presents to Aaron, their kalif, who with much ado was prevailed upon to grant a peace upon the following terms: That the em-Nicephorus peror should pay to the Saracens a yearly tribute of thirty thousand pieces of gold, concludes a disbelides three thousand for his own head, and as many for that of his son; and that honourable he should not presume to repair such forts as had been dismantled. Nicephorus agreed them. e to these terms; but the enemy was no sooner retired, than, with an open breach of the treaty, he rebuilt the forts that had been demolished; which so provoked the Saracens, that they returned the same year, and raged with more sury than ever, They invade putting all to fire and sword, both on the continent, and in the island of Cyprus, the empire where they demolished the churches, and put an incredible number of the inhabit-anew. ants to the sword. The following year they made a descent upon the island of Rhodes, and took a great number of prisoners; but their fleet suffered much by a violent storm, which overtook them as they were returning home x. The same year Nicephorus married his son Saturacius to Theophania, a near relation of the late

A tumult at Constantinople.

Nicephorus ravages with

He is defeated and flain.

Saturacius.

claimed empe-

empire.

empress Irene, though she had been some time before contracted to another, which a gave occasion to great complaints, and encouraged some to conspire against him: but they were all detected and punished with the utmost severity; nay, many persons of great distinction, ecclesiastics as well as laymen, were, upon bare suspicions, dragged to prison, and there either put to death, or racked with the greatest cruelty. In the The Bulgarians seventh year of his reign, the Bulgarians, making an irruption into the empire, under the conduct of Crumus, their king, surprised Sardica, a city of Masia, and put the whole garison, consisting of six thousand men, to the sword. Nicephorus marched against them with a considerable army; but the enemy retiring with their booty at his approach, instead of pursuing them, he returned to Constantinople, and imposed a new tribute upon the city for the repairing of Sardica; which incenfed them to b fuch a degree, that they rose in a tumultuous manner, and attacked the palace, but were repulsed by the emperor's guards with great slaughter. In the ninth year of his reign he raised a powerful army, and marching at the head of it, entered the country of the Bulgarians, destroying all with fire and sword. Crumus, their king, alarmed at his approach, fent embaffadors to fue for peace, which he offered to conclude upon terms highly honourable to the empire. But Nicephorus, rejecting them with indignation, pursued his ravages, wasting the country, destroying the cities, and putting all the inhabitants to the sword, who had the misfortune to fall into his hands, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. Crumus, sensibly affected the Bulgarians, with the calamities of his subjects, sent the emperor a second submissive message, c offering to agree to any terms, on condition he would quit his country. But Nicephorus difiniffing the embaffadors with scorn, Crumus, pushed on by despair, attacked unexpectedly the emperor's camp; and having forced it, in spite of all opposition, cut off almost the whole army, with the emperor himself, a great number of patricians, and most of the chief officers. Saturacius received a dangerous wound in the neck, but escaped in a litter to Adrianople. All the arms and baggage fell into the enemy's hands; and the body of Nicephorus being found among the flain, Crumus caused his head to be cut off; and after having kept it for some time exposed to the view of the foldiery, he inclosed the scull in silver, and made use of it instead of a cup y. Such was the end of Nicephorus, after having reigned eight years, as d many months, and twenty-fix days. He is faid to have been strongly inclined to the execrable doctrine of the Manichees, to have denied providence, and to have exceeded all the princes who reigned before him, in lewdness, cruelty, avarice, and all manner of debaucheries 2.

Saturacius fled, as we observed above, to Adrianople, where he was acknowledged emperor by some of the officers, who had escaped the general slaughter. But as he was not in a condition, on account of his wound, to appear in public, and at the same time knew himself to be universally hated both by the nobility and people, he resolved to confer the empire on his wife Theophania. But in the Michael pro- mean time the senate caused Michael, who had married Procopia, lister to Saturacius, e to be proclaimed emperor in the circus; which Saturacius no sooner understood, than he retired with his wife to a monastery, where he embraced a religious life, and died foon after, having reigned two months and ten days. Michael, mindful of the oath he had taken to Nicephorus and his fon, declined at first the imperial dignity; but being afterwards informed, that Saturacius, the better to secure the crown to his wife, had refolved to deprive him of his fight, he accepted the offer, and was crowned in the great church by Nicephorus, the patriarch, after he had by a folemn promife under his own hand obliged himself to maintain the privileges of the church, and to abstain from shedding christian blood 2. The new emperor a few days after Takes his for caused his wife Procopia to be likewise crowned by the patriarch with his son Theo- f for his collegue. phylast, whom he took for his partner in the empire. He was scarce warm in his throne, when the Saracens broke into the empire on one fide, and the Bulgarians on the other. The former were defeated and driven back by Leo, who governed the eastern provinces, with the loss of two thousand men. Against the Bulgarians Is defeated by Michael marched in person; but having, after several slight skirmishes, ventured an the Bu garrans, engagement, his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to fly back with shame and resigns the and difference to Constantinople. The emperor was affected with this misfortune to a fuch a degree, that he refolved to quit the purple, which required a person of a more warlike and active genius, and retire to a cloyfter. Accordingly he earneftly pressed Leo to accept of the empire, who, as he was free from all ambition, inviolably attached to Michael, and at the same time sensible of the dangerous state of affairs, was with much ado prevailed upon to comply with his request, tho' backed by the intreaties of the magistrates, the foldiery, and the patriarch. Michael no fooner understood, that Leo had in the end fuffered himself to be proclaimed emperor, than he retired with his wife Procopia, and his children, to the monastery of Pharus, where he took the monastic habit on the eleventh of July 813. after having reigned one year, nine months, and as many days h. Thus Theophanes, who lived at this b time, and was an eye-witness of what he wrote. But Cedrenus gives us a very different account of the promotion of Leo. According to that writer, Michael had the advantage in the engagement with the Bulgarians, till Leo, who aspired at the empire, drew off the forces under his command; which so disheartened the Romans, that they betook themselves to a disorderly flight, leaving the Bulgarians masters of the field. The emperor, with much ado, escaped to Adrianople, and from thence to Constantinople, attended by a finall body of horse. In his absence Leo, by exclaiming against him as a weak, effeminate, and cowardly prince, prevailed upon the army to revolt from Michael, and offer the empire to himself; which however he pretended to decline, Leo raised to till Michael Traulus or Balbus, one of the chief officers of the army, drawing his fword, the empire. as it had been agreed on beforehand, threatened him with present death, if he did not immediately comply with the earnest intreaties of the whole army, who, he said, placed their fafety, and that of the empire, in him alone. When news was brought to Constantinople of the revolt of the army, and the usurpation of Leo, some of the emperor's friends advised him to maintain his title, and prepare for a vigorous defence. But the good-natured emperor sharply reprimanded them, declaring he had rather lose his life, than involve the state in a civil war, which would be inevitably attended with the effusion of much christian blood. Accordingly he sent to Leo the diadem, the purple robes, and the scarlet shoes, the ensigns of sovereignty, requiring him to come, without the least apprehension of danger, to Constantinople, and take pos-fession of the imperial palace. Thus Cedrenus, to whose authority we should, withd out the least hesitation, prefer that of Theophanes, were we sure that the latter part of the history, which goes under his name, was done by him; but as some able critics pretend, that he concluded it with the reign of Nicephorus, and that the remaining part was added by fome other writer, who, favouring Leo, concealed his ambitious practices in obtaining the empire, we will not take upon us to decide whether Leo usurped the sovereignty, or was raised to it by the voluntary abdication of Michael. The new emperor, upon his arrival at Constantinople, took care to have Michael, and his wife, who had retired to the same monastery, separated; and therefore confined him to a monastery on the island Prota, and banished Procopia, with her children, to another place, having first caused Theophylast, their eldest son, to be cruelly maimed, that he might have no issue d. He had scarce taken possession of the throne, when the Bulgarians, elated with their late success, entered Thrace, destroying all with fire and sword. Leo having drawn together what forces he could, marched out against them, and offered them battle; which they not declining, great multitudes were slain on both sides, but at length the Romans, overpowered with numbers, were put to the rout. As they were pursued by the enemy in great disorder, Leo, who beheld all from a neighbouring eminence, falling unex-He gains a pectedly upon the barbarians with a referve of chosen men, who attended him, tory over the renewed the fight, and in the end obtained an intire victory. Great numbers of the Bulgarians. enemy were flain, and more taken prisoners. Some reckon the king himself, by f name Crumus, among the former; but others will have him to have been only wounded. However that be, the Bulgarians were so disheartened by this overthrow, that they made no inroads into the empire for some years after . The emperor having now nothing to fear either from the Bulgarians, or the Saracens, who were at variance among themselves, applied himself wholly to the suppressing of the wor- He opposes the thip that was paid to images. In order to this, he enforced the observance of the worship of council held at Constantinople in 754. under Constantinus Copronymus, and published images. an edict forbidding any worship to be paid to images, and commanding them to be

> * CEDREN. ZONAR. in Niceph. THEOPH. ibid. 7 THEOPH. ad ann. Niceph. 9. * THEOPH, ad ann. Niceph. 9.

b Idem ad ann. Mic. 2. CEDREN. in Leon. d ZONAR. CEDREN. in Mich. e Idem ibid.

removed

against him.

removed out of the churches. Nicephorus the patriarch, Nicetas a patrician, and a one of the empreis Irene's relations, Theodorus a monk in great reputation, Theophanes the historian, and many others, were banished for refusing to comply with the emperor's edict. But while the emperor was wholly intent upon redressing the Michael Balbus abuses both in the church and state, Michael, surnamed Balbus, or the stammerer, whom he had preferred to the first employments, conspired against him with a design to deprive him of the crown, and place it upon his own head. But the plot being But is seized discovered, Michael was apprehended, tried, and condemned to be burnt alive. But and condemned as the officers were leading him on Christmas eve to the place of execution, the empress Theodosia, by upbraiding her husband with cruelty and irreligion for not respecting that holy time, when he was to partake of the holy sacrament, prevailed be upon him to respite the execution. However, that the criminal might not in the mean time make his escape, the emperor ordered him to be loaded with irons, of which he kept the keys himself. But Michael having, by means of some religious persons, who had been admitted to him, with the emperor's permission, acquainted his accomplices, that he was determined to discover them to Leo, unless they speedily procured his release, alarmed them to such a degree, that they resolved, without loss of time, to put their design in execution. Accordingly, mixing themselves with those who performed divine service in the emperor's chapel, they were admitted early in the morning into the palace, and lay concealed in a corner of the chapel, till the emperor came to his devotions, when, upon a fignal agreed on beforehand, c they started up; but by mistake, as it was not yet day-light, fell upon the person who prefided over the clerks, or, as we may call him, the dean of the chapel. Leo. in the mean time, well appriled of their delign, retired to the altar, where he was attacked by the conspirators, now sensible of their mistake; but defended himself with the chain of the incensory, or, as some write, with the cross, till one of his hands being cut off, he fell to the ground, when the conspirators rushing upon him, L:0 murdered. dispatched him with many wounds, and in the end struck off his head f. Such was the end of Leo IV. after he had reigned seven years, five months, and sourceen days. His character. He is allowed, even by such as were his avowed enemies on account of his zeal in suppressing the worship of images, to have been a vigilant and active prince, and to d have reformed many abuses, that had long prevailed in the state. In conferring employments, he had regard to merit alone, was quite free from avarice, and endowed with many princely qualities; whence the patriarch Nicephorus, who had been banished by him, in hearing the news of his death, could not help owning him to have been a great, tho' a wicked prince. The body of the unhappy emperor was dragged to the circus, and there exposed for some time to public view. After this, the conspirators, having seized on the empress Theodosia, confined her to a monastery, and banished her four fons, viz. Sabbatius, called also Constantine, Basil, Gregory, and Theodosius, to the island Prota, where they were afterwards made eunuchs by Michael's Michael Balbus order, in which cruel operation Theodofius died. Michael in the mean time being e proclaimed em- fet at liberty, and conducted by the conspirators from the prison to the palace, placed himself upon the imperial throne, loaded, as he still was, with his irons, the keys being no-where found: at length the bolts being knocked off with a hammer, he repaired to the great church, where he was crowned by the patriarch.

Michael, thus raised to the empire, was a native of Amorium, a city of Phrygia, inhabited chiefly by Jews, and fuch christians as had been driven from their own countries on account of their heretical opinions. Michael himself observed the Jewish fabbath, denied the refurrection of the dead, and held feveral other tenets condemned by the catholic church 8. In the first year of his reign he recalled a great number of bishops, monks, and others, who had been banished by Leo for not complying f He is an enemy with his edict forbidding the worship of images, but at the same time summoned them to dispute in a council at Constantinople the point in question. With this summons they refused to comply, alledging, that as the worshipping of images had been already approved of and established by a general council, it could admit of no This answer greatly provoked the emperor, who nevertheless was so far from proceeding with rigour against them, that he indulged them in the use of images without the city. In the second year of his reign, and 823d of the christian æra, a civil war broke out in the east, which involved the empire in endless calamities.

to images.

2 It was raised by one Thomas, concerning whom authors are greatly divided in their Thomas reaccounts. According to some, he was meanly born, and at first a menial servant roles in the to a senator at Constantinople, whose wife he debauched, and then, to avoid the punishment due to his crime, fled to the Saracens, among whom, after he had continued for the space of twenty-five years, professing their religion, he obtained of their kalif a considerable body of troops, boasting, that he could easily subdue the whole Roman empire. The better to intice the Romans over to his interest, he gave out, that he was Constantine, the son of Irene. Others will have him to have been a man of great power in the east, and inviolably attached to Leo, whose death he resolved to revenge, and with that view took arms. However that be, he was a man of a b grave aspect, of extraordinary strength and courage, and acceptable to the soldiery on account of his affable and engaging behaviour. Being well received in the eaftern provinces by the inhabitants, who hated Michael, he foon raifed a very numerous army, and over-ran, without controul, all Asia, seizing every-where on the public Mikes himself revenues, and plundering fuch cities as refused to submit to him. And now being massler of Asia mafter of all Asia and Syria, he affumed the purple and diadem, and caused himself and Syria. to be acknowledged as emperor by the patriarch of Antioch. Michael, in the mean time, dispatched all the troops he could assemble against him; but Thomas, meeting them in Afia, gave them a total overthrow; and having with incredible expedition fitted out a strong sleet, he engaged and defeated that of the emperor; and then c croffing over into Thrace, appeared unexpectedly before Constantinople, not doubting Besteges Conbut the inhabitants would open their gates to him at his first approach. But to his stantinopie. great furprize, they received him with most opprobrious language, repulsed him in two fuccessive attacks, and in feveral fallies killed great numbers of his men. Thomas made the necessary preparations for a third assault, being resolved to make an utmost effort, and attack the city at the same time by sea and land. But a most violent storm arising, when he was upon the point of giving the signal, his sleet was dispersed, and his battering engines overturned, and rendered quite useless. This disappointment, and some successful sallies of the besieged, obliged him, as the season was already far advanced, to raife the fiege, and put his troops into winter-quarters, but d with a resolution to return before the city early in the spring; which he did accordingly: but Michael having in the mean time equipped a fleet, and raifed a landarmy, he met with far greater opposition at his return than he had done before. His army was routed with great flaughter in a fally, and his fleet driven ashore by that of the emperor. The usurper had in his army a commander of great valour and experience, named Gregory, who having been banished by Michael to the island of Scirus, because he was a near relation of Leo, the late emperor, had in the beginning of the war declared for the usurper, and been entrusted by him with the command of twelve thousand men; but now observing, that fortune, which had hitherto attended Thomas in all his undertakings, began to forfake him, he resolved to make e his peace with Michael, the rather because his wife and children were in his hands. This negotiation was not carried on so privately, but Thomas had timely notice of it, who thereupon leaving a fufficient number of troops before Constantinosle to carry on the siege, led the rest against Gregory; and coming up with him, while he was marching away with the forces under his command to join the emperor, defeated He defeats and his whole party, took him alive, but put him immediately to death, and then puts to death returned in triumph to pursue the siege. But in the mean time Mortagon, king of Gregory, who the Bulgarians, hearing the emperor was belieged in his metropolis, and either beiray him. pitying his condition, or desirous of gaining his friendship, marched at the head of a numerous army to his affistance. Thomas, when informed of his approach, was f some time in suspense, whether he should continue the siege, or march with all his forces against the barbarians, but at length resolved on the latter; and accordingly breaking up the siege, he met and engaged the Bulgarians at a place called Gedoclus, He is defented but was by them put to flight with great flaughter. Upon the news of his defeat, by the Bulgari-his fleet before Constantinople revolted to the emperor; which obliged him to lay aside all thoughts of pursuing the siege, and to retire to Diabesis, a place distant a few furlongs from the city; whence by his parties he laid waste all the neighbouring country. While he lay encamped there, the emperor ordered all his troops to march out against him, under the command of Catacelas and Olbianus, whom he received with great bravery, but was overthrown by the treachery of his own men, most of whom went over to the emperor in the heat of the engagement. Thomas, with much Vol. VI. Nº 8.

and put to death.

ado, escaped to Adrianople, where he was immediately besieged by the emperor's a Is delivered up forces, and at length delivered up to Michael by his own people, no longer able to to the emperor, endure the famine, and the unspeakable hardships, to which they were reduced. The emperor, having caused his hands and seet to be cut off, ordered him, thus maimed, to be carried upon an ass round the camp. He died soon after in the utmost agony. Anastasius, his adopted son, who for that honour had forsaken the monastic life, which he professed before, being delivered up to the emperor by the inhabitants of Byria; met with the same treatment as his sather had done. Pavium and Heraclea, two maritime cities of Thrace, which Thomas had seized, refused to submit, not so much out of affection to him, as out of hatred to the emperor; on account of his opposing the worship of images. But the walls of the former city were overturned b by an earthquake, and the latter was taken by storm. Some other cities and castles continued to hold out for some time, but they were all in the end reduced, and the civil war intirely extinguished b.

In the mean time the Saracens, who had fettled in Spain, and were grown too numerous for that country, taking advantage of the distracted state of the empire, having equipped several ships, dispatched them in quest of some fruitful island, in which they might plant a colony. Apochapsus, who commanded this squadron, having ravaged most of the islands in the Mediterranean without opposition, all the ships and garisons being gone to the assistance of Thomas, touched in the end at Crete; and being greatly taken with the fertility and pleasantness of that island, described it to e his countrymen upon his return as a place, to use his expression, flowing with milk and honey. Hereupon the Saracens having equipped, during the winter, a fleet confifting of forty ships, well armed and manned, put to sea early in the spring; and landing in the island, encamped on the promontory Charax, whence Apochapsus sent spies to discover the country, who upon their return informed him, that the island was quite destitute of soldiers, and that he would no-where meet with the least opposition. Hereupon he ordered the sleet to be set on fire, that his men, laying aside all thoughts of returning home, might look upon that island as their native country. The emperor, upon the first notice of this descent, dispatched Damianus with a considerable body of troops to drive the Saracens out of the island. Damianus, being d joined by Photinus, advanced, as foon as he had landed his forces, against the enemy, who killed him at the first onset, and put his whole army to flight, Photinus having with much ado made his escape in a light vessel, and carried the news of the overthrow to the emperor. The Saracens, having now no enemy to oppose them, built and fortified a city in a very convenient place, called Chandax, pointed out to them by a monk. From thence they made frequent excursions, and in a short time reduced the whole island, which by its new masters was thenceforth called Chandax, and by others Candia, from the above-mentioned city. This happened in the second year of the reign of Michael Balbus, and the 822d of the christian æra. Michael, thinking it would reflect eternal ignominy, if he suffered the Saracens to settle in Crete, as soon e

The Saracens

And settle

there.

The city of Candia built.

> as he had put an end to the civil war, dispatched Craterus, with a powerful fleet, and a numerous army, to recover the island. Craterus, having landed his men without opposition, fell upon the enemy with great resolution, who received him with equal intrepidity. The fight continued from day-break to noon, the victory inclining to neither side; but soon after the Saracens, great numbers of them being slain, and more taken prisoners, began to give ground, and towards the evening sled in great confusion. Had the Romans pursued them, they might have easily, in that consternation, cut them all off to a man, and made themselves masters of their city. But instead of following the fugitives, and affaulting, without loss of time, the place whither they had all retired, they spent the night in riot and drunkenness, as if the war had f been already concluded, without fo much as placing a guard or centry, to prevent their being surprised. The enemy, apprised of their security, resolved, however fatigued with the duty of the preceding day, not to neglect so favourable an opportunity of being revenged on their conquerors. Accordingly fallying out in the dead The emperor's forces defeated, of the night, they fell upon them while they were partly intoxicated with wine, and partly affeep, and cut them off almost to a man. Craterus, their general, with great difficulty escaped on board a small vessel to the island of Cos. But the prince of the Saracens, not finding his body among the flain, dispatched some vessels with and cut in pieces.

a troops after him, who landing on the island, surprised him, and nailed him to a cross. After this defeat, the emperor, despairing of being able to recover the island of Crete, contented himself with defending the other islands, and restraining the piracies of the Cretan Saracens k. Besides the loss of the pleasant and fruitful island of Crete, several other public calamities happened in this wicked emperor's reign, viz. Several public great conflagrations, destructive earthquakes, which overturned whole cities, inun-calamities. dations, strange phænomena in the heavens, general dearth and scarcity of provisions, violent storms, &c. which are all ascribed by Cedrenus to the contempt of images. But these calamities did not reclaim him from the loose and dissolute life which he led without any regard to religion, or the laws. In the fixth year of b his reign, his wife being dead, he forced Euphrosyna, the daughter of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, out of a monastery, where she had led from her infancy a recluse life, and married her. Soon after, Euphemius, an officer of great interest and authority in the army, falling in love with another facred virgin, and encouraged by the example of the prince, took her by force out of the monastery, and debauched her. Of this outrage her brothers made loud complaints to the emperor, who thereupon ordered the governor of Sicily, where the fact was committed, to examine into the matter; and if he found what was alledged against Euphemius to be true, to cut off his nose. To avoid this punishment, Euphemius drew several other officers of the army into a conspiracy; repulsed the governor, when he came to execute his orders; c and then flying to the Saracens in Africa, promised to betray Sicily into their hands, and pay them a large tribute, provided they would declare him emperor of the Romans. To this the Saracen governor of Africa readily consented; and having acknowledged him emperor, fent him back with a sufficient number of troops to Euphemius make good his title. He landed in Sicily without opposition; and advancing to acknowledged Syracuse, endeavoured, by a flattering speech, to persuade the inhabitants, who stood Saracens. on the walls, to open their gates to him, and own him for emperor. Among the rest he observed two brothers, who were men of great interest in the city, to pay him greater respect, and hear him with more attention, than the rest; which encouraged him to call them to him. But as he advanced from the rest of his company d to meet and salute them, one of them, taking hold of him by the hair, held him till the other cut off his head. The Saracens however did not quit the advantage He is killed. which he had put into their hands; but being thus introduced by him, made themfelves by degrees masters of the whole island; and passing over into Italy, landed at The Saracens Taranto; whence they drove the Romans, and got possession of Calabria, and the reduce Sicily. adjoining provinces 1. The emperor died foon after of a flux, having reigned eight Michael dies. years, nine months, and feven days; and was buried in the church of the apostles. His death happened on the first of October 829.

HE was succeeded by his son Theophylus, who, in the beginning of his reign, to Theophylus. gain the affections of the people, and prevent conspiracies, pretended to be a strict e observer of justice, and a severe assertor of the laws of the empire. Tho' his father owed both his life and dignity to the murder of Leo, yet he refolved to punish all those who had been any-ways accessary to it, in order to deter others from attempts of the like nature. With this view he summoned the chief of the nobility, and the great officers of the empire, to attend him in the palace Magnaura, or, as it was called from the five towers, Pentapyrgium. When they were assembled, he told them, that his father had in his life-time refolved to reward the eminent fervices of those, who had been instrumental in his promotion; but since death had prevented him, he thought it incumbent upon himself, as the executor of his father, to pay that debt. He therefore defired them to withdraw from the rest into a particular f room, where he would examine the merit of each person, and reward him accordingly. Hereupon those, who had been accessary to the murder of Leo, readily discovered themselves, in expectation of some great reward. But the emperor having thus got them, convicted by their own confession, into his power, he ordered one of his officers to put the laws against murder in execution, and to punish, according He punishes the to their deferts, those who had not only shed innocent blood, but had inhumanly murderers of massacred the anointed of the Lord within his temple. He then dismissed the assemble. bly, and the officer, pursuant to his orders, punished all those who had conspired against Leo as murderers m. After this he fent Euphrosyne back to the monastery, from whence his father had taken her, and applied himself with great diligence to a public affairs, hearing once a week all complaints that were brought against his minifters, administering justice with the utmost impartiality, and frequently visiting in person the markets, in order to settle the prices of the necessary provisions. In the He marries his third year of his reign he married his favourite daughter, by name Mary, to Alexius daughter to Alexius Mose flower of his age, and endowed with many excellent qualities. As he reposed in him an intire confidence, he conferred upon him the dignity of patrician, raised him to the proconfulship, and at last, as he had yet no issue-male of his own, created him Cafar, and fent him at the head of a numerous army to restrain the Saracens, who committed dreadful devastations in Italy. Being attended there with uncom- b mon fuccess, his rivals at court, jealous of the esteem he was in with the emperor. and the reputation he had acquired, represented him as one who aspired at the empire, strengthening their malicious suggestions with an old prediction, that A should one day drive out Th. This Alexius no sooner understood, than he desired leave of Theophylus to retire, and embrace a monastic life. The emperor, who gave no ear to these infinuations, denied his request, and commanded him to keep his rank and power. However, Theophylus having a fon foon after, and his daughter, who was married to Alexius, dying about the same time, he was at length prevailed upon, by Who embraces the repeated importunities of his fon-in-law, to comply with his request, and fuffer * monastic life. him to retire ". Besides Alexius, the emperor had two other eminent commanders, c viz. Manuel and Theophobus. The former had been raised by Leo, and the late emperor Michael, to the first posts in the army. The latter was the natural son of a Persian embassador, descended from the blood royal of that nation, who dying soon after the birth of his son, lest him at Constantinople, where he was educated after the Roman manner. All those of the royal family of Persia being either destroyed or driven out by the Saracens, who had made themselves masters of their country, the few Persians, who had outlived the general flaughter of their nation, hearing of Theophobus, sent to the emperor, desiring him for their king. But Theophylus chose rather to raise him to the rank of a patrician, and give him one of his sisters in marriage, giving at the same time, by a law enacted for that purpose, all his subjects d leave to intermarry with the Persians; which brought great numbers of that nation over to the Romans, who formed them into one body, called the Persian legion, from which the emperor promifed himself no small service in the expedition, which he was about to undertake against the Saracens, who had invaded the Roman territories. Against them the emperor, attended by Manuel and Theophobus, marched The Romans in person; but in the battle which ensued, the Romans, after a most bloody and defeated by the obstinate contest, gave ground, and fled in the utmost confusion. The emperor, with his guard, two thousand Perstans, and Theophobus, gained a neighbouring hill, The emperor in where he was immediately furrounded by the enemy, who exerted their utmost great danger. efforts to take him prisoner, his own men striving with equal resolution and intrepidity to defend him. The day being thus spent, when night came on, the Romans, by the advice of Theophobus, filled all on a fudden the air with loud acclamations, founding at the same time their trumpets, and other warlike instruments. The Saracens, deceived by this firatagem, and concluding they had received fome reinforcement, retired in great hafte, lest they should be surrounded; and gave the emperor an opportunity of making his escape to the rest of the army. The Perfians were so taken with the conduct of Theophobus on this occasion, that they addressed the emperor, begging he would suffer them to serve under him, in a separate body, which was readily granted. The following year he was attended with better success; The defeats the for having engaged the Saracens, he gained a complete victory, killed great num- f bers of them, and took above twenty thousand prisoners, whom he carried in triumph to Constantinople. This encouraged him to make another attempt the next spring; but his army was utterly defeated, and he himself in great danger of being taken prisoner, while he advanced too far into the enemy's ranks. Manuel, apprised of the danger he was in, broke through to him with a body of chosen men, in order to bring him off. But he refusing to retire, lest by his retreat he should discourage his army, Manuel presenting his sword to his breast, and telling him, that the flate would fuffer more by his captivity than by his death, threatened to kill him, Saracens.

* ldem ibid. 1 CEDREN. in Mich. ann. 8. Zonar. p. 173. m JOANN. CUROPUL. in Theophyl.

0 1

rd

æd

ĸ.,

Γ,

n-

and

W1S

by

čer

rs, c ite οſ

g

ed

Ţ,

ot

Sio

in

cîs d

00

OD,

ich

Ti-

ed

d

r, olt

ne- e

Mi,

ns, he

in-

he

7-

d

,

; 1- f

h

'n

of

n- b

a unless he retreated with him to the rest of the army. The emperor then complied, Manuel, and his chosen band, opening him a way through the midst of the enemy. Theophylus had, at first, a just sense of this eminent piece of service, styling Manuel his deliverer; but afterwards, envying him the reputation he had thereby acquired, and His ingratiashamed of being indebted to one of his subjects for his safety, he readily gave ear to tude to Mathe malicious infinuations of fome courtiers, accusing him of ambitious views, and nuel. privately resolved to deprive him of his fight; of which Manuel being seasonably informed by the emperor's cup-bearer, he fled to the Saracens, and, upon condition Wino flies to the he should not be obliged to change his religion, entered into their service, and was Saracens, foon raised to the highest honours, and trusted with the command of their armies b against the Cermata, a neighbouring nation, whom he overcame in several battles. The fame of his great exploits reaching Constantinople, the emperor, grieved for the loss of so brave and faithful a commander, resolved to bring him back by any means. Accordingly he wrote a letter to him with his own hand, inviting him home, and promiting to reinstate him in all his honours and employments. This letter being privately conveyed to Manuel by a monk, he received it with unspeakable joy, and waited only a favourable opportunity of complying with the emperor's kind invitation. He had hitherto declined fighting against the Romans; but now pretending a desire of being revenged on those by whom he had been unjustly accused to the emperor, he defired leave of Ishmael, prince of the Saracens, to make war upon the Romans in Casc padocia. Ishmael, highly pleased with this demand, not only gave him the command of a powerful army, but, as he had already given fignal proofs of his fidelity, appointed the young prince his fon to ferve under him. Being arrived in Cappadocia, while the army lay encamped at a convenient place for the execution of his defign, he went out with the young prince, under pretence of hunting; and being met, as had But returns to been agreed on before-hand between him and the governor of the province, by fome the Romans. Roman troops, he acquainted the prince with his design, desiring him to return to the army, and acquaint them with it. From Cappadocia he immediately repaired to Constantinople, where he was received with great solemnity by the emperor in the church of Belchernæ, raised to the highest post in the army, and chosen to stand as godfather d to his fon Michael, whom he foon after took for his partner in the empire. The following year the Saracens invaded Cappadocia under a general of their own nation, and the emperor marched against them in person; but both armies, seized, while they were already in fight of each other, with a panic fear, betook themselves to flight, and returned home, without coming to an engagement. The following year 837. Theophylus invaded Syria, ravaged the country far and wide, and having made himself master of several strong-holds, returned in triumph to Constantinople, leaving Theophobus to command the army. In his absence the Persians, now increased to The Persians thirty thousand, depending upon their strength and numbers, seized on Theophobus at musiny. Sinople, and, notwithstanding all his intreaties, protestations and arguments, declared e him emperor. Theophobus gave the emperor private notice of what had passed, assured The fidelity of him of his loyalty, tho' he had, in appearance, accepted of the imperial dignity, Theophobus. and laid hold of the first opportunity that offered to make his escape to Constantinaple, where he was received by the emperor with the greatest demonstrations of kindness, and continued in his former honours and employments. The rebellious Persians were, at his request, pardoned, and received into favour; but dispersed into several provinces 1. Theophylus, in ravaging Syria, had, notwithstanding the earnest intreaties of the prince of the Saracens, destroyed Sozopetra, the place of his nativity; which provoked him to such a degree, that, breathing nothing but revenge, he raised a The Saracens mighty army, ordering every soldier to engrave upon his shield the word Amorium, invade the emf the birth-place of Theophylus, and capital of Cilicia, which he was resolved, at all pire. events, to destroy. The emperor, informed of these mighty preparations, raised what forces he could, and marched with them to Dorylæum, distant about three days journey from Amorium. There, in a council of war, several officers advised him to decline an engagement with the Saracens, whose army was far more numerous than that of the Romans, and to remove the inhabitants of Amorium to some other place; but the emperor, imagining such a proceeding would reslect no small disgrace upon him, resolved to venture all in the defence of his native city; and accordingly sent thither a strong detachment, under the command of Aetius, general of the east, Theodorus

Defeat the Romans.

Amorium taken and destroyed.

Theophylus d.es.

His character.

Michael III. gent.

She persecutes

Craterus, Theophilus Bubutzicus, and other experienced generals. In the mean time a the prince of the Saracens dispatched his son, with ten thousand Turks, and a strong party of Armenians, to try the strength of the emperor's forces. The two armies met at a place called Dazymenum; whereupon an engagement ensuing, the Saracens were at first put to the rout; but the Romans, in pursuing the fugitives, were so galled by the arrows of the Turks, that they not only gave over the pursuit, but betook themfelves to a disorderly flight. The Persians however, tho' abandoned by the rest of the army, stood their ground, and surrounding the emperor, made head against the enemy, till night coming on, gave them an opportunity of retiring. The prince of the Saracens, informed of his fon's fuccess, marched directly to Amorium, and being there joined by the young prince, laid close siege to the place, which, after a long b and obstinate resistance, was in the end betrayed to him by one of the inhabitants, named Badiates, who, upon fome discontent, had abjured the christian religion. The Suracens, enraged at the resolute opposition they had met with, put most of the men to the fword, carried all the women and children into captivity, and levelled the city with the ground. The emperor was so affected with the destruction of the place, that, falling into a deep melancholy, he abstained from all rourishment, drinking nothing but snow-water, which threw him into a dysentery. Being apprised that his end approached, he caused himself to be carried to Magnaura; and having summoned the senate and chief officers of the empire to meet him there, he exhorted them in a pathetic speech to continue faithful to his wife and son, and protect them from all e treachery. After this, finking under the affliction of his mind, and diftemper of his body, he fainted away, and expired, having reigned twelve years, three months, and twenty days. Joannes Curopalates, whom we have followed in the history of this prince's reign, as the nearest to those times, tells us, that, when he was at the point of death, he commanded the head of Theophobus, who had been arrested upon some groundless suspicions, to be cut off, and brought to him; and that, touching it with his hand, he expired, uttering these words, Neither shall I be henceforth Theophylus, nor thou Theophobus o. But Zonaras and Cedrenus write, that he was put to death by one of the emperor's officers, without his knowledge P. He professed a greater enmity to images, and persecuted with greater severity than any of his predecessors had done, those who worshipped them. Hence he is painted by the writers of those times in the blackest colours; but his actions, even as they are related by his sworn enemies, speak him a prince endowed with many excellent qualities, an exact observer of justice, a true lover of his people, and an utter enemy to covetousness. Of the latter Cedrenus gives us the following instance: having one day observed from his palace a ship of great burden fraught with merchandize entering the harbour of Constantinople, he asked the mariners, To whom the cargo belonged? They answering, To the empress, he replied with great indignation, God has made me a prince, and my wife a merchant! Was ever any emperor before married to a merchant? Having thus spoken, he commanded the mariners to come ashore, and fire to be set to the vessel, e faying, If princes apply themselves to trade, their subjects must starve 9. He beautified the city of Constantinople with many stately edifices, and fortified it with new walls, which could not, on account of their height, by any art be scaled. He banished all loose and scandalous women out of the city, being a great enemy to all manner of dissoluteness, and a pattern of the antient Roman temperance, which he endeavoured to revive by several wholsome laws r.

Theophylus was fucceeded by his fon Michael; but as he was then only fix years old, Theodorare his mother Theodora took upon her the administration; which she began by exerting her zeal for the worship of images, recalling all those who had been banished on that account in the late reign, and banishing such as differed in opinion from her. She f drove from his see John the patriarch of Constantinople, and placed Methodius a monk, and zealous patron of images, in his room, ordering the second council of Nice, in and Manichees. which the worship of images was approved of and established, to be observed throughout the empire. Having thus, in a few years, utterly suppressed the iconoclasts, whose doctrine had prevailed in Constantinople, and most cities of the east, for the space of one hundred and twenty years, she fell in the next place upon the Manichees, of whom no fewer than an hundred thousand are faid to have been destroyed; which

O JOAN. CUROPAL. ibid. ZONAR. ibid.

P CEDREN. ZONAR. ibid.

<sup>4</sup> CEDREN. in Theoph.

r CEDREN.

111,

ne a

11

y

of

he

of

ng

Ċ,

hê

en

ity

ce,

g

1113

ım-

hem

his

int

me

ith

1115,

h by

nity

hofe

com

rver

lat.

ace

rii-

Τo

тy

hus

ified ralls,

d all

r of

ired

old,

ing

hac

nk,

in gh•

asts,

the bees,

hich

DIEY.

OVE

She f

siel, e

ng b

a drove the rest to despair and rebellion, having one Carbeas of that sect for their leader; who hearing that his father had been crucified on account of his persuasion, fled with four thousand of the same sect to the Saracens, and opened them a passage into the Roman territories, where they ravaged and unpeopled whole provinces. In the mean time the emperor, having attained the twentieth year of his age, began to think of governing by himself, being instigated thereunto by Bardas, brother to Theodora, who promifed himself mighty advantages from a change of affairs; but despairing of being able to succeed in his designs, so long as Manuel and Theostifus, whom the late emperor had appointed tutors to his son, continued near his person, he resolved, in the first place, to remove them by some means or other. He had scarce taken this b resolution, when a misunderstanding arose between those two faithful ministers; which Bardas improved with such art, that Manuel, quitting the court, retired to a Manuel retires private life. He being removed, Bardas easily persuaded the emperor, that Theoc- from court. tistus, having nothing less in view than the empire, designed to marry either the empress, or one of her daughters, and to render him incapable of governing, by depriving him of his fight. Upon these malicious, and altogether groundless, insinuations, Theolistus was, by the young prince's orders, apprehended, dragged to prison, and there most inhumanly murdered. Michael and Bardas resolved to finish Theoclistus what they had begun, by removing the empress, who, well apprised of their design, murdered. to spare them the crime of shedding more blood, determined to retire of her own accord. Accordingly, having summoned the senate, she laid before them the present c condition of the treasury, to obviate, by that means, the extravagant expences of her fon, and at the fame time to fhew them how careful and frugal she had been during her administration; for she had, by a commendable occonomy, not only spared the immense treasure left by her husband, but greatly improved it. After this, she resigned her power, and quitted the court, to the great satisfaction of her brother and The empress fon, now at liberty to act without restraint or controul. However, lest she should Theodora reattempt to resume the power she had so readily quitted, Michael ordered her, and her signs. three daughters, to be shut up in a monastery, where she died soon after of grief's. This happened in 855. after Theodora had governed the state for the space of fourteen years. Michael, thus free from all restraint, abandoned himself to the most insamous Michael a d debaucheries, taking pride in imitating Nero, whom he proposed to himself for his wicked and impattern, and even seemed to exceed in all manner of wickedness. He, in a short time, pious prince. squandered away the immense treasure lest him by his mother, being always attended by a crew of most extravagant, debauched and profligate wretches, whom, to expose to ridicule the most sacred things, he often caused to appear in copes and other vestments, in which priefts used to officiate, and in that apparel to imitate the most holy functions and ceremonies. One Gryllus, the most profligate of the crew, he styled patriarch; others he called metropolitans; and took to himself the title of one of the chief bishops. Thus attended, he used to walk in broad day-light, as in procession, through the streets, imitating and deriding the patriarch and his clergy. Having e once caused the infamous Gryllus to be apparelled like the patriarch, he sent for his mother in the name of Ignatius, who then held that see. The empress came immediately; but as she fell down upon her knees to crave his blessing, Gryllus, discovering himself, derided the piety of the good empress with indecent gestures, applauded with a loud laugh of the whole affembly . The diffolute prince, having in a short His predigality. time wasted all his treasures, was reduced to the necessity of melting down and coining certain trees of gold, which had been made in the late reign by a bishop named Leo, the greatest man of his age, and were the admiration of all who beheld them; for among the boughs were dispersed several golden birds, which, by the help of an engine, fung melodiously, while the spectators were at the same time no less agreeably f surprised and frightened by the roaring of a golden lion, effected by the same artifice. The prodigal emperor had likewise disposed of the imperial robes, and other curiosities, for which the palace was famous, had he not been prevented by death. In the year 854. he undertook an expedition against the Saracens, and laid siege to a city of theirs on the Euphrates; but the besieged sallying out upon the Romans while they were at their devotions on a Sunday, put the whole army to slight, and made them- Is routed by she selves masters of their camp, and all their baggage, the emperor himself having with Saracens. much-ado made his escape. Two years after, the Saracens, entering with an army of

JOANN, CUROPALAT. CEDREN. ZONAR. ibid. 1 Idem ibid.

thirty

thirty thousand men the Roman dominions, put the emperor to flight, tho' at the head a of forty thousand Thracians and Macedonians. The loss of this battle however was soon repaired by the good fortune of Petronas, the emperor's brother, who falling unexpectedly upon the Saracens in the neighbourhood of Ephesus, cut off the kalif himself, and his whole army, took his fon prisoner, and returned in triumph to Constantinople. In 860. Bardas created he raised his uncle Bardas, who had hitherto governed with an absolute sway, to the dignity of Cafar, in which high station he acted in a most arbitrary manner, without the least regard to the laws and customs of the empire. He divorced his wife, without being able to lay any thing to her charge, and married his own niece. Hereupon the holy patriarch Ignatius refused to communicate with him on the feast of the epiphany; which provoked him to such a degree, that having affembled a synod at Constanti- b nople, he suborned several false witnesses, who accused Ignatius of having murdered his predecessor Methodius; upon which he was deposed, and thrown into prison, Photius being raised to the patriarchal see in his room; which occasioned great disturbances at Constantinople. In 867, the emperor, at the persuasion of Bardas, who ruled with an absolute sway, undertook an expedition against the Saracens, who had fettled in Crete, whence they were continually infesting the coasts of the empire, and made this year a descent upon Thrace, penetrating far into the country, and committing every-where dreadful ravages. Against them the emperor marched in person, attended by Bardas; and arriving at a place called Chorus, ordered his army to encamp there. The fervants of Bardas, whether on purpose or unadvisedly, is un- c certain, pitched their mafter's tent on a hill, which overlooked the emperor's pavilion placed in the plain. This the emperor seemed to resent; and the enemies of Bardas at court, laying hold of that opportunity to convince the prince how much reason he had to be jealous of so insolent and ambitious a favourite, incensed him to such a Heismurdered degree, that he gave them private orders to dispatch him; which they did accordingly on the first of April of the present year. The soldiers, upon the news of his death, began to mutiny, and would have revenged it upon the emperor himself, had he not privately retired from the army, and returned to Constantinople u. The ruin of Bardas made room for Basilius, the emperor's great chamberlain, and the chief author and promoter of the late murder; for the emperor, who had an utter aversion d to all manner of business and application, immediately committed to him the whole management of public affairs, and foon after, that is, on the twenty-fixth of May of the same year, declared him his partner in the empire. Basilius was born in Macedon, but an Armenian by descent, and, according to Cedrenus, descended from the royal family of the Arsacida; but others affirm, he was come of mean and obscure parents. At the facking of Adrianople by Crumus king of the Bulgarians, being then a child, he was carried into captivity with his parents; but fet at liberty upon the conclusion of the peace. As he was tall in flature, of a comely afpect, and well-shaped, Theophilizes, a nobleman of great distinction, took him into his family, and appointed him his protostrator, that is, his gentleman of the horse. Having soon after tamed an e unruly horse belonging to the emperor, he was, by the interest of Bardas, taken into the emperor's fervice, and raised to the post of master of the horse; which giving him an opportunity of converling often with the prince, he gained, by degrees, a great afcendant over him, and was advanced to the high office of great chamberlain. Hereupon Bardas, jealous of the credit he was in with the emperor, and looking upon him no longer as his creature, but his rival, resolved on his destruction. But Basilius, apprised of his design, was before-hand with him, as we have related above. Basilius, being upon the death of Bardas advanced to the imperial dignity, did all that lay in his power to redress the many abuses that had crept into the state, and to reclaim Michael from his vicious courses; but the dissolute prince was so far from sol- f lowing his wholfome counfels, that he refolved to rid himself of so troublesome a censor; which hastened on his own ruin: for Basilius, finding he could by no other means fave himself, but by destroying his collegue, entered one night his room, while he was drunk and afleep; and, with the affiftance of fome others privy to his defign, wounds, after he had reigned fourteen years with his mother, and five years, three partner in the empire.

Michael takes

Michael mur- first cut off both his hands as he held them up, and then dispatched him with many months alone ".

" Idem ibid. CEDREN. ZONAR, in Mich.

W CUROPALAT. ZONAR. CEDREN. ibid.

Bafilius, now fole mafter of the empire, governed with great justice and modera-Bafilius. tion, preferring fuch only as were persons of known probity, and allowing all his fubjects free access to him; which greatly endeared him to his people, who looked upon him rather as their father than their prince. However, in the very beginning of his reign a conspiracy was formed against him by George and Symbatius, two patricians; but it being seasonably discovered, their eyes were put out, and their accomplices banished. To obviate any suture attempts of the same nature, in the second year of his reign he raifed his eldest son Constantine to the imperial dignity, and in the third he created Leo and Alexander, his second and third sons, Casars. As for his fourth son, by name Stephen, he caused him to take orders, with a design to raise b him to the patriarchal fee. His four daughters took the religious habit in the monastery of St. Euphemia, where they led exemplary lives. Having thus settled his domestic affairs, he resolved to make war upon the Manichees. We have observed above, that in the late reign one Carbeas, a Manichee, fled, with five thousand of the fame fect, to the Saracens, with a defign to revenge the death of his father, who had been crucified on account of his persuation. Great numbers of the persecuted Manichees flocking to him for shelter, he made frequent inroads into the Roman territories from three strong-holds in Armenia, viz. Arganum, Armera, and Tephrica, which had been yielded to them by the Saracens. Against these Manichees Basilius marched in per-Hebreaks the fon, laid waste their country, took or killed their best commanders, and returned Manichees. c with an immense booty to Constantinople; which city he entered in triumph. The following year the Manichees, resolved to revenge the losses they had sustained, broke unexpectedly into the empire, under the command of Chrysochir; but being met by the imperial troops, they were almost to a man cut off, with their leader, whose head was sent to Constantinople. By this deseat the strength of the Saracens was so broken, that they were never afterwards in a condition of molesting the empire, as they had done for several years together. Encouraged with his success against the Manichees, His success he entered Syria the following year 880. attended by his eldest son Constantine, reco-against the Savered several strong-holds out of the hands of the Saracens, and took an incredible racens. number of prisoners. On his return he made himself master of Casarea, the metrod polis of Cappadocia, and of feveral other strong-holds, which he levelled with the ground. The prisoners he took in this expedition were so numerous, that not being able to spare sufficient forces to guard them, he commanded multitudes of them to be put to the fword; which struck such terror into the Saracens, that some of their governors not only submitted, but joined the emperor against their own nation. The African Saracens, and those of Crete, attempting to invade the empire, were likewife defeated with great flaughter, and the fleet of the former utterly destroyed by Nazar the Roman admiral. These extraordinary advantages were, in some degree, Syracuse taken counterbalanced by the loss of Syracuse, which the Saracens of Cartbage took and by the Saradestroyed. Adrian, a patrician, who had been sent to relieve it, arriving too late, cens, and detended the emperor, upon his return to Constantinople, caused him to be dragged from the great church, where he had taken fanctuary, and fent him into exile x. Basilius, at fuch times as he was not engaged in wars, busied himself in building and repairing churches, of which Cedrenus mentions a great number. Zonaras blames him for erecting and dedicating so many churches to the honour of St. Michael, as if he had deligned thereby to expiate the murder of the emperor Michael. His eldest fon Constantine being dead, he raised his second son Leo to the imperial dignity, who being offended at the great sway which Theodorus Santabarenus, by prosession a monk, but commonly reputed a magician, bore at court, endeavoured to remove him from the emperor's presence. Of this the jealous monk was soon apprised, and therefore f resolved to destroy him. With this view, pretending to have private intelligence The treachery of a conspiracy against Basilius, which was to be put in execution while he was hunt- of a monk. ing, he first persuaded the young prince privately to arm himself, and some of his attendants, that he might be ready to oppose any attempt upon the life of his father; and then haftening to the emperor, told him in great confernation, that his fon defigned to murder him; that his defign was to be put in execution the first time he went out to hunt; and that, if he caused him to be searched, he would find him armed accordingly. The emperor, giving ear to the wicked and malicious infinuations of the monk, ordered his fon to be searched; and a dagger being found under

Leoimprisched his garments, committed him to close prison in an apartment of the palace, where a his eyes had been put out at the instigation of the monk, had not the patriarch and the fenate interposed in his behalf. However, he was long kept under close confinement;

but at length released, at the earnest and repeated intreaties of the senate, and restored to his former dignity. Curopalates tells us, that the emperor having forbidden the fenate to mention to him the young prince's name, or make any further application in his favour, while he was one day entertaining several of the nobility, a parrot, which hung up in a cage in the room, in imitation of some, who used to lament there the unfortunate prince's condition, cried out all on a sudden, Alas, unhappy Leo! His friends, laying hold of that opportunity, as if the bird reproached them with their neglect, notwithstanding the emperor's prohibition, renewed their former applicabions; to which Basilius at length yielded v. Basilius not long after died, having reigned eighteen years, ten months, and seven days. Cedrenus writes, that he was carried off by a diarrhœa; but Zonaras tells us, that while he was hunting, a flag thrusting his horns under his girdle, and lifting him up from the ground, shook him with fuch violence, that he died foon after. The fame writer adds, that one of the emperor's attendants having disengaged him from the stag, by cutting his girdle, he, instead of rewarding him, caused his head to be cut off, for drawing his sword in the presence of his sovereign. But of this no mention is made either by Cedrenus or Curopalates. Some pretend, that, before he died, he embraced a monastic life, but without divesting himself either of his power, or the ensigns of majesty. It is certain, c that, towards the latter end of his reign, he addicted himself intirely to the conver-His instructions sation of monks, and to works of piety. To his son Leo, whom he appointed his to his fon Leo. fuccessor, he left, with the empire, some excellent maxims or rules of government, comprised in fixty-fix chapters, the initial letters of which form the following sentence; Basilius, emperor of the Romans in Christ, to Leo his dear son, and collegue in the empire. The maxims contained therein are truly worthy of a great prince, and a christian philosopher. Bafilius made a new collection of the laws, known by the name of bafilicæ, that is, royal or imperial laws; for they did not take their name, as some have imagined, from the emperor Basilius, by whose orders they were compiled. They were written in the Greek tongue, the Latin, in which the laws of Justinian were d compiled, being at this time scarce understood in the eastern empire. Basilius is, by all the antient writers, deservedly ranked among the best emperors. Basilius was succeeded by his son Leo, whom he had taken for his partner in the empire, upon the death of his eldest son Constantine. The new prince was a great lover of learning, and so well versed in all the branches of literature, that he deservedly acquired, as Antoninus had done, the furname of Philosof bus. His first care was to punish Theodorus Santabarenus the monk, whom he ordered to be whipt in an ignominious manner, and then banished him to Athens, where his eyes were put out, Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, had favoured Theodorus, and conspired with him to raise a kinsman of his own to the throne; he had besides raised great disturbances in the church: for which crimes he was, by Leo's orders, deposed, and banished into Armenia, Stephen, the emperor's brother, being raised to the patriarchal see in his He honours the room. To shew his gratitude to the emperor Michael, who had first preferred his father, and had been murdered by him, he caused his body to be conveyed with extraordinary pomp from the monastery of Chrysopolis, where it had been interred, to the church of the Apostles in Constantinople, and there to be deposited in a stately monument of marble. In the year 893, the eighth of Leo's reign, a war broke out between the Romans and Bulgarians on the following occasion: A great trade had been long carried on between the two nations, and the public mart was kept at Constantinople, whence it was, at the request of some merchants, removed to Thessalonica. There f the collectors of the customs oppressing with new and unlawful impositions the Bulgarian merchants, Simeon their king having first applied in vain to the emperor for redress, resolved to do himself justice; and accordingly, entering the Roman territories at the head of a powerful army, ravaged and laid waste the country as far as Macedon, where he was met by the Roman army, under the command of Procopius Crenites and Curticius, who were both cut off, with most most of their men, in the engagement that enfued. Simeon, having taken in the purfuit a great number of prifoners, caused their noses to be cut off, and sent them back thus deformed to Con-

Balilius dies.

Lco.

memory of Michael.

His army defeated by the Bulgarians.

a stantinople. The emperor, highly provoked at this outrage, prevailed upon the Ungri or Hungarians, whom our author styles Turks, to invade the country of the Bulgarians on one fide, while he entered it on the other. Against the Hungarians Simeon marched in person; but was by them utterly deseated, the flower of his army being cut off, and he himself with much-ado escaping to a city named Dorostolum, whence he fent embassadors to Leo suing for a peace; which was readily granted him upon very honourable terms. But the emperor's forces were no fooner withdrawn, The treachery than Simeon fell unexpectedly upon the Hungarians; and having put them to flight, of the Bulgaravaged their country, destroying all with fire and sword. Leo, provoked at this breach of the treaty, and more at his new and unreasonable demands, resolved to b fall upon him with the whole strength of the empire, and utterly destroy him. A powerful army was accordingly raised, and sent into Bulgaria, under the conduct of Catacalon, and Theodosius a patrician. But Simeon, who carefully watched their motions, falling unexpectedly upon them, cut most of them in pieces, with Theodofius, and a great number of officers of distinction; which obliged the emperor to submit to the best terms he could obtain 2. While Leo was engaged in these wars abroad, several conspiracies were formed against him at home; which however were seasonably discovered, and the conspirators sent into exile, the emperor being averse to the shedding of blood. In 901. the empress Theophano, or, as others call her, Theophania, being dead, the emperor married one Zoe, the most beautiful woman of her age, whom he The emperor c had kept as his concubine in his wife's life-time, and caused her to be crowned with marries a the usual folemnity, conferring at the same time on her father, by name Zantzas, the cond and third title of Father of the emperor. Zoe did not long enjoy her new dignity, and, upon her death. Lee married to be chief wife. her death, Leo married to his third wife a lady of extraordinary beauty, named Eudocia; but she dying in child-bed, together with the infant, Leo, who had yet no iffue male to succeed him, married to his fourth wife another Zoe, who brought him a son, called Constantine. This fourth marriage, which was then held unlawful, gave rise to great disturbances and divisions in the church of Constantinople; for Nicolaus Mystieus, at that time patriarch, not only declared against the marriage, but excommu- Is excommuninicated the emperor; who thereupon, after having earnestly begged, but in vain, to cated for marriage. d be restored to the communion of the church, confined the patriarch to a monastery, rying a fourth. and placed one Euthymius Syncellus in his room. Some of the clergy adhered to Nicolaus, and others to Euthymius; which occasioned a schism in the church. Though Euthymius restored the emperor to the communion of the faithful, yet he resolutely opposed him, when, by the advice of the senate, he was about to publish an edict, declaring it lawful to marry the fourth time. Leo had formerly published an edict, subjecting those who married thrice to the penalties which had been decreed against them by some antient councils, and the clergy would not suffer him to revoke that edict 2. Some time before his fourth marriage, as he was going on Whitfunday in a folemn procession to the church of St. Mocius, as was customary on that day, a person e of a mean condition, watching that opportunity, just as he entered the church, gave An attempt him such a blow on the head with a club, that he fell to the ground, and those about upon the empehim believed him dead; and truly he had been killed upon the spot, had not the vio- ror's life. lence of the blow been broken by a chandelier, which hung in the way. Alexander, the emperor's brother, was thought to have been privy to this attempt; but no proof could be alledged against him, the traitor, though tortured in a most cruel manner, obstinately resulting to discover his accomplices. As they could extort nothing from him, he was burnt alive in the circus, after his hands and feet had been cut off b. The following year 902. the fixteenth of Leo's reign, the Saracens, having equipped a mighty fleet, took Taurominium in Sicily, reduced the island of Lemnos, and ravaging Taurominium f without controul the coasts of Asia, threw the imperial city itself into great consterna- and Thessalotion. In the end of the summer they laid siege to The flatonica, which they took, and nica taken by would have destroyed, had it not been redeemed with a large sum by Simeon, one of the Saracens, the emperor's fecretaries, who was on that account raifed to the rank of a patrician. Leo, not able to make head against the Saracens at sea, raised a powerful army, which he sent into the east, under the conduct of Eustathius Argyrus, and Andronicus Ducas, in order to attack them by land; which they did with great success, having who are dogained several victories over them. However, the year following they invaded with feated by the * Vide Const. Porphyrogen, in præamb. ad edict. unionis.

Idem in Leon. ZONAR. CEDREN. ibid.

LEO GRAMMAT, 1. iii. & iv.

a mighty army the Roman territories; which obliged the emperor to dispatch Himerius and Andronicus Ducas against them. They were both generals of great courage, experience, and conduct; but a satal misunderstanding between them, which was owing to the malicious intrigues of one Samonas, put a stop to the progress of their

Samonas, a Saracen by birth, and formerly chamberlain to the emperor, having discovered a conspiracy, had been, on that account, advanced to the first employments in the state. Having by that means acquired immense wealth, he attempted to escape into his own country, carrying with him his treasures; but was stopped upon the road, and brought back to Constantinople by Constantine Ducas, the son of Andronicus. The emperor, provoked at his thus abandoning him, notwithstanding the many favours he had heaped upon him, kept him for some time under close con- b finement; but in the end reftored him to his former rank and honours. As Samonas bore an irreconcilable hatred to Andronicus, on account of his fon Constantine, by whom he had been intercepted on his way home, he prevailed upon one of that general's intimate friends, with a large fum, to warn him by letter not to join Himerius, who, he said, had orders from the emperor to put out his eyes as soon as he had him in his power. Andronicus, giving credit to this letter, refused to join Himerius, who nevertheless engaged the Saracens, and gave them a total overthrow. Andronicus, dreading the emperor's indignation, seized a castle near Iconium, called Cabala, with a delign to revolt; which Samonas no sooner understood, than making use of all his authority at court to his destruction, he prevailed upon the emperor, with his artful c infinuations, to declare Andronicus a traitor, and to dispatch a strong army against him, under the command of Iberitzas Gregoras. Hereupon Andronicus, despairing of pardon, fled to the Saracens, by whom he was received with the greatest demonstrations of kindness and esteem. Leo, greatly concerned for the loss of so brave a commander, who had hitherto ferved him with much honour and integrity, and dreading him as an enemy, resolved to persuade him, if possible, to return home. this view he released a Saracen captive, on condition he delivered to Andronicus a letter, wherein the emperor invited him home, promised to restore him to his former honours, and gave him repeated affurances of his friendship and esteem; but the captive, bribed by Samonas, instead of conveying the letter to Andronicus, delivered it d to the kalif, who immediately caused the unfortunate Andronicus, with his son Constantine, and the rest who had attended him in his slight, to be thrown into prison, where they were treated with the utmost cruelty. Andronicus soon perished under the hardships he endured; several others purchased their liberty by renouncing their religion; but Constantine, the son of Andronicus, made his escape, with a small number of attendants, and tho' pursued, sometimes by fighting, and sometimes by casting gold in the way, and by that means diverting the greedy foldiery, got fafe to Confrantinople, where he was kindly received by the emperor, and feafted upon his arrival in the golden room. We are told, that as he was departing, when the banquet was over, the emperor, calling him back, warned him not to fuffer himself to be so far misled by the omen of his name as to aspire at the empire; adding, that he had been assured by those who could foretel things of that nature, that his own fon Constantine was destined by Heaven to the empire; and that, if Ducas ever attempted the imperial dignity, his head would be inevitably cut off, and brought through the gate of that very place where he was now treated with fo much honour and magnifi-The event confirmed the truth of this prediction, as we shall relate anon. About this time Samonas, the emperor's chief favourite, who had hitherto governed with an absolute sway, was at length disgraced on the following occasion: He had recommended a youth, named Constantine, by birth a Paphlagonian, to wait on the Ducas, difgraced, flies to the Saracens.

Andronicus

frantine returns to Constantinople.

He dies; but bis fon Con-

Samonas difgraced.

ŵ.

empress, who, being greatly taken with his address, and other good qualities, used fall her interest to preser him. This gave no small jealously to Samonas, who, apprehending he might in time be supplanted by this new savourite, did all that lay in his power to remove him; but finding all his efforts ineffectual, he arrogantly accused the empress of too much familiarity with him, and even had the boldness to publish a libel against the emperor himself, who, finding him to be the author of it, confined him to a monastery, and appointed his rival Constantine great chamberlain in his room. In 911, the twenty-sixth and last year of his reign, the Saracens, under the

٩

a on the coasts, and in the islands of the Egean sea, Himerius was sent with a powerful fleet against them; but in a sea-fight near the island of Samos, the Roman navy was The Roman theet against them; but in a lea-night near the mand of sames, the same has a fleet defeated utterly defeated, Himerius himself having with much difficulty escaped to Mitylene, fleet defeated by the Stracens. The emperor did not long outlive this calamity; but died of the colic on the ele- Leo dies. venth of May of the present year, after having reigned twenty-five years, and three months. He left behind him only one fon, by name Constantine; but as he was scarce five years old, he bequeathed the empire to his brother Alexander, after having earnestly intreated him to leave it at his death to his son Constantine, whom he recommended to his care d. Leo is allowed on all hands to have been a prince of great pru-His character dence, and an uncommon penetration in the management of public affairs. He is and works.

b highly extolled by the ecclefiastic writers, on account of his zeal for the purity of the catholic faith, and by them compared to the most zealous and vigilant among their bishops. As he was a man of great learning, he left several works behind him, viz. a letter to Omarus king of the Saracens, concerning the mysteries and truth of the christian religion, and the herefies and blasphemies of the Saracens; a book of military discipline, which has been translated into Latin; another on hunting; several theological and historical tracts, still to be seen, tho' strangely maimed and corrupted, in the Vatican library; a circular letter, which, in imitation of the bishops, he wrote to all his subjects, encouraging them to the practice of every christian virtue; but as he applied himself above all to the study of the law, he new-modelled the Roman c jurisprudence. His father Basilius had, in the year 870, with the affistance of his two fons Constantine and Leo, published an epitome of Justinian's code, which he called procheiron. This work, which consisted of forty titles, is still to be found among the manuscripts in the Valican library. It is by some ascribed to Basilius; Constantine and Leo, by others only to Leo and Constantine, and by some to Leo alone; whence Cujacius, and other civilians, conclude it to have been revited by Leo, and brought into a better form. Leo, not fatisfied with that, published about the year 886. his basilieæ, divided into fixty books, and fix volumes. In this great work the emperor followed the order which Justinian had observed in his laws; for it was compiled from his code, edicts, novellæ, and from the constitutions of the succeeding d emperors down to Basilius, whatever was superfluous, or had been abrogated by the custom of after-times, being retrenched. The basilica were no sooner published, than the books of Justinian were quite laid aside, both in the schools and courts of justice. Leo dying, his son Constantine revised and corrected the basilica, which had been published by his father, and ordered them, thus corrected, to be made use of both at the bar and in the schools. The basilica of Leo were called priores, and those of Constantine posteriores; but the latter alone were in force, and continued to be the foundation of the Greek jurisprudence to the end of the empire .

Leo being dead, his brother Alexander was by the senate and people acknowledged Alexander 4 emperor; but he, in the very beginning of his reign, gave such instances of his cruelty, debauched e avarice and debauchery, as rendered him odious to all his subjects. Those who seemed prince. to discountenance him in his lewd and dissolute courses, he banished under various pretences, placing persons of most infamous characters in their room, and suffering himfelf to be intirely governed by debauchees and proftitutes. He was so taken with one Basilitzas, a person of a mean descent, but of a most dissolute life, and his inseparable companion in the most abominable extravagancies, that he resolved to settle the empire on him, and, by castrating his nephew Constantine, to deprive the young prince of all hopes of fuccession. But he was diverted from such an unpopular attempt, by some of the late emperor's friends representing to him, that the child, who was of a weak and fickly conftitution, would, in all likelihood, be foon removed out of the way I by a natural death. In the mean time he banished the empress Zoe from the court, fuffering none to continue there, but such as were slaves to his sensual pleasures, and subservient to his brutish appetites. Simeon, prince of the Bulgarians, no fooner heard of his accession to the empire, than he dispatched embassadors to him to renew the treaties of peace and friendship concluded by former emperors between the two He provokes nations; but Alexander, instead of cultivating the friendship of that warlike and power- the Busgarians ful nation, dismissed their embassadors in an ignominious manner; at which Simeon justly provoked, invaded with a mighty army the Roman territories, destroying all

d CUROPALAT. ZONAR, CONST. MANASS. GLYCAS, ibid. obser. c. 10. Doviat. hist. jur. civil. p. 47.

* STRUV. hist. jur. Græc. c. 4. Cujac. 1. vi.

Alexander, instead of offering to oppose him, pursued without a

He dies. Coalt atine

empire.

with fire and sword.

interruption his dissolute courses, till death, hastened on by his intemperance, delivered the world from so pernicious a monster. As he was one day using violent exercise, after having eaten and drunk to a great excess, some of the vessels breaking, he continued to bleed inwardly till he died. Before his death, which happened in 912. after he had reigned about a year and a month, he declared Constantine his succeffor; but appointed him for his governors, as he was yet a child, such persons as had been most subservient to him in his infamous pleasures, and were, on that account, despised and abhorred by all men of honour and integrity. This encouraged Confantine Ducas, the son of Andronicus, of whom we have spoken above, to attempt the fovereignty, notwithstanding the warning given him by the late emperor; but as b he endeavoured to force the imperial palace, after he had been proclaimed emperor by his friends in the circus, he was seized by the guards, who immediately cut off his head, and carried it to the emperor. With him fell the hopes of his party, most of his accomplices, who were men of great power and authority in the city, being discovered, and punished either with death or banishment. During these domestic The Bulgarians broils, Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, having laid waste Thrace, was advanced to the break into the very gates of Constantinople, which city he had great hopes of reducing in a short time; but the unexpected and vigorous opposition he met with from the inhabitants, obliged him, after several unsuccessful attempts, to abandon the enterprize, and retire to Hebdomon, whence he fent embassadors to the young prince's governors, with overtures for a treaty; which were received with great joy. While the negotiations were carrying on, Simeon was admitted to dine with the emperor in the palace of Blacherna, whence he returned home loaded with rich presents. Cedrenus writes, that a peace was concluded; but Zonaras affures us, that the treaty was broken off, before it could be brought to a happy conclusion, the prince of the Bulgarians refusing to submit to the conditions infifted upon by the regents. If an agreement was made, it was broken foon after, as we shall relate anon. In the mean time the regents, disagreeing amongst themselves, at the earnest request of the people of Constantinople, and of the young prince himself, recalled to court the empress Zoe; who, having soon got all the power into her own hands, removed from the emperor's presence the favourites of Aexander. herown hands, and put others in their room, who were better qualified for that high trust f. Zoe

The Bulgarians had scarce taken upon her the administration, when the Bulgarians broke into the invade the em- empire on one fide, and the Saracens on the other. The former, after having laid wafte Thrace, fat down before Adrianople, which was betrayed to them by one Pancratucus an Armenian, whom Simeon had bribed with rich presents. The Saracens, under the conduct of Damianus, kalif of Tyre, having equipped a powerful fleer, committed great devastations on the coasts. Zoe, thus attacked by two powerful enemies at once, refolved, pursuant to the advice of the senate, to make peace upon any terms with the Saracens, and employ the whole strength of the empire against the Bulgarians. Accordingly a treaty was happily concluded with the former, and a mighty army fent against the latter, under the conduct of Leo Phocas, who, having mustered his numerous forces in the spacious plain of Diabasis, led them strait against the enemy, encamped at a small distance. Before the engagement, Constantine, the chief chaplain of the palace, or, as he was skyled protopapa, exposing the wood of the holy cross to the view of the whole army, commanded them to kneel down, and swear, that they would fight to the last. After this, both armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expressed; but the Romans prevailing after a most obstinate dispute, the Bulgarians sled in the utmost confusion. The victory however was unluckily matched out of their hands by the following accident: Lee, the Roman general, alighting at a fountain to quench his drought during the pursuit, his horse broke loose, while f he stooped down to drink. The foldiers, who knew him, seeing him without a rider, concluded from thence, that their general was flain, and thereupon giving over the pursuit, began to retire in a disorderly manner; which Simon quickly perceiving, rallied his men, and facing about, fell unexpectedly upon the Romans, put them to flight, and purfued them with great flaughter, not only great numbers of the common foldiers being flain in that confusion, but many officers of great distinction 4. this unhappy mistake some ascribe the dreadful overthrow which the Romans received on this occasion; but others relate the matter in a quite different manner. They tell

The empress

Zoe gets all

the power into

The Romans defeated.

2 us, that while Lee was bufy in the pursuit of the enemy, news was brought him, that Romanus Lacapenus, the admiral, a man of great power and authority, who had been ordered to hover on the coast with his fleet, and assist Leo, if required, was returned to Constantinople, with a design to seize on the empire in the absence of the army, and the chief officers. Upon this intelligence, Leo, fay they, who had the fame ambitious view, returned immediately to the camp, the better to be informed of the truth. But the foldiers, imagining he retired out of fear, were fo discouraged, that they turned their pursuit into a sudden and disorderly slight h. Simeon, slated with this unexpected success, resolved to return before Constantinople; but two strong detachments from his army being met on their march by the imperial troops, Two parties of and utterly defeated, he thought it adviseable to drop that enterprize, and return the Bulgarians home. In the mean time the two rivals, Leo and Romanus, returning to court, began routed. to plot, not only against the emperor, but against each other; for they had both nothing less in view than the fovereignty. But the faction of Romanus prevailing at length over that of Lao, the latter was declared a traitor; and being feized in a Leo diffraced, castle named Aicas, whither he had fled for shelter, he was, by the emperor's orders, and deprived deprived of his fight, and by that means rendered incapable of any further attempts. of his fight. Romanus, having thus got rid of Leo, and driven all his partizans from the empe-

For's presence, persuaded the young prince to marry his daughter, and to appoint his son Christopher commander in chief of the allies, which post was at that time one of the greatest dignities in the empire. Having in this manner engrossed to himself the whole power, he drove the empress Zoe from the palace, and confined her to the Zoe confined to monaftery of St. Euphemia. Soon after her departure, he caused himself to be first a monastery. declared Casar, and afterwards to be solemnly crowned emperor by the patriarch, Romanus the young prince rather filently permitting, than approving of these extraordinary crowned empeproceedings. The following year 921. Romanus caused his two sons, Stephen and ror-Christopher, to be crowned in the great church, referving the other, by name Theophylastus, for the patriarchal dignity; nay, with the utmost arrogance he ordered himself to be named before Constantine in all public edicts and monuments. Several projects were fet on foot by the friends of young Constantine to deliver him from the d controul, or rather captivity, in which he lived; but they were all discovered, before they were ripe for execution, and the authors of them punished with the utmost feverity. Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, taking advantage of these intestine broils, broke anew into the Koman territories; and having defeated, with great slaughter, the imperial troops dispatched against him, he advanced, without opposition, to the very gates of Constantinople; but despairing of being ever able to reduce that metro-speech put the Bulgarian in mind of the account he was to give one day to the eternal cluded with Judge of the christian blood he had already shed. At the same time the Saracons, the Bulgarians. who had long insested the coasts and the islands, being surprised by John Radenus, the Roman admiral, in the harbour of Lemnos, were cut off almost to a man, and their whole fleet destroyed. Not long after, Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, died, and was succeeded by his son Peter, who, breaking into the Roman dominions, destroy'd all with fire and sword, without any regard to the treaty lately concluded between the emperor and his father. When he heard Romanus was marching against him at the head of a powerful army, he dispatched a monk to him, with proposals for a peace, which he defired might be strengthened and confirmed with a marriage. This overture being well received by Romanus, the Bulgarian prince, after feveral negotiations, repaired to Constantinople, where he was splendidly entertained by Ropolis, he defired an interview with the emperor Romanus; which being readily granted, f manus in the palace of Blackerna, and with great solemnity married by Stophon, the The king of the patriarch, to Mary, the daughter of Christopher, the emperor's son. At one of Bulgarians many public entertainments that were made on this occasion, the Bulgarians loudly marries the complaining, at the infligation of Romanus, as was supposed, that the emperor Con-ter of Romanus stantine should take place of Christopher, the father-in-law of their prince, Romanus, nus. pretending to gratify them, caused his son, with a seeming reluctancy, to take the most honourable place. The nuptial solemnities were scarce over, when the Sarasens in Syria invaded the Roman territories; but John Curouas, the imperial general in those parts, not only drove them back with great loss, but having besieged and a peace thereupon ensued between the two nations, Romanus having in a pathetic A peace con-

The Rolli

Romanus depoted by bis

own fon.

Melitena taken taken the city of Melitena, reduced the adjoining country to the form of a province. a from the Sara- The following winter proved very severe; and the long troft, said to have lasted an hundred and twenty days, was followed by a dreadful plague, which swept off incredible numbers of people: earthquakes were felt in several provinces, and whole cities overturned. At Constantinople a fire broke out, which confumed many stately buildings. But Romanus was not fo much affected with these public calamities, as with the death of his fon Christopher, who died on the fourteenth of August of the present year 933 . The following year one Basilius, a native of Macedon, giving out, that he was Constantine Ducas, who had been stain in the beginning of the prefent reign, drew valt crowds after him; but being feized by an officer in the army, he was brought to the emperor at Constantinople, who, after having caused one of his b hands to be cut off, set him at liberty. But he continuing still to pass himself upon the credulous multitude for the son of Andronicus, got together great numbers of malecontents, who having feized on a strong hold, made from thence frequent incurfions into the neighbouring country, destroying all with fire and sword. But Romanus, having with much difficulty got him once more into his power, ordered him to be burnt alive k. In 944. the Rossi, who inhabited the European Sarmatia, and were known to the antients by the names of Roxolani and Bastarnæ, having equipped a numerous fleet, confifting, according to some, of ten, according to others, of fifteen thousand vessels, committed dreadful ravages on the coasts of the empire. Theophanes, the Roman admiral, falling unexpectedly upon them, destroyed their c utterly defeated whole fleet; and the two generals Bardas and Curcuas, pursuing those who had by the Romans faved themselves ashore, made such a havock of them, that very sew returned home with the news of their misfortune. All this while Constantine, the lawful prince, lived without the least authority, having but the bare name of emperor. However, he carefully watched an opportunity of recovering his former power; and with this view gained over some persons in great credit and esteem with Romanus, and his fons, who being well apprifed, that to remove Romanus was the first step towards the re-establishment of Constantine, applied to Stephen, the usurper's youngest son, and by degrees brought him to rebel against his father, whom he seized on the fixteenth of December of the present year 944, and confined to a monastery in the d island Prota. He being thus removed, Stephen caused himself to be proclaimed emperor in his room, obliging his elder brother Constantine, who had been raised by his father to the imperial dignity, to acknowledge him for his partner in the fovereignty. This gave rife to a misunderstanding between the two brothers, which proved satal to both. For Constantine having invited them to an entertainment, as if he had been desirous of bringing about an accommodation, caused them both to be seized in the midst His sons deposed of their jollity, and to be immediately conveyed away, viz. Stephen to the island of and banified. Panormus, and Constantine to Terebintus, where they were both ordained priests. Stephen was afterwards removed to Proconnesus, and from thence to Rhodes, then to Mitylene, and lastly to Lesbos, where he died, after having borne his missortunes for many years with great constancy and resolution. Constantine having two years after killed one of his keepers, with a delign to make his escape out of the island of Samothrace, whither he had been removed, the rest, transported with rage, fell upon him, and slew him. As for Romanus, their father, he died in the beginning of the fourth year of his exile m. Constantine, thus restored to his former power and authority, amply rewarded all those who had been instrumental in his restoration, preferring them to the first employments in the state. Soon after, in order to prevent any future designs that might be formed against him, he caused his son Romanus to be crowned with the usual folemnity, and Romanus, the son of Stephen, with Basilius, the natural fon of Romanus the elder, and Michael, the fon of Christopher, to be f made eunuchs, and to enter into orders. In 948. the Saracens breaking into the empire with a mighty army, Bardas Phocas, and his two fons Nicephorus and Leo. were dispatched with the flower of the Roman forces against them. Bardas was one of the best officers of his age; but being hated by the foldiery on account of his extreme covetousness, he performed nothing answerable to the high character he bore; nay, his men having abandoned him in an engagement, he was dangerously wounded

Constantine restored to his former power.

> CUROPALAT. in Roman. LEO GRAMMAT. in Rom. k Idem ibid. 1 Idem. ZONAR. CEDREN. M CUROPALAT. CEDREN ZONAR. ibid. LUITPAND. l. V. C 9, 10, 11. in Rom. LUITPRAND. L. V. p. 384.

> in the forehead, and with much ado brought off alive by some of his friends. His

a two fons gained several signal victories over the enemy, by whom however they Leo and Nicewere not more feared than beloved by those who served under them. Leo, having phorus gain overthrown the Saracens in a pitched battle, took, among the other prisoners, Apo-tages over the lasemus, a person of great distinction, and nearly related to Chahdanus, the kalif; Saracens. which the emperor no fooner knew, than he ordered the captive to be fent to Constantinople, where the vain prince, after having led him in triumph, trod in an infulting manner upon his neck. The kalif, highly provoked at this indignity, used in a most barbarous manner Constantine, the third son of Bardas Phocas, whom he had. taken prisoner, in order to make him abjure the christian religion; but not being able to prevail with him, he caused him to be poisoned. Phocas, to revenge his b death, put to the sword all the relations of the kalif, who had the misfortune to fall into his hands. On the other hand, the kalif having raifed a numerous and formidable army, marched against Phocas and his sons, carrying with him Nicetas, a patrician, and several other prisoners of distinction, with an intent to cause them to be massacred in the sight of the Roman army. But Nicetas, who was a man of great address, having in the mean time infinuated himself into his favour, was by him made privy to all his defigns, which he found means to impart to Phocas, who lying in ambush for him in a narrow pass, cut off his numerous army almost to a man, the kalif himself escaping with much difficulty, after having put to the sword all the Roman prisoners; except Nicetas, who, by bribing his keepers, had made his escape. e in the beginning of the engagement. After this victory, Phocas, invading the territories of the Saracens, took several strong-holds, and laid waste whole provinces. But in the mean time the Saracens, who had settled in Crete, committing dreadful ravages on the coasts, the emperor having with incredible expedition fitted out a powerful fleet, dispatched it with a strong army on board against the island of Crete, where they landed, without the least opposition from the Saracens, altogether unprowided against fo sudden a descent, and would have easily made themselves masters of the whole island, had they been commanded by an officer of any skill or experience. But the emperor having appointed commander in chief in this expedition one of his chamberlains, named Constantine Gongylas, who had been brought up in the court, d and was confequently an utter stranger to the art of war, through his ignorance the whole undertaking miscarried. For the Saracens, finding he neither took care to fortify himself by any works, nor to send out scouts to get intelligence, concluded from thence, that he was no warrior; and recovering from their consternation, fell upon him unexpectedly, put his army to flight with great flaughter, and made The Romans themselves masters of his camp and baggage. He had himself fallen into the enemy's accept defeated hands, had not some of his guards, in spite of their utmost efforts, conveyed him in Crete. on board one of his vessels. Not long after this defeat, Romanus, the emperor's son, prompted by his ambition, and egged on by his wife Theophano or Theophania, con-Romanus, the ipired with her against his father; and having gained over Nicetas, one of the atten-emperor's son, e dants at the emperor's table, prevailed upon him to administer poison to the prince, attempts upon instead of a potion, which had been prescribed to him by his physicians. But the emperor happening to stumble after he had taken in his hand the poisonous cup, the greater part of the draught was spilt by that lucky accident; so that what remained had not the defired effect, tho' his life was for some time in great danger. month of September of the same year, he undertook a journey to mount Olympus, to beg the prayers of the monks, as given out, for the fuccess of his arms against the Saracens, whom he defigned, if possible, to drive out of Syria: but the true motive of his journey was to advise with Theodorus, bishop of Cyzicus, by what means he might drive from the patriarchal see Polyeullus, who had succeeded Theof phylastus, the fon of Romanus. Being taken ill on his journey, either by the wicked practices of his fon, or through the bad habit of his body, he was carried back in a litter to Constantinople, where he died on the ninth of November 960. after having constantine lived fifty-four years and two months, and reigned thirteen with his father, uncle dies. and mother, twenty-five with Romanus, and fifteen alone . Curopalates, from whom His character; other authors have copied, charges him with being too much addicted to wine, and with committing the whole management of affairs to his wife Helena, and his favoutire Bajilius, who abusing the trust reposed in them, set every thing to sale, bestowing the first employments in the state on the highest bidder. By this means all the bffices, both civil and military, were filled with perfors no ways qualified for them, a which equally redounded to his dishonour, and the detriment of the state. He is likewise condemned for punishing the smallest faults with the utmost severity. On the other hand, he was a great encourager of learning, which he is faid to have revived, after lessers had been long neglected. He was himfelf well skilled in most branches of literature, especially in history, arithmetic, astronomy, philosophy, and geometry. Zonaras commends him on account of his priety, which, fays he, appeared.

Romanus.

A debauched

The island of

Crete recovered.

The Saracens east.

Nicephorus Mantinople, and triumphs.

in all his writings and epiftles P. Constantine was succeeded by his son Romanus, surnamed the boy, to distinguish him from the other Romanus, his grandfather; for he was the ion of Constantine by Helena, the daughter of Romanus, the usurper. He is deferredly reckoned amongst b the most lewd and debauched princes mentioned in history. Tho' he was himself capable of governing well, being endowed with uncommon parts, yet be committed the whole management of affairs to one Joseph, his chief chamberlain, that he might with more liberty, and without interruption, purfue his pleasures; which he did, wallowing in all manner of debaucheries, without bestowing one thought on the public. Soon after his accession, he caused his young son Bastlius to be crowned with the usual solemnity by the patriarch Polyeustus; and imagining he had by that means secured the empire to his posterity, he took no surther care either of his family or the public. In the second year of his reign, Nicephorus Phocas, a person of extraordinary merit, who had been raised by Constantine to the chief command of all the c forces of the empire, undertook, with the confent of Romanus and the senate, an expedition against the Saracens in Crete; and landing in that island, defeated the enemy in several engagements, made himself master of all their strong holds, Chandax itself not excepted, took Curupes, the kalif, and Arcemas, his lieutenant, prifoners, and in the space of seven months reduced the whole island. But before he could settle affairs there, he was recalled by the emperor, at the instigation of Joseph, who growing jealous of the success of Nicepborus, alarmed the young prince with a pretended prediction, that he who conquered Crete should become master of the whole Roman empire. While Nicephorus was thus fignalizing himfelf in Crete, his brother Leo was attended with equal success in the east, where he gave the Saracens the d overcome in the greatest overthrow they had ever received. Chabdanus, their kalif, with much difficulty, made his escape; but the rest were either killed upon the spot, or taken prisoners. Such numbers of captives were sent by Leo to Constantinople, that all the houses, both in the city and the neighbouring country, were, if we may give credit to the writers of those times, filled with Saracen slaves. Leo, on his return to Confantinople, was honoured with a triumph; but his brother Nicepborus, of whom the emperor entertained no fmall jealoufy on account of the above-mentioned prediction, was not allowed to come to court, but ordered to march against Chabdanus, the kalif of Syria, who having recruited his army after his late defeat, threatened the empire with a new invasion. But Nicepborus, meeting him on the borders of e Syria, overthrew him in a pitched battle; and then laying siege to Beraa, made himself master of that important place, in which he found great wealth, and multitudes of christian captives, who on that occasion recovered their liberty. The news Romanus dies. of this victory had not yet reached Constantinople, when the emperor died, after having lived twenty-four years, and reigned thirteen years four months and five days, viz. ten with his father, and the rest alone. His death, which happened on the fifteenth of March of the year 963. is by some ascribed to poison, administered to him by his wife Theophano; by others, to his great lewdness and intemperance?. He left two fons behind him, viz. Bafilius and Constantine; but as they were yet very young, the empress Theophano took upon her the administration; which she had no sooner f done, than the commanded Nicephorus to repair to Constantinople, much against the comes to Con- will of Joseph, the prime minister, and honoured him with a triumph in the circus, where he displayed the rich spoils he had taken in the island of Crete, and the city of Berea. During his stay at Constantinople, he found that Joseph suspected him of ambitious defigns, as if he aspired at the empire, which he was well apprised would end in his ruin, Joseph Rill bearing great sway at court. In order therefore to remove the suspicions of the prime minister, having defired and obtained of him a private audience, he told him, that looking upon all worldly grandeur with that

P CUROPALAT. ZONAR. ibid.

1 CUROPAL. in Roman.

contempt

a contempt it deserved, he had long panted after a retired and monaffic life; but had been prevented from complying with his inclination by the kindness of his matters. who had forced employments upon him of the greatest trust. At the same time he shewed him a hair-cloth, which he pretended he wore constantly next his skin. The credulous minister, surprised at this speech, and the sight of the hair cloth, fell downat his feet, and with tears in his eyes, begging his pardon, declared, that for the future he would give no credit to any thing that could be alledged against him. Nicephorus having thus gained the good opinion of Joseph, was suffered to return to the army in the east; where he had not been long, ere Joseph, jealous of the esteems he was in with the army, began to repent he had let him escape out of his hands, b and feriously to consider by what means he might put him out of a condition of raising disturbances in the state. As his apprehensions daily increased, he wrote in the end to Tzimisches and Curcuas, two principal commanders in the east, promising to prefer them to the first posts in the army, provided they seized on Nicepharus; and secured him in a monastery, or by any other means removed him our of the way. But the two officers not only delivered the letters to Nicepborus, but advised? him to provide for his own fafety by the only means that was now left him, viz. that of taking upon him the sovereignty. This proposal he rejected at first, or seemed to reject, with the utmost horror; but Tzimisches and Curcuas threatening him with their drawn fwords, he accepted of the empire, as was given out; to fave e his life, and suffered himself to be proclaimed emperor on the second of July of the is prothe year 963 2. Some writers tell us, that he was not so much prompted by his claimed empeambition to usurp the fovereignty, as by his love for the empress Theophano, of ror. whom he had been long enamoured. They add, that he maintained a private, and perhaps not altogether innocent, correspondence with her, which greatly heightened the suspicions of the prime minister, who had secret intelligence of all that passed. As Nicephorus was no less beloved by the people of Constantinople, on account of his affability and mighty exploits, than Joseph was hated for his pride and haughty * carriage, the news of what had happened in the east was received by all ranks of people with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable, nothing being heard in d the streets but success and prosperity to Nicephorus Callinicus, or the brave conqueror. The house of Joseph, and those of his friends and adherents, were in an instant levelled with the ground by the tumultuous rabble. The new prince, being arrived at Chrysopolis, was there met by the chief nobility, and conducted to Hebdomon, where he was crowned with great solemnity by the patriarch Polyeuclus. Being thus Nicephorus acknowledged both by the people and senate, he began his reign by banishing Phocas crown-foseph into Paphlagonia, and confining him to a monastery in that province, where ed emperor. he died two years after. In the second year of his reign he married the empress Theophano, tho' he was therein opposed with great warmth by the patriarch, because he had been married before, and was faid to have stood godfather to one of the e empress's children; nay, Polyeuctus proceeded so far as to excommunicate the emperor, pretending his marriage to be unlawful, on account of the two above-mentioned impediments. But the matter being examined in a fynod held for that purpose at Constantinople, Nicepborus was by the assembled bishops restored to the communion of the church . In the third year of his reign he raifed a powerful army, with a defign to drive out of Sicily the Saracens, who had fettled there, and were daily committing dreadful ravages on the coasts of Italy. With the command of this army he intrusted Manuel, the natural son of his uncle Leo, who being an an intire stranger to the art of war, suffered himself to be drawn by the enemy into the mountainous parts of the island, where he was cut off with all his men. John The Roman f Zimises, who commanded in Cilicia, was attended with better success; for the Sara- army cut off by cens, who had invaded that province, were defeated by him with such slaughter, the Saracens that the hill, on which the battle was fought, was from that time forward called in Sicily. the bloody bill. The same year the Saracens in Cyprus were overthrown in several successive battles, and in the end driven quite out of the island, which was reunited to the dominions of the empire. The following year the emperor marched in person against the Saracens in Cilicia, took three of their strongest cities; and having win-Nicephorus pered in Cappadocia, invested early in the spring the cities of Mopfitesta and Tarsus gains great at the same time, which, after an obstinate desence, were obliged to surrender at advantages over the Sara-to the relief of Tarfus; but the city having submitted three days before their arrival, they failed back, when they were overtaken by a violent florm, which destroyed most of their ships, and drove the rest on the coasts of the empire, where they were seized, with the soldiers on board, by the Romans. Nicephorus, encouraged with the fuccess that attended his arms, broke into Syria the following year; and having easily reduced such cities and forts as resused voluntarily to submit, he marched forward, the Saracens flying every-where before him, and laid flege to Antioch itself.

But as that metropolis was defended by a numerous garison, and well stored with provisions, the emperor, after having continued three months before it, was obliged,

Cedrenus, writes, that he might have reduced the place, but was deterred from it by an old prediction, that the prince who took Antioch would not long enjoy that conquest c. Upon his return to Constantinople, Burtzas, a patrician, whom he had left in Syria with a large body of troops, to secure the places he had conquered in those parts, having drawn together his forces in the depth of winter, marched strait to Antioch, and appearing unexpectedly before the place, struck the garison with such terror, that they immediately submitted. Thus was the metropolis of Syria once more reunited to the empire. But Nicephorus, mindful, says Cedrenus, of the above-mentioned prophecy, instead of rewarding Burizas for such an eminent piece of fervice, discharged him, and forbad him the court. John Zimisces, who had ferved him with the utmost fidelity, and uncommon success, was likewise dismissed soon after upon some groundless suspicion, and banished the court, which in the end proved the ruin of the unhappy prince. For Zimises, highly provoked at the undeserved treatment he met with, conspired with Burtzas, and several others, and found means to draw the empreis herfelf into the conspiracy, incensed against her husband, according to the most probable opinion, on account of his deligning, as the apprehended, to make her two fons Basilius and Constantine eunuchs, and to leave the empire to his brother Leo. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the empress was not only privy to the conspiracy, but acted the chief part in it; for by her means Zimifes, and the other conspirators, were privately let into the palace in d

the night-time, and conducted to the emperor's room, where they dispatched him with many wounds, before the guards could come to his relief. When they received the alarm, Leo Abalantius, cutting off the emperor's head, shewed it out of the window; which unexpected fight struck the guards with such terror, that, without offering to revenge the unfortunate prince's death, they continued quiet, expecting what farther defigns the conspirators had in view J. Such was the end of Nicephorus Phocas, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and leventh of his reign. He was without all doubt a prince of great valour and experience in war, gained several signal victories over the Saracens, drove them out of the illand of Cyprus, recovered Cilicia and the greater part of Syria and Ajia Minor, and would in all likelihood, if he had lived e longer, restored the empire to its antient splendor. But his abominable covetousness, and the exorbitant taxes with which he loaded his subjects, estranged from him the minds of the people; so that he was, notwithstanding the glory he had acquired in arms, univerfally hated both by the nobility and the populace, who were fo far from revenging his death, that they received the news of it with the greatest by the approach of winter, to drop the enterprize, and return to Constantinople b. b

A fleet, with a great number of troops on board; was fent from Egypt a Antioch besieged.

The siege raifed.

Antioch sur-

A conspiracy against Nicephorus.

dered.

Who is mour-

demonstrations of joy imaginable. Nicephorus being thus murdered, John Zimisces was proclaimed by the conspirators, and by all acknowledged emperor. His first care was to remove from their employments, both in the state and army, all the friends of the deceased emperor, and among the rest Leo, the brother of Nicephorus, whom he confined to the island of Lesbos, f All those who had been banished by his predecessor he recalled, and restored them to their former honours. When he thought himself by this means thoroughly settled on the throne, he went to the great church to receive the crown at the hands of the patriarch. But Polyenclus, meeting him at the door, opposed his entrance, telling him, that he could not fuffer the church to be profaned by one who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his fovereign, till he had atoned by a publice penance for so enormous a crime. Zimisces heard the patriarch with great submission; and being unwilling to quarrel with the church in the beginning of his reign, offered himfelf

John Zimifces proclaimed emperor.

> b Idem Ibid. CEDREN. in Niceph.

4 CUROPALAT. CEPRE'S ZONAS. ibid.

ready

.3

a ready to give what satisfaction should be thought proper, alledging at the same time in his own defence, that the emperor had not been murdered by him, but by Ablantius, at the instigation of the empress. Hereupon the patriarch commanded him to banish them both, and to revoke all the edicts published by his predecessor to the prejudice of the church and the ecclefiattics; which he readily complying with, and at the same time promising to settle his paternal estate on the poor, the patriarch admitted him into the church, where he was crowned with great folemnity on He is crowned Christmas-day. As for the empress Theophano, she was banished into Armenia, and by the patrithere thut up in a monastery. Some writers are of opinion, that the opposition made by the patriarch was not real, but feigned, and concerted beforehand between him b and Zimisces, who only wanted a plausible pretence to remove her. However that be, the new emperor took her two sons Basilius and Constantine for his collegues, and caused them to be acknowledged as such by the senate and people of Constantinople. In the mean time the Saracens, hearing of the death of Nicephorus, raised without loss of time one of the most numerous armies that had been seen for some ages in those parts; and giving the command of it to one Zochares, a person well skilled in the art of war, fat down before Antioch, not doubting but they should be able to reduce the place, before it could be relieved by the emperor. But in spite of their utmost efforts, the besieged held out, till Nicolas, an eunuch, declared general by the emperor, having raifed what forces he could in Mesopotamia, and the neighc bouring provinces, fell unexpectedly upon them, gave them a total overthrow, and The Saracens obliged them to raise the siege, and return with shame and disgrace to their own defeated before territories. The following year ozo the Rass having driven out the Pollowing year ozo the Rass having driven out the Pollowing. territories. The following year 970, the Rossi having driven out the Bulgarians, and feized on their country, advanced with an army of above three hundred thousand men into the dominions of the empire; and having wasted all Thrace, fat down before Adrianople. Zimisces having first endeavoured in vain to come to an agreement with them, ordered Bardas Sclerus, or the bold, his wife's brother, to make head against them with what troops he could draw together. Bardas, pursuant to his orders, marched strait to Adrianople; but not daring to venture an engagement, as he had with him but thirteen thousand men, he had recourse to stratagems; and having d drawn a strong party of the enemy into an ambuscade, he first cut them all off to The Rossi a man; and then falling, when least expected, upon the main body of their army, defeated by he gave them a total overthrow, put most of them to the sword, took an incredible Bardas Scierus. number of prisoners, and would not have suffered one to escape, had not night coming on obliged him to give over the pursuit. The Romans are said to have lost but twenty-five men in both engagements. The fuccess which attended the emperor's arms abroad, did not deter feveral of the nobility from conspiring against him at home, with a defign to raise to the empire Bardas Phocas, the late prince's nephew, who, upon the encouragement given him by his friends at Constantinople, withdrew on a sudden out of Amasia, the place of his banishment; and being joined Bardas Phocas e by several persons of distinction, made himself master of Cafarea in Cappadocia, revolts. and there took upon him the imperial title and enfigns. At the same time Leo, the father of Phocas, who had been confined to the island of Lesbos, attempted to make his escape from thence with his other fon Nicephorus, in order to join Bardas; but being apprehended by the emperor's officers, both he and Nicephorus were fentenced to death, but foon after pardoned by the good-natured emperor. In the mean time Bardas Sclerus, who had been dispatched by the emperor at the head of a confiderable army against Phocas, arriving at Dorylaus, the capital of Phrygia, endeavoured first by fair offers to bring him and his accomplices back to their duty; for he had been strictly injoined by the emperor to abstain as much as possible from f shedding blood. But when he found them deaf to his offers and promises, he left Dorylaus, and advanced to Cafarea, in order to lay siege to the place. Upon his approach, those who had appeared the most fanguine in the revolt, agreed among themselves to abandon Phocas, and consult their own safety. Accordingly they Is abandoned by withdrew with their attendants, before Bardas invested the place; so that Phocas, his followers. who had with him but a small number of troops, thought it adviseable to retire from Cæsarea, and shut himself up in a strong castle called Cyropaum, which at first he refolved to defend to the utmost extremity. But when Bardas invested the place,

The rebellion suppressed. the same time undertook to obtain his pardon of the emperor, he submitted; and a depending upon the promises of Bardas, delivered himself up into his hands. The emperor granted him his life; but to prevent his raising new disturbances, confined him to the island of Chios. The rebellion being thus suppressed, the emperor married with great solemnity Theodora, according to some, the sister, according to others, the daughter, of the late emperor Romanus. The following year 971. the emperor, being informed that the Rossi, notwithstanding their late deseat, were preparing to invade the empire anew, resolved to be beforehand with them. Accordingly having raised a powerful army, and committed the administration of affairs at home to such as he thought he had the greatest reason to conside in, he set out from Constantinople early in the spring; and marching with great expedition over mount b Hæmus, invested Perstbalba, the principal city of Bulgaria, before the enemy received the least intelligence of his approach. A party of the Rossi, consisting of eight thousand men, attempted to throw themselves into the city, but were all to a man either cut

The emperor invades the country of the Ross.

Takes their metropolis by as[ault.

The citadel taken.

The Rossi aeseated with great slaugh-

Dorosterum besieged. The Rossi over come in a second battle.

off, or taken prisoners, by the Romans: among the latter was Sphagellus, a person of great authority among the Bulgarians. The Romans, animated with this success, attacked the city with great refolution and intrepidity, but were obliged, by the approach of night, to retire to their camp, before they could master it. Early next morning Zimisces, having drawn out his men, offered the besieged very advantageous conditions; which they rejecting, he gave the fignal for a general attack. Rossi made a most vigorous resistance; but the Romans prevailing in the end, the c city was taken, and great numbers of the inhabitants, without distinction of sex or age, put to the sword by the incensed soldiery. Eight thousand Scythians, part of the garison, finding the Romans masters of the city, retired to the citadel, with a design to defend themselves there to the last extremity. As the castle stood on a steep rock, and the Romans were already greatly fatigued, they seemed inclined to put off the affault to the next day. But Zimisces advancing in person against the enemy at the head of a small band of chosen men, the whole army followed him, every one striving who should first thrust himself between his prince, and the danger that threatened him. The Scythians fought like men in despair; but the Romans, after a terrible flaughter on both fides, made themselves in the end masters of the d place. All the Scylbians were either driven down the rocks and precipices, or put to the sword. In the city, when the first fury of the soldiery was over, the women and children were spared, and, together with such men as were found without arms, made prisoners. Among the captives was Borifes, king of the Bulgarians, who being conducted to the emperor in his royal robes, was received by him in a manner fuitable to his rank, magnificently entertained, and released with his wife and children, and all the Bulgarians, Zimisces declaring he was at war with none but the Ross. The city of Perstbalba was utterly destroyed; but the emperor, having caused it to be rebuilt, called it after his own name Joannopolis. From thence he marched to Dorosterum, a city of great strength on the Danube, where he was met by the e army of the Rolli, three hundred and thirty thousand strong. However, he resolved to venture an engagement, which they not declining, one of the most bloody battles enfued we find mentioned in history. It continued from morning to night, victory inclining fometimes to one fide, and fometimes to another. As night approached, the left wing of the Rossi began to give ground, which the emperor observing, he charged them at the head of a chosen body with such resolution, that they betook themselves in the end to a precipitous and disorderly slight. Upon their retreat, the Romans, animated by the example of their prince, fell with fresh vigour upon the main body of the enemy, and bearing all down before them, carried the day. The Rossi fled in the utmost consusion to Dorosterum, whither the emperor pursued f them, and laid close siege to the place, which brought on a second battle, wherein the Rossi were defeated anew with great slaughter. However, they still held out, and in their daily fallies made a dreadful havock of the Romans, till their provisions failing them, they unanimously agreed to quit the city, and open themselves a way, fword in hand, through the midst of the Roman army. This they attempted with great boldness and resolution, and succeeded in the attempt, tho' great numbers of them were cut in pieces, and the rest obliged to save themselves by a precipitous flight. Their general, by name Sphendosthalbus, finding himself no longer in a condition to make head against the Romans, sent embassadors to the emperor, offering to relinquish Bulgaria, and conclude a peace upon the following terms; viz. That g a he should be acknowledged as a friend and ally of the empire; that he and his countrymen should be suffered to return home unmolested; and that a free commerce should be settled between the two nations. The emperor, who was grown weary of the war, readily agreeing to these articles, the treaty was concluded, and A peace befigned by both parties. After this Sphendoft balbus went to wait on the emperor, who tween the two received him in a very obliging manner, entertained him with great magnificence, nations. and dismissed him loaded with rich presents. The Rossi being obliged, on their way home, to pass through the territories of the Patzinaca, that herce and savage people fell upon them unexpectedly, and cut off the general, and most of his men. The war with the Rossi being thus ended, to the great reputation of Zimisces, and b the fafety of the empire, the emperor caused all the towns on the Danube to be fortified, and then returned to Constantinople, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable. He was met at some distance from the city by the patriarch, the clergy, the senate, and the people, with crowns, and a triumphal chariot, drawn by four horses, richly caparisoned; but he, placing the image of the virgin Mary in the chariot, followed it in a folemn procession mounted on a white horse, and thus entered the city amidst the joyful acclamations of the people s. During the war with the Ross, several cities in the east, which had been reduced by his predecessor, revolted, which obliged him to undertake another expedition. Leaving therefore Constantinople, he marched into the eastern provinces; and having reduced Zimisces recoe several cities, partly by force, partly by fair promises, he advanced as far as Damascus, vers several conditions and there resided some since applying him felt with great case to the office of some cities in the and there resided some time, applying himself with great care to the affairs of state. east. During his stay in the east, he was informed, that Basilius the eunuch had engrossed almost the whole wealth of those provinces to himself; that most of the fine palaces, and fruitful territories, which he observed on the road, belonged to him; that in the late reign he had oppressed the people in a most cruel manner, &c. Upon which he broke out with a figh into this expression; How unhappy is the present condition of the Roman empire, which is thus pillaged by an avaricious and aspiring eunuch! Basilius had ferved with great reputation under feveral emperors in their wars with the Saracens; and as he was a man of great authority, had not a little contributed to d the promotion of Nicephorus, who out of gratitude raised him to the post of prime minister, in which he was continued by Zimisces, on account of his great knowledge and experience in affairs of state. As he had many friends at court, he was soon informed of the emperor's reflection; and apprehending he might be called to an account, he refolved to prevent, by some means or other, the evil consequences, which he had reason to fear would attend it. Accordingly, by large presents, and greater promises, he prevailed upon the emperor's cup-bearer to administer him poison; which brought him to his end, before he reached Constantinople. Tho' he mistrusted He is poisoned his prime minister, yet he would not suffer any inquiries to be made about the ly Basilius the treason, but spent the short time he lived in exercises of christian piety. He died ennuch. e in 976, after having reigned fix years and as many months, and was univerfally lamented, especially by the inhabitants of Constantinople, whom he had eased of many heavy taxes, with which they had been burdened by his predecessors. He is deserv- His character. edly reckoned amongst the best and greatest emperors on account of his equity, moderation, courage and piety, in which he excelled most of his predecessors. He was the first who caused the image of our Saviour to be engraved on the coins, with this legend, Jejus Christ, the King of kings. The writers of those times tell us, that in the last battle with the Rossi, a champion on a white horse was observed by the whole army fighting before the first ranks; that to his single valour was owing the victory gained on that occasion; and that as he had never been seen before, and f disappeared after the battle, they all believed him to be St. Theodore, the martyr, on whose anniversary the victory was obtained. The emperor himself seemed to be of this opinion; for he repaired a church dedicated to that martyr, and changed the name of Euchaneia, the city in which it stood, to that of Theodoropolis h. Zimisces dying without children, appointed Basilius and Constantine, the sons of Basilius and the late emperor Romanus, by Theophano, for his successors. But as both princes Constanting. were under age, the eldest being but nineteen, and the other seventeen, Basilius, the eunuch, took upon him the administration; and the better to establish his authority, recalled Theophano, the young princes mother, who had been banished by Zimisces.

CUROPALAT. ibid. CEDREN. & LEO GRAMM. in Zimisc. h CUROPALAT. ibid. His next care was to remove Bardas Sclerus, of whom we have spoken above. He a usurps the

sovereignty;

had been rewarded for his eminent services by Zimisces with the chief command of all the forces in the east, and was greatly beloved by the soldiery, among whom he had been brought up from his youth. This gave no small jealousy to the prime minister, who thereupon deprived him of his command, and sent him into Mesopotamia, to restrain the incursions of the Saracens into that province. Sclerus broke out into bitter invectives against Bafilius; but the prime minister threatening to deprive him of all his employments, and confine him to his house, he thought it adviseable to obey the orders he had received, and to depart into the province which had been affigued him. He carried with him a firm refolution of being revenged on his rival; and accordingly, foon after his arrival, he acquainted the chief officers b of the army with his delign, who all to a man promifing to stand by him, and Bardas Sclerus encouraging him to fet up for himfelf, he caused himfelf to be proclaimed emperor, and was faluted as fuch with loud acclamations by the whole army. Having spent the winter in warlike preparations, and entered into an alliance with the Saracens, who fent him large supplies of money and horses, he set forward in the beginning of the spring towards Constantinople, Basilius, struck with terror and dismay at the news of his revolt, left no means unattempted to divert the impending storm. He dispatched orders to Peter, who had been appointed, in the room of Sclerus, commander of the forces in the east, to draw together all his troops, and encamp with his whole army in the neighbourhood of Cafarea. At the same time Syncellus, c bishop of Nicomedia, a man famed for his eloquence, and the holiness of his life, was fent to try whether he could prevail upon Sclerus to quit his unjust pretensions, and disband his army. The usurper received the prelate with the greatest demonstrations of esteem and affection; and having heard him in appearance with great submission, returned him this short answer; That having once appeared in the purple, he was firmly resolved never to quit it but with his life. Upon the return of the bishop to court, Peter was ordered to secure all the passes, and to prepare for a vigorous defence, in case he was attacked, but by no means to begin hostilities. Peter, purfuant to his orders, posted strong parties in all the passes; but Sclerus having, in spite of all opposition, opened himself a way into Cappadocia, encamped at a small d distance from the imperial army. Hereupon several skirmishes ensued, without any considerable advantage on either side. But at length Sclerus, falling unexpectedly upon the emperor's army, cut great numbers of them in pieces, before they could put themselves in a posture of desence; and having forced the rest to save themselves by flight, made himself master of their camp, in which he found great sums of money, and an immense quantity of arms and provisions. The same of this victory induced most of the eastern provinces to renounce their allegiance to the young princes, and declare for Sclerus, who, elated with this success, would not so much as admit to his presence the embassadors, who were sent to him with very honourable and advantageous proposals. In the mean time Leo, who had been appointed e to fucceed Peter in the command of the army, arriving in Phrygia, marched from thence at the head of a strong detachment into the eastern provinces, which had fubmitted to the usurper, but had been left quite destitute of troops. This obliged Sclerus to divide his army, and fend a body of men to cover those countries. But Leo falling in with them on their march, a battle enfued, in which the emperor's troops had the advantage, great numbers of Sclerus's men being slain, and many taken prisoners. The usurper, alarmed at the news of this defeat, lest Cappadocia, and hastening after Leo, came up with him in a few days march, engaged him, and gained a complete victory. Most of the chief officers in the emperor's army were flain, and Leo himself taken prisoner, with several other persons of great distinction. f Such of them as had abandoned Sclerus to fide with Leo, had their eyes pulled out by the usurper's orders at the head of the army. As for Leo himself, he was treated with great civility, but kept under close confinement. Bardas, animated with this fuccess, marched strait to Nice, the metropolis of Bithynia, not doubting but he should carry the place at the first affault. But Manuel Eroticus, whom Basilius had fent with a confiderable body of troops to defend it, repulfed the usurper in several succeffive attempts with fuch vigour, that, despairing of being able to take a place so well garisoned by force, he resolved to reduce it by famine. Manuel, apprised of his design, and sensible of the great streights to which the numerous garison would be foon reduced, filled the empty granaries with fand, which he strewed over with g

And defeats the emperor's army.

He gains another victory.

He lays siege to Nice.

a corn, and shewed them to some prisoners he had taken; who, being dismissed, represented to Sclerus, that he attempted in vain to reduce a place by famine, that was so plentifully supplied with corn. Soon after, Manuel fent deputies to acquaint Sclerus, that, confidering the doubtful events of war, he was willing to furrender upon certain conditions, one of which was, that the garifon should be allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, and to pass unmolested to Constantinopte. To these conditions the usurper readily consented; but was highly provoked, when, The place sur entering the city, he discovered the deceit, and found the place quite destitute of pro-renders. vilions. Sclerus, after the reduction of Nice, was preparing to march to Constantinople, where he had many friends, who were ready to declare for him as foon as he b appeared. But in the mean time Bardas Phocas, whom Bafilius had recalled from exile, and appointed commander in chief against Sclerus, as the only man in the empire able to contend with him, arriving, with all the troops he could draw together, at Amorium, the usurper thought it advisable to march in the first place against him. Accordingly he hastened with all his forces to Amorium; and coming there to an engagement, put Phocas's army to the rout. Tho' Phocas himself discharged all the Bardas Phocas offices of a valiant foldier, and experienced officer, yet his foldiers were so dispirited defeated by by former defeats, that he could neither with words nor his example inspire them Scierus. with courage. Phocas, no longer able to keep the field, retired to Phrygia, and having there received large supplies out of Iberia, and the other provinces, which e continued stedfast in their allegiance, he resolved to venture a second engagement. Accordingly, leaving Phrygia, he advanced into Cappadocia, where he found Sclerus encamped on a large plain named Pancalea, and ready to receive him. Both armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expressed; but Phocas's men beginning, after an oblinate dilpute, to give ground, the brave general, determined to conquer or perish, opened himself a way, sword in hand, into the midst of the enemy's ranks, and there engaging Sclerus himself, dangerously wounded him. Some of the enemy's officers, apprifed of the danger their general was in, hastened to his rescue; and finding him covered all over with blood, they carried him to a neighbouring fountain, there to wash his wound, and refresh him, as he was fainting with drought. d In the mean time his horse running in with his bloody main among the ranks, his foldiers concluded from thence, that their general was flain; which occasioned such consternation in the army, that, instead of pursuing the emperor's troops, who had, in spite of Phocas's utmost endeavours, begun to fly, they fled themselves in the greatest Bardas gains a confusion, some throwing themselves headlong down vast precipices, others taking to complete victory over Scientific Halys, in which great numbers were drowned. Thus was the fortune of the rus, day turned, and the victory, by a lucky mistake, snatched out of the hands of the enemy, who were pursued with great slaughter by Phocas. Sclerus escaped with a small body of horse to Martyropolis, and from thence to Babylon, to implore the Who slies to protection and affiltance of Chofrhoes, fultan of the place; which the emperor Bafilius Babyion. e no sooner understood, than he dispatched embassadors to Chosrhoes, representing to him the evils that might accrue from one prince's protecting fuch as had, by an open revolt, taken arms against another. The embassadors were at the same time injoined to affure Sclerus in the emperor's name, that he should not only be pardoned, but received into favour, and restored to his former honours, provided he renounced his pretensions, and returned home. Chosrboes, finding the embassadors were privately treating with Sclerus, ordered both him and them to be thrown into prison, whence we shall see him in a short time released, to raise new disturbances in the empire.

THE rebellion of Sclerus being thus suppressed, the emperor Basilius, who had taken the administration into his own hands, resolved to be revenged on the Bulgarif ans, who had made frequent inroads into the empire, while the emperor's troops were employed in the east. With this view he put himself at the head of his army, and, without imparting his design either to Phocas, or any other of his generals in the east, he entered Bulgaria; and leaving Leo Melissenus to secure the narrow passes behind Basilius enters him, he marched strait to Sardica. But while he was preparing to lay siege to that Bulgaria. important place, Stephen, commander in chief of the western forces, and an avowed and irreconcilable enemy to Leo Melissenus, coming in the dead of the night to the emperor's tent, conjured him to lay aside all other designs whatsoever, and to return with all possible expedition to Constantinople, whither Leo had already marched, with

But returns with disgrace.

Birdas Phocas proclaimed

emperor.

liberty, joins

They agree to divide the empire between them.

and sizes Scle-

rus.

Phocas.

a delign to feize on the fovereignty in his absence. The emperor, alarmed at this a unexpected news, and apprehending the enemy might, by feizing on the posts which Leo was said to have abandoned, cut off his retreat, ordered in a great fright his army to march the same night; which being observed by Samuel, prince of the Bulgarians, he fell upon them in their retreat, and put great numbers of them to the fword. The emperor with great difficulty reached Philippopolis, where he found Leo carefully attending his duty on the station which had been assigned him. Hereupon, highly provoked against Stephen, who had thus imposed upon him, he immediately discharged him, and conferred his employment on his competitor. Stephen however maintained to the last, that Leo really intended to usurp the empire; which incensed the emperor to fuch a degree, that he could not forbear striking him, and dragging b him in a violent passion on the ground by his hair and long beard k. The emperor had undertaken the Bulgarian expedition, as we have observed above, without imparting his design to Bardas Phocas, commander in chief of all the eastern forces. This that general highly resented; and apprehending the young prince would act for the future without any regard to his counsels, he began to entertain thoughts of usurping the supreme authority. The officers of the army, to whom he imparted the motive of his discontent, encouraged him in his attempt, and promised to support him to the last; so that after several private conferences, they all met at the house of one Eustathius Melenius, and there investing Phocas with the imperial ornaments, unanimously proclaimed him emperor. At the same time Bardas Sclerus, of c whom we have spoken above, being set at liberty by Chosrboes sultan of Babylon, returned into the territories of the empire, at the head of three thousand Roman captives, the fultan having granted them their liberty, in regard of their eminent services against the rebellious Persians. With these Sclerus thought himself once more in a condition to renew his former pretentions; and accordingly entering Mejopotamia, caused himself to be there acknowledged emperor. But being in the mean time informed of the revolt of Phocas, after having been some time in suspense whether he Scierus, set at should join him or Basilius, he offered in the end to assist Phocas, and share the empire with him; but at the same time he advised his son Romanus privately to abandon him, and fly to Basilius at Constantinople. By this means, if Phocas prevailed, he d thought he should be able to obtain of him his son's pardon; and if Basilius got the better, he did not doubt but his fon would have interest enough to obtain his of the emperor. Romanus, upon his arrival at Constantinople, was received by Basilius with all possible demonstrations of kindness, and raised to the first employments in the state. But Sclerus met with a far different treatment from Phocas: they agreed at first to divide the empire between them; Sclerus was to have for his share Antioch, Phanicia, Palestine, Calosyria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt; Constantinople, with the rest of the provinces, was allotted to Phocas. This agreement being ratified and sworn to by both parties, Sclerus and Bardas joined their forces; which was no sooner done, Phocas betrays than Phocas caused Sclerus to be privately seized; and having stripped him of his e imperial ornaments, committed him to close prison. His men at first mutinied; but being overpowered with numbers, they were forced to submit, and in the end prevailed upon with large promises to serve under Phocas; who, being thus reinforced, fent Calocyrus Delphinus with part of his army to Chrysopolis, while he removed with the rest to Abydus, in order to besiege that important place, and after reducing it, to block up Constantinople itself. But in the mean time the emperor Basilius, acquainted with the enemy's motions, having passed the streights in the night, fell unexpectedly upon Delphinus; and having put his army to flight at the first onset, took him, and fome other officers of great note, prisoners, who were all immediately nailed to He lays siege to several trees on the highway, to strike terror into the rest. Phocas met with a vigor- f ous refistance at Abydus, the inhabitants and garifon being encouraged by the arrival of the imperial fleet, which was immediately followed by the emperor Bafilius, and he foon after by his brother Constantine. Upon the arrival of the two princes, Phocas refolved to give them battle; and accordingly leaving part of his forces before Abydus to pursue the siege, he drew up the rest in a neighbouring plain. Some of the young princes generals advised them to throw themselves into Abydus, and there wait the arrival of fresh supplies; but the greater part thinking it adviseable to engage the enemy without loss of time, they marched at the head of their forces in battle-array

Abydus.

a into the plain where the usurper had drawn up his. But while both armies were ready to engage, or, as some write, when the battle was begun, Phocas was taken off. Phocas dies. The manner of his death is differently related: fome write, that his horse threw him, and that he died of the fall; others, that he was killed in the first onser. The emperor Constantine bragged, that he had killed him with his own hand; but the most received opinion is, that one of his domestics, by name Symeon, in whom he reposed an intire confidence, at the instigation of Basilius, administered him poison before the battle, of which he died foon after. Be that as it will, the report of his death was no fooner spread abroad in the army, than his men betook themselves to a precipitous and disorderly flight. The emperor's forces pursued them close, cut great b numbers of them in pieces, and having taken most of the leading men of the party prisoners, conveyed them to Constantinople, where they were punished according to their deferts, some being publicly executed, and others stripped of their estates, and fent into banishment. However, the death of Phocas, and the defeat of his army, did not put an end to the civil wars; for such of the party as had the good luck to make their escape, having set Sclerus at liberty, encouraged him to pursue his former Sclerusset at pretensions; and he, tho' now in a very advanced age, hearkening to their sugge-liberty. ttions, put himself at their head, and marching into Cappadocia, reduced great part of that province. But the emperor having written a friendly letter to him, offering him his favour and protection, and his fon Romanus earnestly intreating him at the c same time not to involve the empire in new wars, but to enjoy the small remainder of his life in peace and tranquillity among his friends and relations, he was prevailed He submits. upon to quit his pretentions, and return to Constantinople, where he was received by Basilius with uncommon civility, entertained at his table, and declared great steward of the houshold. Such of his followers as had enjoyed offices of honour or profit under him, were continued in the same employments, or preferred to others equally advantageous and honourable. We are told, that when he first appeared before Basilius, supported, on account of his age and corpulency, by two of his domeftics, the emperor, in reflecting how much he had dreaded him, could hardly forbear

THE civil war being thus happily ended, Basilius took a progress into Thrace and Basilius. wishes Macedon; and having left a sufficient number of troops at Thessalonica to a we the Bul- the eastern green garians, he passed over into Asia with the rest, to settle the affairs of the eastern pro-vinces. vinces. On his march through Cappadocia, he was entertained with his whole army by Eustathius Melenius, commander of the troops in that province. The wealth which Melenius displayed on that occasion, gave the emperor such umbrage, that, pretending a particular esteem for him, he took him with him to Constantinople, whence he never after suffered him to depart, lest he should raise disturbances in the empire; and, after his death, feized on his vast estate. The emperor, upon his return to Constantinople, was informed, that Samuel, king of the Bulgarians, had furprised the city of Thessalonica, and having crossed the Peneus, was laying waste Thesfaly, Baotia, Attica; nay, that some of his parties had penetrated into the very heart of Peloponnesus. Hereupon Nicephorus Uranus, commander in chief of the western His war with forces, was dispatched against him, at the head of a powerful army. Uranus, leav- the Bulgarians. ing his baggage at Larisa, reached by long marches the Sperchius, and encamped with his whole army over-against the enemy, who lay on the opposite bank. As the river was greatly swelled with the heavy rains that had fallen, Samuel, not imagining the Romans would attempt to pais it, suffered his troops to roam in large parties about the country in quest of booty. But Uranus, having at length found out a place where the river was fordable, passed it in the dead of the night; and falling unexpectf edly on the Bulgarians who were left in the camp, and lay for the most part asseep, cut great numbers of them in pieces, took their baggage, with many prisoners, and Samuel, king of made themselves masters of their camp. Samuel and his son were dangerously the Bulgarians. wounded, and would unavoidably have been taken, had they not all that day concealed defeated. themselves among the dead. The next night they stole away to the mountains of Etolia, and from thence made their escape into Bulgaria. The following year 1001. the emperor Basilius entered Bulgaria at the head of a numerous and well-disciplined army; and having defeated Samuel in a pitched battle on the banks of the Axius, took Vidina, Scopi, and several other strong cities. However, the emperor narrowly

Comuel dies.

emperor.

Ibatzes alone bolds out.

A desperate a tempt of Daphnomelus.

Bulgaria in-

escaped being cut off with his whole army in the streights of Cimba, where he was a unexpectedly attacked by Samuel; but refcued from the danger he was in by the feasonable arrival of Nicephorus Xiphias, governor of Philippopolis, who falling upon the enemy's rear, put them to flight. Basilius pursued them close, and having taken an incredible number of prisoners, caused their eyes to be pulled out, leaving to every hundred a guide with one eye, that he might conduct them to Samuel; who, not able to stand the shock of so terrible and affecting a spectacle, fell into a deep swoon, and died two days after. Samuel was succeeded by his son Gabriel, who was soon after murdered by John Bladist blabus, a person nearly related to him. Bladist blabus, having caused himself to be acknowledged prince of the Bulgarians, sent embassadors to Basilius, offering to submit to any terms, and to own himself, and behave on all b occasions, as a subject and vasfal of the empire. The emperor received the embasfadors in a very obliging manner, but the new prince declining, under various pretences, to execute the conditions agreed on, Bafilius returned the following year into Bulgaria, firmly refolved not to sheath his sword, till he had intirely reduced it. Accordingly, having in the space of two years made himself master of most of the enemy's strong-holds, and gained several victories over Bladistblabus, who had defended his country with incredible valour, but was at length flain in a battle fought near Achridus, the Bulgarians fent deputies to the Roman camp, with offers The Bulgarians of a total and unfeigned submission. Basilius received them with his usual civility; and having raised to the rank of patricians such of the Bulgarian nobility as seemed c most forward in surrendering their castles and strong-holds, he was received with loud acclamations into the city of Achridus, where he found the vast treasures of the Bulgarian princes, which he distributed, by way of donative, amongst his soldiers. Soon after, the widow of the late king, with her fix daughters, and three of her fons, delivered herself up to the emperor, who received her with the greatest kindness and respect, and entertained her fuitable to her rank. This obliging behaviour in the emperor encouraged her three other fons, with most of the princes of the blood, who had taken shelter among the mountains, to submit, and throw themselves upon the emperor's mercy. However, Ibatzes, a person nearly allied to the royal family, who had distinguished himself in a very eminent manner during the whole course of the war, d refusing to submit, fled to a steep and craggy mountain, with a design to desend himself there to the last extremity. Basilius endeavoured by fair means to induce him to submit to necessity, and comply with the present posture of affairs; but he equally despising the emperor's threats and promises, Eustathius Daphnomelus, whom Basilius had lately appointed governor of Achridus, without imparting to any one his delign, repaired, with two perfons in whom he could confide, to the mountain where Ibatzes had fortified himself. He hoped to pass undiscovered among the many strangers, who flocked thither to celebrate the approaching feast of the assumption of the virgin Mary, for whom Ibatzes had a particular veneration; but being known to the guards, he was feized, and carried before Ibatzes, to whom he pretended to have matters of e the greatest importance to communicate. Ibatzes received him in a very obliging manner; and having, at his request, followed him into a remote place, Daphnomelus threw himself all on a sudden upon him; and his two men, who attended at some distance, and with whom the whole scheme had been concerted before-hand, coming up, and thrusting their cloaths violently into his mouth, pulled out both his eyes, and got fafe to an abandoned castle on the top of the hill; which Ibatzes's men invested on all sides, as soon as they heard of the missortune which had befallen their leader. But Daphnomelus exhorting them to follow the example of their countrymen, and, now that they were destitute of a leader, to submit to the emperor, by whom, he affured them, they should be well received, and amply rewarded, instead of f attacking the castle, they congratulated Daphnomelus on his success, and took an oath of allegiance to the emperor of the Romans. Hereupon Dathnomelus, quitting the castle, carried Ibatzes, without the least opposition, to Basilius, who no less surprised at the boldness than the success of the attempt, rewarded his officer with the government of Dyrrachium, and all the rich moveables of his prisoner. Basilius, having thus at length accomplished the intire reduction of Bulgaria, returned with an incredible number of prisoners and hostages to Constantinople, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy by the senate and people. After the conclusion of this war, which began in 995. and ended in 1019. the emperor undertook an expedition into Iberia; but with what success, we are no where told. During his absence, g Xiphius, rather the Constantinopolitan princes.

i lil.

V25 1

he

ΟĐ

ĉŋ

30

la,

:0:3 :2|| b

11-

ار-

oto

it.

the

had

i tie

žers.

Ery; ned c oud Sulson

and the who

n the o had

war, d mielf bmit ciling ately red,

or-

rho

gin rds,

rs of e

ging

melus forme

ming

men heir

nen,

om, d of f

ath

the rifed

rern-

.v ing

incre-

l with ion of spedifence, B

a Xiphius, and Nicephorus the son of Bardas Phocas, revolted; but Xiphius, being gained over by Basilius, put a stop to the rebellion, by dispatching his fellow-conspirator. Basilius proceeded with great severity against all who had been, or were only suspected of having been, privy to the conspiracy. Great numbers of the nobility were on this occasion either put to death, or sent into exile; which occasioned some commotions at Constantinople: but the ringleaders being seized, and publicly executed, the city was restored to its former tranquillity. In 1025, the emperor, tho' then in the Basilius reseventieth year of his age, resolved to engage in a new war against the Saracens, who solves to make had settled in Sicily, and committed dreadful ravages on the coasts of Naples and Saracens; Calabria; which countries were still subject to the empire. Accordingly, having b affembled a powerful army, and equipped a mighty fleet, he fent before a strong body of forces, under the conduct of Orestes, his favourite eunuch, with a design to follow in person soon after with the rest of the army; but was prevented by death, But is preventwhich overtook him in the month of December of the year 1025. after he had lived ed by death. feventy years, and reigned fifty. He was highly esteemed by his subjects, on account of his application to public affairs, and his success in the long and bloody war, which he undertook against the Bulgarians. But as his jealousy increased with his years, towards the close of his reign he grew inexorably severe; on which account he was rather feared than beloved by his subjects. The absolute conquest of Bulgaria, which had been in vain attempted by so many of his predecessors, but was happily accome plished by him, has rendered the name of Basilius II. famous among the Roman, or

CHAP. XXXV.

The Roman history, from the death of Basilius II. to the taking of Constantinople by the Latins.

BY the death of Basilius, Constantine, who had borne the name of emperor in con-Constantine, junction with his brother, remained sole master of the empire. As he was an effeminate, vicious and indolent prince, he intirely neglected all public affairs, to His wicked follow his private diversions, suffering his ministers, most of them persons no less reign. infamous than himself, to oppress the provinces without controul, and lay on the people what burdens they thought sit. By this means the empire, which had begun to revive under Nicephorus, Zimisces, and Basilius, was, in the short reign of Constantine, brought to as low an ebb as it had ever been at. Such persons as had, either by Several persons their exploits or virtues, acquired reputation in the late reign, were removed from of diffinition their employments, to make room for the emperor's companions in his debaucheries. put to death, or e Nicephorus Comnenus, a person no less esteemed for his virtue, than his experience in war, was at the same time deprived of his command and his sight, under pretence of conspiring against the emperor, tho, in reality, his eminent virtues, which gave umbrage to the abandoned prince, were his only crimes. Bardas, the son of the celebrated Phocas, who had ferved Bafilius with the utmost fidelity, and distinguished himself on many occasions in a most eminent manner, was treated with the like severity, for no other reason, but because his extraordinary merit gave umbrage to the emperor's favourites. Many other persons of great distinction, who seemed to dislike the emperor's conduct, were, under various pretences, either put to death, or fent into exile. Such proceedings raifed a general discontent at home, and at the same f time encouraged the nations abroad to make irruptions into the territories of the empire; but they were restrained by the care and vigilance of those who commanded on the borders. It was happy for the state, that Constantine's reign was short; for he had scarce governed three years alone, when he fell dangerously ill, and was given vol. VI. No 8. 7 M ceffor, ceffor, some proposing Constantine Delassenus, commander of the forces in Armenia, 2 and others using all their interest in favour of Romanus Argyrus, a person of an antient family, and nearly related to the emperor. As Constantine had three daughters, it was agreed, that whoever succeeded him should marry one of them. Romanus was already married, and therefore feemed by this agreement to be excluded from the empire; but his friends, who were the most powerful at court, and the emperor's chief favourites, prevailed upon the prince to declare in his favour, and fending for him, to put it to his choice either to be deprived of his fight, or to divorce his wife, and, marrying one of the emperor's daughters, be raised to the dignity of Casar. Romanus seemed at first inclined rather to lose his eyes, and the imperial dignity, than part with his wife, whom he tenderly loved; but she, informed of what passed, b retired immediately to a monaftery, and by embracing there a monaftic life, made room for Zoe, the emperor's fecond daughter, to whom Romanus was married, and at the same time created Casar. Three days after the nuptials, Constantine died, in the year 1028. the seventieth of his age, and third of his reign without a collegue.

Romanus, thus raised to the empire, began his reign by easing the people of the Confrantine dies.

Romanus II.

person against

the Saracens.

many taxes, with which they had been burdened by his predecessor; which gained him the hearts of his subjects. His liberality to the church knew no bounds, and his indulgence to the unhappy captives, who had been taken in the late wars, was no less remarkable; for they were all ranfomed at his private expence, supplied with money to defray the charges of their journey, and fent back to their respective countries m. c In his fecond year, the Saracens, who had continued quiet in the reign of Basilius, but had begun to prepare for war in that of Constantine, broke into that part of Syria which belonged to the Romans, and, with their daily incursions, greatly harassed the territory of Antioch. Spondyles, who commanded the troops quartered in Antioch and that neighbourhood, endeavoured to restrain them; but being in several encounters worsted, and put to slight, the emperor resolved to march in person into Syria, and retrieve, if possible, the reputation of the Roman arms there. Pursuant to this resolution, he fet out from Constantinople, at the head of a very numerous and formidable army. But before he had advanced far on his way, he was met by embassadors from the Saracens of Berwa, who, alarmed at his vast preparations, were come to sue d for peace, promising at the same time to pay their usual tribute for the suture, and never more to infelt the territories of the empire. Most of the officers in the army advised Romanus to accept of their submission, and not to engage rashly in a war, which, in all likelihood, would prove both bloody and expensive. But he, promifing himself great glory and advantages from that expedition, dismissed the embassadors with disdain, and entering Syria, detached a strong party to observe the enemy's motions. The party, falling unhappily into an ambulcade, were all cut off to a man; and the Saracens, elated with this success, attacked unexpectedly Constantine Delassenus, who had been fent out with a strong body of troops to cover the Roman foragers, put him to flight at the first onset, and pursued him to the very gates of the camp, e which they invested on all sides. The emperor's army being soon reduced to the utmost extremity for want of provisions, and above all of water, it was agreed in a council of war, that they should decamp in the night, and march to Antioch. But the Saracens, who carefully watched their motions, falling upon them with great vio-His army is cut lence in their retreat, put most of them to the sword, the emperor himself escaping with the utmost difficulty to Antioch. The enemy took all the emperor's baggage; The baggage of which however was recovered by George Maniaces, at that time governor of a small town in those parts, in the following manner: Eight hundred Saracens, loaded with covered by Ma- the rich plunder of the emperor's camp, appeared before the place, and affirming that the emperor himself was taken, and his army totally defeated, summoned Maniaces f to furrender. Maniaces, already informed of the emperor's escape, but pretending to give credit to what they said, fent them out a great quantity of provisions to refresh themselves that night, and promised to deliver up the town to them as soon as it was light. Hereupon the enemy, without the least distrust, passed the greater part of the night in mirth and jollity; but when, after having eaten and drank to a great excess, they were all asleep, Maniaces, fallying out, cut them all off to a man, without the least opposition; and having taken two hundred and eighty camels loaded with the spoils of the Roman army, he sent them to the emperor, who rewarded him

" CUROPALAT. in Roman,

ii, į

V1S

ihe

2,10

for fe, ar,

than Eed, b

nade

and

, in

the ited

d his

o lefs

ccey

Ω,

gris

the

and

ters

and

tlo-

ible

from

io fie d

, and

army

war,

omil-

baffa.

mp's

).2N **;

jje. ers,

mp, c

the

in 2

But

10.

aping

ige;

mall

with that aces f

ing

eſh

W35

ιof

reat

rith-

aded

him

for

15°

a for this seasonable piece of service with the government of Media a. In the mean time Romanus, having with much-ado reached Cappadocia, returned from thence, with the remains of his shattered army, to Constantinople; and there laying aside all thoughts of any warlike attempts for the future, made it his whole study to fill the exchequer, which had been quite drained by the prodigality and extravagance of his predecessor. In order to this, he renewed his claim to old debts, thought to have Romanus opbeen utterly forgotten, and proceeded with fuch rigour in the recovery of them, that preffes the peomany persons of distinction were driven from their estates, and reduced with their ple. families to beggary. These severe exactions raised a general discontent in the people, which gave rife to feveral plots and conspiracies, for the most part carried on by b Theodora, the late emperor's youngest daughter, who was on that account confined to a monastery, and obliged to take the religious habit; which we shall see her hereaster exchange for the imperial purple. In 1033. the fourth of Romanus's reign, a dread-several public ful plague broke out in Cappadocia, and raged with fuch violence in that province, calamities. as well as in Paphlagonia and Armenia, that the inhabitants were forced to abandon their dwellings, and retire to other parts of the empire. The plague was followed by a terrible famine, and that by earthquakes, which destroyed several cities, and overturned many stately edifices at Constantinople, where it was felt for the space of forty days. At the same time a comet appeared, which passed with a terrible noise from the north to the fouth, the whole horizon feeming to be in a flame. Romanus, The emperor alarmed at these, and several other public calamities and prodigies, with which the applies himself histories of those times are filled, applied himself wholly to works of piety, hoping wholly to works by that means to avert the wrath of Heaven, which seemed to threaten the empire. of piery. He erected several hospitals for the relief of the poor, repaired those which had been destroyed by the late earthquakes, rebuilt the aqueducts, supplied the city with water, of which it began to be in great want, and, above all, enriched with large donations the monasteries, bestowing on the monks whole cities, and the most fruitful lands in the provinces, purchased by him at the public expence. In the mean time the empress Zoe, a most lewd and incontinent woman, despising her husband, now in the fixty-fixth year of his age, cast her eyes on Michael, the brother of John The empress d an eunuch, in great authority with the emperor. As Michael, tho' meanly born, falls in love was a man of a most comely aspect, of a graceful person, and great address, the with Michael. empress began to entertain a violent passion for him; which, as she abandoned herself to it, grew in a short time so powerful, that she resolved to dispatch her husband, and marry him. Accordingly, having imparted her design to such of her creatures as the could confide in, poifon was administred by them to the unhappy prince, which, in a short time, reduced him to a most deplorable condition. However, the empress, thinking it too flow in its operation, hired an affaffin to dispatch him, who, entering the bath where the emperor was refreshing himself, held his head under water till he Romanus expired. His death happened on the eleventh, or, as others write, on the fifteenth murdered. e of April of the year 1034. after he had reigned five years, and fix months.

Romanus being dead, the empress Zoe sent for the patriarch Alexius in great haste, who was then celebrating in the church the office appointed for Good-friday; for on that day the emperor was murdered. As Alexius had been fent for in Romanus's name, he was greatly furprifed, when he heard he was dead; and much more, when the empress, upon his being introduced to her, ordered him to marry her to Michael. Struck with horror and amazement, he declined the office for fome time; but was in the end, with a present of an hundred pounds weight of gold, prevailed upon to Michael the comply. When the ceremony was over, the new emperor acquainted the people Paphlagonian with the death of Romanus, and his own marriage with Zoe, who, he faid, had taken marries Zoe, him for her partner in the empire, to which the had an undoubted right. I extens to f him for her partner in the empire, to which she had an undoubted right. Letters to the empire. the fame purpose were dispatched into the provinces, where none of the great men feemed displeased at the promotion of Michael, except Constantine Delassenus, who had been named by some to succeed Basilius II. and being, on account of his rank and family, the first man in the empire, was highly offended, that a person of Michael's obscure birth should be preferred to him. But John the eunuch, Michael's brother, having, with repeated oaths, promifes and affeverations, prevailed upon him to come to court, banished him, as soon as he had him in his power, to the island

Several perfons of distincmuch.

Whogoverns

without con-

Michael Cala-

the Saracens

upon Edessa

defeated.

Cælar.

troul.

finement, till he was fent for to court by the empress Zoe, as we shall relate hereafter. a At the same time John took care to remove, and, under various pretences, to send into exile, such as gave him the least umbrage, or seemed to be ill-affected to his tion banished by family: Constantius Monomachus, afterwards emperor, was confined to a castle; Maniaces, who was highly effeemed and beloved by the people, was fent into Upper Media, under pretence of restraining the incursions of the Saracens; all the friends and relations of the late emperor were driven from their estates and employments, and the government of the provinces, as well as the charge of civil affairs, committed to John, having thus established his brother's interest in the provinces, began to reflect on the fate of Romanus; and distrusting the fickle temper of Zoe, removed from her all the women, in whom she reposed any confidence; and b discharging her eunuchs, appointed others, in whom he could confide, to attend, or rather to watch her; so that she could not stir out of the palace without his know-The empress, highly provoked at the restraint put upon her, ledge and consent. and looking upon John as no other than her gaoler, endeavoured to get rid of him by poison; but the design being discovered, before it could be put in execution, the minister stood thenceforth on his guard, and watched her more narrowly. As for Michael the emperor, he fuffered John to govern with an absolute sway, applying himself wholly to his devotions. Being conscious of the heinous crime he had committed in murdering his fovereign, he hoped to atone for it by works of piety, by his liberality to the poor, and by erecting and endowing churches, hospitals, oratories, c &c. As he began to grow distempered in his body, and disordered in his mind, John, concluding that, if he died, the empress would endeavour to recover her authority, and would not fail, if the succeeded therein, to gratify her revenge with the utter ruin of him and his family, prevailed upon the emperor to prefer Michael, surnamed Calaphates, his fifter's fon, to the dignity of Cafar, and to banish all the friends and relaphates created tions of the empress Zoe°. In the third year of Michael's reign, a peace for thirty years was concluded between him and the Saracens of Egypt, whose kalif being dead, his widow is faid to have embraced the christian religion, and to have brought about an agreement between her subjects and the Romans. The following year 1036, was remarkable for dreadful earthquakes, which overturned several cities in different parts d of the empire, and for an attempt of the Saracens on the city of Edessa, which nar-An attempt of rowly escaped falling into their hands. Twelve of the chief men of their nation, presenting themselves before the gates, with five hundred horses, and as many camels, loaded with large chefts, demanded admittance, pretending they were carrying prefents to the emperor. The governor received into the city the twelve embassadors, as they flyled themselves, and entertained them at a banquet; but could not be prevailed upon to admit the horses and camels: which diffidence preserved the place; for the chests were filled with armed men, who, in the dead of the night, were to be let out, and, killing the centinels, to seize on the city. The design was discovered by an Armenian to the governor; who, fuddenly withdrawing from the banquet, e and taking a sufficient force with him, surprised and put to the sword all the Saracens without the town; then returning to his guests, treated them in the like manner, sparing but one, whose hands, ears and nose he cut off, and sent him home in that condition, to give his countrymen an account of what had happened P. The Bulgarians ing year the Bulgarians revolted, and, shaking off the yoke, chose one Deleanus, or, as some call him, Dolianus, for their king. He was servant to a citizen of Constantinople; but escaping from his master, fled into Bulgaria, his native country; and there gave out, that he was the son of Gabriel, and grandson of Samuel. The Bulgarians, weary of the yoke, to which they had but lately submitted, received him as their deliverer, and having proclaimed him king, murdered all the Romans, who had the f misfortune to fall into their hands. At the same time the inhabitants of Dyrrachium, bitants of Dyr- no longer able to bear the cruel exactions of their governor Michael Dermocaitas, rose up against him, drove him out of the town, and despairing of pardon, openly revolted, and chose one Teichomerus, a soldier of great reputation amongst them, for their king. Deleanus, the new king of Bulgaria, no fooner heard of this revolt, than he wrote an obliging letter to Teichomerus, offering to take him for his partner in the kingdom of Bulgaria, provided he joined him with all his followers. Teichomerus, not suspecting the least treachery, readily received him into Dyrrachium; but a Deleanus, instead of performing his promise, caused the credulous and unhappy Teichemerus to be put to death; and then marching without loss of time to Thessalonica, where the emperor lay encamped, struck with his unexpected approach such terror into the Roman army, that they fled with Michael in the utmost confusion to Constant The emperor is tinople, leaving all their baggage behind them to the care of Manuel Ibatza, who, put to flight. betraying his trust, delivered it up to the enemy. In the mean time Alusianus, the brother of John the last king of Bulgaria, who, when that country submitted to Basilius, had been raised to the dignity of a patrician, having made his escape from Conflantinople, and got undiscovered into Bulgaria, was there received by his countrymen with great demonstrations of joy. As he was a real descendant of the royal b family, his arrival gave no small umbrage to Deleanus, who nevertheless, to ingratiate himself with the people, took him for his collegue in the empire, and sent him, at the head of forty thousand men, to lay siege to Thessalonica. Alusianus distinguished Thessalonica himself on that occasion in a very eminent manner; but the vigorous opposition he besieged. met with from Constantine the patrician, obliged him to raise the siege and retire, after he had lost fifteen thousand men in the undertaking. Deleanus laid hold of this opportunity to leffen the credit of his collegue, giving out, that he maintained a private correspondence with the Romans. But Alusianus, apprised of his evil designs, refolved to be before-hand with him; and accordingly, having invited him to an entertainment, he caused his eyes to be plucked out; and then, distrusting the fickle c humour of the Bulgarians, returned to Constantinople, after his friends had obtained of the emperor his pardon. Upon his return, Michael, tho' grievously afflicted with The emperor a dropfy, entered the enemy's country at the head of a powerful army, and falling enters Bulgaupon the Bulgarians, now destitute of a head to advise and command them, put them it; intresposs to flight, and obliged them to submit anew to the yoke. After this, the emperor the empire. returned in triumph to Constantinople; but finding his distemper daily increased, he foon after diverted himself of the imperial purple, and entering into a monastery, which he himself had built, spent there the remaining part of his life in acts of piety and repentance. He died on the tenth of December 1041. after he had reigned seven years, and eight months. Upon his death, Michael Calaphates, his sister's son, who Michael Calad had been created Casar, and at the same time adopted by Zoe, as some authors write, phates. was proclaimed emperor. He, upon his accession to the empire, probably out of complaifance to Zoe, who appeared very zealous in his interest, banished his uncle John the eunuch, and proceeded with the like unnatural feverity against his other relations, causing most of them, without any regard to their age or circumstances, to be made eunuchs. Over-jealous of his authority, he caused in the end the empress Zoe to be confined to a monastery, under pretence, that she had, by witchcrast and forcery, attempted to take away his life. His monstrous ingratitude to one, who had been chiefly instrumental in his promotion, and was still held in great veneration by the people, on account of her high birth, provoked them to fuch a degree, that breaking out into a general fedition, with an unanimous confent they fent for Theodora, the emperor Constantine's youngest daughter, who had been shut up in a monastery, as we have observed above, and saluted her empress, with her sister Zoe. Michael, Zoe and Theofinding the people universally bent against him, retired of his own accord, with his dora raised to uncle Constantine, to a monastery, where they both took the religious habit, hoping the sovereignty. by that means to appeale the inraged multitude. But Theodora, who was more relations and adherents, Michael having enjoyed the fovereignty scarce four months q. Zoe, seeing herself once more invested with the sovereignty, banished all the friends of the late tyrants, and recalled from exile such as had served her sather and uncle, preferring them to the first employments in the state and army. Among the rest Maniaces, of whom we have spoken above, was sent for to court, and appointed commander in chief of all the western forces. Zoe had scarce reigned three months, when the people pressing her to marry, and by that means prevent the disturbances that might arise among competitors for the empire, she recalled from banishment Constantine, surnamed Monomachus, a person of a noble extraction, and comely aspect;

And the inhatachium.

9 CUROPALAT. ZONAR. CEDREN. ibid.

incensed against them than Zoe herself, moving that their eyes should be plucked out, the populace, breaking into the church of St. John the baptist, where they had taken refuge, dragged them from the altar to the forum, and there, in a most cruel man-Michael dener, deprived them of their sight. After this, they were banished, with all their posed and ba-and having married him, caused him to be crowned by the patriarch with the usual a Zoe marries Constantine Monomachus, Maniaces revoies; but is msardered.

folemnity. He had been banished, during the reign of Michael, to the island of who is declared Lesbos, and from thence removed, at the instigation of John the eunuch, to Mitylene, where he was when sent for to court, and raised to the empire. He no sooner saw himself invested with the imperial dignity, than he banished the eunuch to the island of Lesbos; where, his eyes being pulled out by the emperor's orders, he died soon after. In the very beginning of Constantine's reign, Maniaces, not able to brook the ill treatment he met with from Sclerus, one of the emperor's chief favourites, revolted with the troops under his command, and affuming the imperial ornaments, paffed with his army into Bulgaria, where he was joined by the malecontents of that country. Constantine dispatched Stephen Sebastophorus against him, at the head of a very nume- b rous army; which however was defeated and put to flight by Maniaces at the first onset. Maniaces did not live to reap the fruit of his victory, being slain a few days after it, by a person unknown, who had the good luck to make his escape. Upon his death, those who had been most forward in the rebellion, were the first who threw down their arms, and submitted to Stephen, the emperor's general, who, notwithstanding his defeat, was, on his return to Constantinople, honoured with a triumph. The same year 1043. the Rossi, who had continued long quiet, appeared unexpectedly before Constantinople with a mighty fleet; but being defeated by the emperor's navy in the streights, they were glad to renew their antient alliance with the empire. Upon their retreat, the emperor marched in person into the east, and there recovered c feveral cities, which the Saracens had feized in the two late reigns. But while he Leo Tornicius was pursuing the war with great success, Leo Tornicius, escaping out of a monastery,

The Rossi defrated.

revolts, and be to which he had been confined, affumed the purple, and caused himself to be protinople.

He raises the his sight.

fieges Constan- claimed emperor. Leo was a person of extraordinary parts, and nearly related to the emperor, by whom he had been, out of jealoufy, removed from his government of Iberia, and shut up in a monastery; but having found means to make his escape from thence, he fled to Adrianople, where he was received with loud acclamations by the people, who had been lately disobliged by Monomachus. Being joined there by great multitudes, who flocked to him from all parts, he advanced to Constantinople, and laid fiege to that metropolis; but meeting, contrary to his expectation, with a vigor- d ous opposition from the inhabitants, and several of his accomplices falling off from him, he raised the siege, and retired to Arcadiopolis, where he defended himself for fiege, is taken, some time against the forces the emperor had sent to reduce him; but being in the end overpowered with numbers, he was taken, and fent in chains to Monomachus, who first caused his eyes to be pulled out, and then confined him to a remote island. The rebellion being thus happily suppressed almost in its birth, and the Saracens in the east awed by the emperor's presence, a prosound tranquillity reigned the two following years throughout the provinces. But in 1048, the Roman dominions were invaded by a new enemy, scarce mentioned before in history; but reserved by providence for the utter destruction of the empire, which we shall see them accomplish four hundred years hence, and put a period to the very name of a Roman empire. These were the Turks, who, quitting their antient habitations in the neighbourhood of mount Caucasus, and passing the Caspian streights, had settled in Armenia Major, about the year 844. There they continued an unknown and despicable people, till the wars of the Saracens among themselves gave them an opportunity of aggrandizing The Saracens, having, with amazing fuccess and rapidity, subdued Persia, Assyria, Egypt, Africa, and a considerable part of Europe itself, divided their vast spreading dominions into several governments or principalities, which were ruled by their respective sultans or commanders, who, in process of time quarrelling with one another, hastened the ruin of the empire, which they had so successfully f About the year 1030. Mohammed, the fon of Sambrael, sultan of Persia, established. not finding himself a match for Pifaris, sultan of Babylon, with whom he was at war, had recourse to the Turks, who sent him from Armenia Major, where they settled, as we have observed above, three thousand of their nation, under the conduct of one Tangrolipix, ? reading man amongst them. Mohammed, strengthened with this supply, gained & complete victory over the sultan of Babylon; but when the Turks, to whom it was chiefly owing, defired leave to return home, he refused to comply with their just demand, being unwilling to part with them, till he had ended the war, in which he was engaged with the Indians. Hereupon the Turks, withdrawing without his consent to the defart of Carbonitis, and being there joined by several discona tented Persians, began to make frequent inroads into the territories of the Saracens. Mohammed immediately dispatched an army of twenty thousand men against them, who were surprised in the night by Tangrolipix, and utterly deseated. The fame of The Turks this victory, and the immense booty which the Turks acquired by it, drew multitudes conquer Persta to them from all parts, of criminals, fugitive slaves, robbers, &c. insomuch that Tan-duct of Tan-grolipix saw himself in a short time at the head of sifty thousand men. Mohammed, grolipix. enraged at the defeat of his forces, ordered the ten generals, who had commanded them, to be deprived of their fight, and at the same time a new army to be raised, which he headed in person; but as he was riding about in the heat of the engagement to animate his men, he fell from his horse, and soon after died of the fall. His death b was no sooner known, than his men threw down their arms, and submitting to Tan-Tangrolipix grolipix, proclaimed him king of Persia. This battle, which gave rise to the Turkish proclaimed sulpower, was fought about the year 1024 in the neighbourhood of Assacra and Fersia. power, was fought about the year 1034. in the neighbourhood of Aspacan, now Ispahan, the metropolis of Persia. Tangrolipix, now master of Persia, having first opened a passage for his countrymen into that kingdom over the Araxes parting it from Armenia, made war upon Pisaris or Pisasiris, kalif of Babylon, whom he at length flew, and annexed his dominions to his own. He then fent his nephew, Cutlu-Moses Reduces Babyor Cuthimuses, against the Arabians; but he was overthrown by them in a pitched lon. battle, and obliged to take shelter in Media, through which Stephen, the Roman governor, denying him a paffage, he put his troops to flight, took the governor e himself prisoner, and, without any further opposition, reached Briscium, on the confines of Persia, where he fold Stephen for a slave. Returning from thence to Tangro-lipix, he excused, in the best manner he could, the bad success of his expedition, acquainting him at the fame time with his victory over the Romans in Media, and encouraging him to invade that fertile country, which, he faid, might be eafily fubdued, as it was inhabited by none but women, meaning the Romans. Tangrolipix did not then hearken to his advice, being wholly bent on revenging the late defeat on the Arabians, against whom he marched in person, at the head of a numerous army; but being himself defeated and put to flight by that warlike nation, he gave over all Is defeated by thoughts of reducing them; and reflecting on what Cutu-Moses had told him, he the Arabians.

d sent Asan, his brother's son, surnamed the Deas, with an army of twenty thousand men, to reduce Media; which Asan entered, committing every-where dreadful rava-Invades Media. ges. But being in the end drawn into an ambush by the Roman generals, he was cut off, with his whole army. Tangrolipix, no-ways discouraged at this misfortune, fent a new army into Media, near an hundred thousand strong; who, after having laid waste the country without opposition, the Romans shutting themselves up in their strong-holds, laid siege to Artza, a place of great trade, and on that account esteemed the most wealthy in those parts; but not being able by any other means to master it, they set fire to it, which in a short time reduced it to ashes. Of the inhabitants an hundred fifty thousand, and upwards, are said to have perished, either by the sword, e or in the flames. After this, Abraham Halim, half-brother to Tangrolipix, who commanded the Turks, hearing that the Romans, reinforced with a body of troops under the command of Liparites, governor of Iberia, had taken the field, marched against them, and offered them battle; which they not declining, the two armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expressed. The victory continued long doubtful; but at Is defeated by length inclined to the Romans, who nevertheless did not think it adviseable, as their the Romans. general Liparites was taken prisoner, to pursue the sugitives. The emperor, greatly concerned for the captivity of Liparites, dispatched embassadors, with rich presents, and a large sum, to redeem him, and at the same time to conclude an alliance with Tangrolipix. The sultan received the presents; but generously returned them, with f the money, to Liparites, whom he fet at liberty without ranfom, only requiring him, at his departure, never more to bear arms against the Turks. Not long after, Tangrolipix fent a person of great authority among the Turks, with the character of embasfador, to Constantinople, who, having arrogantly exhorted the emperor to submit to his master, and acknowledge himself his tributary, was by Monomachus dismissed with scorn, and driven out of the city. On his return, he acquainted Tangrolipix with the reception he had met with; who thereupon resolved to renew the war. Monomachus, on the other hand, did not neglect the necessary preparations to oppose to powerful an enemy; but was diverted from it by a war, which fuddenly broke out

The Patzinack between him and the Patzinack, a Scythian nation, whose king, by name Tyrach, a highly provoked at the kind reception Kegenes, after revolting from him, had met with from the Romans, passed the Danube on the ice, and entering, if the authors of those times are to be credited, with eight hundred thousand men the Roman provinces, destroyed all with fire and sword. Constantine Arianites was sent against them with all the troops quartered in Macedon and Bulgaria; but he, not thinking it advisable to venture an engagement, suffered them to ravage the country without controul, till great multitudes of them being swept off by the distempers which raged in their army, he was advised by Kegenes, who joined him with twenty thousand men, to fall upon them fuddenly; which he did with so much resolution, that the barbarians, weakened But are utterly with fickness, and terrified at so sudden an onset, threw down their arms, and submitted. Great numbers of them were allowed to fettle at Sardica, Naissus, Eutzapolis, and in other cities of Bulgaria; some returned to their own country; but Tyrach, and an hundred and forty of the most noble among them, were sent to Constantinople, where they were kindly received by the emperor; and upon their embracing the chriftian religion, as Kegenes had done before, with all his followers, they were entertained in a manner fuitable to their rank, and even raifed to confiderable employments. However, the emperor having fent fifteen thousand of those who had settled routed.

Iberia laid maste by the Turks; Who beliege Mintzichierta:

But are forced to raise the siege.

The empress Zoe dies.

in Bulgaria, under the conduct of Catalunes, one of their own officers, to reinforce the army in Iberia, they revolted on their march; and being joined by great numbers of their countrymen, encamped on the banks of the Danube, making from thence c frequent incursions into the Roman territories. The emperor fent some of his best generals against them; but was not able to suppress them, his forces being, in three successive engagements, put to the rout. Having at length resolved to employ the whole strength of the empire against them, they were so terrified at the noise of the preparations the emperor was making, that they fent deputies to fue for peace; which was readily granted them for thirty years. During this war, Tangrolipix, affronted at the reception of his embassador, as we have related above, entered Iberia, and having laid the country waste far and near, returned from thence into Media, and laid siege to Mantzichierta, a place defended by a numerous garison, and fortified with a triple wall, and deep ditches. However, as it was fituated in a plain and open d country, he hoped to be master of it in a short time; but finding, after he had continued before it thirty days together, that the befieged were refolved to defend themselves to the utmost extremity, despairing of success, he resolved to raise the siege, when Alcan, one of his chief officers, prevailed upon him to continue it but one day longer, and to commit to him the conduct and management of the attacks. This being granted, Alcan the next day disposed his men with such skill, and encouraged them by his example to fight with fo much bravery and resolution, that, notwithstanding the vigorous opposition they met with, the place would, in all likelihood, have been taken, had not Alcan been flain, while, in spite of the incessant showers of arrows, darts, stones, &c. he was mounting the wall. The besieged, knowing him e by the richness of his armour, drew him by the hair into the city, and cutting off his head, threw it over the wall amongst the enemy, who, disheartened at that fight, gave over the affault, and retired, Tangrolipix pretending some urgent affairs had called him home. However, he returned the spring following, and ravaging Iberia, spared neither sex nor age. But upon the approach of Michael Acoluthus, who was fent against him at the head of a considerable army, he retired to Tauris, leaving thirty thousand men behind him, to infest the frontiers of the empire; which they did with great fuccess, the borders being, through the avarice of Monomachus, left unguarded; for, till his time, the provinces bordering on the countries of the barbarians, had maintained, at their own charge, forces to defend them, and were on f that account exempted from paying tribute. But Monomachus exacting of them the fame fums that were paid by the other provinces, they were no longer in a condition to restrain the incursions of the enemy. About this time died the empress Zoe, and soon after the emperor himself. Tho' he had always expressed a great esteem and regard for Theodora, the fifter of Zoe, yet he was prevailed upon by the eunuchs at court to name for his fuccessor Nicephorus, who commanded the forces in Bulgaria, and was privately fent for, when the emperor's recovery was despaired of. But Theodora, informed by her friends at court of the emperor's intention, privately with-

1 NICEPH BRYENN. CUROPAL. CEDREN. ZONAR. in Monomach. * NICEPHL BRYENN. C. 4. CUROP. ibid.

drew

a drew from the monastery of St. George, whither she had attended him; and returning to Constantinople, attended by her most faithful friends, caused herself to be proclaimed, and faluted empress; which gave Monomachus so much concern, that he fell into a swoon, and died soon after, having reigned twelve years, and eight And Monomamonths. Some authors write, that both he and Zoe died of the plague, which chus. indeed raged at that time with great fury in Gonstantinople; but most authors ascribe his death to the gout, which he increased by his intemperance, lewdness and debauch-

Theodora no sooner received the news of his death, than she caused all those to Theodora. be secured, who had proposed the promotion of Nicephorus; and depriving them of b their employments, named others in their room, in whom she thought she could confide. Theodorus, the eunuch, was sent at the head of a considerable army into the east to awe the Turks, who hearing of the emperor's death, were preparing to renew the war. He prevented with his care and vigilance the enemy from making inroads into the Roman territories; fo that the eastern provinces enjoyed, during Theodora's short reign, a profound tranquillity, to which they had been long strangers. Her prudent choice of the great officers and ministers of state, her impartial admi- Her excellent nistration of justice, (for she heard all causes herself) and her great moderation in government. the use of the authority with which she was invested, gained her the affections of her people, and the respect and esteem of all foreign nations. But the empire did c not long enjoy the many valuable bleffings that attended her administration; for in the second year of her reign she was seized with a violent pain in her bowels, which in a few days put an end to her life. Before she died, she was persuaded by Leo Strabospondylus, her prime minister, and her favourite eunuch, to bequeath the empire to Michael Stratioticus, a person stricken in years, and altogether ignorant of state-affairs, which chiefly recommended him to the eunuchs, who hoped to govern in his name with an absolute sway. Theodora died, soon after she had named Her death. him, in the month of August 1056. having reigned one year and nine months. The death of Theodora, and promotion of Michael, which had been managed with the Michael utmost secrecy, being known at the same time, Theodorus, cousin-german to the Stratioticus. d deceased emperor, laying claim to the empire, as of right belonging to him, protested against what had been done in favour of Michael; and summoning all his friends, servants, and dependents, moved in the evening with a great train through the most frequented streets to the palace; but finding the gates shut, and well guarded, he went from thence to the great church, not doubting but he should be well received there by the patriarch and the clergy. But they refusing, contrary to his expectation, to admit him, he had recourse to the people, who, unmoved by his offers and promises, continued firm in the resolution they had taken a few hours before to support Michael. Theodorus, now well apprifed he could not succeed in his attempt, and dreading the refentment of the new emperor, renounced all claim A rebellion e to the imperial dignity, and took refuge with his fon in the church; but he was foon suppressed. dragged from thence by the emperor's orders, and banished to Pergamus, where he died some years after. The rebellion being thus suppressed, Michael enjoyed the imperial dignity without a competitor, but soon shewed himself altogether unequal to so eminent a post. As he was an intire stranger to state-affairs, having been brought up from his youth in the camp, he suffered the eunuchs, to whom he was indebted for his promotion, to govern without controul. At their instigation he disobliged most of the general officers of the army, whom he ought to have regarded Michael disas his chief support, and among the rest Isaac Comnenus, and Ambustus Catacale, obliges the offmen renowned for their eminent services and experience in war. The former he cers of the f deprived of his command in the army, and the latter he removed from the government of Antioch, recalling Bryennius, a man of a turbulent and restless spirit, who had been banished by Theodora, and appointing him commander in chief of the eastern forces. Bryennius, upon his return to court, petitioned the emperor for his ettate, which had been confiscated in the late reign, but met with a furly denial; which provoked him to fuch a degree, that he refolved to revolt, and employ the forces under his command against the person who had entrusted him with them. Having imparted his design to Ambustus, Comnenus, and several others, who had several of been disabliged by Michael, they all met, in order to proceed to the election of a them confine new emperor, when, by the unanimous consent of the whole party, Ambustus was against him. g chosen; but he declining the burden on account of his age, Isaac Comnenus was proposed next, as a person in every respect well qualified for so great a trust. As a the proposal was received by all with great applause, Comnenus did not oppose it, but suffered the conspirators to take an oath of allegiance to him, promising at the fame time to govern with justice and moderation. After this, they all departed from Constantinople, where they had met, according to custom, at Easter, and repaired to their several posts, where each of them was, in his respective station, to promote the general defign. Bryennius hastened to the army in the east; but falling out there with John Opfaras, a patrician, whom the emperor had appointed to distribute a largess among the soldiers, the quarrel was carried to such a height, that Bryennius, in defiance of the emperor's orders, committed Opfaras to custody, after having caused him to be publicly beaten with rods. Hereupon Lycanthes, who commanded b in that neighbourhood a strong body of Lycaonians and Pisidians, concluding that Byrennius designed to revolt, sell upon him unexpectedly in his camp; and having taken him prisoner, delivered him to Opsaras, by whose orders his eyes were pulled out. The officers of the east, informed of his misfortune, and apprehending he might, upon examination, reveal their designs, (for he was sent in chains to the emperor) refolved openly to declare themselves; and accordingly having drawn together in a spacious plain, all the forces under their command, they sent for Comnenus, who was then at his house in Paphlagonia, and presented him in the imperial Ifaac Comne- robes to the foldiery, by whom he was, with universal consent, saluted emperor on the eighth of June 1057.

Vol. VI. Nº 8. proposed

nus faluted emperor.

Which is defeated by

Comnenus.

Comnenus, thus raised to the imperial dignity, took upon him the command of An army fent the army, which he immediately marched over the river Sangarius in Phrygia Major, against him; bending his rout towards Nice, which he surprised, most of the soldiers, who garifoned it, being retired to their own homes. In the mean time Stratioticus, receiving news of the revolt, affembled all the forces quartered in the west; and having mustered his army, chose for his generals Theodorus the eunuch, and Aaron Ducas, an officer of great experience in war, and brother to the wife of Comnenus. The two generals marched at the head of their army to Nicomedia, and from thence to Nice, in the neighbourhood of which city they found Comnenus encamped. Upon their approach, he drew up his army, Ambustus having the command of the left wing, Ro- d manus Sclerus of the right, and Comnenus himself of the main body. The emperor's generals accepted the challenge, and the two armies engaged with great resolution and intrepidity. At first Aaron, who commanded the left wing of the imperial army, broke the opposite wing of the enemy, took Romanus himself prisoner, and pursued the fugitives to their camp. But Ambustus, on the other hand, bearing all down before him, pierced into the enemy's camp, which he took and plundered; and then charging with fresh vigour the emperor's left wing, obliged them to give over the pursuit, and retire in some confusion. In their retreat they were attacked by Comnenus, and eafily put to flight; which fo discouraged the rest of the emperor's troops, that, throwing away their arms, they fled in great diforder. Comnenus, having e thus gained a complete victory, began his march to Constantinople, not doubting but the citizens would open their gates to him, as foon as he appeared before them. In the mean time Stratioticus, informed of the overthrow of his forces, fent some of the chief men in the senate to Comnenus, with proposals for an agreement, which was concluded on the following terms: That Comnenus should be declared Casar; that a full pardon should be granted to all his followers; and that such of them as enjoyed employments, should be continued in them, and confirmed by the emperor. But this agreement was made void by the emperor himself soon after he had ratified it: for, at the inftigation of some about him, he obliged, partly by promises, partly by menaces, the fenate and people to bind themselves by a most solemn oath never f to give Comnenus the title of emperor, nor own him for their fovereign. This oath was exacted, when Comnenus was still in Afia; but news was no sooner brought, that he was within a day's march of Constantinople, than he was, by a decree of the fenate, and the unanimous confent of the people, proclaimed emperor, and all those, The decree being who should oppose him, adjudged enemies to their country. passed in the senate without opposition, the patriarch dispatched messengers to Comnenus, inviting him to the city, and at the same time some bishops to Stratioforced to resign ticus, commanding him in the name of the senate and people to resign the imperial dignity, and quit the palace. We are told, that when the bishops delivered their message, Stratioticus asked them, What they intended to give him in exchange for the g

Stratioticus

empire?

a empire? and that they answering, The kingdom of heaven, he immediately divested himself of the purple; and quitting the palace, retired to his own house, and from thence to a monastery, after he had reigned one year. Comnenus arrived the same Isasc Comneevening, and was the next day, the first of September 1057. crowned in the great nus crowned church by the patriarch Michael Cerularius. The new emperor's first care was to reward those, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his promotion, and above all the patriarch, whose nephews and relations he preferred to the first employments in the state. As he was well skilled in military affairs, and had given signal proofs of his courage and refolution, the neighbouring barbarians continued quiet, during his short reign. At home he was more feared on account of his severity, than b beloved. As he found the exchequer quite drained, he loaded the people with heavy taxes, and at length fell upon the monasteries, depriving them of the immense wealth, with which they had been enriched by his predeceffors. This the patriarch highly refented, and with great arrogance threatened to pull him down from the throne, to which he had raifed him, unless he restored to the monasteries the estates which he had unjustly seized. But the emperor, instead of yielding to his threats, immediately banished him, and raised Constantine Lichudes to the patriarchal see in He banishes his room. Isaac had not reigned above two years, when he was seized with a vio-the patriarch. lent distemper, occasioned, as some authors write, by a slash of lightning. Being fensible that his end approached, and at the same time touched with remorfe in e reflecting by what means he had obtained the imperial dignity, he voluntarily refigned it, and retiring to a monastery, there spent the remainder of his days in exercises of piety, having reigned but two years and three months. Being advised, before he refigned, to chuse a successor, tho' he had several children and near relations of his own, yet preferring the public good to his private interest, he named Constantine He resigns the Ducas, a person generally esteemed the best qualified in the whole empire for so empire to Con-eminent a station. Ducas, thus chosen by Comnenus, and received by the senate and station. people, was crowned with the usual solemnity by the patriarch. He applied himself with great diligence to the affairs of state, administered justice with the utmost impartiality, reformed feveral abuses, which had prevailed under his predecessors, d and behaved on all occasions with such moderation, that he might have been reckoned amongst the best princes, had not his insatiable avarice drowned in a manner all his good qualities. He chose rather to leave the frontiers naked and unguarded, than to maintain the necessary garisons; which encouraged the Turks to extend their conquests on all sides, and the Uzians, a Scythian nation, to pass the Danube to the The Uzians number of five hundred thousand men, and ravage the neighbouring countries. invade the em-Nicephorus Botoniates, asterwards emperor, and Basilius Apocapes, were sent against pire; them. But the barbarians having put the emperor's forces to flight at the first onset, and taken both the generals in the pursuit, laid waste all Thrace and Macedon; and penetrating without opposition into Greece, destroyed all with fire and sword. The e emperor, affected with the calamities of his subjects, but yet unwilling to be at the charge of raising the necessary forces to deliver them from the oppression under which they groaned, endeavoured at first to purchase a peace with rich presents, and even with promising to pay them an annual tribute. To such meanness was the emperor brought by his fordid temper. But the barbarians resusing to hearken to any terms, he ordered a general fast to be observed throughout his dominions, and then marched out against them with a handful of men. But in the mean time the enemy being greatly weakened by a plague that began to reign among them, the Hungari or Hungarians, whose country they had ravaged, fell unexpectedly upon But are cut off them, and cut them off almost to a man. Nothing else happened, during this by the Hungaf unactive prince's reign, which authors have thought worth transmitting to posterity, except a dreadful earthquake, which overturned several stately edifices at Constantinople; and the appearing of a comer, which was feen for forty days together, and thought to portend the emperor's approaching fate. And indeed Constantine was soon after seized with a violent distemper, which in a sew days put an end to his life. He lest the empire to his three sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine; but as they were yet very young, he appointed the empress Eudocia, their mother, regent during the minority, after having required of her an oath never to marry, which was lodged with great folemnity in the hands of the patriarch. He likewise obliged invade the empire.

The Turks

Romanus

Diogenes.

the fenators folemnly to swear, that they would acknowledge none for their sove- a reign but his three fons. Having thus secured, as he thought, the imperial crown to his family, he died in 1067. after having reigned five years and fix months. He was no fooner dead, than the Turks, hearing the empire was governed by a woman, broke with great violence into Mesopotamia, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, destroying all with fire and fword. The empress was no-ways in a condition to oppose them, the greater part of the army having been disbanded in her husband's life time, and the troops, that were still on foot, being undisciplined, and altogether unsit for service. This gave the empress great concern, which was aggravated by the seditious speeches of a discontented party at home, repeating in all assemblies, that the present state of the empire required a man of courage and address at the helm, instead of a weak b and helpless woman. As they imagined the empress would never think of marrying, in regard of the oath she had taken, they hoped by these speeches to induce the people to revolt, and chuse a new emperor. This Eudocia was aware of; and therefore, to prevent the evils that threatened her and her family, she resolved to marry fome person of merit, capable of deseating the designs of her enemies both at home and abroad. At this time Romanus Diogenes, a person of a most beautiful aspect, extraordinary parts, and an illustrious birth, for he was descended from the emperor Romanus Argyrus, being accused of aspiring at the empire, tried and convicted, was brought forth to receive the fentence of death, which his ambition had deserved. But the empress, touched with compassion at the appearance of the unhappy pri- c foner, who, she thought, deserved a better sate, put a stop to the sentence; and having gently upbraided him with his ill-timed ambition, fet him at liberty, and foon after appointed him commander in chief of all her forces; in which station he acquitted himself so well, that the empress resolved to marry him, if she could but recover the writing, in which her oath was contained, out of the hands of the patriarch. In order to this, she applied herself to a favourite eunuch, who going to the patriarch, told John Xighiline, that the empress was so taken with his nephew, by name Bardas, that she was determined to marry him, and raise him to the empire, provided he absolved her from the oath she had lately taken, and convinced the senate of the lawfulness of such a marriage. The patriarch, tho' a man of great d probity and learning, yet dazzled with the prospect of his nephew's promotion, readily undertook to perform both; and accordingly, having first obtained the confent of the senate, by representing to them the dangerous condition of the empire, and exclaiming against the rash oath, which the jealousy of the late emperor had extorted from the empress, he publicly discharged her from the observance of it, restored the writing to her, and exhorted her to marry some deserving person, who, being entrusted with an absolute authority, might protect her and her children, and defend the empire against the many enemies, who threatened it, and were not to be repressed by the hands of a weak woman, or awed by three young children. The empress, thus discharged from her oath, married a few days after, to the great & disappointment of the patriarch, Romanus Diogenes, who was thereupon proclaimed emperor. As he was a man of great activity and experience in war, he no sooner faw himself invested with the sovereign power, than, taking upon him the command of the army, he passed over into Asia with the few forces he could assemble, recruiting and inuring them on his march to the military discipline, which had been utterly neglected in the preceding reigns. Upon his arrival in Asia, he was informed, that the Turks, having surprised and plundered the city of Neocasarea, were retiring with a rich booty. Hereupon, hastening after them at the head of a chosen body of light-armed troops, he came up with them the third day; and falling upon them, while they were marching in disorder, without the least apprehension of an enemy, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and recovered the booty. He then pursued his march to Aleppo, which he retook, together with Hierapolis, where he built a strong castle. As he was returning to join the forces he had lest behind him, he was met by a numerous body of Turks, who attempted to cut off his retreat; but the emperor, pretending at first through sear to decline an engagement, attacked them afterwards, when they least expected it, with such vigour, that he put them to flight at the first onset, and might have gained a complete victory, had he thought it adviseable to pursue them. After this, several towns submitted to him,

The empress marries him.

He passes over into Atia.

His success against the Turks.

) K [[] Sove∙ ₁ rown Нę T.10, g all the the VICE. tches weak 5 ging, : the hereacry эте peã, bçiot i, 723 trai. y pri- c , 10d and n he but the , by pire, a the great d onice, 000prire, r had 0f 14 FÀO, , 10d 00 30 ren. great è imed 00768 nmand recruit otterly d, that with dy of жM, emy, f rfued ilt a i, he

, but

acked

them

iad he

o him,

the

Chap. 35.

a the Turks abandoning them upon the first news of his approach. But the autumn being already far spent, he retired to Cilicia, and from thence to Constantinople. The following year he passed over into Asia early in the spring; and being informed, that the Turks, having defeated Philaretus, who had been left to guard the banks of the Euphrates, were advanced into Cilicia, and had there surprised and sacked Iconium, the most rich and populous city of that province, he marched in person against them. But the Turks, not thinking it adviseable to wait his arrival, retired in great haste. However, the Armenians, encouraged by the approach of the emperor's army, fell upon the enemy in the plains of Tarsus, put them to flight, and stripped them both of their baggage and the booty they had taken. The enemy being b retired, the emperor spent the remaining part of the summer in settling the affairs of the provinces; and upon the approach of winter, returned once more to Constantinople, which he entered in triumph, amidst the loud acclamations of the people. The spring following the emperor marched anew into Asia, at the head of a considerable army, which he had raised, and with incredible pains disciplined, during the winter. As the Turks had already taken the field, feveral skirmishes happened between the parties detached from the two armies, in one of which Nicephorus Basilacius, one of the emperor's chief officers, was taken prisoner, and carried to Axan, the Turkish fultan, and son of the celebrated Tangrolipix, who received and entertained him with great civility. When the two armies drew near, the fultan, observc ing the disposition and number of the emperor's forces, and dreading, as he was a man of great experience and fagacity, the uncertain issues of war, fent embassadors to Romanus, with proposals for a lasting and honourable peace, which being rejected He rejects the by the emperor with disdain, both armies prepared for an engagement. Tho' the P opojals of the emperor's troops were not near fo numerous as those of the enemy, Ruselius, one of ultan. his best commanders, having been detached a little before with a considerable body; yet Romanus, presuming upon the courage of his men, and the success that had hitherto attended his arms, caused the fignal to be given; and falling with great fury upon the enemy, put them into some disorder. However, they soon rallied, and charged with fresh vigour, so that the dispute continued with various success, d till the emperor, fearing the sultan should send part of his army to attack his camp, which he had left weakly guarded, caused, as the day was already far spent, a retreat to be founded, and retired in good order with that part of the army, which he commanded in person. But Andronicus, the son of John Ducas, brother to the late emperor Constantine, and in his heart an enemy to Romanus, whose good fortune he envied, cried out, that the emperor was put to flight; and at the same time turning his horse about, fled with great precipitation to the camp. The rest of the army followed his example, and were pursued by the Turks, who in that confusion put great numbers of them to the sword. The emperor did all that lay in his power to make them rally, and face the enemy; but, in spite of his utmost e efforts, they continued their flight, every one shifting for himself in the best manner He is defeated, The emperor, tho' thus for saken by his army, yet stood his ground, and taken prihe could. till he himself being wounded, and his horse killed under him, he was at length soverpowered with numbers, and taken prisoner. When news was first brought to the fultan of his captivity, he could hardly give credit to it. But being affured of the truth, both by the embassadors, whom he had sent to him before the battle, and by Basilacius, his captive, he ordered the emperor to be brought before him, and tenderly embracing him, Grieve not, noble emperor, said he, at your missortune; for But kindly enfuch is the chance of war, sometimes overwhelming one, and sometimes another; you shall tertained, and bave no occasion to complain of your captivity; for I will not use you as my prisoner, by the sultan. f but as an emperor: which he did accordingly, lodging him in a royal pavilion, assigning him attendants, with an equipage suitable to his quality, and discharging fuch prisoners as he desired. After he had entertained for some days his royal captive with extraordinary magnificence, a perpetual peace was concluded between them, and the emperor difinissed with the greatest marks of honour imaginable. Being thus let at liberty, he proceeded, attended by the fultan's embassadors, for Constantinople, where the peace was to be ratified. He stopped at Theodosiopolis, and continued some days there to have his wounds dressed, with a design to pursue his journey to the imperial city, as foon as he was able to travel. But in the mean time he was informed, that John, the brother of Constantine Ducas, with Psellus, a leading man in the senate,

g and several others, having, upon the news of his captivity, driven Eudocia from the

7 P

Vol. VI. Nº 8.

Michael Ducas throne, and thut her up in a monastery, had proclaimed her eldest son Michael a proclaimed em- Ducas emperor. Upon this intelligence he left Theodofiopolis, and repairing to a strong castle called Docia, he fortified himself there, not doubting but he should be soon joined by his friends, and by great numbers of the officers and foldiers, who had ferved under him. But in the mean time John, who had taken upon him to act as guardian to the young prince, and governed with an absolute sway, dispatched his eldest son Andronicus against him with a strong body of troops, who having defeated the small army the unfortunate prince had with him, pursued him to Adana, a city in Cilicia, where he was closely belieged, and in the end forced to furrender. Andronicus carried his prisoner into Phrygia, where he fell dangerously ill, being, as was suspected, secretly poisoned. But the poison being too slow in its operation, John b

Romanus dies. ordered his eyes to be pulled out, which was done with fuch cruelty, that he died foon after in the island Prota, to which he had been confined, having reigned three years and eight months w. Romanus Diogenes being thus removed, Michael Ducas was univertally acknowledged emperor; but he being an indolent and unactive prince, the whole power was lodged in John, his uncle, who preferred such only as had been instrumental in the late revolution, and, under various pretences, banished those who gave him the least umbrage.

wade the em-

Defeat the emperor's army.

Gain a second victory.

the Turks.

Rufelius revolts.

In the mean time Axan, the Turkish fultan, hearing of the unhappy end of the late emperor, resolved to revenge the death of his friend and ally; and accordingly, The Turks in- having raised a powerful army, he broke into the territories of the empire, not c with a defign only to spoil and plunder, as formerly, but to conquer, and hold what he had once conquered. The emperor, alarmed at the motions of the Turks, dispatched Isaac Comnenus, fon to the late emperor of that name, against them, who gained at first some advantages over them; but having soon after ventured a general engagement, his army was, after a long and obstinate dispute, utterly defeated, and he himfelf taken prifoner. Another army was foon dispatched against them, under the command of John Ducas, the emperor's uncle, who gained several advantages over the enemy, and would, in all likelihood, have put a stop to their farther conquests, had he not been diverted by Ruselius, or Urselius, a native of Gaul, who revolting with the troops of his own nation under his command, reduced feveral cities in Pbry- d gia and Cappadocia, causing himself to be every-where proclaimed emperor. Against him John marched with all his forces, suffering the Turks in the mean time to pursue their conquests; but coming to an engagement with the rebels on the banks of the Sangarius, he received a total overthrow, and was taken prisoner. Notwithstanding this victory, Ruselius, to stop the progress of the Turks, who threatened the empire with utter destruction, not only released his prisoner, but joined him against the common enemy, by whom they were both overcome, and taken prisoners. However, Axan was for some time diverted from pursuing his conquests, and reaping the fruit of his victory, by Cutlu-Moses, cousin to the late sultan Tangrolipix, from whom he had revolted; but being defeated by him in a pitched battle, he had taken e refuge in Arabia, whence he now returned, at the head of a confiderable army; and laying claim to the fovereignty, was preparing to decide the controverfy by dint of fword. But while the two armies were ready to engage, the kaliff of Babylon, who had been deprived of his temporal jurisdiction by Tangrolipix, as we have related above, but still continued to exercise his authority in matters of religion, being looked upon as the fuccessor of their great prophet, interposed; and by representing to them the dangers, to which their intestine diffentions exposed them, brought them to this agreement; that Axan should enjoy undisturbed the monarchy lately erected by his father Tangrolipix, and that Cutlu-Moles, and his family, should quietly possess fuch provinces of the empire as he or his fons should, in process of time, conquer, f The progress of This agreement being made, Cutlu-Moses turned all his forces against the empire; and being affisted by Axan, made himself, in this and the following reign, master of all Media, Lycaonia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, fixing the feat of his new empire at Nice, in the latter province. While the Turks were busied in reducing the above-mentioned provinces, Ruselius, who had been ransomed by his wife, and, notwithstanding his late revolt, restored to favour, and entrusted with a considerable command in Asia Minor, revolted anew; and depending upon the affiftance of the Turks, with whom he had privately entered into an alliance, caused himself to be proclaimed

W NICEPH. Bryenn. c. 2-10. CUROPALAT. in Rom. Diog.

emperor.

a emperor. Michael sent the best commanders in the empire against him; but they were all fuccessively overcome in the feveral battles that were fought, Rufelius being powerfully supported by the Turks, whose interest it was to sow and maintain divisions in the empire. At length the emperor was advised to fend Alexius Comnenus against him, he being esteemed, tho' then very young, a man of uncommon address, and well skilled in the art of war. Alexius, by intercepting the enemy's provisions, and constantly harassing them on their marches, without ever coming to an engagement, reduced them in a short time to such streights, that they were forced to take refuge in the dominions of the fultan, where they were kindly entertained, and fupplied with necessaries at the public expence. But Alexius applying to Tutach, the Turkish b commander in those parts, he prevailed upon him with a large sum to seize on Ruse- The rebellion lius, and fend him in chains to Amafia, whence he was conveyed to Constantinople. Suppressed by The rebels, destitute of a leader, readily submitted, and surrendered the cities and Alexius Com-throng-holds, which they had reduced. The civil war being thus ended, Alexius returned to the imperial city, which he found highly diffatisfied with the emperor's conduct, and grievously afflicted with a famine, during which the emperor, instead of relieving the distressed inhabitants, had lessened the measure of the corn, which defervedly procured him the nick-name of Parapanaces. The aversion which people of all ranks had for the emperor on account of his avaricious temper, encouraged Nicephorus Botoniates, who commanded the forces in Asia, to revolt, and enter into Nicephorus c an alliance with the Turks, upon whom he had been fent to make war. Cutlu-Moses Botoniates and promifed to affift him to the utmost of his power; upon which he assumed the purple, and was faluted emperor by the army under his command. At the fame time Nicephorus Bryennius, who commanded in Dyrrhachium, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor there; and depending upon the affection of his foldiers, whom he had obliged with his liberality, was preparing to march strait to Constantinople. Michael, well apprifed that he was not in a condition to oppose either of the two competitors, resolved to relign the empire, and leave the throne empty for which of them should prevail. Accordingly, divesting himself of the imperial ornaments, he retired to a monastery, Michael where he took holy orders, and was foon after raifed to the fee of Ephefus x. He had refigns. d reigned fix years, and as many months, and refigned in the year 1078. Upon his refignation, Botoniates entered Constantinople without opposition; and being crowned Nicephorus by the patriarch on the twenty-fifth of March 1078. he immediately dispatched Botoniates Alexius Comnenus with the flower of his army against Bryennius, who was advancing crowned empewith long marches to the imperial city at the head of a numerous and well-disciplined army, and received with loud acclamations in all the places through which he passed, he being universally beloved by the people, and looked upon as a person in every respect well qualified for the empire. The two armies met at Calaura in Thrace; and an engagement enfuing, the fortune of the day continued doubtful, till the Seythians, who ferved under Bryennius, pursuing the advantage they had gained over e the forces of Alexius, fell upon his baggage, and began to plunder; which occasioned great confusion in the army of Bryennius, the rest of his troops following the example of those barbarians. Of this Alexius took advantage; and charging them with fresh vigour, put them to flight. However, they rallied, and, encouraged by Bryennius, recurned to the charge; but Alexius having, in the mean time, taken the horse of Bryennius, adorned, as he was, according to the custom of those times, with the imperial ornaments, he ordered him to be led up and down the ranks, giving out, that the general was slain. His own men being, by this device, greatly encouraged, and those of the enemy equally despirited, the victory continued no longer doubtful. Bryennius Bryennius, by shewing himself at the head of his army, convinced them of their taken prisoner. f mistake; but as they were already put into disorder, and had begun to give ground, after having attempted in vain to stop their slight, he was himself obliged to sly with the rest. As he was pursued close by the emperor's forces, he had the mis-

* Nickph. Bryenn. hist. Michael. c. 2-8. Ann. Comnen. l.i. c. 2.

fortune to fall into their hands, after having given extraordinary proofs of his perfonal valour. Alexius received him in a most obliging manner, entertained him at his own table, and soon after, having put his troops into winter-quarters, set out with his unfortunate prisoner for Constantinople; but was met on the road by Borilus, with orders from court to deliver up Bryennius to him, and march back against Basi-Basilacius lacius, who had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at Dyrrhachium; and being revolts;

Supported

Supported by all the men of interest in the west, had surprised Thessalonica, and was a

preparing to march to the imperial city at the head of a confiderable army. Alexius, having drawn his troops out of their winter-quarters, marched against the enemy; and encamping at a small distance from Basilacius, began to ravage and lay waste the neighbouring country. Hereupon Basilacius, having attempted in vain to bring him to an engagement, refolved to fall upon his camp in the night, which he did But is defeated accordingly; but Alexius, informed beforehand of his delign, received him, while he expected to meet with no opposition, so briskly, that his forces were soon put to flight, and he himself obliged to throw himself, with part of his army, into Thessalonica, which was immediately invested by the conqueror. Basilacius, who was a man of great resolution and intrepidity, rejecting the advantageous conditions b offered by Alexius, prepared to hold out to the last extremity; but the inhabitants, dreading the emperor's refentment, opened their gates, allowing Basilacius just time enough to retire into the castle, which he defended with incredible bravery, till he was betrayed by his own men, and delivered up to Alexius, who fent him to Constantinople, where his eyes were pulled out by the emperor's orders, and he confined to a monastery v. As the emperor was stricken in years, and had no issue male, Borilus and Germanus, two brothers, natives of Scythia, and the chief favourites of Betoniates, perfuaded him to name in his will one Synademus for his fucceffor, a youth of uncommon parts, and nearly related to the emperor. Tho' this was managed with great fecrecy, yet Mary, the empress, had some intimation of it. She was c first married to the emperor Michael Ducas, and afterwards to his succe sfor Nices borus Botoniates. By her former husband she had Constantine Ducas, who, by marrying the daughter of Botoniates, had acquired an indisputed right to succeed him. The empress therefore, highly provoked both against the emperor and his favourites, for thus excluding, with the utmost injustice, her son from the empire, disclosed the whole to the two brothers Alexius and Isaac Comneni, who promised her all imaginable affiftance. But in the mean time the two favourites, taking umbrage at the intimacy that appeared between the empress and the Comneni, resolved to remove, Alexius Com- by some means or other, the two brothers out of the way. Of this Alexius being depose the em- seasonably informed, he applied to Pacurianus, an officer of great experience in war, d and equally versed in state-affairs, acquainted him with the design they had formed of deposing the emperor, and begged him to assist them with his advice. Pacurianus, having heard him with great attention, answered without the least hesitation, That if they withdrew to the army early next morning, he would attend them in their flight; but if they delayed one moment longer, he would discover to the emperor their treasonable designs. Alexius, charmed with this resolute and generous answer, fled early in the morning, with his brother Isaac, Pacurianus, and the rest of their friends, towards the army, which then lay encamped on the borders of Upon their arrival, they acquainted the chief officers of the army with their defign of creating a new emperor; which being universally approved of, a e council was summoned; and after some deliberation, whether Isaac or Alexius should Alexius faluted be raifed to the empire, the latter was unanimously chosen, and saluted emperor by emperor by the the whole army, which, without loss of time, he led to Constantino le, being received with joyful acclamations in all the cities, through which he passed. The inhabitants of Constantinople, awed by the troops of Botoniates, shut their gates against him; but an officer, to whose charge one of the quarters of the city was committed, having He takes Con-privately admitted part of Alexius's forces, the gates were by them opened in the night to the rest, who, rushing in, made themselves masters of the city, before Botoniates knew it was affaulted. As Alexius's army was composed of barbarians as well as christians, the unhappy city was plundered in a most cruel manner, without f any regard to the churches themselves, which, together with the monasteries, were stripped of all their wealth and ornaments. George Palacologus, a person of great authority in the empire, and a zealous champion for the Comneni, easily prevailed upon the officers of the imperial navy, then riding in the haven of Constantinople,

Isic and

peror.

to declare for the new emperor. Botoniates, thus forfaken by all, fent some senators to Alexius, offering the whole power to him, provided he were suffered to retain the bare name of emperor, and with it the ornaments of the imperial dignity. Alexius was inclined to comply with his request; but John Ducas, brother to the late a emperor Constantine Ducas, and an irreconcileable enemy to Botoniates, would not fusfer him to hearken to an accommodation upon any terms whatsoever. Hereupon Barilus, the reigning favourite, observing with how much security the troops of Alexius ranged through the city in quest of plunder, drew together a considerable body of resolute men; and having encouraged them with large sums, and greater promises, was preparing to fall upon the unwary enemy. But Cosmas, the patriarch, a man famed for his piety, adviling Botoniates rather to submit to providence, and refign the empire, than suffer the city to be polluted with the effusion of christian blood, he readily embraced his counsel; and leaving the imperial palace, withdrew Botoniates to the great church, and from thence to a monastery, where he took the religious resigns.

b habit, after he had reigned two years and ten months ". Botoniates having thus refigned the fovereign power, Alexius was, by the unanimous consent of the senate and people, proclaimed emperor, and crowned by the patri- Alexius Comarch in the month of April 1081. His first care was to reward those who had been nenus crowned instrumental in his promotion, conferring on them the chief employments in the emperor. state, and even inventing new honours and dignities to gratify them. Constantine Ducas, the fon of the late emperor Michael, was suffered to wear an imperial crown, and appear with the other enfigns of fovereignty, pursuant to a promise, which he is faid to have made to the empress Mary, before he took arms against Botoniates. As the barbarous behaviour of his foldiers, upon their first entering the city, had

- e given great offence both to the clergy and people, Alexius, either being really, or pretending to be touched with remorfe for the disorders they had committed, resolved to make an open confession, and undergo a public penance. Accordingly he appeared before the patriarch, and several other ecclesiastics, in the attire of a penitent; and acknowledging himself guilty of the many disorders that had been committed by his foldiers, begged the patriarch to impose upon him a penance answerable to the enormity of his crimes. The patriarch injoined him, and all his relations and adherents, to fast, to lie upon the ground, and to practise several other austerities, for the space of forty days, which no one performed with more chearfulness than the emperor himself. Having thus atoned for his crimes, or at least gained the affections
- d and esteem of the clergy, he began to make the necessary preparations for putting He puts a stop a stop to the conquests of the Turks, who had seized on several provinces during the to the conquests late distractions, and threatened the empire with utter destruction. But Solyman, of the Turks. the fon and fuccessor of Cutlu-Moses, alarmed at the warlike preparations that were carrying on in all the provinces of the empire, dispatched embassiadors to Alexius, with overtures for a lasting peace, which he at first rejected, but was in the end glad to accept, tho he had gained several advantages over the enemy, upon certain advice, that Robert Guischard, duke of Puglia and Calabria, was making great pre-Robert Guisparations against him in the west. Robert was by birth a Norman, the son of Tan-chard's expedia cred, lord of Hauteville, who having a numerous family, and but a small estate, tion against
- e fent his two eldest sons to try their fortune in the wars against the Saracens in Italy, where they distinguished themselves in a very eminent manner; and having driven out the Saracens, seized on the places they had held, establishing by that means a new principality in Italy. Robert, the third son, upon the death of his two elder brothers, did not content himself with the principality of Puglia, which they had held, but reduced the greater part of that country which is now called the kingdom of Naples, taking upon him the title of duke of Puglia and Calabria. Towards the end of the reign of Botoniates, Michael, who had been forced to refign the empire, having made his escape into the west, prevailed upon Robert, whose daughter had been some years before betrothed to Constantine, Michael's son, to espouse his cause, f and attempt his restoration. With this view Robert made great preparations both by sea and land, which were continued even after the resignation of Botoniates, Robert being determined to drive Alexius from the throne, if possible, and restore Michael, or, as some authors insinuate, to seize on the empire for himself. Be that as it will, over into Robert, having left his fon Roger as his lieutenant in Italy, failed with all his forces Epirus. from Brundusium; and landing at Buthrotum in Epirus, made himself master of that Takes Buthroplace, while his fon Bohemond, with part of the army, reduced Aulon, a celebrated tum and port and city in the country now called Albania. From thence they advanced to Auon. Dyrrhachium, which they invested both by sea and land, but met with a most vigorous Besseges Dyrrhachium.

His fleet defeated by the Venetians.

relief of the Dyrrhachium Surrenders.

opposition from George Palæologus, whom the emperor had entrusted with the defence a of that important place, and who, in spite of the utmost efforts of the enemy, held out, till the Venetians, with whom the emperor entered into an alliance, arriving with a powerful and well-appointed navy, fell upon the enemy's fleet commanded by Bohemond, and gave them a total overthrow, the admiral himself, whose ship was sunk with several others, having narrowly escaped falling into their hands. After this victory, the Venetians landing without loss of time, and being joined by Palæologus from the town, fell with great fury upon Robert's men, who were employed in the siege, destroyed their works, burnt their engines, and having driven them back to their camp, returned to their ships loaded with booty. As the Venetians were masters at sea, the besieged were supplied with plenty of provisions, while a b great famine raged in the enemy's camp, attended, as usual, by a pestilential distemper, which is faid to have destroyed ten thousand men in the space of three months, among whom were some of the chief officers, and many other persons of great distinction. However, Robert, who was a prince of great intrepidity, address, and resolution, pursued the siege; and having with great difficulty repaired and equipped his sleet, found means to supply his famished troops with provisions, brought in great plenty from Italy. Palæologus, finding the courage of the garison and citizens began to fail them, fent repeated advices to the emperor of the streights, to which they would, in all likelihood, be reduced. Hereupon Alexius resolved to march in person to the relief of the place; and accordingly, leaving his brother Isaac at Con-c marches to the stantinople, to prevent any disturbances there during his absence, he set out for Thesfalonica; and being joined there by Pacurianus, and the troops under his command, he pursued his march with incredible expedition to Dyrrhachium; and encamping at some distance from the town, on a rising ground with the sea on the lest, and an inacceffible mountain on the right, he fummoned a council of war, in which, after a warm debate, it was refolved by a great majority, but contrary to the opinion of the most experienced officers in the army, that the whole should be put to the issue of an engagement; which Robert was so far from declining, that, observing the emperor's preparations, he ordered all his ships to be sunk, which was giving his men to understand, that they had no hopes of safety, but in victory. However, d the emperor's forces had at first the advantage, and drove a body of Robert's troops quite to the fea, which occasioned no small disorder in the army; but they being encouraged and brought back to the charge by Gaita, Robert's wife, a woman of a masculine courage and behaviour, the fight was renewed with fresh vigour, and the victory long disputed. At length the emperor's forces began to give ground, and being warmly pressed by the enemy, the whole right wing betook themselves to a But is defeated precipitous and disorderly flight, most of them escaping to a neighbouring church dedicated to St. Michael, as to a place of safety. But the victorious enemy, purfuing them close, set fire to the church, which was soon consumed, with all who were in it. In the mean time, Robert having put to flight the main body of the e emperor's army, Alexius himself was forced to retire, tho' he was the last, if we may give credit to his daughter Ann Comnena, who turned his back. The flower of the emperor's troops were cut off either in the flight, or in the pursuit, with an incredible number of officers, and persons of distinction, among whom were Constantius, the son of Constantine Ducas, Nicephorus Synademus, Nicephorus Palaologus, the father of George, Zacharias, Aspetes, &c. The emperor with much ado made his escape, and reached Achris, leaving the enemy master of his camp, and the whole baggage of the army. Robert, elated with this victory, returned before Dyrrhachium, which immediately submitted, and opened its gates to the conqueror, who, as the year was already far spent, put his troops into winter-quarters, with a design to pursue his f conquests early in the spring. In the mean time, Alexius, who had lost the flower of his troops in the battle, ordered new forces to be raifed in all the provinces of the empire, feizing for that purpose, as the exchequer was quite exhausted, on the wealth of the churches and monasteries, which gave great offence to the clergy, and had like to have occasioned dreadful disturbances in the imperial city. At the same time Alexius, entering into an alliance with Henry, emperor of Germany, persuaded him to invade the territories of Robert in Italy, which he did accordingly early in the spring, entering Calabria at the head of a numerous army. Robert was no sooner informed of the emperor's motions, than, summoning a council of war, he appointed his fon Bohemond his lieutenant in the east; and having recommended him to the g

dk III.

held ring

deď

hip

ids.

by red

them

111

ile 16

em-

ths,

ltin-

elo-

pped

ht in

17:05

rad

ch in

60.0 Tog

ınd,

g at an

iter

noic

the

ving

779

स्पत्त, वे

roops

being

012

d the

and

to 2

arch

:UC-

#h0

may

of the

edible

, the

er of and

e of ich

W.1S

rer

; of

the

and 3ME

aded

ly io 00.zer

inted o the B

F.:13

hi3 f

the c

a officers of the army, he set out without delay for Italy, where he relieved the pope, Robert obliges besieged by the emperor's forces in the castle of St. Angelo, retook Rome, and drove the emperor Henry to quit the emperor out of Italy, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. In Italy, the mean time Bobemond reduced several places in Illyricum; and having defeated several places Alexius in two pitched battles, entered Thessaly, and sat down before Larissa; which in Illyricum being defended by an officer of great experience in war, held out till the emperor, reduced by having recruited his army, marched to its relief. Sooon after his arrival, he found Bohemond. means to draw a strong party of Bohemond's men into an ambuscade, who were almost all cut off. However, in the battle, which was fought a few days after, Bohemond had the advantage; but his troops mutinying, and refusing to continue the war, till b they had received their arrears, he was obliged to repair to his father in Italy. Alexius, taking advantage of his absence, recovered several cities; and being informed, that Robert was making great preparations against him, he had recourse once more to the Venetians, who having with incredible expedition equipped a powerful fleet, engaged Robert, and overthrew him in two fuccessive battles, but were foon after furprised by him, and defeated with the loss of almost their whole navy. We are told, that Robert used his victory with the greatest barbarity, putting several of his prisoners to unheard of torments. The Venetians equipped a fecond fleet; and joining that of the emperor, fell unexpectedly upon Robert's navy, while they were riding with-Robert de-out the least apprehension of an enemy near Buthrotum, sunk most of his ships, and fested by the e took a great number of prisoners, his wife and younger sons having narrowly escaped fealing into their hands. But Robert, not in the least disheartened with this overthrow, ordered his fleet to be refitted, new ships to be built, and levies to be made throughout his Italian dominions, with a defign to pursue the war with more vigour than ever. But being in the mean time feized with a violent fever, he died in the He dies. island of Cephalenia, being then in the seventy-ninth year of his age. Upon his death, Roger, his fon and successor, not thinking it adviseable to pursue so dangerous and expensive a war, recalled his troops; so that Dyrrhachium, and the other places, which they had feized in Illyricum, fubmitted anew to the emperor 2.

This war was scarce ended, when another broke out with the Scythians, who, The Scythian d passing the Danube, laid waste great part of Thrace, committing every-where unheard-war. of cruelties. Against them the emperor dispatched Pacurianus and Branas, who, engaging the enemy, tho' far superior to them in numbers, were both cut off, with the greater part of the army, to the unspeakable grief of the emperor, who had a particular esteem for Pacurianus, on account of his extraordinary parts, his experience in war, and his approved fidelity. This overthrow was owing to the rashness of Branas, who in a manner forced his collegue to venture an engagement, contrary to his own opinion. Talicius, who had fignalized himfelf on feveral occasions, being appointed to command the army in their room, fell upon the enemy as they lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Philippopolis, cut great numbers of them in e pieces, and obliged the rest to retire in the utmost confusion. However, they returned the fpring following in such numbers, that the emperor resolved to march against them in person. Accordingly, leaving the imperial city, he set out for Adrianople, and from thence to a place called Lardea, where, contrary to the advice of his most experienced officers, he engaged the enemy; but, after a warm dispute, which lasted The emperor's almost from morning to night, was put to flight, and utterly defeated. Incredible army defeated numbers of his men were put to the fword, or taken prisoners, he himself escaping by the Scythiwith the utmost difficulty to Beroe. About the same time, the Turks, finding the main strength of the empire was employed against the Scythians, broke with great violence into the Roman territories, and made themselves masters of several places f of great importance in Asia, and among the rest of Clazomene, Phocaea, Mitylene, Methymna, and foon after of the island of Chios. This sudden irruption obliged the emperor to fend part of his forces into the east, under the conduct of John Ducas, brother to the empress, while he himself led the rest, reinforced with new levies, against the Scythians, by whom he was again overthrown with great loss, being betrayed by one Neantzes, a Scytbian, who had deferted to him in the beginning of the war; but abandoning him in the heat of the battle, fo disheartened the Romans with his sudden slight, that they began to give ground; and being pressed by the enemy, and overpowered with numbers, they retired in great disorder, leaving the Scytbians mafters of their camp and baggage. However, not long after, Alexius 2 gained a considerable advantage over them; and the year following, 1084. having defeated them in a pitched battle, and put them to flight, made such a dreadful havock of the fugitives, that few of them are faid to have escaped the general slaughter b. An end being put to the Scytbian war by this victory, the emperor resolved

Alexius gains a complete victory over them.

Alexius's wars with the Turks.

Mitylene retaken by the Romans.

to march in person against the Turks, with whom John Ducas, his brother-in-law, had often sought with various success. Tzachas, a leading man among the Turks, having made himself master of Smyrna, erected there a new principality, independent of the fultan, haraffing with frequent incursions the neighbouring countries. He had, besides several other places, reduced Mitylene, which John Ducas, pursuant to his instructions, closely besieged by land, while Constantine Delassenus, who commanded by the fleet, invested it by sea. But Tzachas, having committed the desence of the place to his brother, kept the field with a chosen body of troops, watching the motions of the Romans, intercepting their provisions, and haraffing them with frequent and fudden onfets, which diverted them from pursuing the siege with due vigour. But John Ducas, having at length drawn Tzachas to an engagement, gave him a total overthrow; after which he fent deputies to Ducas, with proposals for a peace, which was concluded upon the following terms: That Tzachas should be allowed to retire unmolested to Smyrna; that Mitylene should be delivered up to the Romans; and that none of the inhabitants should be injured in their persons or estates, or be forced to attend Tzachas at his departure. These articles were mutually agreed to, and c hostages delivered on both sides; but Izachas having, with a manifest breach of the treaty, obliged several of the inhabitants to quit their habitations, and follow him, Delassenus failed after him; and soon coming up with him, sunk most of his ships, put great numbers of his men to the fword, and releated the captives, Tzachas himfelf having narrowly escaped falling into his hands by embarquing on a light vessel, which carried him fafe to Smyrna, where he ordered a new fleet to be equipped, and in the mean time marched with all the forces he could raile to Abydos, which he hoped to reduce, before it could be relieved by the emperor. But the fultan, looking upon him as an enemy no less dangerous to himself than to the empire, marched against him in person at the head of a powerful army, while Delassenus, the Roman d admiral, cut off his retreat by sea. Tzachas, finding himself thus attacked by two powerful enemies at once, chose to submit to the sultan, whose daughter he had married. The fultan received him in a very obliging manner, and invited him to an entertainment; but, in the height of his mirth, caused him to be murdered, and to death by the foon after concluded a peace with the emperor c. fultan. The Scythians

In the year 1093, the Scythian war broke out anew, the barbarians being encourenew the war, raged to invade the empire by an impostor, who, pretending to be Leo, the eldest son of the late emperor Romanus Diogenes, slain some years before in an engagement with the Turks, laid claim to the empire, and was received with great joy by the Scythians, who wanted only a pretence to renew the war. Alexius, having received timely advice of the delign they had formed of falling with all their forces on the empire, visited the borders in person; and having supplied the frontier towns with whatever was necessary for their defence, repaired to the city of Anchialus on the Euxine sea. There he was informed, that the barbarians, having passed the Danube, and caused the impostor to be proclaimed emperor in several towns, which had submitted to them, were advancing with long marches to Anchialus, in order to beliege the place, and, by taking the emperor, put an end to the war at once. Upon this intelligence, Alexius, having left a sufficient garison in the place, encamped with the rest of his forces on a rising ground at a small distance from the city, and there fortified himself in such manner, that the barbarians, after having viewed f his camp and works for three days together, thought it adviseable to draw off; and leaving Anchialus, which they could not invest without driving the emperor from his post, marched to Adrianople, the impostor persuading them, that the place would be immediately delivered up to them by Nicephorus Bryennius, who commanded in it, and had, he affirmed, been highly obliged by his father Romanus Diogenes, when emperor. The credulous barbarians, believing all he faid, marched chearfully to Adrianople, but, contrary to their expectation, met there with so vigorous a relistance, that, after they had continued leven weeks before it, they had some thoughts

And besiege Adrianopic; a of abandoning the enterprize. But being encouraged by the pretended Leo to pursue the fiege, the place was in the end reduced to the utmost extremity, and must have submitted in a few days, had not an officer of the army, by name Alacaseus, pre-Which is preferved it with the following stratagem: In imitation of the celebrated Zofyrus, he dif-ferved by a figured his face, mangled his whole body in a cruel manner, and flying in that con-firatagem. dition to the impostor, told him, that he was the son of one, who had been inviolably attached to his father, on which account he had been thus inhumanly treated by Alexius, and was come to implore the protection of the lawful emperor, and conjure him, by the memory of both their fathers, to revenge their mutual injuries. The usurper, giving credit to what he said, and reposing an intire considence in him, b followed him, attended by a chosen body of Scytbians, to a strong-hold in that neighbourhood, which, Alacaseus pretended, the governor designed to betray to him. He was accordingly received, as had been agreed before-hand, into the place, and invited by the governor to a grand entertainment; at which the mock prince, and his Scythians, who, without the least apprehension of treachery, had drunk to excess, were seized, and loaded with chains. Hereupon Alexius, informed of what had happened, marched with all possible expedition against the Scytbians, now destitute of a leader; and falling upon them before they had the least intelligence of his approach, flew seven The Scythians thousand of them upon the spot, took three thousand prisoners, and obliged the defeated. rest to save themselves by a precipitous slight. However, they returned the solc lowing year with a very numerous army; but being overthrown in two fucceffive engagements, they fent at length deputies to treat of a peace; which was concluded A peace conupon the emperor's own terms 4. After this Alexius returned to Constantinople, loaded cluded with with booty; which he generously divided among those, who had distinguished them. felves most in the war.

During his stay at Constantinople, he was informed, that the western christians The holy war. were making great preparations for the recovery of the holy land, at that time poffeffed by the Turks and Saracens. As the fortunes of those adventurers are inseparably interwoven with the remaining part of this history, it might be justly deemed an unpardonable omission, not to acquaint the reader with the motives that prompted d them to engage in that mighty undertaking, commonly known by the name of the boly war, or the crusade. About the year 1093. an hermit, by name Peter, a native Peter the herof Amiens in Picardy, undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, to visit the holy places mit his pilthere; and observing the miserable condition of the christians in Asia, Syria and Pa-grimage, and lessine, at that time mostly possessed by the Turks, and the cruel usage they met with from those infidels, on account of their religion, he began to deliberate, first with himself, and afterwards with Simon, then patriarch of Jerusalem, about the means of rescuing them from the tyranny under which they groaned. As the eastern empire was in too weak a condition to give any hopes of redress, he resolved to apply to the western princes, and endeavour, by all possible means, to unite them in a e league against the common enemy, for the relief of the unhappy christians, and the recovery of the holy land. Accordingly, having received pressing letters from the patriarch, and the grand mafter of the hospitalers, to that purpose, for the pope, and all the christian princes in the west, he took upon him to be messenger; and embarquing on the first ship he met, he arrived at Bari in Puglia, and proceeding from thence to Rome, he delivered the letters to pope Urban II. giving him at the same time a pathetic account of the unexpressible miseries the christians suffered under the Turkish yoke, of which he himself had been an eye-witness. Having received all the encouragement he could wish for from the pope, he applied to the other princes; and travelling from kingdom to kingdom, inspired both princes and people with the f pious and commendable defire of relieving the oppressed christians, and rescuing the holy land out of the hands of the insidels. The pope, informed of this general disposition, summoned a council at Clermont in France, where three hundred and ten The council of bishops met, and likewise the embassadors of most christian princes; to whom Peter Clermont. the hermit made an eloquent speech, representing the sufferings of the oppressed christians, the desolation of the holy places, the cruelty of the Turks, &c. in so lively and affecting a manner, that a religious war was unanimously resolved on, all declaring, as if filled with one spirit, their consent, by often repeating aloud, Deus vult, Deus vult, God will have it so, God will have it so. Upon the dissolution of the council,

The crusade published.

The principal commanders.

Peter the hermit begins the expedition.

His unhappy conduct.

Godfrey
marches in a hostile manner
so Constantinople.

An agreement between the emperor and the princes of the srufade.

the crusade was published by the pope, and generally embraced throughout the west, a multitudes flocking together from all parts, with red croffes on their breafts, the mark of their expedition, ready to recover the holy land, and redeem the christians from the cruel yoke they groaned under, at the expence of their lives. They are supposed in all to have been no fewer than three hundred thousand men, of whom the chief commanders were, Hugh brother to Philip I. king of France, Robert duke of Normandy, Robert earl of Flanders, Raymond of Toulouse, Godfrey of Bouillion, with his brothers Baldwin and Eustace, Stephen de Valois earl of Chartres, Bohemond prince of Tarentum, and Peter the hermit. To the latter was given the command of forty thousand men; which army he divided into two bodies, leading one himself, and committing the other to the conduct of Gautier, a native of France, furnamed, from b his being a foldier of fortune, the Moneyless. Gautier began his march on the eighteenth of March 1096, and passing through Germany, entered Hungary, where the inhabitants refusing to supply him and his army with the necessary provisions, he was forced to plunder the country. Hereupon the Hungarians, falling upon him on his march, killed great numbers of his men, and obliged the rest to save themselves among the woods and marshes, where they lay concealed, and suffered unexpressible miseries, till the prince of Bulgaria, touched with compassion, furnished them with guides, who conducted them to Constantinople, the place of their general rendezvous, where they waited the arrival of Peter, who did not join them till the first of August, being strangely harassed on his march by the Hungarians, who slew above two thoufund of his men, took all their baggage, and two thousand waggons, with the money defigned to pay the army. To these hostilities Peter himself gave occasion, by suffering his men to commit all forts of diforders, under pretence of revenging the cruel treatment, which the army under Gautier had met with from the natives. Peter, having with much-ado reached Constantinople with the remains of his shattered army, was there received, in appearance, with great marks of friendship and kindness by the emperor Alexius, who nevertheless was in his heart greatly alarmed at the expedition; for tho' he believed the common people might act upon principles of religion, yet he could not persuade himself, that princes would leave their dominions, and engage in fo hazardous an undertaking, upon the same motives. However, he d supplied Peter's army with all manner of provisions; who thereupon passed the streights, and marching into Bithynia, encamped not far from the city of Nice. Not long after his departure, the emperor received advice of Godfrey's arrival at Philippopolis, with ten thousand horse, and seventy thousand soot; which gave him no small jealoufy, the more, as Godfrey immediately dispatched to him an officer, to demand the liberty of Hugh, brother to the king of France, who, in his passage from Bari to Dyrrachium, being separated by a storm from the rest of the sleet, had been seized by the governor of the above-mentioned city, and fent to Constantinople, where he was detained prisoner. As the emperor refused, under various pretences, to set his prisoner at liberty, Godfrey, who was already advanced as far as Adrianople, began to act against him as an open enemy, laying waste the country, and marching directly to Constantinople. Hereupon Alexius, not finding himself in a condition to oppose fo powerful an enemy, complied at length with his demand, promifing at the fame time to supply his army with provisions; which however he neglected to do, and by that neglect provoked Godfrey to fuch a degree, that he laid waste the whole neighbouring country to the very gates of Constantinople. Alexius, dreading he might fall upon the imperial city itself, tent embassadors to treat of an accommodation, offering his own fon as an hostage, and promising the provoked prince all possible satisfaction: Godfrey having received the embassadors in a most obliging manner, and put a stop to all hostilities, the emperor invited him, and the other princes and chief officers of his f army into the city, where they were received with great magnificence, and entertained in a friendly manner. After feveral conferences, and warm disputes, the following agreement was at length concluded between them and Alexius; that, during the expedition, the emperor should assist them with all his forces, supply them with arms, provisions, and other necessaries, and treat them on all occasions as his friends and allies. On the other hand, the princes were to restore to the empire such provinces and cities as they should recover out of the hands of the Turks and Saracens. Soon after, the other princes arrived by different ways at the head of powerful armies, and were all received by the emperor with the greatest marks of esteem and affection. After a short stay at Constantinople, the forces passed the Bosporus, and encamped g

i III,

ı.k

εd

æf

ŗ.

115

ct

itty 1:d

om b

sh.

the

¥2$

ils

::55 :01:

Wil.

03, 35, 36- c

ney

ul-

æl Ŧ, ŗ,

òγ

and

che

rall

'n

r

d

iĈ

115

an e

ily

ole

me

by

gh-

ıg

ja.

10

.

h ds

0.

ŗ,

ćŠ

g.

his f

, ht 1

a near Chalcedon, with a defign to advance from thence to Nice, and lay fiege to that important city.

WHILE Godfrey and the other princes were yet on their march, the army com- The army commanded by Peter the hermit, which had entered Bitbynia, as we have observed above, manded by and encamped in the neighbourhood of Nice, began to mutiny; and deposing Gautier, advanced Raymond, a German commander of great prowess, in his room. After this, the Germans and Italians, separating from the French, encamped apart. A strong party of the Italians, having made themselves masters of a town called Xeri-gordus, were there surprised by the Turks, and put to the sword. The French, who lay encamped near Helenopolis and Cibolus, two villages on the gulf of Nicomedia, b were, by the Turkish commander in those parts, drawn into an ambuscade, and mostly either cut off, or taken prisoners; so that of the forty thousand men commanded by Peter, scarce three thousand were left, who with him took refuge in Cinite; which place they defended till the arrival of Godfrey, and the other princes of the crusade, with whom they marched to Nice; which city was invested by the chri- Nice besieged stlan princes in the month of May 1097. As the place had been strongly fortified by the chri by Solyman, then fultan of the Turks, who had chosen it for the seat of his empire, stians, and was defended by a numerous garifon, the fiege lasted several weeks; during which time, both the christians and Turks gave many signal instances of their intrepidity and resolution. Solyman, who had posted himself with a numerous army c among the neighbouring mountains, attempted twice to raife the siege; but was as often repulsed with much slaughter. However, the besieged continued to defend the place with great courage and resolution, till the emperor Alexius, who assisted in person at the enterprize, having caused a great number of small vessels to be sitted out, cut off the communication, which, by means of the lake Ascanius, the city maintained with the neighbouring country. The garison being thus deprived of the privately folicited by the emperor with mighty promifes to furrender the place, not to the western princes, but to him, they submitted at length, and, on the fifth of And taken: July, delivered up the city to his lieutenant, by name Butumites. Among the many d captives taken on this occasion, were Solyman's wife, and two of his children, who were immediately fent to Constantinople. After the reduction of Nice, the princes, taking their leave of the emperor, of whom they now entertained great distrust, bent their march towards Syria, having first divided the army into two bodies, for the convenience of forage and subsistence. Bohemond, who marched the first, was fuddenly attacked by Solyman, at the head of fixty thousand Turks, and would in all likelihood have been put to flight, had not Hugh come feafonably to his relief with thirty thousand men; who falling upon the enemy, cut forty thousand of them in The Turks depieces, and obliged the rest to take shelter among the neighbouring mountains. This feated. victory was attended with the furrender of Antioch in Pisidia, of Iconium in Cilicia, è Heraclea, and several other places. The christian princes, animated with this suc-

constant supplies they received both of men and provisions, and at the same time

cefs, bound themselves by an oath not to return, till they had rescued the holy city of Jerusalem out of the hands of the infidels. Accordingly, having passed mount Taurus, they made themselves masters of the cities of Maresia and Artasia; and marching from the latter, but fifteen miles distant from Antioch, they encamped before that famous metropolis on the twenty-first of Ollober 1097. As the place was Antioch bestrongly fortified, and garifoned with seven thousand horse, and twenty thousand sieged, and foot, the siege lasted to the third of June, when one Pyrrbus, who had in appearance embraced the Mohammedan superstition to save his estate, and was entrusted with the defence of a tower called the Two sisters, betrayed the city to Bohemond, whose men f entering it in the night, opened the gates to the rest of the army; who salling upon the Turks before they could put themselves in a posture of defence, cut them off almost to a man. Coffianus the governor, with some others, found means to make his escape out of the place; but fell soon after into the hands of the Armenian christians, by whom he was stain. While the christians were engaged in the siege of Antioch, Corbenus, one of the fultan of Persia's generals, attacked Edessa with a mighty army; but Baldwin, to whom the place had submitted some months before, gave him such a warm reception, that he abandoned the enterprize, and marched to the relief of Antioch. Being informed on his march, that the city was taken, he resolved nevertheless to venture a battle, in hopes of recovering it; but received a total overthrow, The Turks deg having lost, as we are told, an hundred thousand, partly killed, and partly taken feated with prisoners; great flaughter

began prisoners; whereas of the christians only four thousand two hundred were slain. This a memorable battle was fought on the twenty-seventh of June 1098, and the next day the Turks, who still kept the castle of Antioch, despairing of relief, submitted, and were made prisoners. The christians, thus become masters of Antioch, chose with one confent Bohemond prince of that metropolis, not thinking themselves bound by the late treaty, fince Alexius had, contrary to that agreement, under various pretences, declined lending them the least affistance. However, they sent Hugh, brother to Philip king of France, and Baldwin earl of Heynault, to give the emperor an account of their success, and press him to join them with all his forces, pursuant to the treaty; but the earl of Heynault was never afterwards seen or heard of, whence he was generally believed to have been taken prisoner, and murdered by the emperor's orders. b As for the other, he got fafe to Constantinople; but instead of returning to the princes with an account of his embaffy, he departed from thence into France; whence some writers speak of him much to his disadvantage, as if he had been bribed by the emperor to abandon the enterprize. The emperor had indeed at this time a just excuse for not joining the western princes; for Tangripermes, a Turkish pirate, having seized on the cities of Smyrna and Ephesus, and reduced the islands of Rhodes and Chios, infested the coasts of the empire, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Against him the emperor fent a confiderable fleet and army; which arriving fafe at Smyrna, befieged that city by fea and land, and having in the end reduced it, marched to Exhejus; which was likewise forced to submit, Tangripermes having been deseated c with great slaughter in that neighbourhood. The victory gained by the emperor's forces was followed by the furrender of Philadelphia, Laodicea, and other maritime A war between cities of great importance. Alexius, elated with this success, laid claim to Antioch, and fent embassadors to Bobemond, requiring him to deliver up that city to its lawful owner. Bohemond was so offended at this demand, that, instead of complying with it, he, in his turn, claimed, as prince of Antioch, the city of Laodicea, and dispatched a considerable body of forces, under the conduct of his nephew Tancred, to take it by force; which they did accordingly, reducing at the same time several other strongholds in Cilicia, belonging to the emperor. Hereupon Alexius, having caused a mighty fleet to be equipped with all possible expedition, resolved to stop the passage d of the supplies, which the western princes, especially the bishop of Pisa, were preparing for the support of the christians in the east, till such time as they had restored to the empire the cities they had taken from the Turks. Of this fleet Taticius was appointed admiral, who, meeting that of the western princes near Rhodes, attacked them, and gave them a total overthrow; but was himself overtaken, in his return to Constantinople, by a violent storm, which destroyed the greater part of his sleet. After this, the emperor ordered Catacuzenus, one of his generals, to lay fiege to Laodices taken Laodicea; which, notwithstanding the supplies Bohemond with much difficulty threw into it, was in the end obliged to fubmit. Hereupon the prince of Antioch, finding he had not fufficient strength at present to contend with the emperor either by sea or c land, left a strong garison in Antioch, and passed undiscovered into Italy, with a defign to levy new forces there, and return early in the spring into the east. Alexius, acquainted with his defign, ordered his admiral, by name Contostephanus, to cruize on the coasts of Italy, and prevent, by all means, Bobemond's fleet from passing into the east; but Contostephanus, departing from his instructions, made a descent, and laid siege to Brundusium; which however he was obliged to raise, his men being with great slaughter put to flight by the inhabitants. Among the prisoners taken on this occasion were fix Scythians, whom Bohemond carried to the pope, telling him, that, with the affistance of such infidels and barbarians, Alexius endeavoured to stop the progress of the christian princes in the east; which inflamed both the pope and the people against him to such a degree, that multitudes crowded daily to Bohemond, defiring to be employed against a prince, whom they looked upon as an avowed enemy to the christian name. Bohemond, having by this means soon raised a powerful army, passed over into Illyricum; and landing without opposition in the neighbourhood of Dyrrhachium, sat down before that important place, after having caused his sleet to Dyrrhachium. be burnt in the fight of the whole army, that, feeing there was no means of making their escape, they might fight the more courageously, and place their safety in victory alone. As the place was defended by a numerous garifon, and supplied with great plenty of provisions, it made a vigorous defence, and held out, till Bohemond's army being reduced to the utmost extremity for want of necessaries, that haughty prince g

Alexius and Bohemond. prince of Antioch.

by Alexius.

Bohemond tays siege to a began to give ear to the proposals that were made him for putting an end to the war. After several conferences between him and the emperor's ministers, a peace was in the A peaceconend concluded, upon terms equally honourable to both princes. The war being thus cluded. ended, Bohemond returned to Italy, according to Anna Comnena; but, according to others, to Antioch, where, we are told, he died fix months after o. Alexius, being disengaged from this war, marched in person against the Turks, who, renewing their incursions, had laid the country waste to the very walls of Nice; and coming up with them in the neighbourhood of that city, gave them a total overthrow. However, the Turks returned the following year; but were, in feveral successive battles, overcome and put to flight by the emperor's lieutenants, Alexius himself being prevented, b by the gout, and other distempers, that usually attend old age, from heading his army in person. The Turks, disheartened with the great losses they had sustained, sent to fue for peace; which was readily granted them by the emperor; who thenceforth Alexius connever appeared more in the field, but spent the remaining part of his life in striving cludes a peace to heal the divisions, which at that time rent the Greek church. Being seized with a with the Turks violent cold, he died in the year 1118. the thirty-feventh of his reign, and twenty- His death and fecond after the expedition of the western princes for the recovery of the holy land f. character. There is a great disagreement among authors touching the character of this prince, the Greek historians, especially his daughter Anna Comnena, painting him as the best of princes, and those who have written the history of the holy war, representing c him as the worst. However, it is agreed on all hands, that he was a man of great address and penetration, endowed with uncommon parts, and the best statesman of his time. He was grateful, generous and liberal, as appears from his behaviour to his brother, and the rest of his friends, who had been instrumental in his advancement to the throne; for on them he heaped fuch wealth, as quite drained the exchequer; whence, to carry on the war with the Turks, he was forced to feize on the riches of the churches and monasteries; which has prompted some ecclesiastic writers to paint him in the blackest colours. He seems to have been a stranger to all manner of cruelty; for tho' many conspiracies were formed against him during the long course of his reign, yet we read of no other punishment inflicted even on the chief authors d of them, besides banishment, or the confiscation of their estates. His behaviour to the western princes, tho' altogether unbecoming one who professed the same religion, may in some degree be excused, in regard of the jealousy he entertained of them, especially of Bohemond, his old enemy, which prompted him rather to oppose and weaken, than affift them in an undertaking, he apprehended, might at last end in his own ruin, as well as in that of the common enciny. During his fickness, he was earnestly solicited by the empress, and his daughter Ann, to exclude his own son fobnfrom the succession, and bequeath the empire to Bryennius, the husband of Ann; but the emperor, deaf to their folicitations, declared John his fuccessor, who was there- Johannes upon saluted emperor by the people, as soon as the death of Alexius was known, and, Comnenus, e a few days after, crowned in the great church by the patriarch. He had scarce taken possession of the imperial throne, when some of his nearest relations, at the instigation of Ann, conspired against him, with a design to depose him, and place Bryennius in his room; but the conspiracy being seasonably discovered, the conspirators were immediately seized, tried and convicted. However, the good-natured An instance of emperor did not suffer them to be otherwise punished, than by confiscating their his good nature. estates, which he foon after restored to them, receiving anew into favour all those, who, with his fifter Ann, had given life to the conspiracy. After this, he removed from court fuch as he had reason to suspect, appointing none to succeed them but perfons of known probity, and distinguished characters s. In the second year of his His wars with f reign, the Turks, in defiance of the treaty lately concluded with his father, broke the Turks; into Phrygia; but the emperor, marching against them in person, overthrew them in feveral engagements; and having recovered fuch cities as they had taken in Cilicia, and among the rest Laodicea, he laid siege to Sozopolis, a strong town in Pamphylia, which he took by a stratagem, having enticed the Turks out by a pretended flight, and cut off their retreat into the city. The Turks, alarmed at the success that attended his arms, renewed the peace, which they had concluded with his father Alexius. Hereupon the emperor returned in triumph to Constantinople, where he had * Ann. Comnen. I. ii. c. 6. & I. xi. c. 1, 2, 3. Glyc. annal. I. iii. Zonar. in Alex. f Ann. Comn. l. xv. c. 10, 11, 12. 8 Nicet. I. i. c. 1.

Vol. VI. Nº 8.

7 S

200

thians, the Ser-Vii, and the Hunns.

He recovers Armenia.

ing Antioch from the Latins.

The emberor

He dies.

not been long, when news was brought him, that the Scythians, having passed the a Danube, and broken into Thrace, were destroying all before them with fire and fword. Against them the emperor led the flower of his army, and falling upon the barbarians before they could put themselves in a posture of desence, cut incredible numbers of them in pieces, took many prisoners, and obliged the rest to save themselves beyond the Danube. He then turned his victorious arms, first against the Servii, whom he eafily overcame, and afterwards against the Hunns, who had invaded the empire, but were driven beyond the Danube with great flaughter. The emperor, croffing that river after them, carried the war into their country; and having taken feveral of their strong holds, and forced them to conclude a peace upon his own terms, he returned the second time in triumph to Constantinople's. While the emperor was thus b employed against the barbarians, the Turks, without any regard to the late treaty, entered unexpectedly Galatia and Cilicia, and made themselves masters of several cities in those two provinces. The emperor therefore, having allowed his men a few days to refresh themselves at Constantinople, led them afterwards into the east, where he foon made himself master of all Armenia, driving every-where the Turks before The castle of Baca, and the cities of Castamona, Anazarba, Serep, Capharda, Istria, and Sezer, made a vigorous refistance; but were in the end obliged to submit. However, having laid fiege to Berwa in Syria, he was forced by the numerous garifon to raife it, and drop that enterprize. On his return homewards, he was reconciled to his brother Isaac, who in the beginning of his reign, having taken some c difgust, had sled to the Turks, and assisted them with his advice in all their undertakings against the christians. Soon after, John, Isaac's son, deserted to the enemy, and renouncing the christian religion, embraced the superstition of Mohammed. The emperor, having spent three years in the east, and recovered from the Turks the feveral cities and strong-holds which they had lately taken, returned to Constantinople, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable. Having fettled his domestic affairs, he resolved to return once more into the east; and accordingly began his march early in the spring of the year 1140, attended by his three fons, Alexius, Andronicus, and Manuel, giving out, that he had nothing else in view but to secure his conquests in Armenia, and confirm the cities, that had lately sub-d He forms a de- mitted to him, in their obedience; but his real design was to recover, if possible, the city of Antioch, held by the Latins, and reunite that flately metropolis to the empire. Heaven feemed to be offended at this undertaking; for foon after he had left Constantinople, his two eldest sons, Alexius and Andronicus, died in the prime of their years, to the unexpressible grief of the afflicted father, who was ready to fink under the weight of so unexpected a calamity. However, he pursued his march, and entering Syria, acquaint d the inhabitants of Antioch with his arrival; who thereupon fent some of the chief men in the city to meet him. But when he drew near, they refused to admit him within the gates, till he had solemnly sworn he would attempt no innovation, but quietly depart, after a short stay in the city. He had e entertained hopes of gaining over the citizens, and by that means making himself master of the city; but finding them inviolably attached to the Latins, he retired in a great rage, ordering his foldiers, at their departure, to plunder the suburbs. From Antioch he bent his march to Cilicia, where, while he was one day hunting, he was accidentally wounded in the hand with a poisoned arrow, which he carried in his mounded with a quiver. Tho' the wound was flight, yet, as the proper remedies were not applied in poijoned arrow. due time, it caused such a swelling in his arm, that the physicians were for cutting it off; but he peremptorily refusing to submit to the operation, the strength of the poison prevailed to such a degree, that he was in a short time brought to the point of death; when, summoning the chief of the nobility to his chamber, he named in their f presence his youngest son Manuel to succeed him, as better qualified in every respect for that eminent station, than his other fon Isaac. Hereupon Manuel was immediately proclaimed and acknowledged emperor by the nobility, and the chief officers of the army, who bound themselves by a solemn oath to obey no other. The emperor died soon after, on the eighth of April 1143. having reigned twenty-four years, and eight months. It is observable of him, that he put none to death during the whole time of his reign; whence he was no less beloved by his subjects for his humanity

ر مار

ф. d

ble,

che

 $\mathbb{R}^d$

d

k

ρď

1¢•

31,

uld

had e

nklf

. 1

¥4S

کار

in įt

he

of નલ

الماء

cers

ye:01

, and

hole

gg y

27.1

eir f

a and good nature, than feared by the enemies of the empire, on account of his courage, experience in war, and the success that attended him in all his expeditions.

THE emperor no sooner expired, than Manuel dispatched Axuchus, who had been Manuel Comprime minister to his father, to Constantinople, with orders to secure Ijaac; who was nenus. accordingly feized, before he had time to affert his right to the empire, and confined to a monastery. Soon after, the new emperor arrived; and being received with loud acclamations by the people, who hated Isaac, he was crowned with great folemnity by the patriarch. Having fettled his domestic affairs, and fet his brother Ilaac His war with at liberty, upon his promifing to attempt no innovations during his abience, he passed the Turks. over into Asia, at the head of a mighty army; and having recovered several cities in b Phrygia, lately taken by the Turks, he fat down before Icon um; but not being able to master that important place, he returned to Constantinople, leaving sufficient garifons in the frontier-towns to restrain the incursions of the Turks. During his stay in the imperial city, he married Gertrude, fifter-in-law to Conrade, the German emperor; but flighting her, tho' endowed with every periection b. coming a perion of her fex and quality, he maintained a criminal conventation with his own nicce Theedora; which greatly estranged from him the minds of his people. But nothing has rendered his His treachername more odious to posterity, than his treacherous behaviour to the western princes; our behaviour for having promised to supply the army of Conrade, who in the year 1146, undertook princes, an expedition into the holy land, with forage and provisions, instead of that he an expedition into the holy land, with forage and provisions, instead of that, he c caused the countries, through which they were to pass, to be laid waste, and the gates of the towns to be shut; nay, we are told, that the Greeks, inspired by the emperor with an irreconcilable hatred to those adventurers, mixed the flour they fold them with quick-lime; which occasioned a dreadful mortality in the christian army. Besides, the emperor privately acquainted Mamut, sultan of Iconium in Asia Minor, with the designs of Conrade, and the other princes. Whereupon the sultan alarming all the princes of his nation, a formidable army was raised in defence of their common interest, and fent to protect their territories, before the christian princes were in a condition to attack them. By this means the defigns of the western princes were defeated, and an army, which otherwise might have easily triumphed over all the east, in a great measure d destroyed k. Roger, king of Sicily, highly provoked at Manuel's treachery, took His wars with advantage of some disturbances raised by the inhabitants of Corcyra, who thought Roger kings themselves oppressed by too heavy exactions, and made himself master of that island. themselves oppressed by too heavy exactions, and made himself master of that island. From thence he failed to Corintb, which he likewife took and plundered, with Thebes, and most of the principal cities of Baotia. Hereupon Manuel, having assembled all the forces of the empire, and equipped a mighty fleet, proclaimed war against Roger and the Sicilians; which he began with the fiege of Corcyra, now Corfu. The befieged defended the place with incredible bravery; but being in the end quite tired out with repeated attacks, they furrendered upon honourable terms. In this siege the emperor, who commanded his troops in person, lost an incredible number of men, and among e the rest Stephen, one of his chief officers. However, elated with his success, he resolved to carry the war into Sicily itself; but was overtaken by a violent storm, in which several of his ships were lost, and he himself driven, with most of the transports, to Aulon. Being informed, during his stay there, that the Servians had broken into the neighbouring provinces, he marched against them in person, committing the management of the Sicilian war to Michael Palæologus. Manuel gained great advantages over the Servians, tho' affilted by the Hungarians, whom he likewise overcame in feveral battles; and carrying the war into their country, took and razed fome of their chief towns, and then returned to Constantinople, loaded with booty. As for Palwologus, he marched into Calabria, where he frequently defeated Roger's forces, f and continued laying waste the country, till, by the mediation of the pope, a peace A peace conwas concluded between the two princes. The emperor, now difengaged from this cluded between war, took a progress into the east, being every-where received in a friendly manner, and entertained with shews and festivals, by the western princes, notwithstanding his unaccountable and treacherous behaviour towards them. On his return, he was attacked unexpectedly by the Turks, who killed several of his men, and took part of To revenge this outrage, the emperor, after a short stay at Constantinople, passed over into Asia, at the head of a very numerous and powerful army; which struck the fultan with such terror, that he sent embassadors to sue for peace, offering Areights by the Turks.

A beace concluded with the luitan.

vade the emtire anew; but 24000 of them are cut ojj.

Manuel dies.

Alexius Comnenus.

Andronicus revolts,

And marci towards Co .stantinople.

to conclude it upon such terms, as the emperor himself should judge proper. But a Manuel adhering to the young and unexperienced officers, who, pushed on with a false courage, declared with great warmth for war, the offers of the sultan were rejected, and his embassadors dismissed with this haughty answer, That the emperor would come and let him know his pleasure at Iconium, which was the metropolis of the Turkish empire in Asia Minor. Hereupon the sultan, finding a war unavoidable, feized on the narrow passes of Zibrica, through which the emperor's army was to pass, and falling upon them as foon as they entered the streights, made a dreadful havock of them with showers of arrows from the mountains and broken cliffs. The Romans attempted to retire; but their retreat being cut off by a strong detachment of Turks. posted at the entrance of the streights, they were forced to pursue their march, being b galled the whole time by the enemy's arrows showering down upon them from the eminences. In the mean time night coming on, the Turks, who were well acquainted with the country, possessed themselves of all the outlets; so that the Romans found themselves, when light appeared, hemmed in on every fide, without being able either to retire or advance. In this condition, while they looked upon themselves as lost, the fultan, to the great furprize of the emperor and the whole army, fent to Manuel one of his chief officers, by name Gabras, with proposals for a peace; which he immediately figned, to the inexpressible joy of the whole army, who pursued their march unmolested to Chonas, where the emperor distributed what money he had with him among the foldiers, and then proceeded to Philadelphia, in which city he continued, till his wounds were cured. One of the conditions of the peace was, that the fortifications of Dorylaum and Subleum in Asia Minor should be razed. This the emperor, now out of danger, refused to perform, alledging, that what had been extorted from him by force, was not binding. The fultan, highly provoked at this answer, The Turks in- fent a body of twenty-four thousand chosen men, under the conduct of Atapacus, to lay waste all Phrygia; which they did with the utmost barbarity, sparing neither sex nor age. But the emperor's forces, falling upon them as they were croffing the Meander on their way home, cut them all off to a man, and recovered the whole booty k. The Turks were so disheartened with this overthrow, that they continued quiet the remaining part of Manuel's reign, who, having no wars to employ his thoughts, d turned them to religious matters, and by endeavouring to introduce and establish heterodox opinions, raised great disturbances and divisions in the church, some of the prelates being prompted by their interest to embrace and maintain the doctrine he had broached, and others impugning it with great warmth. Among the latter was Eustathius archbishop of Thessalonica, famous for his learned comments on Homer. But the death of the emperor put an end to these disputes. He was taken ill in March 1180. and died in the following September, having near completed the thirty-eighth year of his reign. Some time before his death, he took the monastic habit, hoping thereby to atone for the debaucheries, to which he abandoned himself in times of peace 1.

HE was succeeded by his son Alexius Comnenus; but he being only twelve years old, his mother took upon her the administration, and governing with an absolute sway, suffered the young prince to indulge himself in his pleasures and diversions, in order to indispose him for applying to the affairs of state. The ministers, whom the empress employed, made it their chief study to enrich themselves at the expence of the public, the empress herself having nothing else in view but to fill her coffers. Public affairs being thus intirely neglected, while every one studied his private interest, the Turks, who let slip no opportunity of inlarging their territories, breaking into the empire, made themselves masters of Sozopolis, and several other important places in Phrygia. This raised in the people a general dislike to the present admini- f stration; which being observed by Andronicus, who was cousin-german to the late emperor, and had long aspired at the empire, he thought this the most proper time to attempt the obtaining of what he so ardently wished for. Accordingly, as he was generally beloved on account of his infinuating and popular behaviour, he left Oeneum, to which place he had been confined by the late emperor; and moving with his friends and dependents towards Constantinople, gave out, that he had nothing else in view but to reform the abuses of the state, to affert the imperial dignity, to redress the grievances of the people, and rescue the young prince out of the hands of those,

a who, in a most shameful manner, abused his authority, to the oppression of those, whom they were bound to protect. He was every-where received by the credulous people as their deliverer and defender; and fuch multitudes flocked to him from all parts, that none dared to oppose him, till he came into Bithynia, where the governors of Nice and Nicomedia shut their gates against him, as a public enemy. ever, he purfued his march to a caftle called Charace, where he was met by a body of the imperial troops commanded by Andronicus Angelus, whom he put to flight; and advancing with long marches towards Constantinople, encamped at a small distance from Chalcedon, in fight of the imperial city. The empress had committed the whole management of affairs to Alexius, then prefident of the council, with whom she was b thought to be more familiar than was confiftent with her honour. As Alexius hoped by her means to be advanced one day to the imperial dignity, he left nothing unattempted to defeat the designs of Andronicus; but being universally detested by the people, on account of his tyrannical and arbitrary government, the troops he had raised fled over to Andronicus, and the fleet, which was committed to the conduct of The army and Contostephanus, followed their example. Hereupon the people, assembling in a tu-fleet revolt so multuous manner, with repeated acclamations declared deduced deduced from him. multuous manner, with repeated acclamations declared Andronicus guardian of the young prince, fet at liberty his two fons, John and Manuel, whom Alexius had thrown into prison, and seizing on Alexius himself, carried him in a mock triumph to the fea-fide, attended with the fcoffs and curfes of the enraged multitude, and thence conc veyed him in a small boat to Andronicus, who, after having exposed him to the insults of the whole army, caused his eyes to be pulled out. Soon after, Andronicus, passing the fireights, went to wait on the emperor, who was then, with the empress his mother, at a royal feat in the country; and being immediately admitted to his presence, sell on the ground, out of a pretended respect to his prince, repeating several texts of scripture, adapted to the present purpose. As for the empress, he saluted her with a coldness, which sufficiently betrayed the aversion he bore her. Having staid some days with the emperor, he made his entry into the city, attended with the shouts He is received and acclamations of the people, and was by all, with one voice, declared and acknow- at Constantiledged the protector of the empire, during the minority of young Alexius. But, not-clared protection of the tyrangical conduct of Alexius the procedure of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of Alexius the procedure of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of Alexius the procedure of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the protection of the tyrangical conduct of the tyrangical cond d withstanding the tyrannical conduct of Alexius the president, the citizens of Constant tor of the emtinople had foon occasion to repent of the change, there being no kind of cruelty, pire. which the protector did not practife upon the unhappy people, without distinction of fex or condition. Some were deprived of their fight, others banished, and many inhumanly murdered, either out of some private grudge, or because they seemed attached to the young prince. Among the rest Mary, daughter to the late emperor, who had been very instrumental in the late revolution, and her husband Manuel, Andronicus's own fon, were poisoned by the tyrant's orders. As for the empress, he caused her to be accused of treason, as if she had by letters invited Bela, king of the Hungarians, her brother-in-law, to invade the empire. Upon this charge, altogee ther groundless, she was tried, found guilty, no one daring to oppose the tyrant's pleasure, and shortly after strangled by Pterigionites the cunuch. Soon after her death, the tyrant, pretending a great tenderness, and unshaken fidelity, for the young prince, caused him to be solemnly crowned by the patriarch; but took care at the same time to inlarge in an eloquent speech on the dangers that threatened the empire, and required, he faid, a person of wisdom and experience to avert them. He had no fooner done speaking, than his friends crying out aloud, as had been agreed on before-hand, Long live Alexius and Andronicus Roman emperors, the whole multi- Made collegue tude faluted him with the title of emperor, and placed him, with the confent and to Alexius, approbation of Alexius, on the imperial throne, the tyrant affecting the whole time f an utter aversion to what he had so long coveted; nay, upon receiving, as was cultomary, the holy eucharist at his coronation, lifting his eyes up to heaven, he folemnly swore by that venerable mystery, that he took upon him the sovereignty for no other end, but to protect the young emperor, and support his authority; but notwithstanding this oath, as he had now both the emperor and the empire in his power, he resolved a few days after to dispatch his collegue, and take the whole authority into his own hands. Pursuant to this wicked resolution, one Stephanus Hagiochristophorites, with some others, entering, by the tyrant's orders, the unhappy prince's chamber in the night, strangled him with a bow-string. Such was the miserable Whom he cause

fes to be mura

end of Alexius II. in the third year of his reign, and fifteenth of his life ...

Andronicus, now fole master of the empire, made it his chief study to establish the a Andronicus.

of Sicily. minions.

takes refuge in the church

Is proclaimed emperor.

Andronicus ellytormented

Is murdered.

power he had usurped, raging without distinction against persons of all ranks, whom he imagined in the least affected to Manuel's family, or capable of revenging his Histeruel and death. No day passed without some cruel execution; insomuch that in a short time ty-annical con- the flower of the nobility was utterly cut off, the merciless tyrant complaining all the while of the feverity of the law, which did not allow him to shew pity to so many deferving men. Some however found means to make their escape, and among the rest Isaac Comnenus, Manuel's near kinsman; who, taking refuge in Cyrrus, made himself master of that island, and is said to have exceeded even Andronicus himself in all manner of barbarities. Alexius Comnenus, brother to the late emperor Manuel, William, king fled to Sicily; and having persuaded William, king of that island, to make war upon b invades his do- Andronicus, he attended him to Dyrrhachium, which city the king soon reduced: and marching from thence into Macedon, laid waste that province without opposition, and fat down before The stall alonica, where his fleet had been ordered to attend him. The city was taken by storm, after a few days siege, through the indolence and cowardice of the governor, and with the utmost cruelty plundered by the Sicilians, who, without distinction of sex or age, put all they met to the sword, not sparing even those who had taken refuge in the churches. Andronicus, having assembled his troops, ordered them to march, under the conduct of the best generals in whom he could confide, against the enemy. But they were defeated and put to flight at the first onset; which inspired the Sicilians with such courage, that they began to look upon c themselves as already masters of the imperial city itself. In the mean time the tyrant, finding the number of the malecontents increased at home, in proportion to the succels of the enemy abroad, began to rage with more cruelty than ever, not sparing even his own favourites, who had been hitherto the executioners of his tyranny against others. Among the many who were destined to slaughter, was Isaac Angelus, a perfon of great distinction, being descended from one of the most antient samilies in Constantinople. Hagiochristophorites, Andronicus's prime minister, was ordered to seize him; but Isaac, having killed the affassin with his own hand, made his escape to a Isaac Angelus neighbouring church, whither he was followed by his uncle John Ducas, by his son Isaac, and by several other persons of the first quality. As Isaac was generally beloved, d on account of his popular and engaging behaviour, multitudes of people flocked from all parts of the city to see him in his asylum. As Andronicus was then absent from the city, Isaac laid hold of that opportunity to stir up the populace against him; which he did fo effectually, that, on a day appointed, they flocked in crowds to the church of St. Sofbia, and there, with one voice, faluted Isaac emperor, declaring at the same time Andronicus a public enemy. The tyrant, informed of what had happened in the city, and despairing of being able to appeale the enraged multitude, or make head against them, fled to Meludium, a royal palace on the east side of the Propontis, and from thence attempted to escape into Scythia; but being several times driven back by contrary winds, and pursued, as it were, by divine vengeance, he was in the end apprehended, and presented in chains to Isaac; who, having caused taken, and crue his right-hand to be cut off, and one of his eyes to be pulled out, delivered him up to the enraged populace, from whom he suffered indignities answerable to the injuries by the populace. with which he had provoked them; for having led him, as it were, in triumph, through the most frequented streets of the city on a camel, with his face towards the tail, amidst the reproaches and insults of the incensed multitude, they hung him up by the feet between two pillars, stripped of his cloaths, cut off his private parts, and tormented him for three days together, he bearing the whole time with an invincible courage all the torments the incenfed and relentless mob could inflict upon him, sometimes repeating, Lord, have mercy upon me, and fometimes addressing the multitude f with these words, Why do you break a bruised reed? At length one, touched with compassion at the sight of an object, which might have drawn tears from cruelty. itself, by a mortal wound in his throat, put an end at the same time to his life and torments, after he had lived seventy three years, and reigned two ". He was the last emperor of the Comnenian family.

Isaac, thus raised to the imperial dignity, gained, in the beginning of his reign, Haac Angelus. the affections of his subjects, by his lenity and moderation, not only recalling and restoring to their estates such as had been banished by Andronicus, but relieving several a decayed families out of his private estate. When he thought himself sufficiently established on the throne, he dispatched the flower of the army, under the conduct of Branas, an officer of great experience, against the Sicilians; who, being surprised by him as they were roving about the country in quest of plunder, were put to flight, and He defeats the cut off almost to a man, either by the emperor's troops, or the natives, whom they Sicilians. had provoked with their barbarities. Their fleet, consisting of two hundred fail, on their return home, being overtaken and dispersed by a violent storm, most of their ships were taken by the emperor's admiral, and great numbers of prisoners sent to Constantinople, where most of them perished with famine, the emperor, who was naturally addicted to cruelty, not fuffering them to be relieved even with bread and water. Having thus put an end to the Sicilian war, he refolved to drive, if possible, Isaac Comnenus, of whom we have spoken above, out of Cyprus, where he oppressed the inhabitants in a most tyrannical manner. In order to this, he equipped a mighty fleet, which he sent, under the command of John Contostephanus, and Alexius Comnenus, to make a descent upon that island; which they did accordingly, landing with-Attempts in out the least opposition. But while the forces were ashore, Margarites, a famous vainto recover pirate, who had joined Isaac Comnenus, falling upon the seet, seized or burnt all the Cyprus. ships, while the tyrant, attacking the forces that were landed, and could not retreat, cut them off all to a man. This misfortune encouraged the Miefians, whom the emperor oppressed with heavy taxes, to revolt, and return to the protection of the Seyc thians; who, having raifed a numerous army, over-ran the neighbouring provinces. Against them the emperor dispatched his uncle John Ducas, who gained several advantages over the enemy, and would in all likelihood have put an end to the war, had he not been recalled by the jealous emperor. John, surnamed Cantacuzenus, being appointed to succeed him, was, through his rashness and indiscretion, often worsted by the enemy. Whereupon Branas Alexius, the greatest commander of his age, was entrusted with the whole management of the war. Branas, seeing himself at the head of a Branas revolupowerful and well disciplined army, after having gained some advantages over the enemy, returned on a sudden to Adrianople, the place of his nativity; and having caused himself to be proclaimed emperor there, led his troops without loss of time d to the imperial city, hoping to surprise the emperor, who had scarce received intel- And lays siege ligence of his revolt; but the citizens putting themselves, upon his approach, in a to Constantiposture of desence, and haraffing his troops with frequent sallies, he resolved to encamp nople. at some distance from the city, and, by cutting off all communication with the neighbouring country, to reduce it by samine. The emperor in the mean time, reposing all his confidence in the virgin Mary, (whose image he caused to be placed on the walls) and in the prayers of the monks, continued inactive in his palace, till he was roused by Conrade, son to the marquis of Montferrat, who, happening to be then at Constantinople, encouraged him to draw together his troops, and march out against the enemy; which he did accordingly, being attended by Conrade, who commanded e the main body of the imperial army. Branas received him with his men in battlearray; whereupon an engagement ensuing, the dispute was maintained for a considerable time on both fides with great obstinacy; but in the end the emperor's forces, tho' a handful in comparison of the enemy's, prevailing, Branas himself was killed He is defeated on the spot, and most of his chief officers either slain in the pursuit, or taken prison- and killed. ers. This victory was chiefly owing to the bravery and conduct of Conrade, by whose hand Branas fell, while he was encouraging his men to return to the charge o. The rebellion being thus happily quelled, the jealous emperor resolved to employ the whole strength of the empire against the celebrated emperor of Germany, Frederic The emperor's Barbarossa, who was marching, at the head of a mighty army, to the assistance of treacherons f the princes of the crusade. He had promised to grant Frederic a free passage through conduct tohis dominions, and supply his army with all manner of provisions; but being in the wards redet mean time gained over by Saladin, the Turkish sultan, who promised to restore Pale- emperor. fine to him, instead of affishing the German army, pursuant to his engagement, he no sooner heard of their arrival on the borders, than he dispatched his cousin Manuel, with a powerful army, to obstruct their passage, and intercept their provisions, having first, without any regard to the law of nations, thrown into prison the bishop of Munster, the earl of Nassau, and count Walram, Frederic's embassadors. The Germans, justly provoked at the emperor's treachery and perfidiousness, passed, in spite of the opposition they met with from the cowardly Greeks, into Thrace, and the Frederic defeats the emperor's forces. Takes Jeveral places.

peror to submit to di honourable terms.

The emperor defeated by the Scythians.

lus revolts.

feized on the corn, of which they found great plenty in the fields, before the inhabitants had time to remove it into the fortified towns, pursuant to the orders they had received from court. As they approached Philippopolis, the inhabitants abandoned the place; and Frederic, taking possession of it, halted there a few days to refresh his troops. In the mean time the emperor, highly incenfed against Manuel, whom he accused of cowardice, sent him peremptory orders to engage the Germans; pursuant to which, the Greek general advanced within fix miles of Philippopolis. But his whole army being shamefully put to flight by a party of Germans, whom Frederic had sent out to fcour the country, and watch the enemy's motions, the cities of Nicopolis and Adrianople, with all the places between the A gean and Euxine seas, opened their gates of to the victorious army, without attempting to make the least opposition. Hereupon the emperor, having let Frederic's embassiadors at liberty, began to sue for peace, offering to supply the Germans with provisions, and the necessary ships to transport them into Asia, provided they delivered hostages to him for his scurity, and crossed the streights without delay. Frederic, now master of the whole country to the very gates of Constantinople, thought it became him to chastise the pride of the presumptuous, but cowardly Greeks, and therefore returned the following answer to the emperor's deputies; That he had conquered Thrace, and therefore would dispose of it at his pleasure; that he was determined to winter there, since the emperor had, by his perfidiousness, retarded his march, till it was too late in the year to pass the c streights; that he was resolved to treat the emperor as an enemy, if he had not a fufficient number of ships ready against Easter to transport his troops; and since he could not depend upon his faith, he commanded him to fend without delay twentyfour of the principal lords and officers of his court, with eight hundred persons of inferior quality, as hostages for the performance of what he required. To these Obliger the en- shameful conditions the emperor readily submitted, sending immediately the hostages with rich presents to Frederic, who, having wintered at Adrianople, removed early in the spring to Callipolis, where he found a great number of vessels ready to transport his army into Asia v. In the year 1192, the eighth of Isaac's reign, an impostor, pretending to be the son of the emperor Manuel, laid claim to the empire; and being d encouraged by the fultan of Iconium, raifed in a short time an army of eight thousand men, made himself master of all the cities in the Meander, in spite of the opposition he met with from Alexius, the emperor's brother, who was fent against him, and would in all like lihood have in the end driven the emperor from the throne, multitudes flocking to him from all parts, had not a priest put an end to his conquests, by stabbing him with his own sword, while he lay aster having drunk to excess 4. The Scythians, encouraged by these domestic commotions, renewed their incursions, and over running the neighbouring provinces, destroyed all with fire and sword. Against them the emperor marched in person; but having passed the summer without daring to attack them, they fell upon him in his retreat, and cut the greatest e part of his army in pieces, the emperor himself having with much-ado made his escape. After this, the barbarians roved about the country without controll, plundering the cities, and carrying the inhabitants into captivity. The emperor dispatched against them first Alexius Guido, and afterwards Bataizes Basilius; but both these generals being defeated, and the latter killed upon the spot, with the flower of his army, the emperor, having raifed new forces, refolved to march against them once more in person. Accordingly, he set out from Constantinople early in the spring, and arriving at Cypsella on the frontiers of the empire, he halted there, till the troops, Alexius Ange-lus revolus. In the mean time his brother Alexius Angelus, who had long aspired at the empire, observing the general discontent that f reigned among the foldiery, refolved to lay hold of the present opportunity of attaining what he had so long wished for. Accordingly, having imparted his design to some of the chief officers of the army, and sound them ready to espouse his interest, and combine against Isaac, while the emperor was one day diverting himself with the chace, the conspirators, seizing Alexius, as had been agreed on before hand, carried him to the imperial pavilion, and with repeated acclamations, saluted him emperor, being therein followed by the whole army. Isaac, judging it impossible to reclaim the revolted army to their duty, fled with great precipitation to Macra,

a where he was overtaken by those whom his brother had sent after him, and by his orders deprived of his fight, and thrown into prison, after he had reigned nine years and eight months r.

Alexius Angelus, thus raised to the throne, abandoned himself to the same vices, Alexius Angel for which he pretended to have removed his brother, spending his time in riot and lusluxury, while the Scytbians on one hand, and the Turks on the other, made themfelves masters of several important places, and laid waste whole provinces. As he was an utter enemy to all application, he committed the whole management of His bad goaffairs to his wife Euphrosyne, and his favourites, who oppressed the people in a most vernment. tyrannical manner, felling the first employments of the state to the highest bidder, b without any regard to their birth or abilities, and using all other means, how unjust foever and dishonourable, to fill their private coffers. In the year 1202. Alexius, reflecting on the great kindness his brother had shewn him during his reign, and thinking himself now firmly established on the throne, ordered the unhappy Isaac Isaac, the late to be set at liberty, and called his fon Alexius, at that time about twelve years old, emperor. set to the court, treating him as his own child. But Isaac, still mindful of the indig-at liberty. nity that had been offered him, and the injustice done both to himself and his son, began to entertain thoughts of recovering his former dignity, and afferting his undoubted right to the imperial crown. With this view he maintained a private correspondence with the Latins, and by their means with his daughter Irene, wife to c Philip emperor of Germany, earnestly pressing her to persuade the emperor to undertake the protection of her unfortunate father and brother. Irene giving them hopes of a speedy and powerful affiltance, young Alexius made his escape from Constanti- His son Alexius nople; and embarquing in a ship belonging to a merchant of Pi/a, riding then at the recurs to the mouth of the Hellespont, landed safe in Sicily, where he spent some days in private western princes. conserences with his sister, who was then in that island, and from thence pursued his journey to Rome, to solicit the affistance of the pope, by whom he was kindly received, and warmly recommended to Philip. That prince received young Alexius with the greatest demonstrations imaginable of kindness and esteem, and was sensibly touched, as he had an intire affection for Irene, with the misfortunes of her family;

d but being then engaged in a troublesome war with Otho, who disputed the empire with him, he could not espouse the young prince's cause. However, by means of his embassadors, he engaged the French and Venetians, who had then a powerful army in Dalmatia, ready to march against the Turks, to attempt the restoration of his brother-in-law, and employ their whole strength against the usurper. The treaty, A treaty conafter some warm disputes, was concluded; in virtue of which the French and Vene-cluded between tians were to establish Alexius on the imperial throne, and Alexius, upon his restora-them and Alexius tion, to pay two hundred thousand marks in filver towards the expences of the holy xius. war, maintain ten thousand men one year to be employed in the conquest of  $E_{gypt}$ , and, during his life, five hundred knights well armed for the defence of such places as they should conquer in the holy land. The treaty being ratified with mutual oaths, the army embarqued and failed for Corfu, the place of the general rendez-

As they appeared before Dyrrhachium, the inhabitants were no sooner in-Dyrrhachium formed, that the young prince was on board the fleet, than they presented him with submits to the keys of the place, and swore allegiance to him. Encouraged with this happy Alexius. presage, they pursued their course to the island of Corfu, and from thence, after a Thort stay, to the port of St. Stephen on the Propontis, where they refreshed them-Telves, and then failed to Chalcedon, opposite to the imperial city, where they landed their troops. In the mean time, the emperor, having drawn together all his forces, Constantiencamped on the Bosporus, over-against the confederates, who nevertheless passed nople besteged.

f the streights, the emperor having but twenty galleys to oppose them, and landed in fight of the emperor's army, who, at their approach, retired in great diforder. The next day the French made themselves masters of the castle of Galata, and the Venetians being favoured by an easterly wind, failed up to the chain that locked up the mouth of the harbour; and having cut it with sheers of steel, that opened and thut by means of an engine, they took or funk all the Greek vessels in the haven. After this, the Venetians having battered the walls for ten days together by sea, and the French by land, a general affault was given on the seventeenth of July. Greeks made a more vigorous opposition than was expected; and being affilted both

The usurber makes bis escape.

nople.

betrays the young prince,

by the advantage of the place, and their numbers, often repulfed the aggreffors. a But at length the celebrated Henry Dandalo, duke of Venice, tho' then above eighty years old, putting himself at the head of his countrymen, whom he encouraged more with his example than his words, broke in, maugre all opposition; and having feized on one of the towers, planted on the top of it the great standard of St. Mark. The emperor, finding part of the enemy's troops was got into the town, fallied out with a defign to charge them in the rear, and by that means oblige them to draw off their men from the attack; but being repulsed with great slaughter, and the brave Dandalo having by this time made himself master of twenty-five towers on the fide of the haven, the cowardly prince, abandoning his people, went privately on board a small vessel, kept ready for that purpose, and escaped with his treasures, b and the imperial ornaments, to Zagora, a city of Thrace, at the foot of mount Hamus. It was no fooner known, that the tyrant had fled, than the people, crouding to the prison, where Isaac had been detained ever fince the flight of his son Alexius, faluted him anew with the title of emperor, placed him upon the imperial throne, from which he had been driven about eight years before; and acquainting the confederates with the flight of the usurper, and the re-establishment of Isaac, invited the young prince to share the empire with his father. The confederates were transported with joy at the news of so sudden and unexpected a revolution; however, as they had been but too often deceived by the Greeks, they refused to acknowledge Isaac, till he had ratified the treaty concluded with his fon; which he had no c fooner done, tho' not without fome reluctance, the articles appearing to him very Isac reflored. hard, than the confederates owned him for emperor, and conducted the young prince in great triumph into the city, where he was affociated with his father in the empire, and crowned with extraordinary pomp and folemnity on the first of August 1203'. As the usurper continued still in Thrace, supported there by a strong party; and Theodorus Lascaris, his fon-in-law, was at the head of a numerous body of troops on the other fide the Bosporus, the two emperors earnestly intreated the confederates to put off their expedition to the holy hand, till they had completed the work, which they had so happily begun. To this they readily agreed; and marching against the tyrant, who had seized on Adrianople, drove him from thence, and d obliged him to fly for refuge to the neighbouring barbarians. Theodorus Lascaris no fooner heard, that the confederates were preparing to crofs the streights, in order to attack him, than he difbanded his army, and withdrew to the territories of the The confederates, having thus established the two princes on the throne, returned about the middle of winter to Constantinople, where they were received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable; and from thence passed early in the A dreadful fire spring over into Asia. The same year, 1203. happened a dreadful conflagration at at Constanti- Constantinople, occasioned by some Latin soldiers, who having plundered a mosque, which the late emperor had fuffered the Mohammedans to build in the imperial city, and being on that account attacked by the Turks, who were much superior to them e in number, set fire to some wooden houses, the better to savour their escape. The flame, spreading in an instant from street to street, reduced in a short time great part of the city to ashes, with the capacious store-houses, that had been built at a vast expence on the key. The emperor Isaac died soon after the departure of the Latins, leaving his fon Alexius fole master of the empire. The young prince, to discharge the large sums he had promised to the French and Venetians, was obliged to lay heavy taxes on his subjects, which, with the great esteem and friendship he shewed to his deliverers, raised a general discontent among the people, who were fworn enemies to the Latins. This encouraged John Ducas, furnamed Murizuphlus, Murtzuph'us from his joined and thick eye-brows, to attempt the fovereignty. As he was a person f of great address and uncommon parts, he not only ingratiated himself with the multitude, by exclaiming against the Latins, as the only cause of the present miseries; but having found means to gain the young prince's confidence, he by degrees brought him to disoblige the Latins, and even to treat them as enemies. As the hostilities were returned by the western princes, Murtzuphlus dispatched in the emperor's name one of his friends to the marquis of Montferrat, with proposals for an accommodation, offering to deliver up to him the palace and fortress of Blacherna, within the walls of Constantinople, provided he would come and deliver him from the enraged

a populace, who, he faid, had revolted, and proclaimed another emperor. The marquis, giving credit to the embassador, prepared to march to Constantinople; but in the mean time, the treacherous Murtzuphlus, having stirred up the people by giving out, that Alexius had fold the city to the Latins, who were in full march to take posfession of it, entered, in the height of the tumult, the prince's chamber, and strangled And murders him with his own hands. After this, he presented himself to the people, acquainted him. them with what he had done to fecure their liberties, and earneftly intreated them to chuse an emperor, who had courage enough to defend them against the Latins, who were ready to oppress and enslave them. He had no sooner ended his speech, than those who were privy to his wicked design, saluted him with the title of empeb ror, and were followed by the whole multitude, who, with loud acclamations, placed him on the imperial throne, as one capable of defeating the pretended defigns of the Latins. The princes of the crusade no sooner heard of the death of Alexius, and the promotion of the treacherous affaffin, than they unanimously agreed to turn their The Latins arms against the usurper, to revenge the murder of a prince, whom they had placed refolve to reupon the throne; and fince they had been so often betrayed, and retarded in their vengo his feveral expeditions to the holy land by the Greek emperors, to make themselves masters of Constantinople, and seize on the empire for themselves. Pursuant to this resolution, having mustered all their forces in Asia, they crossed the streights, and closely belieged the imperial city both by sea and land. The tyrant, who was a They beliege c man of courage and great experience in war, made a vigorous defence. However, Constantithe Latins, after having battered the walls for feveral days together with an incre-nople; dible number of engines, gave a general affault on the eighth of April, which lasted from break of day till three in the afternoon, when they were forced to retire, after having lost some of their engines, and a great number of men. It was nevertheless refolved the same night in a council of war, that the attack should be renewed, which was done accordingly on Monday the twelfth of April, when, after a warm dispute of several hours, the French planted their standard on one of the towers; which the Venetians observing, they quickly made themselves masters of four other towers, where they likewife displayed their ensigns. In the mean time, three of the gates d being broken down with the battering rams, and those who had scaled the walls having killed the guards, and opened the gates between the towers they had taken, the whole army entered, and drew up in battle array within the walls. But the Greeks flying up and down in the greatest consusion, several parties were detached to scour the streets, who put all they met to the sword, without distinction of age or condition. Night put a stop to the dreadful slaughter, when the princes, founding the retreat, placed their men in the different quarters of the city, with orders to stand upon their guard, and fortify themselves, not doubting but they should be attacked early next morning. They were therefore greatly surprised, when, instead of an armed enemy, they saw by break of day processions of suppliants advancing Which is taken e to them from every quarter of the city, with crosses, banners, images of saints, and plundered. relics, &c. to implore mercy. The princes, touched with compassion, promised them their lives, but at the same time ordering them to retire to their houses, they gave up the city to be plundered by the foldiery for that day, strictly injoining them to abstain from slaughter, to preserve the honour of the women, and to bring the whole booty into one place, that a just distribution might be made according to the rank and merit of each particular. The Greeks had, without all doubt, removed and concealed their most valuable effects during the night; the most eminent persons had made their escape, and carried with them infinite treasures; most of the soldiers had, in all likelihood, reserved several things of great value for themselves, as it comf monly happens, notwithstanding all prohibitions to the contrary; and yet the booty, without the statues, pictures and jewels, amounted to a sum almost incredible. As for Murtzupblus, he made his escape in the night, embarquing on a small vessel with Euphrosyne, the wife of the late usurper Alexius Angelus, and her daughter Eudoxia, for whose sake he had abandoned his lawful wife. This great revolution happened in the year 1204. of the christian æra, eight hundred and seventy-four years after the removal of the imperial feat from Rome to Constantinople.

CHAP.

C H A P. XXXVI.

The Roman history, from the expulsion of the Greeks, to the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, and the utter destruction of the Roman empire.

Baldwin, earl of Constantinople.

Theodorus a new empire

at Nice;

Baldwin's army defeated by the Bulgacruel death.

HE Latins, now masters of the imperial city, proceeded to the election of a new emperor; when Baldwin, earl of Flanders, a prince in every respect equal to that high trust, was, after some deliberation, chosen, and crowned with extrachosen emperor ordinary pomp and magnificence in the church of St. Sophia. To him was allotted the city of Constantinople, and the country of Thrace, with a limited sovereignty over the other provinces, which already were, or should afterwards be, taken from the Greeks. To Boniface, marquis of Montferrat, they affigned Theffaly, which was erected into a kingdom. The Venetians had for their share the islands of the Archipelago, part of Peloponnesus, and several cities on the Hellespont. But while the Latins were thus dividing their new acquisitions, Theodorus Lascaris, ion-in-law to the tyrant Lascaris erects Alexius Angelus, having, at the taking of Constantinople, made his escape into Bithynia, was there joyfully received by the inhabitants; and possessing himself not only of that country, but of Phrygia, Mysia, Ionia, and Lydia, from the Meander to the Euxine sea, took upon him the title of emperor, and fixed his imperial seat in the The Comment famous city of Nice. At the fame time David and Alexius Comment, grand-children at Trapezond. to the late tyrant Andronicus, seizing on the more eastern countries of Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia, erected a new empire at Trapezus or Trapezond, where their posterity reigned, till their empire, as well as that of Constantinofle, fell into the hands of Mohammed the Great, as we shall relate in a more proper place. Thus the Greek empire was no longer one, but divided into feveral empires, Baldwin reigning at Constantinople, the marquis of Montferrat in Thessaly, Theodorus Lascaris at Nice, c the Comneni at Trapezond, and the Venetians in the islands, not to mention several other toparchies or principalities erected on the ruins of the Constantinopolitan empire. But to resume the thread of our history, Baldwin, the new emperor of Constantinople, having, with the affiltance of the other princes, reduced all Thrace, except Adrianople, whither great numbers of Greeks had fled for shelter against the prevailing power of the Latins, refolved to lay siege to that important place, and accordingly sat down before it with all his forces. The Greeks defended themselves with great resolution, and at the same time, by means of some of their nation; who had withdrawn into Bulgaria, prevailed upon John, king of that country, to espouse their cause, who marching at the head of a powerful army, consisting partly of Bulgarians, partly d of Scythians, to the relief of the place, drew the emperor, by a pretended flight, Bildwin taken, into an ambuscade, cut off most of his men, and took Baldwin himself prisoner; and put to a After this victory, the Bulgarians over-ran all Thrace, plundering the cities, laying waste the country, and committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. As for the unhappy emperor Baldwin, he was fent in chains to Ernoc, or Ternova, the capital of Bulgaria, where, after his hands and feet had been cut off by the king's orders, he was carried into a defert, and there left exposed to the wild beasts and birds of prey. In that miserable condition he lived three days, and then expired. The Greek historians themselves, who, we may well imagine, were no-ways prejudiced in his favour, allow him to have been a prince endowed with every good quality e becoming a person in his high station ".

In the mean time, Alexius Angelus, the late usurper, hearing that Theodorus Lascaris, his fon-in-law, reigned in Asia, left Greece, where he then lay concealed; and passing over into Asia, went privately to the court of Jathalines, sultan of Iconium, a his antient friend and ally; and laying before him the miferable condition to which he was reduced, with tears in his eyes, implored his affistance for the recovery of Alexius Angehis empire, especially of that part of Asia Minor, which was, with the utmost inju- lus stirs up the stice, with-held from him by Theodorus Lascaris. Jathatines, at this time sultan of Theodorus Iconium, was the younger fon of fultan Aladin, who, at his death, divided his king-Lascaris. dom between his two children Aratines and Jathatines. But they quarrelling about the fovereignty, the latter was driven out by the former, and forced to fly for refuge to Constantinople, where he was kindly received, and entertained in a manner suitable to his rank by Alexius, then emperor. Jathatines therefore espousing, out of gratitude, the cause of his unfortunate friend, sent embassadors to Alexius, requirb ing him, in a threatening manner, to deliver up the country he unjuftly possessed, to the lawful owner Alexius, his father-in-law. Before the return of the embaffadors, the fultan, attended by Alexius, advanced at the head of twenty thousand men to Antiocb on the Meander, and laid fiege to that place; which Lascaris no sooner understood, than he marched with two thousand men, the most he was able in that exigence to raife, to the relief of the befieged city, being well apprifed, that if he fuffered it to fall into the enemy's hands, as it flood on that river, and was the boundary of his emprie, it would open a way for them into the heart of his domi-The fultan at first could scarce give credit to those who brought him intelgence of the approach of Lascaris with so small a force. However, he drew up his c army in the best manner the narrowness of the place would allow of; which he had scarce done, when eight hundred Italians, of Lascaris's army, charging the Turks with incredible resolution, broke through the sultan's army, disordered his ranks, and put his men into the utmost confusion. As the Greeks had not courage enough to follow them, they were separated from the rest of the army, and on their return furrounded by the Turkish cavalry, and all to a man cut in pieces. The Greeks, difheartened at so great a loss, were upon the point of turning their backs, when the sultan, now, as he imagined, sure of the victory, singling out the Greek emperor, and trusting to his own strength, engaged him in person, and at the first blow struck him off his horse. But Lascaris, quickly recovering himself, unhorsed the sultan, d and, before he could put himself in a posture of defence, cut off his head; and fixing They are deit upon the point of a spear, in sight of the enemy's army, struck such terror into feated, and the them, that they immediately betook themselves to a precipitous and disorderly slight, sultan slain. leaving the Greeks, who before were ready to fly, masters of their camp and baggage. Alexius, the author of this war, was taken prisoner, and carried to Nice, where he was confined to a monastery, in which he ended his days some years after w. This victory was followed by a peace, concluded with the Turks upon the Greek emperor's own terms, who being now at leifure to fecure his dominions against Henry, brother to the late emperor Baldwin, and his fuccessor in the Constantinopolitan empire, a bloody war was continued for several years between these two princes, with various war between e fuccess; but the Greeks being divided among themselves, and several princes of the the Latin and imperial family erecting, in different provinces, independent principalities, Lascaris Greek empewas in the end obliged to acknowledge the authority of Henry, and conclude a peace rors. with him. After this, Henry turned his arms first against the Bulgarians, whom he drove out of Thrace, and afterwards against Michael Angelus, a Greek prince of the imperial family, who having seized on Ætolia and Epirus, during the confusion that eusued upon the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, caused himself to be acknowledged despot or lord of that country. The emperor waged war with him, and his brother Theodorus, a warlike prince, during the greater part of his reign; but was not able to recover the countries which he held. Henry, after having reigned Henry, the ten years, nine months, and twenty days, with great glory and success, died at Latin emperor, The falonica in the fortieth year of his age. He was succeeded by Peter, count of Peter. Auxerre, who had married his fifter, and fignalized himself upon several occasions. This prince, arriving at Rome on his way from France to Constantinople, was solemnly crowned there by pope Honorius III. on the ninth of April 1217. From Rome he proceeded to Venice, where he entered into an alliance with that republic against Theodorus, who had succeeded his brother Michael in the principality of Ætolia and Epirus. Leaving Venice, he entered that prince's dominions, and laid fiege to Dyrrhachium, which Theodorus had lately taken; but not being able to reduce it, he was forced to abandon the enterprize, and foon after to come to an agreement with a Theodorus, who promised him a free passage through his dominions; but nevertheless fell upon him unexpectedly, cut most of his forces in pieces, and having taken the emperor himself prisoner, put him to death soon after x. Upon his death, the Latins named his eldest fon Philip, count of Namur, to succeed him; but he declining that burden, Robert, the deceased emperor's second son, was, with much ado, prevailed upon to submit to it. In the third year of his reign died Theodorus Lafcaris, after having governed, for the space of eighteen years, that part of the empire, which the Greeks still retained in Asia, and defended it with no less courage than fuccess against the Turks on one side, and the Latins on the other. He left behind

Who is treacherously put Theodorus, prince of Epirus. Robert, Latin emperor of Constantinople.

His troops defeated by John Ducas, peror.

Who recovers

several places

Robert dies.

Baldwin II.

him one son and three daughters; but the son being yet an infant, he bequeathed b the empire to John Ducas, surnamed Vataces, who had married his eldest daughter Irene, and was by the dying emperor not undeservedly judged more capable than his own brothers, Alexius and Isaac, of defending, and even inlarging, the empire, which he had founded. John Ducas was crowned in the year 1222. by Manuel, patriarch of the Greeks, at Nice. Alexius and Angelus, the late emperor's brothers, thinking the empire belonged of right to them, withdrew to Constantinople, to implore the protection of the Latins against one, whom they looked upon as no other than an usurper. Robert, the Latin emperor, readily espoused their cause; and having raised a considerable army, committed it to their conduct. But John, having assembled in the mean time all his forces, met the two brothers at a place called Poemaneum; c and having engaged them, gained a complete victory, the flower of the Latin army being cut off, and the two commanders taken prisoners. The Greek emperor, encouthe Greekem- raged with this success, built with incredible expedition a great number of galleys in the several ports of Asia; and falling unexpectedly upon the islands in the Archipelago, reduced most of them, driving every-where the Latins before him. The same of his exploits reaching Assan or Azen, king of Bulgaria, that prince, courting his friendship, proposed a match between his daughter Helena, and Theodore, the emperor's fon, which was readily embraced by Ducas, who well knew how advantageous to his affairs an alliance would prove with so powerful a prince. At the same time, the fultan of Iconium, apprehending an irruption of the Tartars, who had already d driven the Turks out of Persia, sent embassadors to Nice, to confirm and prolong the truce between the two crowns; which Ducas readily agreed to, and then employing his whole strength against the Latins, made himself master of all the places held from the Latins by them on the Bosporus, and the Hellespont. While the Latins were thus distressed on the other side the streights by John Ducas, Theodorus, prince or despot of Epirus, invading Theffaly and Thrace, made himself master of those countries; and assuming the title of emperor, caused himself to be crowned with great solemnity by Demetrius, patriarch of Bulgaria. He had lately concluded a peace with John, the son and successor of Azen, in the kingdom of Bulgaria; but elated with his success against the Latins, and desirous of inlarging his dominions with new conquests, in desirance e of the late treaty, he broke into Bulgaria. But John, whom he looked upon as noways a match for fo renowned a conqueror, having raifed a mighty army, engaged him; and having, after a long and bloody dispute, put his forces to flight, took the despot himself prisoner, and caused his eyes to be pulled out. Not long after, that is, about the year 1228. died Robert, emperor of the Latins in Constantinople, in the ninth year of his reign. He died in Achaia, as he was returning from Rome, which city he had vifited, according to fome writers, in order to be crowned there in a more folemn manner by the pope. He had married the daughter of Baldwin of Neville, though the had some time before been betrothed to a Burgundian lord, who, highly provoked at her forfaking him to marry the emperor, seized on her, f and her mother, during the prince's absence; and having caused the ambitious mother to be thrown into the sea, ordered the nose, ears and lips of her beautiful daughter to be cut off. The sense of this barbarous outrage sunk so deep into the emperor's mind, that it was thought to have occasioned his death. He was succeeded by Baldwin II. his brother, or, as some writers will have it, his son, who being but eight John, earl of years old, John of Brienne, formerly king of Jerusalem, and one of the greatest Brienne, regent captains of his time, was appointed regent and guardian of the empire during his of the empire. minority. Some writers reckon him among the Latin emperors of Constantinople, a and tell us, that it was agreed among the Latin princes, that he should be honoured with the title of emperor during his life, he being then near eighty years of age; and that upon his death the empire should return to Baldwin, who was to marry Martha, or, as some style her, Mary, the daughter of John, by his second wise Bevengaria, the daughter of Alphonso, king of Castile. Be that as it will, it is certain, that John governed with an absolute and uncontrouled power, and was by all respected and obeyed as emperor. In the beginning of his administration, John Azen, king of Bulgaria, and John Ducas, the Greek emperor, entering into an alliance, fell with their united forces upon the territories of the Latins, and laid close siege to Conftantinople itself. But the regent, behaving with a courage and resolution b equal to his former reputation, fallied out with no more than two hundred horse, and a handful of foot, put the enemy's army, tho' a hundred thousand men strong, He defeats the to flight; and having obliged them to raise the siege, and pursued them with great snited forces of Azen and Vaflaughter, returned to the metropolis loaded with booty. However, the following taces. year 1236. the confederate princes, depending upon their numbers, appeared anew before the imperial city; but were attended with no better fuccess, being a second time defeated, and put to flight. But the enemy receiving daily new supplies, and the Latin army being in time greatly weakened and diminished, partly by sickness, and partly by frequent battles and skirmishes, the regent was at length obliged to thut himself up in the imperial city, having no more men left alive than were necesc sary to desend the walls. The enemy, well apprised of the state of his affairs, returned once more, and renewed the fiege; whereupon John, knowing he could not rely Constantiupon the Greeks, who abhorred a foreign yoke, and were intirely devoted to the nople besieged. families at Nice and Trapezond, sent the young emperor Baldwin to solicit succours in person from the western princes. During his absence, the Venetians, arriving with a powerful fleet at Constantinople, obliged the confederate forces of Azen and Vataces The siege raised. to raise the siege. But John of Brienne dying soon after, that is, in 1237. the ninth John of Briyear of his administration, the loss of so great a man would have proved fatal to enne dies. the Latins, but for a miliunderstanding that arose between the Greek emperor and king of Bulgaria, and was carried to such a height, that the latter having by a stradi tagem recovered his daughter, whom he had married to the emperor's fon, joined the Latins against him, and with them laid fiege to the city of Chiorli. But in the mean time news being brought him of the death of his wife Ann, daughter to the king of Hungary, he dropped that enterprize, and returned home, where he foon after married the daughter of Theodorus Angelus, the late despot of Epirus, whom he had taken prisoner a sew years before, and deprived of his sight, as we have related above. This alliance produced a great change in the affairs of Theodorus; for Azen not only set him at liberty, but assisted him in the recovery of his dominions, which The despot of had been usurped by his brother Manuel. Being thus restored to his former power, Epirus restored.

foon after, he passed over into Thrace; and entering into an alliance with the Scylbians, who had lately settled in Macedon, he entered the mock-emperor's territories, stripped Vances him of great part of his dominions, and obliged him to renounce the title of empe-reduces feveral tor, and content himself with that of despot. In 1239. the emperor Baldwin, return-Thrace. ing from the west, arrived at Constantinople, and was there crowned by the patriarch being then in the fixty-second year of his age y. Vataces was fucceeded by his fon Theodorus Lascaris, who having renewed the Theodorus antient alliance with the fultan of Iconium, passed the Hellespont at the head of a pow-Lascaris. erful army, and made war upon the king of Bulgaria, and the despot of Epirus, who had invaded his dominions in Macedon and Thrace, with such success, that they were to the very gates of Constantinople, died, after a glorious reign of thirty-three years, Vataces dies.

he appointed his fon to govern in his room, caufing him to be acknowledged as e emperor. This gave no small umbrage to John Vataces, who pretended to be the sole emperor of the Greeks; and therefore, upon the death of Azen, which happened in the church of St. Sophia. He concluded an alliance with the Comment reigning at Trapezond, and, with their affiftance, befieged and took the city of Chiorli, which, however, was soon after retaken by Vataces, together with the island of Rhodes, surf prised a sew years before by the Genoese. Vataces, having thus recovered such places as had been by the Latins dismembered from his empire, and not only made himfelf master of the greater part of Asia, but extended his conquests in Europe almost

BOOK III.

Turks.

forced to fue for peace, which he granted them upon his own terms. While he lay a Michael Pala- at The falonica, he received letters from Nice, informing him, that Michael Palæologus. whom he had left governor of Asia during his absence, had secretly withdrawn to the Turks, under pretence, that his enemies at court, by mifreprefenting his conduct, had rendered him suspected to the emperor, whose displeasure he feared. As Michael was an officer of great courage and experience in war, the fultan of Iconium received him with uncommon demonstrations of kindness and esteem, and gave him the command of a body of Greeks in the Turkish pay, at the head of which he distinguished himself soon after in a battle between the Turks and Tartars, and would have gained a complete victory, had not the fudden revolt of a chief officer, who was nearly related to the fultan, turned the fortune of the day. The Turkish army being b almost intirely cut off, the victorious Tartars, who had already driven the Turks out of Persia, and the more eastern provinces, ravaged without controll the countries belonging to them in Asia, and reduced the sultan to such streights, that he was forced to fly for refuge to the emperor Theodorus, who received him in a very obliging manner, and fent him back with a body of chosen troops, under the command of Isaac Ducas, an officer of great reputation, and the emperor's chief favourite. The fultan, in his turn, delivered up to the emperor the city of Laodicea. In the mean time. Theodorus, unwilling to lose a subject of such extraordinary parts as Palæologus, wrote to him a most kind and obliging letter, inviting him home, and promising to receive him anew into favour, and restore him to his former honours and employments. c With this invitation Palacologus readily complied, and was, upon his return, reinstated in the emperor's favour, after having taken an oath of allegiance to Theodorus and The emperor died soon after, having scarce reigned three years complete, leaving his fon John, then about nine years old, to succeed him. Some time before John Lascaris. his death, he took the monastic habit, distributed great sums among the poor, and applied himself with exemplary piety to acts of devotion. On his death-bed, he appointed Arsenius, the patriarch, and George Muzalo, guardians to the young prince. Muzalo was a person of a mean descent, but had, by his great sidelity and inviolable attachment to the emperor, deserved to be raised to the highest employments in the state, which he had ever discharged with wonderful integrity, and a character d altogether unblemished. However, the nobility, thinking the care and tuition of the young prince belonged of right to them, began to complain of his conduct, and malign all his measures. Hereupon Muzalo, who sincerely defired to retire, and lead a private life, having affembled the nobility, offered to refign the administration to fuch as they thought the best qualified for the discharge of so great a trust. But they all declining it, he obliged them to renew their allegiance to the emperor, and bind themselves under a solemn oath to obey him, and, during his minority, those whom the deceased emperor judged proper to entrust with the care of his son, and the government of the state. But, notwithstanding this oath, the leading men among the nobility, conspiring against Muzalo, on the day appointed for the obsequies of e the late emperor, repaired to the abby of Sofandra, where he was to be interred;

The emberor

bome.

Muzalo, the Michael Palæologus guar-and mixing with the croud, in the midst of the service, fell upon Muzalo with their drawn fwords, and dispatched him at the very altar, whither he had fled for refuge, young prince's with his two brothers Andronicus and Theodorus, men of distinguished characters. governor, mur- Muzalo being thus removed, the conspirators, without any regard to the patriarch, who was a man of learning, but an utter stranger to state-assairs, declared Michael Palacologus guardian to the young prince, and protector of the empire. He fignalized the beginning of his administration with a signal victory over Michael Angelus, dian to the young prince. despot of Epirus, who taking advantage of the distractions of the state, after the death of Vataces, had broken into Thrace and Macedon, at the head of a numerous f army; but was obliged to retire into his own dominions by John Palacologus, the protector's brother, after having loft, in a bloody engagement, the flower of his When news of this victory was brought to Magnesia, where Palacologus then

emperor.

binding himself, by a solemn oath, to resign the empire to the young prince, as foon as he should be of age, the credulous patriarch was prevailed upon to place the crown upon his head. Palæologus, thus raised to the empire, dispatched his brother Constantine with a considerable army into Peloponnesus, which was then held g refided, he was, by the most powerful among the nobility, and the populace, saluted with the title of emperor, which he did not reject. The patriarch threatened at first to cut off from the church both Palacologus and his adherents; but the protector a partly by the despot of Epirus, and partly by the Latins, but soon recovered by

Constantine. After this, Michael passed in person with a numerous army into Thrace, having nothing less in view than the reduction of Constantinople itself, the dominions of the Latins being now fo difmembered, that scarce any thing was left to the inactive and flothful Baldwin befides the imperial city. However Palæologus, apprehending the difficulty and dangers of fuch an extraordinary undertaking, refolved to put it off to a more favourable opportunity, and in the mean time to make himfelf master of the castle of Pera, in order to distress the Latins more effectually. But Attempts the being in feveral successive assaults repulsed with great loss, he was obliged to give reduction of over the enterprize, and retire. However, as he was master of the neighbouring Pera in vain. b country, before his departure, he disposed his troops in such manner, that the city being in some degree blocked up, the inhabitants were reduced to the utmost extremity. In the mean time, Alexius Angelus, despot of Epirus, attempting, in defiance of a late treaty with Palæologus, to recover the places he had lost in Thessaly and Greece, Alexius Strategopulus, a person descended of an illustrious family, and for his eminent services distinguished with the title of Casar, was sent against him with orders to try whether he could on his march furprise Constantinople. Alexius, having passed the streights, encamped at a place called Rhegium, where he was informed by the natives, that a strong body of the Latins had been sent to the siege of Daphnusa; that the garison was in great want of provisions; and that it would be no difficult c matter to surprise the city. Hereupon the Greek general resolved at all events to attempt it; and being encouraged by some of the inhabitants, who coming privately to his camp, offered themselves to be his guides, he approached the walls in the dead Alexius Strateof the night, which some of his men scaled without being observed; and killing gopulus surthe centries, whom they found asleep, opened one of the gates to the rest of the army, flantinop'e, who rushing in, put all they met to the sword; and at the same time, to create more and expels the terror, fet fire to the city in four different places. The Latins, concluding from thence Latins. the enemy's forces to be far more numerous than they really were, did not fo much as attempt either to drive them out, or to extinguish the flames; but, struck with terror and amazement, suffered themselves to be cut in pieces in the streets, or their d houses, which were soon filled with blood and slaughter. In this general consusion, the emperor Baldwin, quitting the ensigns of majesty, fled with Justinian, the Latin patriarch, and some of his intimate friends, to the sea-side; and there embarquing on a small vessel, sailed first to Eubaa, and from thence to Venice, leaving the Greeks in possession of the imperial city, after it had been held sitty-eight, or, as some will have it, sixty years, by the Latins. This happened in the year 1261. of the christian zera, the second of the reign of Michael Palzologus v. When news of the surprising, and altogether unexpected, success of Alexius was first brought to Palæologus, residing then at Nymphaum, he gave no credit to it; but receiving soon after letters from Alexius himself, with a particular account of so memorable an event, trans-e ported with joy, he ordered public thanks to be returned in all the churches with great solemnity, appeared in public in his imperial robes, attended by the nobility in their best apparel, and ordered couriers to be immediately dispatched with the agreeable tidings into all the provinces of the empire. Soon after, the emperor, having fettled his affairs at Nice, fet out for Constantinople with the empress, his fon The emperor Andronicus, the senate, and the nobility, to take possession of the imperial city, and removes his fix his residence in the place, which, at first, had been destined for the seat of the court from Nice to Conwestern empire. Having passed the streights, he advanced to the Golden gate, and stantinople. continued some days without the walls, while the citizens were busied in making the necessary preparations to receive him with a magnificence suitable to the occasion. f On the day appointed, the Golden gate, which had been long shut up, was opened, His entry, and and the emperor entering it, amidst the repeated acclamations of the multitude, public rejoic-marched on foot to the great palace, being preceded by the bishop of Cyzicus, car-ings. rying the image of the virgin Mary, supposed to have been done by St. Luke, and followed by all the great officers, the nobility, and the chief citizens, in their most pompous apparel. Public thanks were again returned in the church of St. Sophia, at which the emperor affifted in person, with the clergy, the senate, and the nobility. The exercises of piety were succeeded by all sorts of diversions, which lasted several days, the nobility, and chief citizens, striving to excel each other in testifying their joy by banquets, and public sports, on such an extraordinary occasion, a When the public rejoicings were over, the emperor carefully surveyed the imperial city, which allayed in great measure the sense of his present good fortune; for he observed the stately palace of Blacherna, with the other magnificent dwellings of the Roman emperors, lying in ruins; the many capacious buildings, that had been erected by his predecessors at an immense charge, destroyed by fire, and other unavoidable accidents of war; feveral streets quite abandoned by the inhabitants, and choaked up with the rubbish of the ruined houses, &c. These objects gave the emperor no small concern, and kindled in him a defire of rebuilding the city, and restoring it to its former lustre. In the mean time, looking upon Alexius as the restorer of his country, he caused him to be clad in magnificent robes, placed with his own hand b a crown upon his head, ordered him to be conducted through the city, as it were in triumph, decreed that for a whole year his name should in the public prayers be joined to his own, and, to perpetuate the memory of fo great and glorious an action, he commanded his statue to be erected on a stately pillar of marble before the church of the apostles. His next care was to repeople the city, many Greek families having withdrawn from it, while it was held by the Latins, to settle elsewhere, and the Latins now preparing to return to their respective countries. The former were recalled home; and the latter, in regard of the great trade they carried on, prevailed upon with many valuable privileges not to remove. The Genoese were allowed to live in continue in the one of the most beautiful quarters of the city, to be governed by their own laws c and magistates, and to trade without paying customs or taxes of any kind. Great privileges were likewise granted to the natives of Venice and Pisa, which encouraged them to lay aside all thoughts of removing, and carry on a trade, which proved highly beneficial and advantageous to the state. The emperor being soon after informed, that Baldwin had married his daughter to Charles, king of Sicily, and given him by way of dowry the city of Constantinople, which that warlike prince was making great preparations to recover, he ordered the Genoese, who were become very numerous, and might have done great mischief, if the city had been attacked, to remove first to Heraclea, and afterwards to Galata, where they continued. As for the Pifans and Venetians, who were not so numerous and wealthy, they were allowed to con-d tinue in the city . The emperor, having thus settled the state, and gained the affections both of the natives and foreigners, began to think of securing to himself and his posterity the sovereignty, which he only held as it were in trust, and was to refign to the young prince as foon as he came of age. Having therefore caused himfelf to be crowned anew in the imperial city, he foon after ordered the young prince to be deprived of his fight, pretending, that no one but himself had any title to the city or empire of Constantinople, which he alone had recovered from the Latins. This treason and barbarity involved him in endless troubles and dangers. For Arsenius, the patriarch, immediately excommunicated him, and all those who had been any-ways accessary to his crime, which occasioned great disturbances in the c Jole emperor.

He is involved city. At the same time, Michael, despot of Epirus, and Constantine, king of Balgaria, who had married the young emperor's fifters, breaking into Thrace, laid waste that country, destroying all with fire and sword. Palacologus marched against them in person; but as he was returning home without persorming any thing worthy of notice, he was attacked unexpectedly by the Bulgarians, and had unavoidably fallen into their hands, had he not escaped by sea on board a small vessel, which conveyed him fafe to Constantinople. The troops he had with him were for the most part cut in pieces, or taken prisoners; and the Bulgarians, being reinforced with twenty thousand Tartars, roved about the country without controul, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. The Venetians, observing the distracted state of f the empire, laid hold of that opportunity to recover the islands in the Archipelago, which Palæologus had seized after the reduction of Constantinople. The Venetians were joined by the king of Sicily, and most of the western princes, who combining against Palæologus, would, in all likelihood, have driven him from the throne, had he not engaged pope Urban IV. to espouse his cause, by promising to submit himfelf and his dominions to the Latin church, and by that means diverted the storm that threatened him. The pope persuaded Charles, count of Anjou, and king of puts out the young emperor,

Palxologus

acknowledged

eyes of the

and causes himself to be

The Latins encouraged to in great troubles.

Sicily, to conclude a peace with him; and Palæologus, on his side, did all that lay in a his power to bring about an union between the two churches, acknowledging by his embassadors, or in person, as some will have it, the supremacy of the pope in the The union of famous council of Lyons held in the year 1274. This occasioned great disturbances the Greek and at Constantineple, and throughout the empire, Joseph the patriarch, and with him Latin churches. most of the clergy, openly inveighing against these innovations; which provoked Paladogus to such a degree, that he caused such as appeared most obstinate to be imprisoned and cruelly racked, and banished the rest with the patriarch Joseph, in whose room Veccus was chosen. However, not long after, Simon of Bire, a native of France, being, by the interest of Charles, king of Sicily, chosen pope, on which eccation he took the name of Martin IV. he folemnly excommunicated Michael for b having contributed to the famous massacre of the French in Sicily, which happened on Easter-day, the thirtieth of March 1282, and is commonly known by the name of the Sicilian vespers. At length the unhappy prince, oppressed with cares, was taken ill as he was marching against the Turks, who had broken into the eastern provinces; and his distemper increasing daily, he was obliged to halt at a place called Allagium. There he received the embassadors of the Tartars, whom he had invited to his assistance, and soon after died, having lived sifty-eight years, and The emperor reigned twenty-four, wanting one month . He was succeeded by his son Androni- dies. sus Palæologus, who, thinking he could not begin his reign by a more popular act Andronicus than by restoring the ceremonies of the Greek church, and refusing to acknowledge Palzologus. the supremacy of the pope, ar mulled whatever his father had done with respect to the union of the two churches. But fuch as had received the Latin ceremonies defending them with great obstinacy, and those of the contrary saction, now countenanced by the emperor, returning the evil treatment they had met with in the late reign, the eschism was revived, and such animosities raised in the state, as threw the whole empire into a ferment. However, his endeavouring to restore the antient ceremonies disobliged such only as were addicted to the Latin church; but his conduct towards his brother Constantine estranged from him the minds of both parties. Constantine was the darling of the people; and being fent by the late emperor his father into Asia, to defend the frontiers of the empire, he had there in several battles overthrown the d Turks. His great popularity, and the reputation he had gained by his victories, rendering him suspected to the emperor, he was by his orders seized and thrown into Jealous of his prison, with several other persons of great distinction, amongst whom was Michael brother Con-Strategopulus, son to the celebrated Alexius, who had recovered Constantinople from stantine. the Latins. Upon the removal of these two brave officers, the Turks, under the conduct of the famous Othoman, made themselves masters of several places in Pbrygia, Caria, and Bithynia, and among the rest of the city of Nice. To put a stop to their conquests, the emperor dispatched into Asia Philanthropenus and Libadarius, two officers of great reputation and experience in war, appointing the latter governor of the cities of Ionia, and committing to the former the defence of the frontiers e on the Meander. Philanthropenus gained several advantages over the Turks; but, elated with his fuccess, he assumed the purple, and causing himself to be proclaimed Alexius Phiemperor, marched against Libadarius, who had declared him a public enemy, and lanthropenus set a price upon his head. As the two armies were ready to engage, the Cretans, revolts; who served under Philanthropenus, and had been beforehand gained over by Libaidarius, feizing their leader, delivered him up to his adversary, who caused his eyes But is betrayed to be put out. In the mean time, the Turks, taking advantage of these intestine by his own men. A disturbances, not only extended their dominions in Asia, but conquered most of the issands in the Mediterranean; and being masters at sea, insested the coasts of the empire to the utter ruin of trade and commerce. In this distracted state of affairs, the empef ror, distrusting his own subjects, took into his pay ten thousand Massagetes or Alans, who being driven out of their own country by the Tartars, had passed the Danube. These being sent over into Asia, under the conduct of Michael, the emperor's eldest In fon, whom he had lately declared his collegue in the empire, the Turks, at their approach, retired to the mountains; whence foon after they came suddenly down, and falling upon the Massagetes, while they lay in their camp, without the least appre- The emperor's hension of danger, put them to flight in spite of all the efforts of the young empe-forces defeated ror, who, on that occasion distinguished himself in a most eminent manner, but by the Turks. was in the end obliged to fly with the rest, and take refuge in the strong castle of killed by the emperor's priers. They seize on Califolis.

The Catalans revols.

The Tarks

Thrace ravaged by the Catalans and Turks.

The Massagetes, abandoning him, marched directly to the Hellespont, a ravaging the countries through which they passed, and thence crossed over into Europe. The Turks, pursuing them, made themselves masters of all the strong-holds to the sea-side. As for Michael, having narrowly escaped falling into their hands, he got in the end safe to Constantinople. The emperor, notwithstanding the shameful conduct of the Massagetes, reposing still greater trust in strangers than in his own subjects, of whom he was grown jealous since the rebellion of Philanthropenus, took into his service a body of Catalans, under the command of one Ronzerius or Rouzerius, who had formerly ferved in the wars between the kings of Sicily and Naples : and having conferred extraordinary honours upon him, fent him with his troops to the relief of Philadelphia, then closely besieged by the Turks, whom, upon his arrival, b he obliged to abandon the enterprize and retire. Upon their retreat, he turned his arms against those whom he was sent to protect; and roving about the country, committed every-where unheard-of cruelties, subjecting all to the rage and lust of thole dissolute vagabonds. Having plundered the few places that were left to the emperor in Asia, he returned with his Catalans to Europe; and leaving the rest at Callipolis, went with two hundred chosen men to demand of the young emperor Michael, lying then at Orestias in Thrace, the arrears which he pretended to be due to himself and his men. Michael, justly provoked at his late conduct in Afia, and now incensed Their leader is against him on account of his insolent carriage, ordered his guards to fall upon him, who accordingly cut him, and most of his men, in pieces. Those, who escaped, c flying to Callipolis, acquainted their countrymen with the death of their general, who thereupon, transported with rage, first put all the citizens to the sword, and then fortifying themselves in the best manner they could, prepared for a vigorous defence. However, as they distrusted their own strength, they sent for assistance to the Turks dwelling over-against them in Asia, who immediately conveyed over the streights five hundred chosen men to reinforce them. These were soon followed by others, who joining the Catalans, laid waste the neighbouring country; and having, with great expedition, equipped and manned eight galleys, plundered all the merchant-ships in the streights, and would have greatly distressed the imperial city itself, had not their small fleet been encountered and destroyed by the Genoese. On this occasion the Turks d first in Europe, came first into Europe; an event which we may deservedly reckon one of the most fatal that ever happened to the empire. The young emperor Michael marched against the Catalans and Turks, with a confiderable army, confisting of Greeks, Massagetes, and other auxiliaries; but the auxiliaries withdrawing as foon as the fignal for battle was given, and standing at a small distance as idle spectators, at whose instigation was never known, the Greeks were fo discouraged, that the emperor could neither by threats or promises stop their flight. He performed in person all that could be expected from an experienced officer, and valiant foldier; but not being able to encourage his men, either with his words or example, and his horse being killed under him, he was forced to retire, and make his escape to Didymothicum, where his father lay. encamped. After this victory, the Catalans and Turks over-ran all Thrace, destroying every thing with fire and fword, till finding it impossible for them to subsist longer there, the Catalans resolved to invade Thessaly; but the Turks, desirous of returning home with their booty, separated from them, being then thirteen thousand horse, and eight hundred foot; and bending their march through Macedon, acquainted the emperor, that they were ready peaceably to depart, provided he would allow them a fafe passage through his dominions, and supply them with ships to transport them into Afia. To this the emperor, willing to get rid of fuch troublesome guests, readily condescended, and accordingly ordered the necessary vessels to be got ready with the utmost expedition. But the Greek officers, observing the immense booty with which f they were loaded, began to contrive how they should make themselves masters of it, and in the end resolved to fall upon the Turks in the night; and by cutting them all off, revenge the injuries they had done to the subjects of the empire, and enrich themselves with the booty. The matter was not managed with such secrecy, but the Turks had timely intimation of it. Hereupon, having surprised a strong castle in that neighbourhood, they prepared for a vigorous defence, and at the same time found means to acquaint their countrymen on the other fide the streights with the danger that threatened them, who, entited with the hopes of booty, haftened to their affiftance; and crossing the Hellespont, ravaged the adjacent country, making excursions to the very gates of Constantinople. The emperor, awaked at length by the daily g complaints a complaints of his people, refolved to root them out; and accordingly marched against them with all his forces, the country-people flocking to him from all parts with their fpades, mattocks, and other inftruments of husbandry, in order to affift him in the reduction of the castle. The Turks were greatly alarmed at their approach, and began to look upon themselves as inevitably lost; but afterwards observing, that the Greeks, who had closely besieged the place, confiding in their strength and numbers, utterly neglected all discipline, they took courage, and fallying out with no more than eight hundred chosen horse, penetrated almost without opposition to the emperor's tent; which struck the undisciplined peasants with such terror, that they betook themselves to a disorderly slight. Their example was followed by the rest of the The emperor's army, tho' the emperor, and some of the officers, made several bold stands, hoping forces defeated thereby to stop the slight of the disheartened multitude; but the cowardly Greeks by the Turks; could not by any means be prevailed upon to stand before the enemy, who, after having made a dreadful flaughter of the fugitives, and taken some of the chief officers prisoners, made themselves masters of the emperor's camp, in which they found a large fum, defigned for the payment of the troops, feveral standards, the imperial crown, enriched with precious stones of an inestimable value, and all the baggage of the army. After this unexpected victory, the Turks roved up and down Thrace for two years together, without controul; which brought unspeakable calamities upon the inhabitants, confined within their walled towns, without daring to stir out to till c their ground. At length Philes Palæologus, a person nearly related to the emperor, touched with the calamities of his country, defired leave to march against the enemy, with fuch officers and foldiers as the emperor should think fit to appoint for that service, not doubting, he faid, but, with the affiftance of Heaven, he should revenge the injuries done to his country, and return in triumph. As Philes was an utter stranger to the art of war, but remarkable for his piety, and the integrity of his life, the emperor, looking upon him as one chosen by providence for the relief of his oppressed country, readily complied with his request. Philes's first care was to establith good discipline among his soldiers, exhorting them to live with temperance and fobriety, encouraging them with frequent donatives, and promifing to reward each d of them at the end of the war according to his deferts. Having thus modelled his fmall army according to his defire, he took the field, attended by the prayers and good wishes of the emperor, and the whole people. Being informed, soon after his departure from Constantinople, that Chaleb, the Turkish commander, was ravaging the country about Bizia, with one thousand foot, and two hundred horse, he marched immediately against him; and encamping the third day in a large plain near a little river called Xerogipsum, he received at midnight certain intelligence, that the enemy with their booty were at hand. Hereupon having drawn up his men in battle-array, and, with a pathetic speech, encouraged them to exert themselves in the desence of their country, he waited the enemy's arrival, who began to appear at fun-rising. The Turks, not in the least terrified with the surprize, having formed a strong barricade with their waggons, and fecured their prisoners, advanced in good order against the imperial troops, who received them with great resolution and intrepidity. Philes, having first invoked the divine affistance, charged at the head of the right-wing the enemy's cavalry, who began to give way; but his horse being killed under him, he was obliged to withdraw; which somewhat damped the courage of his men. However, he quickly appeared again at the head of the army; and falling with fresh vigour upon the enemy with the most resolute of his men, put their horse to flight; Who are overand then dismounting, charged their foot at the head of his infantry with such reso- thrown by Philution, that the Turks, no longer able to withstand them, betook themselves to a les Palæologus, f precipitous flight. Philes pursued them with great slaughter to the entrance into the Cherjonesus, and there encamped, with a design to cut off their communication with the neighbouring country. The emperor, transported with joy at the news of this victory, dispatched immediately five galleys, which were reinforced with eight more fent by the Genoese of Peræ, to guard the streights, and prevent their receiving any affistance out of Asia. At the same time Philes's army was strengthened with two hundred chosen horse, sent him by Crales king of Servia, who had married the emperor's daughter. The Turks being thus shut up both by sea and land, Philes, And are shut advancing with his forces to the castle they had seized, began to batter it with an up in the Cherincredible number of engines; which did great execution. The Turks, now despair-sonesius.

g ing of relief, and weakened by daily skirmishes, resolved to use an utmost effort, and

VOL. VI. Nº 8.

attempt

attempt to break through the Greeks sword in hand; but finding them, when they a first sallied out, upon their guard, and ready to receive them, they returned to their castle; but not so discouraged as not to attempt a few days after to open themselves a way through the Servians; which attempt proving equally unfuccessful, they began utterly to despair. Having therefore cast away their arms, and taken with them their gold and filver, of which they had great plenty, in the dead of the night they made towards the sea-side with a design to surrender themselves to the Genoese, who, they hoped, would shew them more mercy than the Greeks, as they had never injured nor provoked them; but the night proving dark, many of them, mistaking the Greek for the Genoese galleys, fell into the hands of their most implacable enemies, by whom They are all cut they were cut in pieces without compassion. The rest fared not much better; for b the Genoese killed such as brought the most money with them, lest in time they should discover it to the Greeks, who would have claimed it. The poorer fort they loaded with chains, fending some of them to the emperor, and keeping the rest for their own Thus was Europe delivered for the present from the Turks; but the time is drawing near, when we shall see them, through the indolence of the emperors, and cowardice of the Greeks, firmly established on this side the streights, to the utter ruin of the empire.

in fieces or taken.

Andronicus, the younger, a diffointe trince.

THE unhappy emperor was foon after involved in far greater troubles: Michael, his eldest fon, and collegue in the empire, had two sons, Andronicus and Manuel, of whom the former was greatly beloved by his grandfather Andronicus, tho' a youth of a most c untractable temper, debauched, dissolute, and abandoned to all manner of wickedness. Being greatly addicted to women, and suspecting he had some rival in the affections of his favourite mistress, he charged certain ruffians to watch her one night, and dispatch the person that should come to visit her. It unluckily happened, that Manuel came that very night, with little or no attendance, to the house, in quest of his brother. The affaffins, not knowing him in the dark, miltook him for the prince's rival, and falling upon him, gave him feveral mortal wounds, of which he died a few days after. When news of his death was brought to the emperor Michael his father, the good prince was so affected with it, that he died soon after of grief. The grandfather Andronicus, notwithstanding his deep concern for the death of Manuel, d still continued to cherish and savour Andronicus, who, answering his kindness with the utmost ingratitude, contracted an intimate friendship with Syrgiannes, John Cantacuzenus, Theodorus Synadenus, and Alexius Apocaucus, all persons disaffected to the emperor, and ready to lay hold of the first opportunity that offered to raise disturbances in the empire. As they were men of uncommon parts, and great experience in affairs of state, they soon gained an ascendant over the young prince, and finding him a subject proper for their designs, they inspired him with a thirst after power, and an utter aversion to the aged emperor his grandfather. The court being thus rent into two opposite factions, that of the young prince grew daily more powerful. The emperor did all that lay in his power to reclaim him; but his endeavours proving, to e his great grief, unfuccessful, he resolved in the end publicly to reprove him before vainto reclaim the patriarch, and the chief of the nobility. The prince, receiving timely intimation of his grandfather's design, went, when sent for, to the palace, attended by a great number of his followers and partizans, with arms under their garments, ready, if any violence was offered to the young prince, to rush upon the aged emperor with their drawn swords, and, dispatching him, proclaim Andronicus emperor in his room. But the emperor, who was passionately fond of him, reproved the youth in so tender and affectionate a manner, that, bursting into tears, he fell at his grandfather's feet, and promised an intire submission for the future. The grandfather, on his side, embracing him with paternal affection, promifed to appoint him his heir, and name f him for his successor in the empire. Thus they parted, thoroughly reconciled; but this reconciliation was short-lived: for the prince, returning to his favourite counsellors and companions, foon fell from the resolution he had taken, and began to entertain the same ambitious thoughts he had done before. Hereupon the emperor, perceiving he was become irreclaimable, resolved to secure him, and by that means prevent the disturbances, in which he foresaw the state would be otherwise unavoidably involved. This resolution was communicated by the emperor to Gerasimus the patriarch, and by him scandalously betrayed to the prince, who thereupon fled with his

The emperor endeavours in a accomplices and partizans the very night he was to have been apprehended, and The jourg escaped to Adrianople. The emperor, upon the first notice of his flight, caused him prince makes to be declared a public enemy. proscribed all his adherents, and obliged the inhabite his escape, to be declared a public enemy, proscribed all his adherents, and obliged the inhabitants of Constantinople, whose fidelity he suspected, to renew their oath of allegiance. On the other hand, the prince, arriving at Adrianople, was there acknowledged for And openly emperor by Syrgiannes, Cantacuzenus, and the other officers, who commanded the revolts. troops quartered in Thrace; fo that, finding himself in a few days at the head of a confiderable army, he detached a strong body of horse and foot to attempt, under the conduct of Syrgiannes, Constantinople itself, before the citizens could put themselves in a posture of desence. The emperor, alarmed at their approach, dispatched Theob leptus, bishop of Philadelphia, with other persons of distinction, to the young prince, then encamped at Orestias, with proposals for an accommodation; which, after a warm and long debate, was concluded on the following terms; that the empire The emperor should be divided, and the prince have Thrace, from Christopolis to Rhegium, and obliged to dithe suburbs of Constantinople, for his share; that his followers should enjoy, without vide the emmolestation, the lands and honours he had conferred upon them; and that, on the pire with him. other hand, the emperor should retain Constantinople, with all the cities and islands in the east, and in the west the whole country lying between Christopolis and Dyrrha-chium. In the mean time the Turks, taking advantage of these intestine broils, inlarged their dominions in Asia, and reduced most places on the Meander, and among c the rest the strong and important city of Prusa in Bitbynia. Othoman had some years before attempted to take it by ftorm; but being repulsed with great loss, he had built two strong castles at a small distance from the city, and left in them numerous garifons, under the command of two of his best generals, Attemur and Balabanzuch, who, by cutting off all communication between the place and the neighbouring country, reduced the inhabitants and the garifon to such streights, that great numbers of them dying for want of necessaries, the rest, despairing of relief, were in the end obliged to capitulate, and submit to Orchanes, the son of Othoman, who was Prusa taken by then indisposed, on the following terms; that the inhabitants and garison should the Turks. be allowed to retire unmolested whither they pleased, and to take with them all the di effects they could carry on their backs. These two articles were faithfully observed by Orchanes, who, entering Prusa, took possession of that important place in the year 1327. and, upon the death of his father Othoman, chose it for the seat of the Turkish empire. To return to Andronicus: the agreement between him and his grand-The emperor fon was but short-lived; for Syrgiannes, who had first advised the young prince to and his grandrevolt, not thinking his fervices sufficiently rewarded, wrote letters full of submissions from the fion to the emperor, and, upon promise of impunity, withdrew privately from the army in Thrace, and repaired to Constantinople, where he incensed the emperor against his grandson to such a degree, that the war was renewed on both sides. Constantine, And come to an the emperor's fon, was fent with a confiderable army to Theffalonica, to take upon open rupture. e him there the government of Macedon, and to invade from thence the territories lately yielded to the prince, while Syrgiannes, at the head of a body of Turks, who had entered into the emperor's fervice, reduced that part of Thrace, which lay next to Constantinople. Against Syrgiannes the prince dispatched Synadenus, an officer of great reputation in war; but marched in person against his uncle Constantine, being highly provoked against him for having seized on his mother Xene, and sent her prisoner to Constantinople. Constantine gained several advantages over him; which reduced him to great streights: but the prince having caused a report to be spread abroad, that his grandfather was dead, Constantine was so alarmed at that unexpected news, to which he gave intire credit, that he retired in the utmost consternation to f Thessalonica. He had not been long in that city, when he was informed, that the emperor was alive; and foon after received letters from him, with orders to apprehend twenty-five of the chief citizens, suspected of maintaining a private correspondence with the prince, and fend them in chains to Constantinople. The letters were delivered to Constantine with the utmost secrecy; but the citizens nevertheless, receiving timely intimation of the danger that threatened them, stirred up the populace; who, seizing on Constantine, delivered him up to his nephew, by whom he was kept closely confined as long as he lived. At the same time the Turks under Syrgiannes, quitting the emperor's service, retired home; which obliged that general to return in great haste to Constantinople. Upon his retreat, Synadenus reduced several places in a

The peace re-

They difagree again,

The prince feizes ou feveral

places in Ma-

Thrace, and threatened with a fiege the imperial city itself; which so alarmed the emperor, that he released Xene, and sent her to her son, then encamped at Rhegium, with propofals for an accommodation; which were readily embraced by the prince, the emperor promiting to take him for his collegue in the empire, and to cause him to be folemnly crowned, with his wife Ann of Savoy, whom he had lately married upon the death of Irene his first wife. The ceremony was accordingly performed in the church of St. Sopbia with the utmost magnificence; but the prince, prompted by his ambition, and impatient of a collegue, refolved foon after to remove his aged grandsather, that he might reign without controul. With this view he entered into an alliance with Michael prince of Bulgaria, his brother-in-law, who was to make a b diversion in Servia, if the prince of that country should move, as it was suspected he would do, to the affiftance of the emperor. After this, the prince, withdrawing privately from Constantinople, seized on the public revenue in Thrace; of which the emperor receiving intelligence, refused to admit him on his return into the imperial city, ordering at the fame time his lieutenants in Macedon, and the neighbouring provinces, to act against him as a public enemy. The prince in the mean time, by pretending a great readiness to comply in any thing reasonable with the emperor, gained the affections of the people to such a degree, that they could scarce be restrained in Constantinople itself, from openly declaring in his favour. Hereupon the emperor, to estrange from him the minds of the multitude, having summoned the patriarch, c and the chief of the clergy, ordered them to declare him unworthy of the empire, and exclude him from the communion of the faithful. To this most of them consented, and agreed that his name should be omitted in the public prayers of the church; but the patriarch, and fome others, who privately favoured him, fummoning the people together, pronounced fentence of excommunication against such as should presume to omit the name of the young prince in their public prayers; which provoked the emperor to fuch a degree, that he caused the patriarch to be deposed, and confined him to the monastery of Mangana. The prince, who was then at Rhegium, being informed of what had passed in the metropolis, approached it with thirteen hundred chosen mon, and leaving his army at some distance, rode up with Cantacuzenus, and d a guard of thirty foldiers, to one of the gates, defiring to be admitted, and allowed to confer with his grandfather. The emperor, acquainted with his demand by Phocas Maroles, who commanded the guards on the walls, fent him by the same officer orders to retire forthwith, without attempting to debauch his subjects, on pain of being treated as a public enemy; nay, some reviled him from the walls with most bitter language: upon which the young prince, after having solemnly declared, that he defired nothing fo much as to be reconciled to his grandlather, whom he charged with all the calamities that were to follow, retired to Selybria, and from thence into Macedon, where he took almost without opposition several castles and strong-holds; and then marched to Theffalonica, being invited thither by his friends, who, at his c approach, opened the gates to him, and joined him in reducing the citadel, which made a vigorous resistance, but was in the end obliged to submit, the prince having furprised and cut off a body of three hundred chosen men, sent by the emperor to reinforce the garison. The emperor, alarmed at the progress of his grandson's arms, applied to the king of Bulgaria for affistance, who immediately dispatched a considerable body of forces to his relief; but the prince, having in the mean time defeated the emperor's army on the banks of the Melanes, advanced with long marches to Constantinople. However, three thousand Bulgarian horse reached the imperial city before him, to the great joy of the emperor, who nevertheless, distrusting foreign troops, from whom the empire had already suffered unspeakable calamities, admitted f only their commander in chief, and a small number of officers, into the city, assigning to the rest quarters in the suburbs. As this gave the prince, who arrived soon after, an opportunity of conferring with them, he, by rich presents to their generals, prevailed upon them to return to their own country. The Bulgarians being thus removed, the prince prepared for the fiege of Constantinople; but in the mean time two of the foldiers, who were appointed to guard the walls, coming to the prince in the dead of the night, offered to betray the city into his hands; and accordingly, being encouraged by him with the promise of a reward answerable to that important fervice, they returned into the city undifcovered; and the following night, while the rest of the guard were intoxicated with wine, with which they had supplied them in g a great plenty, they drew up by ladders of ropes about eighteen men, who, breaking open that which was called the Roman gate, opened an entrance for the young prince, The city of and his whole army. When day appeared, the inhabitants were so far from making Constantiants  any opposition, that, on the contrary, with loud acclamations they saluted young to him. Andronicus emperor. Gregora, tho' greatly biassed in savour of the old emperor, and not a little prejudiced against young Andronicus, tells us, that the prince, ascribing the success that had attended his arms ever since the beginning of the war to Heaven, upon his entering the city, iffued orders, forbidding on pain of death any of his officers or foldiers to offer the least affront or injury to the emperor his grandfather. The same writer adds, that he went immediately to wait on the emperor in His conduct tob person, and was so affected with the speech, which the unsortunate prince made him, wards the old that falling at his feet, he tenderly embraced, and, with words full of duty and emperor, respect, endeavoured to comfort the emperor in his greatest distress. After this, he returned folemn thanks to Heaven, for having thus put an end to the war almost without bloodshed; and then, repairing to the monastery of Mangana, he reconducted the patriarch in a kind of triumph to his church, and restored him to his former dignity 4. Young Andronicus, now master of the imperial city, and universally acknowledged and obeyed as emperor, suffered his grandfather to continue in the palace, and wear the enfigns of majesty; but would not allow him the least share in the admi- Who is deprived nistration, which he took intirely into his own hands, governing with an absolute of all power. c sway, without so much as consulting the aged emperor in what related to public affairs. He allowed him yearly twenty-four thousand pieces of gold for his maintenance, and the imperial palace for his habitation, while he himself resided in that of the despot Demetrius. He granted a general pardon to all those who had adhered to his grandfather, and even preferred some of his chief favourites to the first employments in the state .

In the very beginning of his reign, the king of Bulgaria, entering Thrace at the Andronicus head of a numerous army, confifting partly of Bulgarians, and partly of Scythians, III. plundered several cities, and laid waste the whole country. Andronicus, having His wars with with incredible expedition drawn together a confiderable army, appeared unexpect-the Bu'garians. d edly at Byzium, in the neighbourhood of which city the king of Bulgaria lay encamped. His fudden arrival thruck the enemy with fuch terror, that the following night they decamped, and fled back into their own country, leaving behind them great part of the booty. Andronicus pursued them, and carrying the war into Bulgaria, ravaged the country far and near, destroying all with fire and sword, till the king, not daring to venture an engagement, tho' at the head of a very powerful and numerous army, fent embassadors to sue for a peace; which, after several conferences, was concluded upon terms highly honourable to Andronicus. After this, the two princes had an interview on horseback, when they confirmed the treaty, and renewed their antient friendship, which they agreed to cultivate by meeting yearly in such places as should be most convenient for both. The emperor, having nothing to fear from that quarter, turned his arms against the Turks, who, taking advantage of the domestic quarrels among the Greek princes, had greatly inlarged their dominions in Asia. Otheman, whom we may justly style the founder of the Turkish empire, being lately dead, the emperor laid hold of that opportunity to recover several places, which that warlike He recovers prince had reduced, and among the rest the samous city of Nice, with a strong castle Nice and other on the Sangarius, which commanded the passes leading into Bithynia. This castle places from the however was soon after retaken by Urchan or Orchanes, son and successor of Othoman, who, having happily settled his affairs at home, raised a formidable army, and entering Bithynia as foon as the emperor had left that country, made himself master of several f places there, and at last sat down before Nice. The emperor, who was then at Constantinople, leaving the imperial city, hastened back into Asia; and advancing as far as Philocrene, encamped there at a small distance from the Turks; who, after having harassed his men with frequent skirmishes, and sudden onsets, fell upon him at length with their whole army. Hereupon a battle enfued, in which both fides behaved with great bravery and resolution; but in the end the emperor being wounded in the soot with an arrow, and obliged to withdraw, his troops, no longer animated with his example, retired in the utmost confusion to their camp. As the emperor had removed to Philo- By whom he is in the end ded Gregor. l. iv. Cantacuzen. l. i. c. 50-59. Onuph. & Grneb. in chron.

1. f Idem, l. ii. c. 2, 3.

CANTACUZEN. l. ii. feated.

killed; which so disheartened his men, that they betook themselves to a precipitous slight, leaving their camp, arms and baggage, to the enemy, who, after having pursued them for some time with great slaughter, seized on the rich booty which they had left, and amongst other things, on all the emperor's plate and furniture. Andronicus, quite despirited at this misfortune, returned to Constantinople, while the Turks, having now no enemy to controul them, made themselves masters of all the maritime towns in Bitbynia, and in the end of Nice itself, by the following stratagem: Andronicus, in leaving Asia, had promised to reinforce the garison of Nice with a thousand horse. Orchanes, being informed of this, armed the like number of his own men after the Roman manner, and marching with them in person through by-ways into be the road leading from Constantino le, dispatched three hundred more, armed like Turks, to ravage the country within view of the city. As he approached the place, he pretended all on a sudden to have discovered the enemy; and leading his men against the foragers, put them to slight, and recovered the booty. As this was done in the fight of the citizens, who from the walls beheld the whole, the pretended Romans were received with great joy by the inhabitants; but the gates were no fooner opened, than they fell fword in hand upon the guard, and being joined by the three hundred, who were returned from their pretended flight, they cut the garifon in pieces, and made themselves masters of the city. After this, Orchanes, leading his And take Aby- men to the sea-side, laid siege to Abydus; which was betrayed to him by the gover- c

The Turks re-

dus and Nicomedia.

nor's daughter, while his two fons, Solyman and Amurath, reduced several other important places in Asia, and among the rest the antient city of Nicomedia. As the emperor was at this time seized with a dangerous malady, in which his life was despaired of, the court was in too great a consusion to think of the proper measures for putting a stop to the conquests of the Turk, in Asia. Such as had been instrumental in the late revolution, could not resect, without dread and horror, on the condition to which they must inevitably be reduced, if the young emperor should die, and his grandfather be restored to his power and authority. This consideration prompted Cantacuzenus, and some others, if Gregoras is to be credited, to resolve on the old emperor's death; but this resolution being generally disapproved, they all d agreed at last to confine him to a monastery, and force him to take the monastic habit, and exchange the name of Andronicus for that of Antony; which was done accordingly. Thus Gregoras 8. But Cantacuzenus tells us, that the old emperor, apprehending a more severe usage from his enemies, if his grandson should die, retired to a monastery of his own accord, and taking the monastic habit, continued there unmolested to his death, which happened two years after, that is, in 1332. he being then in the seventy-fecond year of his age. Young Andronicus intended, during his malady, to restore the crown to his grandsather; but, upon his recovery, he suffered him to continue in the monastery, retaining the whole power to himself. In the mean time the Turks pursued their conquests in Asia, and threatened Europe itself with an invasion. As e

the emperor was no-ways in a condition to oppose so powerful and formidable an enemy, he was persuaded by Cantacuzenus to conclude a dishonourable peace with them, in virtue of which they were to hold all the places and countries they had conquered in Asia, and suffer the Romans peaceably to enjoy what they had not yet wrested from them. Not long after, the inhabitants of Theffaly revolting, the emperor marched against them in person; but while he was employed in reducing them, the Turks, who observed the peace no longer than it suited their interest, passed over into Europe; and having ravaged the sea-coast, repassed the streights with an immense booty, and a great number of captives. Andronicus died soon after, in the forty-sisth year of his age, the thirteenth of his reign, reckoning from the time he deposed his grandfather, f and 1341. of the christian æra. Cantacuzenus, in the history he has lest us, endeavours to justify his conduct towards his grandfather. Tho' the old emperor designed, as that writer pretends, to have excluded him from the succession, it was no more than the debauched life he then led well deserved. Gregoras, on the other hand, lays the whole blame on young Andronicus, and will not allow that the old emperor gave his grandson the least provocation. All the disorders in the state were owing, according to him, to the unbounded ambition of the youth, and the evil counsels of Cantacuzenus and his other favourites. But, after all, we cannot help concluding, that if Andronicus the younger dies.

Andronicus
the elder confined to a monastery, where

he dies.

a the grandfather was to blame, the grandfon was altogether inexcuseable. Andronicus the younger left two fons, John and Manuel, of whom the eldeft was, upon his father's John Palxolodeath, declared emperor; but as he was then only nine years old, John Cantacuzenus gus. was appointed his guardian, and protector of the empire, during his minority. Cantacuzenus governed with great equity and moderation, took particular care of the education of the young prince and his brother, provided, as far as the weak condition of the empire would allow him, for the fecurity of the provinces; and in short, omitted nothing that could be expected from a faithful, zealous and difinterested minifter. But as he had been declated guardian to the young prince against the will and The parriarch approbation of John the patriarch, who thought that office belonged to him, and an enemy to be claimed a share in the administration, the ambitious prelate did all that lay in his Cantacuzenus, the same feeting him as one who had the young power to render him suspected to the empress Anne, representing him as one who had prince's guarnothing less in view than the imperial dignity. As the patriarch was in great credit dian. with the empress, Cantacuzenus, apprehending he might in the end gain the ascendant over her to his utter ruin, was for resigning his charge, and earnestly pressed the empress for leave to retire; but she refusing to comply with his request, and assuring him, that she was fully convinced of his integrity, and consequently determined to that her ears against the unjust calumnies, and malicious informations of his enemies, he was prevailed upon to continue in the administration. However, the patriarch, and his faction at court, which was very powerful, by continually alarming the c princess with the dangers she was to apprehend from the protector, and misconstruing all his actions, prevailed upon her at length to take fuch measures, as involved the empire in a civil war; for, giving intire credit to the malicious infinuations of the patriarch, who conjured her with tears in his eyes to provide for her own fafety, and that of her children, against the wicked designs of the protector, she began to look upon him as an enemy to herfelf and her family; and having caused some of his friends and relations to be apprehended, while he was absent at Didymothicum, she sent him orders to relign his office forthwith, and retire to a private life; which he refuling to do, till he had an opportunity of justifying his conduct, and convincing the world of his innocency, the empress, at the instigation of the patriarch, declared him a public Cantacuzenus d enemy and traitor. Cantacuzenus, now apprifed, that his enemies aimed at nothing declared a publes than his utter destruction, thought it high time to provide for his own safety. Being then at the head of a powerful army, which he had raised to oppose the Servians, who, upon the emperor's death, had broken into the empire, and having with him feveral persons of the greatest authority in the empire, who all advised him to assume the purple, as the only means of defeating the designs of his enemies, he hearkened to their advice, and suffered himself to be proclaimed emperor at Didymo- He assumes the thicum in 1342. the second year of his administration. When news of his revolt was purple. brought to Constantinople, his mother, and the rest of his friends and relations in the city, were immediately apprehended, and thrown into prison, his estate was consicated, and troops levied to suppress the rebellion in its birth. Thus Cantacuzenus himself in his history; and with him most other historians agree, laying the whole blame on the patriarch and his faction, who, in a manner, forced the perfecuted minister to take arms in his own defence. Having thus assumed the purple, he acquainted the nobility and foldiery in a long speech with the motives that had prompted him to take that step, which, he said, the malice of his enemies had rendered necessary. He then gave leave to all those, whose friends and relations were at Constantinople, to depart, lest, by continuing with him, they should occasion the ruin of their innocent friends. The rest of the army declaring themselves ready to stand by him to the last, he advanced to Adrianople, the inhabitants of which city had f feized on all those whom they suspected to favour him, and sent them in chains to Constantinople. On his march he was informed, that a numerous body of Bulgarians were advancing to join the imperial troops, and fall upon him with their united forces. This obliged him to lay aside the design he had formed against Adrianople, and retire to the sea-side, that he might with more ease receive supplies from the Turks in Asia, with whom he had entered into an alliance upon his first assuming the imperial dignity. Tho' they offered him large supplies, yet he did not think fit to accept them, till he had tried all possible means of bringing about an accommodation. With this view he wrote to the patriarch, exhorting him to peace and concord; but the messenger who peace rejected.

cruelty.

His offers for a brought the letters was seized, and thrown into prison, Cantacuzenus was declared a anew a public enemy, and fuch of his relations as had not the good luck to make their escape, were treated with the utmost cruelty. His mother was delivered up to Apoused with great caucus, his most inveterate enemy, who treated her with the utmost barbarity, telling her fometimes, that her fon was taken prisoner; at others, that he was killed in an engagement, and his head was brought to Constantinople. Her concern, and the cruel usage she met with, having thrown her into a violent sever, Apocaucus would fuffer no physician to attend her, till the empress, hearing the danger she was in, and pitying her condition, recommended her to her own phylicians, who nevertheless were not admitted by the patriarch and Apocaucus to visit her, till they had folemnly sworn not to administer any remedy to her that might relieve her. Being b thus destitute of all help, and daily insulted by her enemies, she died soon after, to the great grief of the empress, who, being informed of the unspeakable miseries she had undergone, and on that account highly provoked against the patriarch and A10caucus, obliged them to fend deputies to Cantacuzenus with overtures for an accommodation; but the deputies, who were their creatures, returning, told the empress, that Cantacuzenus would hearken to no terms; that he was obstinately bent upon war, and determined not to lay down his arms, till he had accomplished the ruin of her two ions, and the whole imperial family. A war being therefore resolved on, Andronicus and Thomas Palæologi were appointed to command the land-forces, which were to march into Thrace, of which country most cities had declared for Cantacuze- c nus. At the same time a fleet, consisting of fixty galleys, was equipped, to prevent the Turks from supplying the enemy with men or provisions. Of this fleet Apocaucus took upon himself the command; and having driven back the Turks attempting to cross the streights, and succour their ally, reduced Cantacuzenus, who was at the fame time warmly preffed by the land-forces under the conduct of the two abovementioned Palæologi, to fuch streights, that he was forced to quit Thrace, and take refuge in the dominions of Crales, prince of Majia, who received him with the greatest demonstrations of esteem and affection, and sent him back at the head of a powerful army, with which he gained feveral confiderable advantages over the emperor's forces, His enemies at- and made himself master of the greater part of Thrace. Hereupon his enemies, find-d tempt to Poison ing they could not suppress him by force, had recourse to treachery, and, with mighty promifes, prevailed upon one Monomachus to try whether he could dispatch him with poison. Accordingly Monomachus, repairing to his camp at Selybria, the better to compass his wicked purpose, owned the errand on which he was come; but pretending to be touched with remorfe, he fell down at his feet, and delivered to him the poison, which he was to have administered. Cantacuzenus received him in a most obliging manner, loaded him with presents, and taking him into his favour, reposed to great a trust in him, that the traitor would have soon found an opportunity of putting his design in execution, without incurring the least suspicion, had not Cantacuzenus been privately warned by his friends at Constantinople to be upon his guard. e

He is received into Constantinople.

In the mean time Cantacuzenus, having made himself master of all Macedon and Thrace, approached the imperial city, with a design to reduce it, either by force or famine; but he had not been long before it, when several citizens, apprehending the calamities attending a long fiege, resolved to prevent them, by admitting him privately into the city. Accordingly, having first acquainted him with their design, they fell in the night upon the guards, and making themselves masters of one of the gates, admitted him and his whole army, faluting him, as he entered, with the title of emperor. They were joined by the generality of the people, who flocking from all quarters of the city, attended him with loud shouts to the forum. As for the empress, she continued in the palace, which she seemed determined to desend to the f last extremity, having a considerable body of troops at her devotion; but the young emperor earnestly intreating her not to expose both herself and him to the fury of the incenfed multitude, she was in the end prevailed upon to hearken to an accommodation; which was happily brought about upon the following terms; viz. that Cantacuzenus should be declared collegue to the young prince, and have the sole administration of affairs for the space of ten years, Palæologus being then but sisteen; that afterwards they should both reign with equal power and authority; and that an act of oblivion should pass on both sides. This agreement being signed and sworn to by Cantacuzenus, Palacologus, and the empress Ann, on the eighth of February 1347. the new emperor was received the same day into the palace, and soon after crowned with g

And crowned emiperor.

the usual solemnity by Isidore, the new patriarch of Constantinople, John his predecessor being deposed, and sent into banishment. That the union between the two princes might be better settled, and more lasting, Cantacuzenus gave his daughter Helena in marriage to young Palæologus, and caused her to be likewise crowned, and acknowledged empress by the nobility and people k. As Cantacuzenus had been powerfully assisted by Orchanes the Turkish sultan, who had even married his daughter, he could not help entertaining a friendly correspondence with that prince; which gave great offence to the clergy, and some zealous christians, who, by exclaiming against so strict an alliance and intimacy between a christian and a Mohammedan prince, estranged by degrees the minds of the multitude from Cantacuzenus; which proved very preju-

b dicial to his affairs. However, he governed the empire for the space of ten years He governs with such equity and moderation, that even his most inveterate enemies could lay with great nothing to his charge. In the fixth year of his administration, the Genoese of Galata, equity and mown who were become very powerful, provoked at the emperor's refusing them leave to inlarge their city, set fire to several buildings in the suburbs of Constantinople, seized on all the emperor's ships then riding in the harbour, and made open war on the empire, in which they gained several advantages at sea, and made themselves masters of some islands in the Archipelago, which the emperor was obliged to yield to them. When Palæologus came to govern jointly with him, Crales king of the Servians, highly provoked against Cantacuzenus, for having obliged him to restore some cities, e which he had feized during the late troubles, gained over with rich presents several persons of distinction, who, by infinuating to the young emperor, that Cantacuzenus defigned to confine him to a monastery, to usurp the whole power, and transmit the fovereignty to his posterity, raised a diffidence between the two princes, which soon after broke out into an open war, Palæologus being on one hand assisted by Crales Awar breaks king of Servia, and Alexander prince of Bulgaria; and Cantacuzenus on the other by out between the Orchanes the Turkish sultan. In a battle which was fought in Thrace, the young two princes. emperor's army was utterly defeated, and he himself obliged to take refuge in Constantinople, all the other cities in Thrace having opened their gates to the conqueror. However, not long after, a peace was concluded between the two princes; which was d no sooner signed, than Cantacuzenus, divesting himself, by a voluntary resignation, Cantacuzenus of all his power, retired to the monastery of Mangana, and there took the monastic resigns, and habit. But his fon Matibew, whom he had fome time before declared emperor, pur-naftic babit. fued the war, and seized on several cities in Thrace, and among the rest on Adrianople. Against him Palacologus marched in person; and having utterly deseated his army, tho' reinforced before the battle with five thousand Turks sent by Orchanes, obliged him to quit the field, and take refuge in one of his strong-holds; whence while he was making his escape at the approach of the emperor's army, he was seized by one Boienas, and delivered up to Palæologus, who, upon his renouncing all claim to the empire, restored him to his liberty 1.

During these civil commotions, the Turks, under the conduct of Solyman, the fon, or, as others will have it, the brother, of Orchanes, passed the Hellespont, and having feized on a strong castle called Coiridocustron, marched from thence against Gallipolis, which Solyman took, after having defeated the governor of the place, who came out with the garison to offer him battle. Thus the Turks, after having reduced all Asia, first settled in Europe, where they have continued ever since. This happened The Turks first in the year 1357. Orchanes dying foon after, Amurath his fon and successor pursued settled in Euthe conquests, which Solyman had begun; and having made himself master of several rope. strong-holds in Thrace, laid siege at length to Adrianople, which was forced to submit, They take the emperor not being in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy. Adrianople. f Amurath, having in a short time mastered all Thrace, made Adrianople the seat of his empire in Europe, as the most proper place for the inlarging his dominions, and extending his conquests to Greece, and the neighbouring provinces. In the mean time Andronicus, the emperor's eldest son, having conspired against his father, was by his orders deprived of his fight, and kept under close confinement. Ducas the historian tells us, that Andronicus, and Cuntuzes Amurath's youngest son, having contracted an intimate friendship, conspired the death of their fathers, binding themselves by mutual oaths to live in amity and friendship, when the one should be emperor, and the other sultan. The same writer adds, that the conspiracy being discovered to

The emteror driven from the throne by his fon, and restored.

Bajazet's conquests in Europe.

gus dies. Manuel.

Bijizet besieges Constantinople.

Defeats an army of 1 30,000 christians.

Amurath, he ordered his own fon's eyes to be pulled out, and required the emperor to a inflict the same punishment on his son, threatening him with a war, if he resuled to The emperor, dreading the power of the fultan, caused the eyes both of his fon and grandson, who was yet an infant, to be pulled out, declaring at the same time his fecond fon Manuel his collegue in the empire. Andronicus however, after two years confinement, made his escape, being favoured therein by the Genoese of Galata, with whose affistance he made war upon his father; and being admitted into Constantinople, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor; and having got his father and two brothers, Manuel and Theodorus, into his power, he confined them to the fame prison in which he had been detained; but they having likewise, after two years, made their escape, Andronicus, dreading the calamities of a civil war, while b the Turks were ready to fall upon the few countries that were still left to the empire, restored his father and brother to the throne, who thereupon gave him Selymbria, and feveral other places in that neighbourhood m. In the mean time Amurath the Turkish fultan being treacherously slain, his fon Bajazet succeeded him in his dominions; and pursuing the conquests which had been so successfully carried on by his predecessors in Europe, made himself master of Thessay, Macedon, Phocis, Peloponnesus, Mysia, and Bulgaria, driving out the despots, or petty princes, who held those countries. Elated with his frequent victories, he began to look upon the Greek emperor, to whom nothing was now left but Constantinople, and the neighbouring country, as his vassal, and accordingly fent him an arrogant and haughty meffage, requiring, or rather c commanding him to pay him a yearly tribute, and fend him his fon Manuel to attend him in his military expeditions. With this dishonourable demand the emperor was obliged to comply, being no-ways in a condition to oppose so powerful and formidable an enemy. The unhappy prince died soon after, that is, in 1392. the thirty-John Palxolo- dable an enemy. feventh of his reign, leaving no fon behind him but Manuel, the other two, Andronicus and Theodore, being dead some time before. Manuel, who was then in Bajazet's court, hearing of his father's death, hastened to Constantinople, without taking his leave of the fultan, or acquainting him with the motives of his fudden departure; which Bajazet highly refenting, punished the officers who had suffered him to escape with the utmost severity; and passing with great expedition out of Bithynia, where d he then was, into Thrace, destroyed with fire and sword the country adjoining to Constantinople, and after having reduced the neighbouring towns, invested the imperial city itself both by sea and land. In this extremity Manuel had recourse to the western princes, who having raised an army 130,000 strong, sent it to his relief, under the conduct of Sigismund king of Hungary, and John count of Nevers. The western troops were at first attended with good success; for entering the countries lately subdued by the sultan, they recovered Widin, and several other places of great importance in Bulgaria, and invested Nicopolis. Hereupon Bajazet, raising the siege of Constantinople, marched, with all the forces he could affemble, to relieve the place. Upon his approach, Sigismund, leaving part of the army to pursue the siege, marched e with the rest to meet the enemy. Hereupon an engagement ensued, in which great numbers fell on both fides, and the victory continued long doubtful. At length, the French cavalry having difinounted to fight on foot, the rest of the army observing the horses without their riders, and concluding from thence they were all cut in pieces. began to give ground, and retire to their camp. This gave new courage and vigour to the enemy, who making an utmost effort, and charging the christians in their retreat with incredible fury, broke their ranks, and obliged them to fly in great con-The Turks pursued them to their camp, which they took, with all their baggage, and an incredible number of prisoners, among whom was the count of Nevers, and three hundred officers of distinction, who were all, except the count f himself, and five more, put to death in Bajazet's presence, after having been insulted by him in a most outrageous manner. As for Sigismund, he had the good luck to make his escape, and crossing the Danube in a small boat, to get safe to his own domi-This memorable battle, in which 20,000 christians were slain, and a far greater number taken prisoners, was fought in the second year of Manuel's reign, and 1393. of the christian æra ". After this victory, Bajazet returned to the siege of Constantinople; but finding the citizens determined to defend themselves to the last extremity, he applied to John the son of Andronicus, to whom, as we have observed above, a the emperor had yielded the town of Selymbria. With him he entered into a private agreement, in virtue of which Bajazet was to place him upon the throne, to which he had a just claim, as being the ion of Manuel's elder brother. On the other hand, John was to yield the city of Constantino; le to Bajazet, and remove the imperial seat to Peloponne us, which the fultan promised to relinquish to him and his posterity. This agreement being privately figned and Iworn to by both parties, Bajazet dispatched deputies to the inhabitants of Constantinople, offering to withdraw his army, and abstain from all hostilities, provided they would drive out Manuel, and place his nephew John on the throne, to which he had an unquestionable right. This politic proposal rent the whole city into two sactions, some savouring Manuel, and others b declaring for his nephew. Of this the emperor being apprifed, and apprehensive of the evils attending a civil discord at so critical a conjuncture, he acquainted his nephew, then in the Turkish camp, that, to deliver his subjects from the calamities under which they groaned, he was ready to refign the fovereignty to him, on condition he was allowed to depart with his wife and children, and to convey himself by sea to whatever place he should think fit. With this condition John readily complied, and Manuel resigns Manuel, having received him into the city, and conducted him to the palace, his nephem embarqued on board a galley, and let fail for Venice, where he landed, and from John. thence went to the several courts of the christian princes, to solicit aid against the overgrown power of the Turks, now become formidable to all Europe. He was everye where received with the greatest demonstrations of esteem, and promised large supplies, all Christendom being alarmed at the late conquest of the infidels. In the mean time John being crowned with the usual solemnity, Bajazet took care to put him in mind of their agreement, and press him to a speedy execution of the main article, which was to yield Constantinople to him, and retire to Peloponnesus or Morea; but the citizens refusing, notwithstanding the unspeakable hardships they suffered, to comply with such a scandalous treaty, Bajazet renewed the siege, and assaulted the Constanticity with more fury than ever. When he had already reduced it to the utmost extremity, news was brought him, that Tamerlane, the victorious Tartar, after having fubdued Persia, and the more easterly provinces, had turned his arms against him, d and was preparing, with a numerous and formidable army, to break into Syria. Hereupon, alarmed at the danger that threatened him, he in great haste raised the siege, and pussing the Hellespont, marched with the utmost expedition to Prusa, which he had appointed the place of the general rendezvous, both for his eastern and western forces. From Prusa he advanced, at the head of a very numerous and well-disciplined army, to meet Tamerlane, who gave him a total overthrow in the plains of Angoria Who is over-in Galatia, on the twenty-eighth of July 1401. cut most of his men in pieces; and prisoner by Tahaving taken the fultan himself prisoner, to punish his excessive pride, cruelty, and merlane. arrogance, shut him up in an iron cage, against which he is said to have dashed out his brains the year following, tho' fome ascribe his death to poison o, as we shall e relate more at length elsewhere. Manuel was no sooner informed of the overthrow and captivity of his inveterate enemy Bajazet, than he returned to Constantinople, where he was received with loud acclamations by the people, who being highly provoked against John for his servile compliance with the Turks, drove him from the throne, and restored Manuel, by whom he was banished to the island of Lesbos. This Manuel re-! great overthrow of the Turks had like to have occasioned the total dissolution of their stored. empire both in Europe and Asia; for the five sons of Bajazet, taking arms against each other, a civil war was kindled, and continued with great fury for ten years together. Isa-Zelebis, Bajazet's third son, upon his father's death, caused himself to be proclaimed fultan; but was foon driven from the throne by his brother Solyman, as f was Solyman by his brother Musa. At length Mohammed, Bajazet's youngest son, having overcome all his competitors, was univerfally acknowledged fultan, and the sole monarch of the Turks. The emperor Manuel in the mean time, taking advantage of these intestine divisions, and siding sometimes with one of the competitors, and sometimes with another, recovered several provinces, which Mohammed, whom he had affisted against his brother  $Mu \int a$ , suffered him peaceably to enjoy till his death, which happened in 1424. the seventy-fifth year of his age, and thirty-seventh of his Manuel dies, reign P. Some authors write, that he refigned the empire to his fon John Palæologus five years before his death, and retiring to a monastery, took the monastic habit,

John Palacolo- with the name of Antony. Be that as it will, he was succeeded by his son John, in 2

Constantinople besieged Ly Amurath to raif. it.

and jeveral

des's success

against the Turks.

whose reign Amurath II. the son and successor of Mohammed, recovered all the provinces which had been seized after the death of Bajazet by the emperor, and the other christian princes. In the beginning of his reign he laid siege to Constantinople, being provoked against the emperor for espousing the cause of an impostor, who, pretend-11. who is forced ing to be Mustapha the fon of Bajazet, was acknowledged for fultan in all the provinces of the Turkish empire in Europe. The citizens defended themselves with great bravery; but being harassed with continual assaults, must have in the end submitted. had not the emperor prevailed upon the prince of Caramania to countenance another Mustapha, Amurath's younger brother, who, having revolted in Asia, was, with the supplies fent him by his new ally, enabled to lay siege to the city of Nice, which he b This obliged Amurath to raise the siege of Constantinople, and march with all his forces against the usurper, who was betrayed and delivered up to him by one Ilras, in whom he reposed great confidence. Amurath, having got him into his power, caused him to be immediately strangled with a bow-string; and then turning his arms against the prince of Caramania, obliged him to sue for peace; which the fultan granted him upon what terms he thought proper to prescribe. Having now no other enemies to contend with, he entered Macedon at the head of a powerful army, and having ravaged the country far and near, laid siege to Thessalonica, which he took, and plundered with the utmost cruelty, as he did most of the cities of Atolia, Theffalonica,

Phocis, and Baotia. From Greece he marched into Servia, which country he foon c reduced; and then breaking into the dominions of the king of Hungary, befieged the taken by Amustrong city of Belgrade, which made a vigorous defence, no fewer than fifteen thousand Turks being slain by the christians in one fally; which obliged Amurath to drop the enterprize, and retire. In his retreat he was attacked by the celebrated John Hunniades, who cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest to shelter John Hunniathemselves under the walls of Sinderovia. Not long after, he gained a still more signal victory over the enemy in the plains of Translvania, with the loss of no more than three thousand of his own men, whereas twenty thousand Turks were killed on the spot, and almost an equal number in the pursuit. Amurath, who was then at Adrianople, fent another army into Transylvania, far more numerous than the two former; but they were attended with no better fuccess, being cut off almost to a man by the d brave Hungarian. He gained over the Turks several other no less remarkable victories, and recovered all Bulgaria and Servia; but was in the end overcome and put to flight by Amurath, in the memorable battle of Varna, fought in the year 1444 the christians being disheartened by the death of Uladislaus king of Hungary, who, while he was attacking the enemy with more courage than prudence, was by them hemmed in on all fides, and cut in pieces. However, Hunniades having had the good luck to make his escape, and being appointed protector of the kingdom during the minority of Ladislaus, who was chosen king of Hungary in the room of Uladislaus, he raised a confiderable army, and advancing to Coffova, engaged Amurath, who lay encamped The battle lasted three days, both armies retiring to their respective camps e when night approached, and renewing the fight early next morning. The two first days the christians had the advantage; but the third day, being quite tired out, and overpowered with numbers, Amurath charging them with fresh troops, they were, after a long and vigorous resistance, put to slight, and utterly routed. In this memorable battle, which was fought in 1448. thirty-four thousand Turks were slain, and eight thousand christians, with the flower of the Hungarian nobility. As for Hunniades, he made his escape into Servia, and from thence returned into Hungary 9. In the mean time John Palaologus, the Greek emperor, fearing the victorious fultan should turn his arms against him, sent embassadors to Adrianople, where Amurath then refided, with orders to conclude a peace upon any terms. The fultan received f them with great arrogance, declaring he would march directly to Constantinople, unless the emperor yielded to him some strong-holds, which he still possessed on the Euxine sea, and engaged to pay him a yearly tribute of three hundred thousand aspers. To these shameful terms the unhappy prince was obliged to submit, in order to enjoy the poor remains of the Roman empire, now reduced to the imperial city, and the adjoina yearly tribute to the fultan.

ing country. However, as he did not doubt but Amurath, as soon as he had put an end to the war, in which he was then engaged with George Castriot, surnamed Scan-

The emperor submits to pay

He is in the end routed by

the Turks.

derbeg, prince of Epirus, would, under some pretence or other, attempt Constantinople Itself, he applied to the western princes; and the more effectually to engage them in his cause, he promised to do all that lay in his power to reconcile the Greek and Latin churches. Accordingly, hearing a council was to be held at Ferrara, he went thither in person, attended by Jojeph the patriarch, a great number of prelates, and the flower of the Greek nobility, who were all received at Venice, where they landed, and afterwards at Ferrara, with great pomp and magnificence. From Ferrara the council was removed foon after, by reason of a plague which broke out there, to Florence, where the union was effected between the two churches, and subscribed to Union of the by the patriarch, and the other prelates. The patriarch died soon after at Florence; Greek and b but the emperor, and the other prelates, returning by land at the pope's charge to Latin churches. Venice, were conveyed from thence on the galleys of the republic to Constantinople. Upon his return, he found the people highly diffatisfied with his conduct, and that of the bishops, some of whom had refused to subscribe the decrees of the council, till the money was paid down, for which they had before-hand agreed to fign them. The disturbances which this union raised in the church, the death of the empress Despina, and the insupportable arrogance with which the unhappy prince was treated by the fultan, gave him fuch concern, that, being already broken with age, he funk under the weight of his calamities and misfortunes in 1448, the twenty-feventh of his John, the emreign, leaving the empire, now confined within the walls of Constantinople, to his bro-feror, dies.

c ther Constantine. Amurath, the Turkish fultan, did not long survive him; but dying Constantine in the beginning of February 1450. was succeeded by his son Mohammed, who had no Palæologus. fooner taken post stion of the throne, than he caused all his brothers to be strangled, Mohammed and ordered his father's lawful wife (for he is faid to have been the fon of a concu-11. bine) to marry a flave, by name Isaac. In the beginning of his reign, he entered into an alliance with Constantine, the Greek emperor, who, upon the first news of his father's death, had fent embassadors to congratulate him upon his accession to the The embassadors were received very graciously, the new sultan declaring, that he had nothing fo much at heart as to live in peace and amity with the emperor, and the other christian princes. The embassadors of the Walachians, Lesbians,

d Bulgarians, Rhodians, Servians, &c. were likewise received in a most obliging manner; which encouraged them to celebrate with public rejoicings the accession of Mohammed to the throne, whom they looked upon as a friend to the christians, the more because his mother was of that religion, being, according to the most credible writers, the despot or prince of Servia's daughter. But notwithstanding the friendship and regard he pretended to have for the emperor, he had no fooner put an end to the war with Ibrahim, king of Caramania, who, upon the news of his father's death, had invaded his dominions in Asia, than he began to entertain thoughts of making himself master of Constantinople, and abolishing the very name of the Roman empire. With this view he built on the Europe side of the Bosporus a strong castle, called by the Turks He builds 4

e Genichicar, and by the Greeks Neocastrum, opposite to another in Asia called Aspo-fort on the castron, which he caused to be repaired, placing in both strong garisons. These two Bosporus. castles commanded the streights, and the former, being but five miles from Constantinople, proved a curb upon that city, and kept it in a manner blocked up. Mohammed had no fooner begun the work, than the emperor, and the citizens of Constantinople, alarmed at the undertaking, dispatched embassadors to the sultan, with orders Which occasions to do all that lay in their power to divert him from it. But Mohammed was fo far a miguider from granting them their request, that tho' the emperor even offered to pay him an standing beannual tribute, provided he put a ftop to the work, he threatened, with the utmost the empror. arrogance, to cause such as should be sent to him upon the like errand to be slead

f alive. He added, that nothing beyond the ditches of the city belonged to Constantine, and that he had an unquestionable right to build in his own dominions what castles and forts he pleased. When the fort in the neighbourhood of Constantinople was finished, the garison left there by the sultan began to ravage the country adjoining to the city, and making excursions to the very gates, returned to their strong-hold loaded with booty. This occasioned several skirmishes between the christians and Turks; in one of which a confiderable number of the latter being killed, the fultan, to revenge their death, ordered his men to fall upon the christians, while they were reaping their corn in the open fields, and put them all to the sword, which was done

Constanting has recourse in vain to the christian princes.

fantinople. taken by the Turks.

Constantinople besieged. Disposition of the Turkish ariny.

accordingly. Hereupon the emperor, having caused the gates of the city to be shut, a ordered all the Turks within the walls to be arrested, but set them at liberty the next day, fending at the same time embassadors to Mohammed, with proposals for concluding a lasting peace between the two crowns. As the sultan seemed averse to an accommodation, and was assembling his forces from all parts, Constantine, well apprifed of his defign, in the first place took care to fill the public magazines, and supply the city with great plenty of all forts of provisions; then by his embassadors to the western princes, acquainted them with the designs of the sultan, and the storm that was gathering against the imperial city, the taking of which might prove fatal to all Christendom. That they might the more readily assist him at so critical a conjuncture, he renewed the union of the two churches, and received with extraor- b dinary demonstrations of esteem and respect the pope's legate, which gave great offence to the ecclesiastics zealously attached to the ceremonies of their ancestors, and occasioned a misunderstanding between the prince and his people. Neither did the emperor's zeal, in confirming the union, procure him the least affistance from the Latins in the west, who, by a strange infatuation, suffered the city, which they looked upon as the bulwark of Christendom, to fall into the hands of the avowed enemy of the christian name, who, they well knew, would not stop there, but extend his conquests to the neighbouring and perhaps to the most distant kingdoms. While Constantine was foliciting aid from the western princes, Caracia, one of Mohammed's All the forts in chief commanders, reduced several places on the Euxine sea, which were still held by c the emperor, viz. Mesembria, Acheloum, Bison, &c. then advancing towards the city, took by affault a strong castle called St. Stephen's tower, and put the garifon to the Other forts in that neighbourhood submitted at the approach of the enemy; but Selybria held out for some time, the inhabitants defending the place with incredible bravery and resolution; but being in the end tired out with repeated affaults, the town was taken, and they all to a man cut in pieces. All the forts, castles, and strong-holds in the neighbourhood of the imperial city being thus reduced, Caracia was ordered to fcour the country during the winter, in order to prevent the inhabitants from receiving any supplies of men or provisions; by which means the city was in a manner blocked up by land. But as the Greeks were still masters at sea, d their galleys ravaged the coasts of Asia, and returned with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives, who were fold for flaves in Constantinople's.

In the mean time, Mohammed, having drawn together from all parts an army of three hundred thousand men, left Adrianople; and bending his march towards the imperial city, encamped before it on the fixth of April 1483. covering with his numerous forces the adjoining plains. His Afiatic troops were posted on the right towards the Bosporus; those of Europe on the lest towards the haven; and he himself, with fifteen thousand janizaries, and other chosen troops, between both, over-against the gate named Karsias. On the other side the haven, Zoganus, one of his chief officers, encamped with a confiderable body of troops, in order to cut off all communication e between the city and country on that side. At the same time Pantologes, the Turkish admiral, appeared before the haven with a fleet of near three hundred fail; but the emperor had taken care to fecure the haven, in which were three large ships, twenty finall ones, and a good number of galleys, by means of a chain drawn cross the entrance from the city to Pera. Mohammed having thus affigned to each part of his army their feveral quarters, and furrounded the city both by fea and land, he began the fiege by planting batteries as near the city as he could, and raifing mounts in feveral places as high as the walls themfelves; whence the belieged were incessantly galled with showers of arrows. He had in his camp a piece of ordnance of a prodigious fize, which carried, according to Ducas, a ball of an hundred pound weight, f made of hard black stone brought from the Euxine sea. It had been cast by an Hungarian engineer, who not meeting with the encouragement he expected from the emperor, had fled over to Mohammed, while he was busied in building the abovementioned forts. With this vast piece, the enemy made several breaches in the walls, which however were with great expedition repaired by the belieged, who behaved with incredible bravery and resolution, being encouraged by the example longlassiniani of the emperor, and directed by John Justiniani, a Genoese adventurer, who arriving, commander in before the fiege, with two large ships, and a considerable number of voluntiers on chief of the emperor's forces.

a board, had been by the emperor, on account of his extraordinary skill in military affairs, appointed commander in chief of all his forces; and besides, for his farther encouragement, promised the sovereignty of the island of Lesbos, provided he obliged the enemy to raise the siege. That brave commander, animated with the hopes of fo great a reward, performed exploits, fays our historian, the' no-ways biasfed in favour of the Latins, worthy of the most renowned heroes of antiquity. Not satisffied with repulfing the enemy in their frequent affaults, he often fallied out against them at the head of his voluntiers, overturned their machines, destroyed their works, and made fuch a dreadful havock of their best troops, that his name soon became formidable. But Mohammed, to carry on the fiege with more vigour, ordered new Mohammed's b levies to be made throughout his extensive dominions; which reinforcements arriv- army reining daily from all parts, his army was foon increased to the number of near four forced. hundred thousand men, while the garison consisted only of nine thousand regular troops, viz. fix thousand Greeks, and three thousand Genoese and Venetians. As the enemy continued battering the walls night and day without intermission, great part of them, with the tower called Baclatina, near the Roman gate, was beaten down; but while the Turks were bussed in filling up the ditch, in order to give the assault, the breach was repaired, and a new wall built. This threw the tyrant into a rage hardly to be expressed, which was greatly heightened, when he beheld from the shore his whole fleet worsted by five ships, four of which belonged to the Genoese The Turkish c of Galata, and one to the emperor: the latter was fraught with corn from Pelopon-fleet worfled nefus, and the others with all manner of provisions from the island of Chios, where by five ships of they had passed the winter. When they first appeared Molanumed ordered his admit the christians. they had passed the winter. When they first appeared, Mohammed ordered his admiral to take them, if possible, or at least to prevent their entering the harbour, and joining the rest of the fleet. Hereupon the whole Turkish navy, weighing anchor, failed out to meet them, covering the streights, as they were in all three hundred fail, from shore to shore. The above-mentioned ships pursued their course; and failing into the midst of the enemy's fleet, funk some of their galleys, disabled others, and made fuch a dreadful havock among them, that Mohammed, who beheld the whole from the shore, could not forbear rushing with his horse into the sea, as d if he intended to swim to his fleet, and encourage them with his presence. But being foon apprifed of the danger, he turned back, and filling the air with loud outcries, and dreadful curses, he tore his hair, and upbraiding his men with cowardice, uttered such menaces against the admiral, and his other officers, as struck all with terror who heard them. But notwithstanding his impotent rage, and the loud shouts of the whole Turkish army, encouraging their mariners to behave more manfully, the five ships opened themselves a way through the midst of the enemy's fleet, and, to the unexpressible joy of the christians, got safe into the harbour '. The Turks attempted feveral times to force the haven, in order to attack the city on that fide; but all their efforts proving unfuccessful, Mohammed formed, and, to the great e terror and amazement of the befieged, put in execution, one of the boldest deligns we find mentioned in history. For, not being able to remove the chain drawn cross the entrance into the harbour, and the ships within it making a dreadful fire on the Turkish fleet as often as they drew near in order to break it, he commanded a large road to be levelled from the Bosporus behind Pera to the haven of Constantinopie, and then, by means of certain engines, the contrivance of a renegado, conveyed Mohammed eighty galleys over land for the space of eight miles into the haven, of which he was conveys eighty no fooner master, the ships riding there being either taken or sunk, than he caused saileys over land into the a bridge, a work no less wonderful and surprising, to be built over it with incredit haven. ble labour and expedition. By means of this bridge, which reached from the camp f of Zoganus at Pera to the walls of Constantinople, the city was laid open to an affault on that fide too. And now the place being invested, and battered night and day with incredible fury on all fides, the emperor, well apprifed he could not with his small garison hold out much longer against such a mighty sleet, and so numerous an army, sent deputies to Mobammed, offering to acknowledge himself his vastal, by paying him yearly what tribute he should think proper to impose upon him, provided he raised the siege, and withdrew. The tyrant answered, that he was determined at all events to become master of the city; but if the emperor delivered it up forthwith, he would yield to him Peloponnesus, and other provinces to his bro-

The emperor

A mutiny in the Turkish camp.

Conftantine makes the neceifary preparations for sustaining the affau't.

thers, which they should peaceably enjoy as his friends and allies; whereas, if he a held out to the last extremity, and suffered it to be taken by assault, he would put him and the whole nobility to the fword, abandon the city to be plundered by his foldiers, and carry all the inhabitants, stripped of their wealth and effects, into captivity. The city was already reduced to great streights; but the emperor being rejetts the con- determined to perish with it, rather than give it up upon any terms whatsoever, ditions offered the siege was carried on with great vigour till the twenty-sisth of May, when a report being spread in the Turkish camp, that a mighty army was advancing full march to the relief of the city under the conduct of the celebrated John Hunniades, the common foldiers, seized with a panic, began to mutiny, and press Mohammed in a tumultuous manner to break up the siege; nay, they openly threatened him with b death, if he did not immediately abandon the enterprize, and retire from before the city, which they despaired of being able to reduce before the arrival of the supposed succours. Mobammed, tho' hitherto an utter stranger to fear, alarmed at the menaces of the incenfed and ungovernable foldiery, was upon the point of yielding to the storm, and raising the siege, agreeable to the advice of the grand visier Haly, who favoured underhand the christians. But Zagan, a Turkish officer of great intrepidity, and an irreconcileable enemy to the christian name, having confirmed the fultan in his former refolution, advised him to give, without loss of time, a general affault; to which, he faid, the foldiery, however mutinous, would not be averse, provided he solemnly promised to abandon the city to be plundered by them. c As this advice best fuited the humour of Mohammed, he readily embraced it, and caused a proclamation to be published throughout the camp, declaring, that he gave up to his foldiers all the wealth of that opulent city, and required nothing for his share but the empty houses. The defire of plunder, and the prospect of an immense booty, soon got the better of the fear, which had seized the army: they all demanded with one voice to be led immediately to the affault. Hereupon the prepares for a emperor was summoned for the last time to deliver up the city, with a promise of general florm. his life and liberty. To this summons the brave emperor answered, that he was unalterably determined either to defend the city, or fall with it. With this answer the messenger returned, and on the evening of the same day, which was Trinity funday, the twenty-seventh of May, the Turkish camp and seet appeared illumi- d nated with an incredible number of lights fet up by the fultan's orders on every tent and vessel to admonish the whole army, that a solemn fast was to be observed the next, to implore the protection of heaven. Constantine, concluding from thence, as he had been privately informed beforehand by his friend Haly, that on the Tuesday following he should be attacked by sea and land, made the necessary preparations for sustaining the assault, his life, liberty, reputation, and whatever else was dear to him, lying at stake. He ordered in the first place a general procession, after which, in a pathetic and eloquent speech, he encouraged the nobility and citizens to exert themselves in the desence of the empire and the christian religion. He then retired to the church of St. Sophia, attended by cardinal Isidore, and several e other prelates, who had conformed to the ceremonies of the Latins; and there, after affifting with exemplary piety at divine fervice, he received the holy eucharist. Zygomola, a modern writer, tells us, that Constantine, having first caused the empress and his children to receive the facrament, ordered immediately after their heads to be flruck off, to prevent their falling alive into the enemy's hands. But this we look upon as one of the many fables that are to be found in most of the modern Greek writers, it being manifest from Ducas, and other contemporary writers, that Theodora, Constantine's first wife, and Catharina Catalusa, his second, died long before, without his having children by them; and that the king of Georgia's daughter, who not long before had been betrothed to him, died before she came to Constantinople, f or was married to him. From the church Constantine repaired to the great palace, and there, after taking leave of his ministers, as if he were never to see them again, he ordered every man to his post, and, putting on his armour, marched in person at the head of a chosen body to the gate Karsia, where a considerable breach had been made by the piece of ordnance, which we have mentioned above. Here the emperor, and Justiniani his lieutenant-general, with 300 Genoese, and a select body of Greeks, lay all night on their arms, hearing a great noise in the Turkish camp, and expecting every moment to be attacked. Accordingly, at three in the morning, the attack was begun by such troops as the sultan least valued, and therefore, g defigning

The Turks begin the ALIACK.

a defigning them for flaughter, had ordered them to march the first with no other view but to tire the christians, who, tho' few in number, made a dreadful havock of that disorderly multitude. After the carnage had lasted some hours, the janisfaries, and other fresh troops, advanced in good order, and renewed the attack with incredible vigour and fury. The christians, summoning all their courage and resolution, twice repulsed the enemy, but in the end being quite spent, and fresh troops pouring every moment in upon them, they were no longer able to stind their ground; so that the enemy in several places broke into the city. In the mean time, Justinian having received two wounds, one in the thigh, and the other in the hand, Justinian is he was fo disheartened at the fight of his blood, that, abandoning his post, he caused mounded, and himself to be conveyed to Galata, where he died from after, not of his wounded has retires.

b himself to be conveyed to Galata, where he died soon after, not of his wounds, but of grief, in reflecting on his cowardly and ignominious conduct. The Genoese and Greeks, who served under him, dismayed at the sudden retreat of their general, quitted their posts, and fled in the utmost consusion. However, the emperor, The emperor's attended by Theophilus Palæologus, Francis Comnenus, Demetrius Cantacuzenus, John gallant behaof Dalmatia, and a few more of the most resolute among the nobility, still k.pt viour. his post, striving with an unparallelled courage and intrepidity to oppose the inundation of the barbarians, who, like a violent storm, now broke in on all sides. Being in the end overpowered with numbers, and feeing all his friends lying dead on the ground around him, What! he cried aloud, is there no christian left alive to strike

c off my bead? He had scarce uttered these words, when one of the enemy, not knowing him, gave him a deep cut cross the face with his sabre: at the same time another coming behind him, with a blow on the back part of his head, laid him He is killed. dead on the ground. Thus died, in the forty-ninth year of his age, and tenth of his reign, Constantine XV. courageously defending that city which Constantine I. had founded. Some writers relate his death differently, and tell us, that being overpowered with numbers, and no longer able to stand his ground, he sled with the rest, and was stifled and pressed to death in the croud. But we have followed Ducas and Phranzes, of whom the latter was chancellor to Constantine, and in the city when it was taken; the former was in the neighbourhood during the whole

d time of the siege, and, a few days after the city was taken, learnt both of the Turks and christians the particulars which he relates concerning that unhappy prince's death. Ducas adds, that Mohammed, admiring his courage, commanded all the funeral honours to be paid him, that were due to an emperor ". The emperor being thus flain, the few christians, who were left alive, betook themselves to slight, and the Turks, meeting with no further opposition, entered the city, and scouring the And the town streets, filled that once stately metropolis with blood and horror. They gave no taken and quarter, but put all they met to the fword, without distinction of fex, age, or condition. But of the unspeakable miseries the inhabitants suffered, during the three days which Mohammed had allowed his foldiers to plunder the city, the reader will

• find a minute and affecting account in Ducas, and other contemporary writers. Many thousands took refuge in the church of St. Sophia, but they were all massacred without pity in their asylum by the enraged barbarians, who, prompted by their natural cruelty, the defire of revenge, and the love of booty, spared no place nor person. Most of the nobility were by the sultan's orders cut off, and the rest reserved for purposes more grievous than death itself. However, many of the inhabitants, amongst whom were some men of great learning, sound means to make their escape, while the Turks were busied in plundering the city. These embarquing on five ships then in the harbour, arrived fafe in Italy, where, with the study of the Greek tongue, they revived the liberal sciences, which had been long neglected in the west. When f the three days were expired, Mohammed commanded his foldiers, on pain of death, to forbear all further hostilities, and they put an end to the most cruel pillage and massacre mentioned in history. The next day he made his public and triumphal The total dissorting entry into the city; and chusing it for the seat of his empire, he solemnly promised Constanting. to take under his protection such of the inhabitants as should continue in it, or, being poliranRoman fled, should return to their ancient habitations, and even to allow them the free empire. exercise of the christian religion. The death of the last Roman emperor, the loss of Constantinople, and the final dissolution of the Constantinopolitan Roman empire, happened on the twenty-ninth of May in the year of the Greeks 6961. of the Hegira 857.

* Ducas, c. 39.

and of the christian æra, according to the most probable opinion, 1453.

The downfal of a state, once so mighty and powerful, was not sudden, or unexpected, but brought on by degrees, and after a visible decay of several ages. To what causes that was owing, we have, on proper occasions, pointed out in the course of the present history; and therefore, not to trespass on the reader's patience with tedious repetitions, we shall only beg leave to remind him here, that we have all along confined ourselves to the immediate causes of so great a revolution, such as human policy may account for, not daring to pry into the decrees of Providence, nor ascribe, as some have done, the calamities that befal a nation, to the sins of those on whom they are inslicted.

CHAP.

C H A P. XXXVII.

The history of the Carthaginians, to the destrution of Carthage by the Romans.

SECT. I.

A description of Carthage, and some account of the origin of that city.

* WERE the materials afforded us by the antients for writing the history of Carthage, in any manner proportioned to the power and opulence of that famous republic, tew nations would make a greater figure in this work; but fuch has been the infelicity of this state, that notwithstanding the immense riches, the extended commerce, the consummate policy and military genius of its inhabitants, rendered it formidable to all its neighbours, and even enabled it to contend with Rome for the empire of the world, yet we have but very short and scanty memorials left us of the great transactions in which it was concerned. Scarce a fragment of any of its own historians has reached us: the principal actions in which it bore a part, that have escaped oblivion, have either been transmitted to posterity by its enemies, or such as b were favourably disposed towards them, and consequently many things omitted, which might have contributed towards giving us a juster idea of it. And yet, notwithstanding this, by collecting all the remarkable passages relating to it, scattered in the Greek and Roman authors; by comparing these together, and connecting them in a proper manner; and laftly, by making some observations of our own, in order to illustrate and explain them; we doubt not but to supply the defects of all former historians, and give the most complete, as well as the most entertaining, history of the Carthaginians, that has yet been offered to the public.

Carthage, the metropolis of Africa Propria for several centuries, was, according to Carthage, Velleius 2, built fixty-five years before Rome, tho' Trogus b and Justin will have it to when founded. c be seventy-two years older than that mistress of the world. Livy c seems to place its foundation twenty years higher than these; and Solinus d exceeds him twenty-seven years. Timeus of Sicily intimates, that Carthage and Rome were sounded at the same time, viz. thirty-eight years before the first olympiad. Lastly, from Menander state Epbesian, as cited by Josephus (A), and the Tyrian annals, it appears to have preceded the Roman æra an hundred and forty years. We shall not take upon us to determine which of these is in the right, nor whether any of them deserves absolute credit; but only observe, that as Carthage 8 consisted of different parts, which were supposed to have been built at different times, it is no wonder, that the antients should

<sup>2</sup> Vell. Paterc. hist. Rom. I. i. <sup>b</sup> Just. hist. I. xviii. <sup>c</sup> Liv. hist. I. li. epit. <sup>d</sup> Solin. c. 29. <sup>c</sup> Timæus Sicul. apud Dionys. Halicarnas. I. i. <sup>f</sup> Menand. Ephel. apud Joeph. I. i. cont. Apion. <sup>g</sup> Petav. de doct. temp. I. ix. c. 69. & Boghart. de col. Phoen. I. i. c. 24.

(A) fosephus, in his computation from Menander Ephesius (1), seems inconsistent with himself, or at least very inaccurate; but Peravius (2) has endeavoured to correct him, and makes him to fix Dido's arrival in Africa an hundred and forty years before the foundation of Rome. Solinus (3) tallies very well with this account; for he tells us, that Carthage, at its final destruction by Scipio Africanus, had stood seven hundred and thirty-seven years. As therefore this destruction happened in the year of Rome six hundred and six, or six hundred and seven, it is evident, that, according to this author, Carthage was built an hundred and thirty, or an hundred and thirty-one years before Rome; and if, with Sir Isaac Newton (4) and Salmasius, we suppose Solinus intended the encania or dedication of the city for its beginning, and that it was nine years in building, Dido's arrival in Africa will be found to have happened an hundred and thirty-nine, or an hundred and forty years before the commencement of the Roman æra; which agreeing so well with Petavius, from whom it differs but two years, a trisse in a point of so remote antiquity, we may justly look upon it as coming pretty near the truth.

(1) Menand. Ephef. apud Joseph. l. i. cont. Apion.
(2) Dion. Petav. de dott. temp. l. ix. c. 69.
(3) Solin. c. 27.
(4) Salmaf. in Solin. c. 27. Newt. chronol. p. 65.
Vol. VI. No 9.

8 E

hand

hand down such a variety of accounts, nor that the moderns should disagree so a much amongst themselves in this affair. It is not very material to our present purpose, whether we can hit upon the precise year of this city's foundation, or not; and therefore we shall not be over solicitous about it. However, it may not be amiss to refer our curious readers to Petavius, who has been very particular on this subject. That learned man, after confidering the jarring opinions of the antients with great attention, endeavours to rectify their mistakes, and at last, with an appearance of exactness, fixes the time of Dido's beginning to build Carthage an hundred thirtyseven years before the foundation of Rome, if, with Varro, we place this in the third year of the fixth olympiad, or an hundred forty-two, if, with archbishop Usher, we prefer the account of Fabius Pillor k (B), who will have it to be near the beginning b of the eighth olympiad, and, for aught we know to the contrary, comes as near the truth as any other chronologer whatfoever.

The Carthagi-

But whatever difagreement may be found amongst historians and chronologers as nians descended to the exact year of the foundation of Carthage, yet it is agreed on all hands, that from the Phoe- the Phanicians were its founders. The Greek poet Nonnus, from some authors, whose works are now lost, assures us, that Cadmus made a very successful expedition into these parts. Eusebius m and Procopius are positive, that the Canaanites who fled from Joshua retired hither; and St. Austin would have it believed, that the Carthaginians were descended from these Canaanites. Philistus of Syracuse, a writer of good authority, who lived above three hundred and fifty years before Christ, relates, c that the first traces of Carthage were owing to Zorus and Charchedon, two Tyrians or Phanicians, thirty years before the destruction of Troy, according to Eusebius. Appian P. who undoubtedly received his notion from Philistus, attributes this event to Zorus and Charchedon, the two faid Phanicians, fifty years before that period; and from him Scaliger 9 corrects Eusebius's numbers. In confirmation of which opinion, Virgil t feems to hint, that Dido was rather the finisher than founder of this city, by giving us to understand, that the ground on which it stood was, before her time, occupied by people who dwelt in huts or cottages, or, in other words, that a town stood upon it. What likewise renders the account of Philistus and Appian not a little probable, is, that the Greeks always called this city Charchedon, for which no reason so proper d can be affigned, as that the person who first settled with a colony on this spot of ground, was called by that name. Besides, something must have determined Dido to chuse this particular place for her Tyrians before any other . Now, no more likely motive can be conceived, than that it had been inhabited for fome time by the Phanicians, who were her countrymen, and from whom therefore she had reason to expect the kindest and most friendly reception. Add to this, that both the coast of Africa, and the coast of Spain opposite to it, were known in very early ages to the Tyrians; since it is remarked by Velleius", that they built the cities of Cadiz in Spain, and Utica in Africa, a little above eighty years after the Trojan war; and Strabo declares, that the Phanicians were possessed of the best parts of Spain and Africa a c considerable time before the age of Homer: all which considerations strongly support the first Phanician settlement mentioned by Philistus and Appian. But as nothing can be laid down with certainty concerning the transactions of those very remote times, except what is deducible from the inspired writings of the old testament, and as nothing is less to be depended upon, than the relations we have of the origin of many antient cities, we leave it to our readers to believe as much or as little of this as they please.

rity, particularly with regard to the point under consideration; but we chuse to refer our readers to archbishop Usher (7), Vossius, &c. as not having room to recite them here.

PETAV. ubi supra, & de doct. temp. l. xiii. p. 370. edit. Antwerp. 1703. & l. xii.

tempor. l. ii. c. 13.

M. Onuph. Panvin. in ant. urb. imag. Uss. an. p. 87.

1 Nonn. in Dionys. l. xiii.

M. Euseb. in chron. l. i. p. 11.

Procop. de bell. Vand. l. ii. c. 10.

M. August. in exposit. epist. ad

Rom. sub init.

Philist. Syracusan. apud Euseb. in chron. ad ann. 804.

Philist. Serv. in loc. sub init.

Government in Libyc. Stalie. animadvers. in Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. in Libyc. Stalie. animadvers. in Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. in Libyc. Stalie. animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. in Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. ad ann. 804.

Popular. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. chron. Animadvers. In Euseb. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. In Libyc. In Libyc. Stalie. Animadvers. In Euseb. In Libyc. In Lib Vide etiam Car. Ruei not. in Virg. En. iv. sub init. edit. Casaub. 1587. * Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. 2. PROCOP. ubi supra. edit. Casaub. 1587.

(B) This Fabius Pictor was the most antient of the Roman historians (5), and a writer of very good authority. He is followed herein by Onuphrius Pan-winius (6), as well as archbishop Usher. Several arguments might be offered in support of his autho-

<sup>(5)</sup> Liv. l. i. ii. &c. Die. Hal. l. i. User. an. p. 60. ad ann. Jul. per. 3966. Voss. de hist. Grac. l. iv. c. 13. &c. (6) Onuph. Panvin. antiq. urb. imag. apud Gravium in thesaur. ant. Rom. tom. 3. p. 215. Petav. de doct. temp. l. ix. c. 51. (7) User. an. ubi supra. Voss. de hist. Grac. & Petav. ubi supra. How-

However, if most of the events, mentioned by profane historians as happening Elifa either before the destruction of Troy, may seem liable to dispute to some persons of a critical founded or in-exactness, it cannot well be denied, as being the concurrent voice of anciquient that larged the city exactness, it cannot well be denied, as being the concurrent voice of antiquity, that of Carthage. Elisa w, called also Dido, sister of Pygmalion king of Tyre, slying with her brother Barca, in the seventh year of the reign of that prince, from Tyre, fixed her residence at Cartbage, and either founded, or much inlarged, this noble city. Were there any beginnings of a town there before, yet it could not have been a place of very great consideration till her arrival. The wealth of her husband & Sichaus, and the Tyrians she brought with her, who, at that time, were the y most polite and ingenious people in the world, enabled her to inlarge and beautify the place, if she did not lay the b foundations of it; to wall it round, and build a strong citadel in it; to lay the basis of a most flourishing and extensive commerce, for which the Tyrian nation was so renowned; and to introduce a form of government, which seemed, in Aristotle's z opinion, by his descanting so largely upon it, to have been one of the most persect that ever was known in the world, at least, in his time. Dido's arrival in Africa, as we have observed, was an hundred thirty-seven years before the building of Rome, according to the Varronian account; an hundred forty-two, according to Fabius Pistor; an hundred and fourteen before the first olympiad; eight hundred eightynine, or eight hundred and ninety before the birth of Christ, and near three hundred after the destruction of Troy, unless, with Sir Isaac Newton, we will suppose the c antient chronologers to have anticipated that destruction near three hundred years. Virgil indeed seems to have allowed this supposition; for notwithstanding what has been advanced by several learned men b to excuse him on that head, had he been of the common opinion, the monstrous anachronism he makes, by bringing Eneas and Dido together as cotemporaries, would have been utterly inexcuseable. We shall hereafter give a full and ample account of the occasion and manner of Dido's slight from Tyre, of her putting into the island of Cyprus, and steering afterwards her course for the coasts of Africa, where she happily arrived; so that it will be intirely unnecesfary, even so much as to touch upon these particulars in this place .

How this city came to be called Carthage, authors are not fully agreed. Solinus d Name whence d tells us, that its true name was Carthada, which, in the Carthaginian language, figni-derived. fied the New City; and herein he is followed by Salmasius, Schindler, Bochart &, and others, who deduce it from the two Oriental words, Charta Hadatta, which are of the fame import. But, befides that it is too far fetched and unnatural, these very authors themselves supply us with arguments to overthrow this etymon; for Schindler h derives Carthago from the Oriental word Charta, a city; and the other two allow, that the city was founded long before Dido came into Africa, and that she only built that part of it called Byrsa, or the citadel. Dr. Hyde k derives it either from Chadre Hanacha, i. e. The chamber of rest, or place of repose, or from Card Haneca, the New City, as before, because Plautus in his Panulus intimates, that it was called by the e natives Chaedreanech; but these derivations likewise are too forced and unsatisfactory, and are besides overthrown by Bochart!. Servius m therefore seems to come nearer the truth, when he fays, that, according to the Carthaginians themselves, who must be supposed to be the best acquainted with their own origin, it received its name from Charta, a town not far from Tyre, to which Dido bore a near relation; and this town is called by Cedrenus " Chartica, or Chartaca, i. e. Charta Aca, or Charta Aco, the city of Aca or Aco, a celebrated fea-port of Phanice (C), near Tyre and Siden, in the territory of the tribe of Asher P, the possessed by the q Tyrians or Pbx-

w Just. l. xviii. Virgil. Æn. i. & Ser./. in loc. Cedres. ...
Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 415, 416, &c. * Virg. Just. &c. ubi supra. * Newt. chron. p. 13. Docs.

2 Arist. de rep. l. ii. c. 11. * Newt. chron.

Macron. alique. * Univers. hist. chron. w Just. 1. xviii.
Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 415, 416, &c.

x Virg. Just. 2. Arist. de rep. 1. ii. c. 12.

phal. & de col. Phœn. passim. 1 Kings, c. v. &c.
2 Arist. de rep. 1. ii. c. 12.

p. 32, 65, &c.
b Ludovic. de la Cerda, Car. Ruæus. Macrob. alique.
Chan l. i. c. 27.
c Salmas. in Solin. p. 322.
d Solin. c. 27.
b Schind. ubi supra.
c Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra.
c Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra.
c Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra.
c Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra.
c Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra.
c Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra.
c Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra.
c Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra.
c Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra. & Hyde in not. ad Peritsol. p. 44. BOCHART. Chan.l. i. c. 1. Serv. in Virg. Æn. i. ver. 37. & Æn. iv. ver. 75. Cedren. hist. compend. p. 140. edit. Par. 1647. Serv. in Virg. Æn. i. ver. 313. Strab. l. xvi. p. 521. Diodor. Sic. l. xix. c. 93. Corn. Vep. Datam. c. 5. Plin. l. v. c. 19. Steph. Byz. de urb. Hieronym. in Am. i, ii. & LXX in Jud. i. Jud. i. ver. 31. Ibid.

(C) The place was, according to Cedrenus, a maritime city or sea-port, as will appear from a peru-sal of the passage referred to; which is an additional argument in savour of our notion. We find likewise a city, called Kartah, given to the Levites in this country, taken out of the territory of the tribe of Zebulun.

nicians. In support of Servius and Cedrenus's authority, it may be observed, that the a Sidonians, Tyrians and Canaanites inhabiting that part of Phanice, frequently prefixed the word kiriath, cariath, or charta, i. e. city, to the proper names of towns, as Kiriath , or, according to St. Jerom, Cariath-Arba, Cariath-Baal, Cariath-Sanna, Cariath-Sepher, &c. tho' fometimes they styled them simply Cariath, or Charta, city, and, for the most part in writing, used their proper' names alone; so that it is no wonder the town under consideration should be known by the names Charta, Aca, Aco, Chartica, Chartaca, Cartaco, &c. fince this was perfectly agreeable to the genius of its inhabitants. Farther, tho' Dido's city was constantly called by the Latin writers Carthago, yet its true name amongst the antient Romans, who undoubtedly received it from the Carthaginians themselves, was Cartaco u, as is evident from the co- b lumna rostrata (D) of Duilius. This, together with what has been w observed in the first

T Jud. i. ver. 10. Josh. xviii. ver. 14. xv. ver. 15, 49.

* Josh. xv. ver. 9, 60, &c.

* Vide Pet. Clacconium in column. rostrat. Duil. apud Joan. Geor. Grav. in thefaur. antiquit. Roman. tom. iv. p. 1810. Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 415, 416.

(D) We have before given an English translation (8) of the old Latin inscription upon the balis of the columna rostrata of Duilius; but as it is a most curious and valuable monument of antiquity, we believe our learned and inquisitive readers would think us guilty of a great omission, were not the original itself interted somewhere in this work; especially as many fine conclusions relating to the Latin lan. guage may be drawn from it; and the furprifing manner in which that language was polified and refined in less than two centuries, may be from thence discovered. In order therefore to render our history as complete as possible, and evince the point at present in view, we shall here present our readers with the inscription itself, and the chasms of it, as fupplied by Lipsius and Ciaccenius, together with a version of it into the Latin of the Augustan age:

C. BILIOS. M. F. COS. ADVORSOM. CARTACINIENSEIS. EN. SICELIAD REM. CERENS, ECEST. AND S. COCNATOS. POPLI. ROMANI. ARTISUMAD UBSEDEONED. XEMET. LECION. EIS.
MAXIMOSQUE. MACICATO. CARTACINIENSEIS. OMNEIS. MACISTRATOS. LUCAES. BOVEBOS. RELICTEIS. NOVEM. CASTREIS. EXFOCIONT. MICELAM. MOENITAM. URBEM. PUCNANDOD. CEPET. ENQUE. EODEM. MACESTRATOD. PROSPERE PUCNANDOD. CEPET. ENQUE. EODEM. MACESTRATOD. PROSPERE REM. NAVEBOS. MARID. CONSOL. PRIMOS. CESET. RESMECOSQUE CLASESQUE. NAVALES. PRIMOS. ORNAVET. FARAVETQUE. DIEBOS. LX CUMQUE. EIS NAVADUS. CLASEIS. POENICAS. OMNIS. PARATASQUE. SUMAS. COPIAS. CAPTACINIENSIS, PRÆSSNIED. MAXUMOD. DICTATOSED. OLOROM. IN. ALTQD. MARID. PUCNANDOD. VICET XXXQUE. NAVEIS. CEPET. CUV. SOCIEIS. SEPTEMRESMOMQUE. DUCIS QUINRESMOSQUE. TRIRESMOSQUE. NAYEIS. XX. DEPRESET AUROM. CAPTOM, NUMBI OCO DCC

ARCENTOM. CAPTOM. PRADRA NUMEI, eccioso e CRAVE. CAPTOM. AES Cooloso cucloso eccioso eccioso eccioso cucloso eccioso e TRIOMPOQUE, NAVALED, PREDAD, POPLOM, ROMANOM. eccloso PONDOD DONAVET DAPTIVOS. CARTACINIENSEIS. INCENSOS. DUXET. ANTE. CUROM PRIMOSQUE. CONSOL. DE. SICELEIS. CLASEQUE. CASTACINIENSEOM TRIOMPAVET. EAROM. REROM. ERCO. S. P. Q. R. EL HANCE. COLUMNAM. P.

Caius Duilius Marci filius Consul adversus Carthaginienses in Sicilia rem gerens, Egestanos (socios atque) cognatos populi Romani artissima obsidione exemit. Legiones (enim) omnes Carthaginicnsum (qui Egesiam obsidebant, & Amilcar) maximus (eorum) magistratus (festinandi studio) elephantis relictis novem, castris effugerunt. Macellam (deiude) munitam (validamque) urbem pugnando cepit. Atque in eodem magistratu prospere rem navibus mari Consul primus gessit: remiges classesque navales primus ornavit atque paravit aiebus sexaginta. & cum his navibus, classes Punicas omnes, paratas (ornatas) que summas copias Carthaginiensum, trajente (Annibale) maximo dictatore illorum, in alto mari pugnando superavit; trigintaque naves cum sociis (hoc est cum ipsis hominibus) cepit, & septiremem pratoriam, quinqueremes (praterea) ac triremes naves xx depressit.

Aurum captum in prada nummi 111. M. DCC. Argentum captum in prada nummi C. M.

Æs grave captum vicies semel centena millia pondo, atque in triumpho navali pradam (omnem in ararium) Popul. Rom. intulit.

captivos (etiam) Carthaginienses ingenuos (hoc est, nobiles aliquot) ante currum duxit : primusque Consul, de Siculis, & classe Carthaginiensium triumphavit. Earum rerum ergo S.P. D. R. ei bancce columnam posuit. triumphavit. Earum rerum ergo Marti donum dedit atque dicavit (9).

Hence it is apparent, that, when this naval trophy was erected, the Carthaginians were called by the Romans CARTACINIENSEIS; and consequently the name of their city, then in use amongst the Romans. was CARTACO.

(8) Univers hist. vol. iv. p. 659, 660. in not. Grav. in thesaur. antiq. Rom. tom. iv. p. 1810.

(9) Vide Petr. Ciaccon. Tolet. in column, rost. Duil. apud

volume

a volume of this history, seems to render the authority above-mentioned incontests able.

THAT it was usual in those early ages to denominate some cities from others, as well as from their sounders, is a truth well known to all persons moderately versed in the knowledge of antiquity; and the city of Thebes in Baotia (E), so called from Thebes in Egypt; Pisa in Italy, from Pisa in Peloponnesus; Salamis in Cyprus, from Salamis in Attica, to omit several others that might be mentioned, are sufficient instances of it.

Salmasius will have the Greek name Charchedon to be derived from Solinus's Carthada; because the Sicilians now-and-then used the Greek letter chi for theta. But sure nothing can be more weak than this; besides, were it much more plausible, it becould not be admitted, because it classes with the authority of Philisus (F), Appian, Eusebius, and St. Jerom. Herodotus, Menander Ephesius, Polybius, &c. the most antient Greek authors, mentioning the Carthaginians, likewise disprove it, because they were not Sicilians.

The Carthaginians were called by the Greeks, fometimes Libyans, on account of the country they possessed, and sometimes Phanicians, on account of the country from whence they were originally descended. The Romans also styled them Pani, or Phanicians, for the same reason; and every thing belonging to them, or their city, Punic or Panic, i. e. Phanician, or belonging to the Phanicians.

We must not omit observing, that, according to Stephanus y and Eustathius, this Caccabethe Punic name city was antiently named, in Punic, Caccabe, from a horse's head, which was found Carthage. by the Tyrians, whilst they were digging for the soundations of Byrsa. This was looked upon as a happy omen, portending the martial disposition of the inhabitants, and the suture greatness of the city. Our readers will find the whole story in Virgil and Justin, and to these authors we refer them. In the mean time we shall only remark, that the learned Bochart has shewn the word Caccabe to have signified, in the Phanician language, the head of the animal above-mentioned; and that, upon account of this event, the Carthaginians had frequently upon the reverses of their coins, either a horse's head, or the body of a horse dimidiated, or a horse intire, with Vistory upon him. Most of these coins have likewise a Punic inscription upon their said reverses, with several other symbols; as is evident from Agostini, Paruta, and others, as well as from the cabinets of the curious.

In order to avoid all future digressions on this head, we shall here give a faithful and particular account of the situation, dimensions, different parts, and power of the city of Carthage, according to the condition it was in at the beginning of the third Punic war, extracted from Polybius c, Strabo, Diodorus, Appian, and other antient authors of the best reputation and authority.

Carthage stood at the bottom of a gulf, upon a peninsula three hundred and sixty Description of stadia, or forty-five miles, in circumterence, the isthmus joining this peninsula to the Carthage. continent of Africa, being twenty-five stadia, or three miles and a surlong, in breadth.

On the west side there projected from it a long tract of land, in shape resembling a tongue, half a stadium broad; which shooting out into the sea, separated it from a lake or morass, and was strongly fortisted on all sides by rocks, and a single wall. In the middle of the city stood the fortress or citadel, erected by Dido, called Byrsa, having on the top of it a temple sacred to Asculapius, seated on a very high hill, upon rocks, and to which the ascent was by sixty steps. This temple was rich, beautiful, and of a considerable extent; so that when Byrsa was taken by Scipio towards the close of the last siege of Carthage, nine hundred Roman deserters sortisted them-

* Salmas ubi fupra.

* Steph, Byz. de urb. Eustath. in Dionys. Afr.

* Virg. Æn. i.

* Just. l. xviii. Serv. & Ludovic. de la Cerda in Æn. i. Coel. Rhodigin. l. xviii. c. 38.

* Bochart. de col. Phon. l. i. c. 24.

* Ant. August. dial. vi. ant.

* Polyb. l. i. c. 73. Strab. l. xvii. p. 572.

* Appian. in Libyc. p. 129.

* Diodor. Sic. bibl. hift. l. iii. p. 178. Oros. l. iv. c. 22. p. 277.

(E) It is plain from scripture (9), that there was a town of this name likewise in Phanice, or the land of Canuan, not far from Shechem; so that whether we look upon Cadmus as a Phanician or an Egyptian, it can scarce be doubted, but that Thebes in Baotia was so denominated from some more antient city.

(F) All these authors are clearly of opinion, that Carthage was built a considerable time before Dido came into Africa; and therefore, if their authority be of any weight, it is highly improbable, that from the citadel Byrsa only, the addition she made to the old city, the place was called Carthada, or the New city; and if this be allowed, it must likewise be admitted, that Salmasius endeavours absurdly to deduce Carchedon from Carthada.

(9) Jud. c. ix. ver. 50, 52. 8 F

felves

At last Asdrubal's wife fetting fire to it, intirely consumed it, together a with herfelf, her children, and the faid nine hundred deferters, to avoid falling into the hands of Scipio. On the fouth fide, towards the continent, where Byrsa had its fituation, the city was furrounded with a triple wall, thirty cubits high, abstracted from the parapets and towers, with which it was flanked all round at equal distances, each interval being fourfcore fathoms, or four hundred and eighty foot. Every tower had its foundations funk thirty foot deep, and was four stories high, tho' the walls were but two; they were arched, and in the lower part, corresponding in depth with the foundations above-mentioned, were stalls, large enough to hold three hundred elephants, with their fodder, &c. Over these were stables for four thousand horses, and lofts for their food. There likewise was room enough to lodge twenty thousand b foot, and four thousand horse. Such a number of forces and beasts of war were contained within the walls, without in the least incommoding the inhabitants. The walls were weak and low in one part only, and that was an angle, which, from the first building of the city, had been neglected, beginning at the long tract of land advancing into the sea towards the western continent, before taken notice of, and extending as far as the harbours, which were on the fame fide. Of these there were two, which were disposed in such a manner, as to have a communication with one another, and had one common entrance, seventy foot broad, and shut up with chains. The first was appropriated to the merchants, and included in it a vast number of places of refreshment, and all kinds of accommodations for the seamen. The second, c or inner port, was, as well as the island called Cothon in the midst of it, lined with large keys, in which were distinct receptacles for securing and sheltering from the weather two hundred and twenty ships, it being designed chiesly for ships of war. Over these were magazines or store houses, wherein was lodged whatever is necessary for the arming and equipping of fleets. The entrance into each of these receptacles was adorned with two marble pillars of the Ionic order; fo that both the harbour and the island represented on each side two magnificent galleries. Upon the island was the admiral's palace, from whence orders were given, and proclamations issued out; and as it stood opposite to the mouth of the harbour, he could from thence discover whatever was doing at fea, tho' no one there could fee what was transacting in d the inward part of the harbour; nay, the merchants themselves, when they entered into their port, had no prospect of the men of war, being separated from them by a double wall, and each port having its particular gate that led to the city, without passing through the other.

Of how many parts the city confilled. Hence it is apparent, that the city consisted of three parts, Byrsa, Megara (G), or Magaria, and Cothon. Byrsa, according to Servius 4, was twenty-two stadia, or near three English miles, in circumference; the English miles. It was not so precisely in the middle of the city, but that it inclined to the south, or isthmus that joined Carthage to the continent, as is observed by Appian e. The word Byrsa is only a Greek e corruption of the true Punic or Phanician name Busra, Bosra, or Bossra, (for it may be pronounced all these ways) i. e. a fortress or citadel, as has been demonstrated by Scaliger f, Bochart, and others, versed in the oriental languages, and may be inferred from Strabo, Virgil, and Appian, the sable of the ox's hide having long since been exploded by the learned. This was justly looked upon as the interior part of Carthage, surrounded by the Megara e, or Magaria, i. e. the houses, or town, (for that the word imports in the Phanician tongue) its exterior part, according to Servius; so that together they formed a kind of double town. Strabo calls the small island in the midst of the second harbour, Cothon f; tho' Appian applies this name likewise to that port or harbour i itself, which, if this writer is to be credited, was environed by a strong f wall, and had one of its parts round, but the other quadrangular. The word Cothon

d Serv. in Æn. i. ver. 320. Eutrop. & Bochart. ubi supra. Appian. & Bochart. ubi supra. Scalig. in not. ad Fest. Bochart. ubi supra. Salmas. in Solin. &c. Serv. in Æn. i. & iv. Deptan. in Libyc. p. 129, &c.

(G) The true name of the exterior part of Carthage (or that which was, properly speaking, the town) was Megara or Magaria, not Magalia, as a is of oriental extraction, and fignifies a port not formed by nature 1, but the effect of labour and art; so that this seems to have been not a proper, but a common name amongst the Carthaginians, who undoubtedly pronounced it Kathum or Kathom; but the Greeks, adopting it into their own language, gave it a Greek termination, and expressing the Phanician A by their great O, (which may easily be conceived) thence came the name Cothon. The Carthaginians were so extremely active and indefatigable, that when Scipio m had blocked up the old port, or Cothon, they, in a very short time, built a new one, the traces of which, scarce an hundred yards square, are still to be feen ". This Cothon was perhaps the fame that was called the Mandracium o in the time of Procopius.

<sup>(10)</sup> Appian. & Serv. ubi supra. Isidor. in orig. l. xiii. c. 12. Vide etiam Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24.

THE number of inhabitants this city contained at the beginning of the third Punic Number of inwar, was seven hundred thousand; a prodigious number, considering the many ter-habitants. rible blows the Carthaginians had received from the Romans during the course of the first and second Punic wars, as well as from their own mercenaries in the interval betwixt these wars, and the destructive broils they had been engaged in with Masinissa. The forces they could bring into the field, as well as their power by sea, when they had a mind to exert themselves in an extraordinary manner, were very formidable, as appears from the army commanded by Hamilear in his expedition against Gelon the tyrant of Syracuse, which consisted of three hundred thousand men; and the fleet, forwarding the operations of the land forces, which was composed of more c than two thousand ships of war, and above three thousand transports. Their riches were likewise immense, as may be collected from what Scipio carried off at the final destruction of the town, after it had been thoroughly plundered, and, as was imagined, intirely exhausted and consumed, viz. near a million and a half sterling. All which may serve to give us some faint idea of what Carthage was, when in the height of its grandeur and magnificence.

As to the extent of the city, Livy informs us, that it was twenty-three ? miles round; The extent of and if what is related of it above be true, this is not improbable. Pliny q intimates, Carthage. that Carthage, when in the hands of the Phanicians, was much larger than when it was a Roman colony; and Suidas affirms, that it was the greatest and most powerful d city in the world. The dominion of the sea, which it enjoyed for six hundred years, almost without interruption, together with the genius of its citizens for commerce, aggrandized it in a most prodigious manner; to which if we add its excellent form of government, which will be explained more fully hereafter, its extensive trade, the mines of Spain, &c. those inexhaustible sources of wealth; it can be no matter of wonder, that the Carthaginians should have arrived at such an exalted pitch of power. One particular edifice, hitherto omitted in our description of Caribage, it may not be improper to take notice of, viz. the temple of Apollor, standing near the Cothon, wherein was a statue of that deity of massive gold, and whose inside was all covered with plates of the same metal, weighing a thousand talents s. But this was involved e in the common destruction of the city, being pillaged and destroyed by a party of Scipio's men, when the Cothon and adjacent part of the city were taken by that general.

It has been 'observed by a curious and learned modern traveller, who was him- Present reself upon the spot, that the greatest part of Carthage was built upon three hills, mains of anfomewhat inferior in elevation to those upon which Rome was erected. All the remains tient Carthage. of this once famous city are, according to this traveller, the area of a spacious room upon one of those hills, overlooking the south-east shore, with several smaller ones hard by it; the common fewers, which time hath not in the leaft injured or impaired; and the cifterns, which have very little submitted to the general ruins of the city. f The harbour is now stopped up, and, by the north-east winds with the (H) Mejerdab, made almost as far distant from the sea as Utica, tho' it is still called El-Mersa, or the port, lying to the north and north-west of the city, and formeth, with the lake of Tunis, the peninfula on which Carthage stood.

<sup>1</sup> Fest. in voc. cothones. Serv. in Æn. i. Bochart, ubi supra. Buxtorf. in voc. DDP &c. epit.

**Shaw's geographical observations relating to the kingdom of Tunis, p. 150, 151.

1. i. c. 20.

**P Liv. l. li. epit.

**PLIN. l. v. c. 4
**APPIAN. ubi supra. m Liv. l. li. PROCOP. · Idem ibid. t Shaw ubi fupra.

(H) This river, the Bagrada of the antients, will be described in the next chapter.

Vast extent of the Carthagi-

Strabo " observes, that the Carthaginians possessed three hundred cities in Africa 2 the Carthagi-nian dominions, before the beginning of the third Punic war; which may easily be believed, if we consider, that the dominions of this state in Africa before that war, extended from the western confines of Cyrenaica w, to the pillars of Hercules, or streights of Gibraltar (1), a tract of land near fifteen hundred miles in length. When it was arrived at its last period of perfection, the best part of Spain, even as far as the Pyrenees, of Sicily, and all the islands in the Mediterranean to the west of this latter, were subject to it. How it came to make such large acquisitions, and by what steps it grew so formidable, as to dispute the empire of the world with Rome itself, will appear in the sequel of this history.

> w SCYLAX CARYAND. Vide & Bochart. ubi fupra, &c. " STRAB. 1. XVII.

(I) The distance betwixt the Philanorum Ara and pillars of Hercules, according to Polybius (11), was fixteen thousand stadia, or about two thousand miles. But from Dr. Shaw's most accurate observations, it appears to have been one thousand four hundred and twenty geographical miles, fixty of which make a degree of a great circle. The particulars of this computation may be feen in the following table:

	Miles.
From Tingi, or Tangier, to the river Malva, or Mullooiah -	200
To the eastern part of the river Chinalaph, or Shelliff	220
To the river Ampfaga, or city of Cirta	165
To Laribus by Theveste, or Tiffesh	130
To Carthage — — — — —	70
To Kairwan, olim Vicus Augusti — — — — —	75
To Tacape in the Lesser Syrsis	110
To Tripolis —	135
To Leptis Magna, or Libda, in the Greater Syrtis -	115
To the bottom of the Greater Syrtis, now called the gulf of Seedra, where the Philanorum Ara are supposed to have been situated	200
In all	1420

Hence it is evident, that Polybius makes this tract to have been of a greater extent than it really was, tho', considering the largeness of the geographical miles above-mentioned, that author does not fo much exceed the truth, as may at first sight be imagined.

(11) Polyb. l. iii.

SECT. II.

A description of Africa Propria, or the territory of Carthage.

Africa Propria. HAVING given our readers the best account of the origin and foundation of b Carthage that can be drawn from antiquity, as likewise a small sketch of its power, wealth, magnitude, &c. which we shall expatiate more largely upon hereafter; before we proceed directly to the history of the Carthaginians, or describe the religion, government, genius, commerce, manners, arts, sciences, &c. of that people, it will be proper to give a description of the country wherein they were seated, and which was looked upon as the natural territory of their city; for with regard to the other dominions they, at certain intervals, possessed, or got a footing in, they were fometimes of a larger, and fometimes of a narrower extent; fometimes in their own hands, and fometimes in those of other states, according as success or misfortune attended them in the management of their affairs.

Its limits.

Mela 2 and Ptolemy will have Africa Propria to have contained all the countries fituate between the river Amp/aga and the borders of Cyrenaica, which, Pliny b tells us, were inhabited by twenty-fix different nations; but this gives it too great an extent, as making it to include Numidia, and the Regio Syrtica, which are countries distinct from the proper territory of Carthage. Its true limits seem c to have been the river Tusca on the west, or side of Numidia; the Mediterranean or African sea on the north; the frontiers of the Garamantes and defarts of Libya Interior on the fouth; and the Mediterranean, with the Lesser Syrtis, on the east. It d was divided into two pro-

POMP. Mela, l. i. c. 7. Ptol. l. iv. c. 3. Vide etiam Cellar, geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 4. Plin. v. c. 4. Idem ibid. Herodot. l. iv. Scylax Caryand, in peripl. edit. Oxon. 1698. Ptol. eggr. l. iv. & Cellar, geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 4. Plin. ubi supra. Strab. l. ii. geogr. l. iv. & Cellar. geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 4.

. . •

•

graduate to the control of the second of the control of the contro

a vinces, the Regio Zeugitana, and Byzacium, with which the kingdom of Tunis e, under Divison. its division into the summer and winter circuits, at present nearly corresponds. According to Dio f, this region was likewife called the old province, and Numidia the new one. Byzacium E, or at least the sea coast of that province, seems to be the Emporia of Livy and Polybius.

Ptolemy has placed Carthage, and all the neighbouring cities, four degrees too foutherly, which is not to be wondered at, confidering the inaccuracy of that geographer in ascertaining the latitudes of places. If we admit the position of Africa Propria to have been nearly the same with that of the kingdom of Tunis, as there is great reason to believe, it must have taken up almost four degrees of north b latitude, viz. from 33° 30' N. to 37° 12' N. and of longitude above three degrees, fince Sbekkab, the most advanced city of the kingdom of Tunis to the westward, is in 8°, and Clybea, the farthest to the east, in 11° 20 E. longitude from London. The spot of ground on which Carthage stood is, according to the latest observations k, about 10° 40' east of London, and in north latitude 36° 40'.

Zeugitana, or the Regio Zeugitana, was separated from Numidia by the river Zeugitana. Tusca, and extended as far as Adrumetum, which Pliny 1 makes to be the first city of Byzacium. The summer circuit of the kingdom of Tunism, including the fruitful country about Keff and Bai-jab, and several other districts, answers at present to this province, which was the Regio Carthaginiensium of Strabon, and the Africa Propria c of Pliny and Solinus. We shall not pretend here to give a minute and particular description of all the cities it contained, as being incongruous with our present design; but only touch upon some of the principal of them, which have been taken the most notice of by those writers who have treated of the Roman and Carthaginian affairs.

THE first place in Zeugitana worthy our notice, fince Carthage has been already Utica. described, is Utica. In rank and dignity this city was next to Carthage itself, and even superior to it in point of antiquity. Aristotle P says it was built, according to the Phanician historians, two hundred and eighty-seven years before Carthage. Velleius 9, as has been above related, makes the Tyrians to have founded it a little more than eighty years after the destruction of Troy. Justin r intimates, that the Tyrians were d settled there a considerable time before Dido came into Africa; nay, that this settlement commenced upon their first arrival in that country: and with these two last authors Mela and Stephanus' agree. From this great antiquity, Bochart thinks the Phanicians gave it the name Atica, the antient, i. e. city, rather, in our opinion, Etuca a or Ituca, i. e. the city of long standing, or the great city, the strong city, &c. which appellation it might have gone by amongst the Tyrians, even in Dido's time; and this notion receives a good degree of probability from Scylax and Polybius, the most antient authors mentioning it, who call it Ituce, or Ityce, to whom the other Greek authors, speaking of it, except Dio, who uses the Latin name, may be added. The gulph, on which both this city and Carthage stood, was formed by two promontories, e viz. the promontory of Mercury, and that of Apollo, under the last of which Utica was seated. Appian w says it was sixty stadia, or seven miles and a half to the westward of Carthage; but, according to the itinerary, these two cities were twenty-seven Roman miles distant from each other z. Utica had a large and commodious harbour, and was famous on many accounts in the Roman history, but on none more than the death of the younger Cato, who was from thence called Cato Uticensis, or Cato of Utica. After Carthage was razed by the Romans, it had a grant made it of all the country lying between Carthage and Hippo, and was for a confiderable time the metropolis of Africa. An ingenious modern traveller y supposes this place to have stood where Boo-shatter does at present; the traces of buildings of great extent and magf nificence still visible there, and the distance from Carthage, perfectly agreeing with that of the itinerary, besides other circumstances, giving good grounds for such a supposition.

THE next town in the neighbourhood of Carthage, but in a contrary direction to Tunes. the former, is Tunes or Tuneta, the Tunis of the moderns. This town is undoubt-

THE next town.

The next town.

The next town.

The former, is Tunes or Tuneta, the 14m.

Shaw's geographical description of the kingdom of Tunis, chap. 1.2. &c.

Plin. ubi supra.

Prol. geog. l. iv. Shaw ubi sup.

Plin. ubi sup. & Cellar. ibid.

Shaw ubi sup.

Vell. Paterc. ubi sup.

Part.

Phon. l. i. c. 24.

Part.

edly of great antiquity, being taken particular notice of by Polybius 2, Diodorus, Livy, a and others; nay, that it was of Phanician original, the name itself sufficiently implies: for we find in that part of the Lower Egypt, almost contiguous to the borders of Arabia Petræa and Phanice, a town called Tanes a, from whence the Tanitic nome, and Tanitic mouth of the Nile took their name. And 'tis well known, that this part of Egypt b was over-run by the Phanicians, either in the time of Joshua, or much earlier; and that these same Phanicians afterwards settled in Africa Propria, Numidia, and Mauritania. In confirmation of which sentiment, we find a river in Numidia c, not far from the Ampfaga, called Tanas; from whence we may infer, fince nothing is more common in the Oriental languages than a permutation of vowels, that Tunes is a Phanician name, and that the city itself is of Phanician extraction, b That it was a town of some note in very early ages, is evident from Livy d, Diodorus, and Strabo, who tell us, that there was a hot bath, and a famous quarry, not far from it; that it was fortified both by nature and art, and furrounded with a wall. It was feated on or near the mouth of the river Catada, fifteen Roman miles east of Carthage. The city is more famous now, than it was even amongst the ancients, being the capital of a powerful kingdom. The greatest part of it is situate upon a riling ground, along the western banks of the lake, which goes by the same name , and in a full prospect (as the ancients have described it) of the Guletta, Carthage, and the island Zowa-moore. Tunis some time since was noted for its corsairs, but of late the inhabitants have applied themseves wholly to trade, and are now become c

the most civilized and polite people in Barbary (A).

Maxula.

Carpis.

Maxula, or, according to Ftolemy, Mazula f, is an ancient town of the state of Carthage, and, if Pliny 8 may be credited, pretty near that city, in a direction contrary to the promontory of Apollo and Utica. We find on the western banks of the Tigris a city in Arabic " named Moful, or Mozul, which word is not remote from the Mazula of Ptolemy. 'Tis likewise evident from the authority of Scylax, who mentions it, that Mazula was of some repute in his time, and therefore of great antiquity; from which confiderations we may conclude it not improbable, as there is a very great affinity betwixt the Arabic and Phanician languages, that this town was built by the Phanicians. It stood on the eastern side of the Catada, now the Mili-d ana; and if the conjecture of the ingenious gentleman above-mentioned be true, viz. that Mo-raisah, two leagues to the north-east of Solyman, be the Maxula, or Mazula, of the antients, this town was about eight leagues, or twenty-four English miles, fouth-east of Tunes (B).

Carpis, a city of this district, placed by Ptolemy k one third of a degree more northerly than Carthage. Pliny calls it Carpi. Our learned traveller | supposes the spot which this town occupied, to be that which Gurbos, or Hamman Gurbos, at present stands upon; and that the hot bath near it is the Aqua Calida of Livy. Though the position Ptolemy assigns his Carpis does not agree with that of the modern Gurbos, this last lying above a degree more southerly than Carthage, yet we doubt not but e the gentleman is in the right, this geographer being very inaccurate in his determination of the latitudes of places.

Polyb. l. i. Liv. l. xxx. Diodor. Sic. l. xiv. Strab. l. xvii. ccc.

aliiq; Vide etiam Cellar. geog. ant. p. 785, 799. ed. Lipfiæ, 1732. b D. August. in exposit. epist.

ad 3 Rom. sub init. Procop. de bell. Vand. l. ii. c. 10. Euseb. chron. l. i. p. 11. Gemar. Hierosol. ad

Tit. Shebith, cap. 6. Manetho apud Joseph. cont. Apion. l. i. Nonnus in Dionysiac. l. xiii. Newton's chronol. p. 198—202. Marsham's can. chron. Bp. Cumberland's treatise on Sanchoniatho's Phæn. hist.

Univ. Hist. Vol. I. Sal. in Jugurth. c. 95. Cellar. geog. ant. p. 913. d Liv. Diodor. & Strab.

ubi sup. & alibi. Shaw ubi sup. p. 155. f Ptol. geog. l. iv. B Plin. l. v. c. 4. h Val.

Schind. pentaglot. Cellar. geog. ant. p. 623. l Shaw ubi sup. p. 57. k Plin. & Ptol. * POLYB. l. i. LIV. l. XXX. DIODOR. SIC. l. XIV. STRAB. l. XVII. &c. * HEROD. STRAB. PLIN. PTOL. SHAW ubi fup. p. 57.

(A) Somewhere near this place Adis or Adda is to be looked for, where Regulus gave the Cartha-ginians a memorable defeat, and forced their camp. It appears from Polybins (1), that this was a town of fome importance; but the antients being filent as to any farther particulars relating to it, fave only that it was fituated amongst rocks and hills, we shall think it sufficient just to have mentioned it.

(B) We find the Musulani, a people seated in the western part of Numidia, not far from the Amplaga, taken notice of by Tacitus (2); and a town and promontory of Eshiopia, famous for the cinamon they produced, near the confines of Nubia and Libya interior, named Mosylon or Mosulum, remembered by Pliny (3). Now as a Phanician colony came very early into Numidia, and the Nubians and Ethiopians were the descendants of the Egyptians and Arabians, as will hereafter be proved, possibly some light may from hence be thrown upon what we have advanced concerning the origin of this town.

(1) Polyb. l. i.

(2) Tacit. an. ii. c. 52. & l. iv. c. 24.

(3) Plin. l. v. c.4. O l. vi. c. 29. Misua,

Misuam, or Nisua, a town taken notice of by Pliny and Ptolemy, between Carpis Misua. and Clypea. The ruins a of this place are still to be seen at the sanctuary of Seedy Doud, in the kingdom of Tunis, five leagues to the E. N. E. of the promontory of

THE next place that occurs is the Aquilaria of Casar o, where Curio landed his Aquilaria. troops from Sicily. Cafar tells us, it was a very convenient station in the summer feafon, and in the neighbourhood of two promontories. Of these, in all probability, that of Mercury (called by the Moors the Ras-adder, and by the Franks cape Bon) was one; fince this is about a league to the northward of Lowab-reab, supposed to be the ancient Aquilaria. Many fragments P of antiquities are still extant b here, but amongst them nothing remarkable.

Clypea 9, a city built upon the small promontory Tapbitis, five leagues south-east Clypea. of the promontory of Mercury, which being in the figure of a shield or hemisphere, gave occasion to the name. It is called by Livy, Mela, and Pliny, Clupea; by Polybius, Appian, and Agathemerus, Aspis; but by Solinus, and the itinerary, Clypea. A mile distant from the ground where the old city stood, is a collection of huts or cottages, called by the inhabitants Clybea. Ptolemy is guilty of a great mistake,

when he makes Afpis and Clypea two different cities.

Curubis, Curobis, and Curabis, a town, according to the itinerary, thirty-two Roman Curubis. miles diftant from the former; but, according to the more accurate observations of c the moderns, seven leagues, or twenty-one miles, south-west and by west of it. It is flyled by Pliny: the free city Curubis, and feems to have been a confiderable place in former times; though the ruins of a large aqueduct, and of the cifterns which received the water, are the only antiquities it can boast of at present, if the modern Gurba answers to it, as both the name and situation sufficiently intimate.

Canthele, a Phænician city, not far from Curubis, according to Hecatæus ". This Canthele. town feems to have received its appellation from the pagan deity Saturn; fince, according to Sanchoniatho w and Damascius, the word el in the Phanician tongue had a particular relation to that deity. In confirmation of which 'tis observed by Ponticus, in his life of St. Cyprian, that there was a town in that place called by the d Romans, vicus Saturni, the street or town of Saturn. This was not a place of figure, at least so low as the classic times, so that we take notice of it here purely on account of its antiquity.

Neapolis, a famous and ancient empory of the Carthaginians in the fouth-east part Neapolis. of Zeugitana, five leagues to the north-east of Curubis. Thucydides x says, that the passage from hence to Sicily was very short, as being performed in two days and a night. Scylax places it not far from the leffer Syrtis, and about a day and a half's journey from the promontory of Mercury. Nabal, a thriving and industrious modern town, is a furlong to the westward of the ancient Neapolis, which appears to have been a large city. Pliny styles this place, as well as Curubis, a free city. Here is a great number of inscriptions upon stones of six foot in length, and three in breadth; but they are either so unfortunately defaced, or filled with rubbish and morter, that it is a difficult thing to copy them. Strabo and Hirtius agree with Scylax in fixing it pretty near the promontory of Mercury. Nabal y stands upon the gulph of Hamam-et in N. lat. 36° 8' two leagues from a little opulent town of the same name.

To these may be added Nepheris, a fortress lying a little to the eastward of Car- Nepheris. thage. It was a place of good confideration, being built upon a rock, and strongly fenced by nature on all fides. Afdrubal, with his whole army, was cut off near it by Scipio, who, after a siege of two and twenty days, reduced the town; and this greatly contributed to the conquest of Carthage. Strabo, Appian, and the epitomizer of Livy,

f take particular notice of it. THE only city remaining in this province that merits any attention is Hippo, to-Hippo, wards the north-west borders of it, a fort of frontier town on the side of Numidia. From the navigable lake Hipponitis, on which it was built, and which served it as a natural fortification, it was denominated Hippo Diarrbytus, and Hippo Zarytus; tho', from the promontory near it the antients sometimes gave it the denomination of Acra, Hippuacra, and Hippagreta. Scylax calls it simply Hippo, notwithstanding it generally

O Cæs. lib. ii. civ. bell. c. 23.
P Shaw uoi
P Lin. ubi fup. n Shaw ubi sup. C.E.s. lib. ii. civ. ben. c. - 5.
i. p. 573. F Shaw ubi sup. Shaw ibid. PLIN. ubi sup.
de urb. W Sanchionatho apud Euseb. in præp. evang. l. i. c. 10.
ibliothec. 242. Thucyd. l. vii. Shaw ubi sup.
Went m PLIN. & PTOL. ubi fup. n Shaw ubi fup. p. 158. q Strab. lib. xvii. p. 573. HECATEUS perieget. apud Steph. de urb. & Damascius apud Photium in bibliothec. 242.

crene, to have his wound dreffed there, a report was spread in the camp, that he was a killed; which so disheartened his men, that they betook themselves to a precipitous slight, leaving their camp, arms and baggage, to the enemy, who, after having pur-

The Turks re-

fued them for some time with great slaughter, seized on the rich booty which they had lest, and amongst other things, on all the emperor's plate and surniture. Andronicus, quite despirited at this missortune, returned to Constantinople, while the Turks, having now no enemy to controul them, made themselves masters of all the maritime towns in Bithynia, and in the end of Nice itself, by the following stratagem: Andronicus, in leaving Asia, had promised to reinforce the garison of Nice with a thousand horse. Orchanes, being informed of this, armed the like number of his own men horse. Orchanes, being informed of this, armed the like number of his own men after the Roman manner, and marching with them in person through by-ways into b the road leading from Constantino le, dispatched three hundred more, armed like Turks, to ravage the country within view of the city. As he approached the place, he pretended all on a sudden to have discovered the enemy; and leading his men against the foragers, put them to flight, and recovered the booty. As this was done in the fight of the citizens, who from the walls beheld the whole, the pretended Romans were received with great joy by the inhabitants; but the gates were no fooner opened, than they fell sword in hand upon the guard, and being joined by the three opened, than they fell fword in hand upon the guard, and being joined by the three hundred, who were returned from their pretended flight, they cut the garison in pieces, and made themselves masters of the city. After this, Orchanes, leading his And take Aby- men to the sea-side, laid siege to Abydus; which was betrayed to him by the gover- c

nor's daughter, while his two fons, Solyman and Amurath, reduced several other important places in Asia, and among the rest the antient city of Nicomedia. As the emperor was at this time seized with a dangerous malady, in which his life was despaired of, the court was in too great a confusion to think of the proper measures for putting a stop to the conquests of the Turk, in Asia. Such as had been instrumental in the late revolution, could not reflect, without dread and horror, on the condition to which they must inevitably be reduced, if the young emperor should die, and his grandfather be restored to his power and authorize. This consideration and his grandfather be restored to his power and authority. This consideration prompted Cantacuzenus, and some others, if Gregoras is to be credited, to resolve on the old emperor's death; but this resolution being generally disapproved, they all d agreed at last to confine him to a monastery, and sorce him to take the monastic habit, and exchange the name of Andronicus for that of Antony; which was done accordingly. Thus Gregoras 8. But Cantacuzenus tells us, that the old emperor, apprehending a more severe usage from his enemies, if his grandson should die, retired to a monastery of his own accord, and taking the monastic habit, continued there unmolested to his death, which happened two years after, that is, in 1332. he being then in the seventy-fecond year of his age h. Young Andronicus intended, during his malady, to restore the crown to his grandsather; but, upon his recovery, he suffered him to continue in the monastery, retaining the whole power to himself. In the mean time the Turks pursued their conquests in Asia, and threatened Europe itself with an invasion. As e

the emperor was no-ways in a condition to oppose so powerful and formidable an enemy, he was persuaded by Cantacuzenus to conclude a dishonourable peace with them, in virtue of which they were to hold all the places and countries they had conquered in Asia, and suffer the Romans peaceably to enjoy what they had not yet wrested from them. Not long after, the inhabitants of Thessaly revolting, the emperor marched against them in person; but while he was employed in reducing them, the Turks, who observed the peace no longer than it suited their interest, passed over into Europe; and having ravaged the sea-coast, repassed the streights with an immense booty, and a great number of captives. Andronicus died soon after, in the forty-sisth year of his age, the thirteenth of his reign, reckoning from the time he deposed his grandsather, f and 1341. of the christian æra. Cantacuzenus, in the history he has lest us, endeavours to justify his conduct towards his grandfather. The the old emperor designed, as that writer pretends, to have excluded him from the succession, it was no more than the debauched life he then led well deserved. Gregoras, on the other hand, lays the whole blame on young Andronicus, and will not allow that the old emperor gave his grandson the least provocation. All the disorders in the state were owing, according to him, to the unbounded ambition of the youth, and the evil counsels of Cantacuzenus and his other savourites. But, after all, we cannot help concluding, that if Andronicus the younger dies.

Andronicus
the elder confined to a monastery, where

he dies.

a the grandfather was to blame, the grandfon was altogether inexcuseable. Andronicus the younger left two fons, John and Manuel, of whom the eldest was, upon his father's John Palxolodeath, declared emperor; but as he was then only nine years old, John Cantacuzenus gus. was appointed his guardian, and protector of the empire, during his minority. Cantacuzenus governed with great equity and moderation, took particular care of the education of the young prince and his brother, provided, as far as the weak condition of the empire would allow him, for the security of the provinces; and in short, omitted nothing that could be expected from a faithful, zealous and difinterested minister. But as he had been declated guardian to the young prince against the will and The patriarch approbation of John the patriarch, who thought that office belonged to him, and an enemy to b claimed a share in the administration, the ambitious prelate did all that lay in his Cantacuzenus, she young power to render him suspected to the empress Anne, representing him as one who had prince's guarnothing less in view than the imperial dignity. As the patriarch was in great credit dian. with the empress, Cantacuzenus, apprehending he might in the end gain the ascendant over her to his utter ruin, was for resigning his charge, and earnestly pressed the empress for leave to retire; but she resuling to comply with his request, and assuring him, that she was fully convinced of his integrity, and consequently determined to shut her ears against the unjust calumnies, and malicious informations of his enemies, he was prevailed upon to continue in the administration. However, the patriarch, and his faction at court, which was very powerful, by continually alarming the c princess with the dangers she was to apprehend from the protector, and misconstruing all his actions, prevailed upon her at length to take such measures, as involved the empire in a civil war; for, giving intire credit to the malicious infinuations of the patriarch, who conjured her with tears in his eyes to provide for her own fafety, and that of her children, against the wicked designs of the protector, she began to look upon him as an enemy to herfelf and her family; and having caused some of his friends and relations to be apprehended, while he was absent at Didymothicum, she sent him orders to refign his office forthwith, and retire to a private life; which he refuling to do, till he had an opportunity of justifying his conduct, and convincing the world of his innocency, the empress, at the instigation of the patriarch, declared him a public Cantacuzenus d enemy and traitor. Cantacuzenus, now apprifed, that his enemies aimed at nothing declared a publes than his utter destruction, thought it high time to provide for his own safety. Being then at the head of a powerful army, which he had raifed to oppose the Servians, who, upon the emperor's death, had broken into the empire, and having with him several persons of the greatest authority in the empire, who all advised him to assume the purple, as the only means of defeating the designs of his enemies, he hearkened to their advice, and suffered himself to be proclaimed emperor at Didymo- He assumes the thicum in 1342. the fecond year of his administration. When news of his revolt was purple. brought to Constantinople, his mother, and the rest of his friends and relations in the city, were immediately apprehended, and thrown into prison, his estate was confie scated, and troops levied to suppress the rebellion in its birth. Thus Cantacuzenus himself in his history; and with him most other historians agree, laying the whole blame on the patriarch and his faction, who, in a manner, forced the persecuted minister to take arms in his own defence. Having thus assumed the purple, he acquainted the nobility and foldiery in a long speech with the motives that had prompted him to take that step, which, he said, the malice of his enemies had rendered necessary. He then gave leave to all those, whose friends and relations were at Constantinople, to depart, lest, by continuing with him, they should occasion the ruin of their innocent friends. The rest of the army declaring themselves ready to stand by him to the last, he advanced to Adrianople, the inhabitants of which city had f seized on all those whom they suspected to savour him, and sent them in chains to Constantinople. On his march he was informed, that a numerous body of Bulgarians were advancing to join the imperial troops, and fall upon him with their united forces. This obliged him to lay afide the design he had formed against Adrianople, and retire to the sea-side, that he might with more ease receive supplies from the Turks in Asia, with whom he had entered into an alliance upon his first assuming the imperial dignity. Tho' they offered him large supplies, yet he did not think fit to accept them, till he had tried all possible means of bringing about an accommodation. With this view he wrote to the patriarch, exhorting him to peace and concord; but the messenger who His offers for a brought the letters was seized, and thrown into prison, Cantacuzenus was declared a anew a public enemy, and fuch of his relations as had not the good luck to make their His mother escape, were treated with the utmost cruelty. His mother was delivered up to Apo-used with great caucus, his most inveterate enemy, who treated her with the utmost barbarity, telling her fometimes, that her fon was taken prisoner; at others, that he was killed in an engagement, and his head was brought to Constantinople. Her concern, and the cruel usage she met with, having thrown her into a violent sever, Apocaucus would fuffer no physician to attend her, till the empress, hearing the danger she was in, and pitying her condition, recommended her to her own physicians, who nevertheless were not admitted by the patriarch and Apocaucus to visit her, till they had folemnly sworn not to administer any remedy to her that might relieve her. Being b thus destitute of all help, and daily insulted by her enemies, she died soon after, to the great grief of the empress, who, being informed of the unspeakable miseries she had undergone, and on that account highly provoked against the patriarch and A10caucus, obliged them to fend deputies to Cantacuzenus with overtures for an accommodation; but the deputies, who were their creatures, returning, told the empress. that Cantacuzenus would hearken to no terms; that he was obstinately bent upon war, and determined not to lay down his arms, till he had accomplished the ruin of her two ions, and the whole imperial family. A war being therefore resolved on, Andronicus and Thomas Palæologi were appointed to command the land-forces, which were to march into Thrace, of which country most cities had declared for Cantacuze- c At the fame time a fleet, confifting of fixty galleys, was equipped, to prevent the Turks from supplying the enemy with men or provisions. Of this fleet Apocaucus took upon himself the command; and having driven back the Turks attempting to cross the streights, and succour their ally, reduced Cantacuzenus, who was at the fame time warmly pressed by the land-forces under the conduct of the two abovementioned Palæologi, to such streights, that he was forced to quit Thrace, and take refuge in the dominions of Crales, prince of Majia, who received him with the greatest demonstrations of esteem and affection, and sent him back at the head of a powerful army, with which he gained feveral confiderable advantages over the emperor's forces, His enemies at- and made himself master of the greater part of Thrace. Hereupon his enemies, find-d kim.

tempt to poilon ing they could not suppress him by force, had recourse to treachery, and, with mighty promifes, prevailed upon one Monomachus to try whether he could dispatch him with poison. Accordingly Monomachus, repairing to his camp at Selybria, the better to compass his wicked purpose, owned the errand on which he was come; but pretending to be touched with remorfe, he fell down at his feet, and delivered to him the poison, which he was to have administered. Cantacuzenus received him in a most obliging manner, loaded him with prefents, and taking him into his favour, reposed to great a trust in him, that the traitor would have foon found an opportunity of putting his design in execution, without incurring the least suspicion, had not Cantacuzenus been privately warned by his friends at Constantinople to be upon his guard. e In the mean time Cantacuzenus, having made himself master of all Macedon and Thrace, approached the imperial city, with a design to reduce it, either by force or famine; but he had not been long before it, when several citizens, apprehending the calamities attending a long fiege, refolved to prevent them, by admitting him privately into the city. Accordingly, having first acquainted him with their design, they fell in the night upon the guards, and making themselves masters of one of the gates, admitted him and his whole army, faluting him, as he entered, with the title of emperor. They were joined by the generality of the people, who flocking from all quarters of the city, attended him with loud shouts to the forum. As for the empress, she continued in the palace, which she seemed determined to defend to the f last extremity, having a considerable body of troops at her devotion; but the young emperor earnestly intreating her not to expose both herself and him to the fury of the incenfed multitude, she was in the end prevailed upon to hearken to an accommodation; which was happily brought about upon the following terms; viz. that Cantacuzenus should be declared collegue to the young prince, and have the sole administration of affairs for the space of ten years, Palaologus being then but sisteen; that afterwards they should both reign with equal power and authority; and that an act of oblivion should pass on both sides. This agreement being signed and sworn to by Cantacuzenus, Palacologus, and the empress Ann, on the eighth of February 1347. the new emperor was received the same day into the palace, and soon after crowned with g

He is received into Constantinople.

emiperor.

a the usual solemnity by Isidore, the new patriarch of Constantinople, John his predecessor being deposed, and sent into banishment. That the union between the two princes might be better settled, and more lasting, Cantacuzenus gave his daughter Helena in marriage to young Palæologus, and caused her to be likewise crowned, and acknowledged empress by the nobility and people k. As Cantacuzenus had been powerfully assisted by Orchanes the Turkish sultan, who had even married his daughter, he could not help entertaining a friendly correspondence with that prince; which gave great offence to the clergy, and some zealous christians, who, by exclaiming against so strict an alliance and intimacy between a christian and a Mohammedan prince, estranged by degrees the minds of the multitude from Cantacuzenus; which proved very preju-

b dicial to his affairs. However, he governed the empire for the space of ten years He governs with such equity and moderation, that even his most inveterate enemies could lay with great nothing to his charge. In the fixth year of his administration, the Genoese of Galata, equity and mowho were become very powerful, provoked at the emperor's refusing them leave to inlarge their city, set fire to several buildings in the suburbs of Constantinople, seized on all the emperor's ships then riding in the harbour, and made open war on the empire, in which they gained several advantages at sea, and made themselves masters of some islands in the Archipelago, which the emperor was obliged to yield to them. When Palæologus came to govern jointly with him, Crales king of the Servians, highly provoked against Cantacuzenus, for having obliged him to restore some cities,

e which he had seized during the late troubles, gained over with rich presents several persons of distinction, who, by infinuating to the young emperor, that Cantacuzenus defigned to confine him to a monastery, to usurp the whole power, and transmit the fovereignty to his posterity, raised a diffidence between the two princes, which soon after broke out into an open war, Palæologus being on one hand affifted by Crales A war breaks king of Servia, and Alexander prince of Bulgaria; and Cantacuzenus on the other by out between the Orchanes the Turkish sultan. In a battle which was fought in Thrace, the young swo princes. emperor's army was utterly defeated, and he himself obliged to take refuge in Constantinople, all the other cities in Thrace having opened their gates to the conqueror. However, not long after, a peace was concluded between the two princes; which was

d no sooner signed, than Cantacuzenus, divesting himself, by a voluntary resignation, Cantacuzenus of all his power, retired to the monastery of Mangana, and there took the monastic resigns, and habit. But his son Matthew, whom he had some time before declared emperor, pur-nastic habit. Sued the war, and seized on several circles in Thrace, and among the rest on Adrianaste. fued the war, and feized on feveral cities in Thrace, and among the rest on Adrianople. Against him Palaologus marched in person; and having utterly deseated his army, tho' reinforced before the battle with five thousand Turks sent by Orchanes, obliged him to quit the field, and take refuge in one of his strong-holds; whence while he was making his escape at the approach of the emperor's army, he was seized by one Boienas, and delivered up to Palæologus, who, upon his renouncing all claim to the empire, restored him to his liberty 1.

DURING these civil commotions, the Turks, under the conduct of Solyman, the fon, or, as others will have it, the brother, of Orchanes, passed the Hellespont, and having seized on a strong castle called Coiridocustron, marched from thence against Gallipolis, which Solyman took, after having defeated the governor of the place, who came out with the garifon to offer him battle. Thus the Turks, after having reduced all Asia, first settled in Europe, where they have continued ever since. This happened The Turks first in the year 1357. Orchanes dying soon after, Amurath his son and successor pursued settled in Eu the conquests, which Solyman had begun; and having made himself master of several rope. strong-holds in Thrace, laid siege at length to Adrianople, which was forced to submit, They take the emperor not being in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy. Adrianople.

f Amurath, having in a short time mastered all Thrace, made Adrianople the seat of his empire in Europe, as the most proper place for the inlarging his dominions, and extending his conquests to Greece, and the neighbouring provinces. In the mean time Andronicus, the emperor's eldest son, having conspired against his father, was by his orders deprived of his fight, and kept under close confinement. Ducas the historian tells us, that Andronicus, and Cuntuzes Amurath's youngest son, having contracted an intimate friendship, conspired the death of their fathers, binding themselves by mutual oaths to live in amity and friendship, when the one should be emperor, and the other fultan. The same writer adds, that the conspiracy being discovered to

The emteror driven from the throne by his son, and rejiored.

Bajazet's conquests in Europe.

gus dies. Manuel.

Bajazet besieges Constantinople.

Defeats an army of 1 30,000 christians.

Amurath, he ordered his own fon's eyes to be pulled out, and required the emperor to 2 inflict the same punishment on his son, threatening him with a war, if he refused to The emperor, dreading the power of the fultan, caused the eyes both of his fon and grandson, who was yet an infant, to be pulled out, declaring at the same time his fecond fon Manuel his collegue in the empire. Andronicus however, after two years confinement, made his escape, being favoured therein by the Genoese of Galata, with whose affistance he made war upon his father; and being admitted into Constantinople, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor; and having got his father and two brothers, Manuel and Theodorus, into his power, he confined them to the fame prison in which he had been detained; but they having likewise, after two years, made their escape, Andronicus, dreading the calamities of a civil war, while b the Turks were ready to fall upon the few countries that were still left to the empire. restored his father and brother to the throne, who thereupon gave him Selymbria, and feveral other places in that neighbourhood m. In the mean time Amurath the Turkish fultan being treacherously slain, his son Bajazet succeeded him in his dominions; and purfuing the conquests which had been so successfully carried on by his predecessors in Europe, made himself mafter of Thessay, Macedon, Phocis, Peloponnesus, Mysia, and Bulgaria, driving out the defpots, or petty princes, who held those countries. Elated with his frequent victories, he began to look upon the Greek emperor, to whom nothing was now left but Constantinople, and the neighbouring country, as his vasfal, and accordingly fent him an arrogant and haughty message, requiring, or rather c commanding him to pay him a yearly tribute, and fend him his fon Manuel to attend him in his military expeditions. With this dishonourable demand the emperor was obliged to comply, being no-ways in a condition to oppose so powerful and formi-John Palzolo- dable an enemy. The unhappy prince died soon after, that is, in 1392, the thirtyfeventh of his reign, leaving no fon behind him but Manuel, the other two, Andronicus and Theodore, being dead fome time before. Manuel, who was then in Bajazet's court, hearing of his father's death, hastened to Constantinople, without taking his leave of the fultan, or acquainting him with the motives of his fudden departure; which Bajazet highly refenting, punished the officers who had suffered him to escape with the utmost severity; and passing with great expedition out of Bithynia, where d he then was, into Thrace, destroyed with fire and sword the country adjoining to Constantinople, and after having reduced the neighbouring towns, invested the imperial city itself both by sea and land. In this extremity Manuel had recourse to the western princes, who having raised an army 130,000 strong, sent it to his relief, under the conduct of Sigismund king of Hungary, and John count of Nevers. The western troops were at first attended with good success; for entering the countries lately subdued by the sultan, they recovered Widin, and several other places of great importance in Bulgaria, and invested Nicopolis. Hereupon Bajazet, raising the siege of Constantinople, marched, with all the forces he could assemble, to relieve the place. Upon his approach, Sigismund, leaving part of the army to pursue the siege, marched e with the relt to meet the enemy. Hereupon an engagement ensued, in which great numbers fell on both sides, and the victory continued long doubtful. At length, the French cavalry having difmounted to fight on foot, the rest of the army observing the horses without their riders, and concluding from thence they were all cut in pieces. began to give ground, and retire to their camp. This gave new courage and vigour to the enemy, who making an utmost effort, and charging the christians in their retreat with incredible fury, broke their ranks, and obliged them to fly in great confusion. The Turks pursued them to their camp, which they took, with all their baggage, and an incredible number of prisoners, among whom was the count of Nevers, and three hundred officers of distinction, who were all, except the count f himself, and five more, put to death in Bajazet's presence, after having been insulted by him in a most outrageous manner. As for Sigismund, he had the good luck to make his escape, and croffing the Danube in a small boat, to get safe to his own domi-This memorable battle, in which 20,000 christians were slain, and a far greater number taken prisoners, was fought in the second year of Manuel's reign, and 1393. of the christian æra n. After this victory, Bajazet returned to the siege of Constantinople; but finding the citizens determined to defend themselves to the last extremity, he applied to John the fon of Andronicus, to whom, as we have observed above,

a the emperor had yielded the town of Selymbria. With him he entered into a private agreement, in virtue of which Bajazet was to place him upon the throne, to which he had a just claim, as being the son of Manuel's elder brother. On the other hand, John was to yield the city of Constantino le to Bajazet, and remove the imperial seat to Peloponne us, which the fultan promised to relinquish to him and his posterity. This agreement being privately figned and tworn to by both parties, Bajazet dispatched deputies to the inhabitants of Constantinople, offering to withdraw his army, and abstain from all hostilities, provided they would drive out Manuel, and place his nephew John on the throne, to which he had an unquestionable right. This politic proposal rent the whole city into two factions, some favouring Manuel, and others b declaring for his nephew. Of this the emperor being apprifed, and apprehensive of the evils attending a civil discord at so critical a conjuncture, he acquainted his nephew, then in the Turkish camp, that, to deliver his subjects from the calamities under which they groaned, he was ready to relign the fovereignty to him, on condition he was allowed to depart with his wife and children, and to convey himself by sea to whatever place he should think fit. With this condition John readily complied, and Manuel resigns Manuel, having received him into the city, and conducted him to the palace, his nephero embarqued on board a galley, and let fail for Venice, where he landed, and from John. thence went to the feveral courts of the christian princes, to solicit aid against the overgrown power of the Turks, now become formidable to all Europe. He was everyc where received with the greatest demonstrations of esteem, and promised large supplies, all Christendom being alarmed at the late conquest of the infidels. In the mean time John being crowned with the usual solemnity, Bajazet took care to put him in mind of their agreement, and press him to a speedy execution of the main article, which was to yield Constantinople to him, and retire to Peloponnesus or Morea; but the citizens refusing, notwithstanding the unspeakable hardships they suffered, to comply with fuch a scandalous treaty, Bajazet renewed the siege, and assaulted the Constanticity with more fury than ever. When he had already reduced it to the utmost extremity, news was brought him, that Tamerlane, the victorious Tartar, after having by Bajazet; mity, news was brought him, that Tamerlane, the victorious Tartar, after having fubdued Perfia, and the more easterly provinces, had turned his arms against him, d and was preparing, with a numerous and formidable army, to break into Syria. Hereupon, alarmed at the danger that threatened him, he in great hafte raifed the fiege, and paffing the Hellespont, marched with the utmost expedition to Prusa, which he had appointed the place of the general rendezvous, both for his eaftern and western forces. From Prusa he advanced, at the head of a very numerous and well-disciplined army, to meet Tamerlane, who gave him a total overthrow in the plains of Angoria Who is overin Galatia, on the twenty-eighth of July 1401. cut most of his men in pieces; and come and taken having taken the fultan himself prisoner, to punish his excessive pride, cruelty, and prisoner by Taarrogance. Thus him up in an iron care, against which he is failed to have a decider. arrogance, shut him up in an iron cage, against which he is said to have dashed out his brains the year following, tho' fome ascribe his death to poison o, as we shall e relate more at length elsewhere. Manuel was no sooner informed of the overthrow and captivity of his inveterate enemy Bajazet, than he returned to Constantinople, where he was received with loud acclamations by the people, who being highly provoked against John for his servile compliance with the Turks, drove him from the throne, and restored Manuel, by whom he was banished to the island of Lesbos. This Manuel regreat overthrow of the Turks had like to have occasioned the total dissolution of their flored. empire both in Europe and Asia; for the five sons of Bajazet, taking arms against each other, a civil war was kindled, and continued with great fury for ten years together. Isa-Zelebis, Bajazet's third son, upon his father's death, caused himself to be proclaimed fultan; but was foon driven from the throne by his brother Solyman, as f was Solyman by his brother Musa. At length Mohammed, Bajazet's youngest son, having overcome all his competitors, was univerfally acknowledged fultan, and the sole monarch of the Turks. The emperor Manuel in the mean time, taking advantage of these intestine divisions, and siding sometimes with one of the competitors, and fometimes with another, recovered feveral provinces, which Mohammed, whom he had affisted against his brother  $Mu \int a$ , suffered him peaceably to enjoy till his death, which happened in 1424. the seventy-fifth year of his age, and thirty seventh of his Manuel dies; reign P. Some authors write, that he refigned the empire to his son John Palacologus five years before his death, and retiring to a monastery, took the monastic habit,

Confintia nople befreged by Amurath

The Malonica, andjeveral other places, taken by Amu-

John Hunniades's success against the Turks.

He is in the end routed by the Turks.

a yearly tribute to the sultan.

John Palacolo- with the name of Antony. Be that as it will, he was succeeded by his son John, in a whose reign Amurath II. the fon and successor of Mohammed, recovered all the provinces which had been feized after the death of Bajazet by the emperor, and the other christian princes. In the beginning of his reign he laid siege to Constantinople, being provoked against the emperor for espousing the cause of an impostor, who, pretend-11. who is forced ing to be Mustapha the fon of Bajazet, was acknowledged for sultan in all the provinces of the Turkish empire in Europe. The citizens defended themselves with great bravery; but being haraffed with continual affaults, must have in the end submitted, had not the emperor prevailed upon the prince of Caramania to countenance another Mustapha, Amurath's younger brother, who, having revolted in Asia, was, with the fupplies fent him by his new ally, enabled to lay siege to the city of Nice, which he b This obliged Amurath to raise the siege of Constantinople, and march foon reduced. with all his forces against the usurper, who was betrayed and delivered up to him by one Ilras, in whom he reposed great confidence. Amurath, having got him into his power, caused him to be immediately strangled with a bow-string; and then turning his arms against the prince of Caramania, obliged him to sue for peace; which the fultan granted him upon what terms he thought proper to prescribe. Having now no other enemies to contend with, he entered Macedon at the head of a powerful army, and having ravaged the country far and near, laid siege to Thessalonica, which he took, and plundered with the utmost cruelty, as he did most of the cities of Ætolia, Phocis, and Baotia. From Greece he marched into Servia, which country he foon c reduced; and then breaking into the dominions of the king of Hungary, besieged the strong city of Belgrade, which made a vigorous defence, no fewer than fifteen thousand Turks being slain by the christians in one fally; which obliged Amurath to drop the enterprize, and retire. In his retreat he was attacked by the celebrated John Hunniades, who cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest to shelter themselves under the walls of Sinderovia. Not long after, he gained a still more signal victory over the enemy in the plains of Transslvania, with the loss of no more than three thousand of his own men, whereas twenty thousand Turks were killed on the fpot, and almost an equal number in the pursuit. Amurath, who was then at Adrianople, fent another army into Transylvania, far more numerous than the two former; but they were attended with no better success, being cut off almost to a man by the d brave Hungarian. He gained over the Turks several other no less remarkable victories, and recovered all Bulgaria and Servia; but was in the end overcome and put to flight by Amurath, in the memorable battle of Varna, fought in the year 1444. the christians being disheartened by the death of Uladislaus king of Hungary, who, while he was attacking the enemy with more courage than prudence, was by them hemmed in on all fides, and cut in pieces. However, Hunniades having had the good luck to make his escape, and being appointed protector of the kingdom during the minority of Ladislaus, who was chosen king of Hungary in the room of Uladislaus, he raised a considerable army, and advancing to Cossova, engaged Amurath, who lay encamped The battle lasted three days, both armies retiring to their respective camps e when night approached, and renewing the fight early next morning. The two first days the christians had the advantage; but the third day, being quite tired out, and overpowered with numbers, Amurath charging them with fresh troops, they were, after a long and vigorous resistance, put to slight, and utterly routed. In this memorable battle, which was fought in 1448. thirty-four thousand Turks were slain, and eight thousand christians, with the flower of the Hungarian nobility. As for Hunniades, he made his escape into Servia, and from thence returned into Hungary 4. In the mean time John Palaologus, the Greek emperor, fearing the victorious sultan should turn his arms against him, sent embassadors to Adrianople, where Amurath then refided, with orders to conclude a peace upon any terms. The fultan received f them with great arrogance, declaring he would march directly to Constantinople, unless the emperor yielded to him some strong-holds, which he still possessed on the Euxine sea, and engaged to pay him a yearly tribute of three hundred thousand aspers. To these shameful terms the unhappy prince was obliged to submit, in order to enjoy the submits to pay poor remains of the Roman empire, now reduced to the imperial city, and the adjoining country. However, as he did not doubt but Amurath, as foon as he had put an end to the war, in which he was then engaged with George Castriot, surnamed Scanand derbeg, prince of Epirus, would, under some pretence or other, attempt Constantinople Itself, he applied to the western princes; and the more effectually to engage them in his cause, he promised to do all that lay in his power to reconcile the Greek and Latin churches. Accordingly, hearing a council was to be held at Ferrara, he went thither in person, attended by Joseph the patriarch, a great number of prelates, and the flower of the Greek nobility, who were all received at Venice, where they landed, and afterwards at Ferrara, with great pomp and magnificence. From Ferrara the council was removed foon after, by reason of a plague which broke out there, to Florence, where the union was effected between the two churches, and subscribed to Union of the by the patriarch, and the other prelates. The patriarch died soon after at Florence; Greek and b but the emperor, and the other prelates, returning by land at the pope's charge to Latin churches.

Venice, were conveyed from thence on the galleys of the republic to Constantinople. Upon his return, he found the people highly diffatisfied with his conduct, and that of the bishops, some of whom had refused to subscribe the decrees of the council, till the money was paid down, for which they had before-hand agreed to fign them. The disturbances which this union raised in the church, the death of the empress Despina, and the insupportable arrogance with which the unhappy prince was treated by the fultan, gave him fuch concern, that, being already broken with age, he funk under the weight of his calamities and misfortunes in 1448, the twenty-feventh of his John, the emreign, leaving the empire, now confined within the walls of Constantinople, to his bro- peror, dies. c ther Constantines. Amurath, the Turkish fultan, did not long survive him; but dying Constantine in the beginning of February 1450. was succeeded by his son Mohammed, who had no Palæoiogus. fooner taken poss ssion of the throne, than he caused all his brothers to be strangled, Mohammed and ordered his father's lawful wife (for he is faid to have been the ion of a concu-11. bine) to marry a flave, by name Isaac. In the beginning of his reign, he entered into an alliance with Constantine, the Greek emperor, who, upon the first news of his father's death, had fent embassadors to congratulate him upon his accession to the The embassadors were received very graciously, the new sultan declaring, that he had nothing fo much at heart as to live in peace and amity with the emperor, and the other christian princes. The embassadors of the Walachians, Lesbians,

d Bulgarians, Rhodians, Servians, &c. were likewise received in a most obliging manner; which encouraged them to celebrate with public rejoicings the accession of Mobasinmed to the throne, whom they looked upon as a friend to the christians, the more because his mother was of that religion, being, according to the most credible writers, the despot or prince of Servia's daughter. But notwithstanding the friendship and regard he pretended to have for the emperor, he had no fooner put an end to the war with Ibrahim, king of Caramania, who, upon the news of his father's death, had invaded his dominions in Asia, than he began to entertain thoughts of making himself master of Constantinople, and abolishing the very name of the Roman empire. With this view he built on the Europe side of the Bosporus a strong castle, called by the Turks He builds a e Genichicar, and by the Greeks Neocastrum, opposite to another in Asia called Aspo-fore on the castron, which he caused to be repaired, placing in both strong garisons. These two Bosporus. castles commanded the streights, and the former, being but five miles from Constantinople, proved a curb upon that city, and kept it in a manner blocked up. Mohammed had no fooner begun the work, than the emperor, and the citizens of Constantinople, alarmed at the undertaking, dispatched embassadors to the sultan, with orders with occasions to do all that lay in their power to divert him from it. But Mohammed was fo far a miguader from granting them their request, that the' the emperor even offered to pay him an standing beannual tribute, provided he put a flop to the work, he threatened, with the utmost the empror. arrogance, to cause such as should be sent to him upon the like errand to be slead

f alive. He added, that nothing beyond the ditches of the city belonged to Constantine, and that he had an unquestionable right to build in his own dominions what castles and forts he pleased. When the fort in the neighbourhood of Constantinople was finished, the garifon left there by the fultan began to ravage the country adjoining to the city, and making excursions to the very gates, returned to their strong-hold loaded with booty. This occasioned several skirmishes between the christians and Turks; in one of which a confiderable number of the latter being killed, the fultan, to revenge their death, ordered his men to fall upon the christians, while they were reaping their corn in the open fields, and put them all to the fword, which was done

Constantine christian

princes.

stantinople taken by the Turks.

Constanti-Disposition of the Turkish army.

accordingly. Hereupon the emperor, having caused the gates of the city to be shut, a ordered all the Turks within the walls to be arrested, but set them at liberty the next day, fending at the same time embassadors to Mohammed, with proposals for concluding a lasting peace between the two crowns. As the sultan seemed averse to an accommodation, and was assembling his forces from all parts, Constantine, well apprifed of his defign, in the first place took care to fill the public magazines, and supply the city with great plenty of all forts of provisions; then by his embassadors to the western princes, acquainted them with the designs of the sultan, and the storm that was gathering against the imperial city, the taking of which might prove satal to all Christendom. That they might the more readily assist him at so critical a conjuncture, he renewed the union of the two churches, and received with extraor- b dinary demonstrations of esteem and respect the pope's legate, which gave great offence to the ecclesiastics zealously attached to the ceremonies of their ancestors, and occasioned a misunderstanding between the prince and his people. Neither did the emperor's zeal, in confirming the union, procure him the least affistance from the Latins in the west, who, by a strange infatuation, suffered the city, which they looked upon as the bulwark of Christendom, to fall into the hands of the avowed enemy of the christian name, who, they well knew, would not stop there, but extend his conquests to the neighbouring and perhaps to the most distant kingdoms. While Constantine was foliciting aid from the western princes, Caracia, one of Mohammed's All the forts in chief commanders, reduced several places on the Euxine sea, which were still held by c the neighbour- the emperor, viz. Mesembria, Acheloum, Bison, &c. then advancing towards the city, took by affault a firong caffle called St. Stephen's tower, and put the garifon to the Other forts in that neighbourhood submitted at the approach of the enemy; but Selybria held out for fome time, the inhabitants defending the place with incredible bravery and resolution; but being in the end tired out with repeated assaults, the town was taken, and they all to a man cut in pieces. All the forts, castles, and throng-holds in the neighbourhood of the imperial city being thus reduced, Caracia was ordered to fcour the country during the winter, in order to prevent the inhabitants from receiving any supplies of men or provisions; by which means the city was in a manner blocked up by land. But as the Greeks were still masters at sea, d their galleys ravaged the coasts of Asia, and returned with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives, who were fold for flaves in Constantinople's.

In the mean time, Mohammed, having drawn together from all parts an army of three hundred thousand men, left Adrianople; and bending his march towards the nople befreged. imperial city, encamped before it on the fixth of April 1483, covering with his numerous forces the adjoining plains. His Afiatic troops were posted on the right towards the Bosporus; those of Europe on the left towards the haven; and he himself, with fifteen thousand janizaries, and other chosen troops, between both, over-against the gate named Karsias. On the other side the haven, Zoganus, one of his chief officers, encamped with a confiderable body of troops, in order to cut off all communication e between the city and country on that fide. At the same time Pantologes, the Turkifb admiral, appeared before the haven with a fleet of near three hundred fail; but the emperor had taken care to fecure the haven, in which were three large ships, twenty finall ones, and a good number of galleys, by means of a chain drawn cross the entrance from the city to Pera. Mohammed having thus affigned to each part of his army their feveral quarters, and furrounded the city both by fea and land, he began the fiege by planting batteries as near the city as he could, and raifing mounts in feveral places as high as the walls themselves; whence the besieged were incessantly galled with showers of arrows. He had in his camp a piece of ordnance of a prodigious fize, which carried, according to Ducas, a ball of an hundred pound weight, f made of hard black stone brought from the Euxine sea. It had been cast by an Hungarian engineer, who not meeting with the encouragement he expected from the emperor, had fled over to Mohammed, while he was busied in building the abovementioned forts. With this vast piece, the enemy made several breaches in the walls, which however were with great expedition repaired by the belieged, who behaved with incredible bravery and resolution, being encouraged by the example

John Justiniani of the emperor, and directed by John Justiniani, a Genoese adventurer, who arriving, commander in before the siege, with two large ships, and a considerable number of voluntiers on chief of the emperer's forces.

a board, had been by the emperor, on account of his extraordinary skill in military affairs, appointed commander in chief of all his forces; and belides, for his farther encouragement, promifed the fovereignty of the island of Leslos, provided he obliged the enemy to raise the siege. That brave commander, animated with the hopes of fo great a reward, performed exploits, fays our historian, tho' no-ways biaffed in favour of the Latins, worthy of the most renowned heroes of antiquity. Not fatiffied with repulfing the enemy in their frequent affaults, he often fallied out against them at the head of his voluntiers, overturned their machines, destroyed their works, and made fuch a dreadful havock of their best troops, that his name soon became formidable. But Mohammed, to carry on the fiege with more vigour, ordered new Mohammed's b levies to be made throughout his extensive dominions; which reinforcements arriv- army reining daily from all parts, his army was foon increased to the number of near four forced. hundred thousand men, while the garifon confisted only of nine thousand regular troops, viz. fix thousand Greeks, and three thousand Genoese and Venetians. As the enemy continued battering the walls night and day without intermission, great part of them, with the tower called Baclatina, near the Roman gate, was beaten down; but while the Turks were busied in filling up the ditch, in order to give the assault, the breach was repaired, and a new wall built. This threw the tyrant into a rage hardly to be expressed, which was greatly heightened, when he beheld from the shore his whole fleet worsted by five ships, four of which belonged to the Genoese The Turkish c of Galata, and one to the emperor: the latter was fraught with corn from Pelopon-fleet worfled nefus, and the others with all manner of provisions from the island of Chios, where the chrystans. they had passed the winter. When they first appeared, Mohammed ordered his admiral to take them, if possible, or at least to prevent their entering the harbour, and joining the rest of the fleet. Hereupon the whole Turkish navy, weighing anchor, failed out to meet them, covering the streights, as they were in all three hundred fail, from shore to shore. The above-mentioned ships pursued their course; and failing into the midst of the enemy's fleet, funk some of their galleys, disabled others, and made such a dreadful havock among them, that Mohammed, who beheld the whole from the shore, could not forbear rushing with his horse into the sea, as d if he intended to fwim to his fleet, and encourage them with his prefence. But being foon apprifed of the danger, he turned back, and filling the air with loud outcries, and dreadful curses, he tore his hair, and upbraiding his men with cowardice, uttered such menaces against the admiral, and his other officers, as struck all with terror who heard them. But notwithstanding his impotent rage, and the loud shouts of the whole Turkish army, encouraging their mariners to behave more manfully, the five ships opened themselves a way through the midst of the enemy's fleet, and, to the unexpressible joy of the christians, got safe into the harbour '. The Turks attempted feveral times to force the haven, in order to attack the city on that fide; but all their efforts proving unsuccessful, Mohammed formed, and, to the great e terror and amazement of the besieged, put in execution, one of the boldest designs we find mentioned in history. For, not being able to remove the chain drawn cross the entrance into the harbour, and the ships within it making a dreadful fire on the Turkish fleet as often as they drew near in order to break it, he commanded a large road to be levelled from the Bosporus behind Pera to the haven of Constantinople, and then, by means of certain engines, the contrivance of a renegado, conveyed Mohammed eighty galleys over land for the space of eight miles into the haven, of which he was conveys eighty no fooner mafter, the ships riding there being either taken or sunk, than he caused saileys over a bridge, a work no less wonderful and surprising, to be built over it with incredit haven. ble labour and expedition. By means of this bridge, which reached from the camp f of Zoganus at Pera to the walls of Constantinople, the city was laid open to an affault on that fide too. And now the place being invested, and battered night and day with incredible fury on all fides, the emperor, well apprifed he could not with his small garison hold our much longer against such a mighty fleet, and so numerous an army, fent deputies to Mobammed, offering to acknowledge himself his vasfal, by paying him yearly what tribute he should think proper to impose upon him, provided he raised the siege, and withdrew. The tyrant answered, that he was determined at all events to become master of the city; but if the emperor delivered ir up forthwith, he would yield to him Peloponnesus, and other provinces to his bro-

The emperor ditions offered

A mutiny in the Turkith camp.

Mohammed

Conft nine makes the neceijary preparations for fullaining the affau't.

thers, which they should peaceably enjoy as his friends and allies; whereas, if he a held out to the last extremity, and suffered it to be taken by assault, he would put him and the whole nobility to the fword, abandon the city to be plundered by his foldiers, and carry all the inhabitants, stripped of their wealth and effects, into captivity. The city was already reduced to great streights; but the emperor being rejetts the con- determined to perish with it, rather than give it up upon any terms whatsoever, the fiege was carried on with great vigour till the twenty-fifth of May, when a report being spread in the Turkish camp, that a mighty army was advancing full march to the relief of the city under the conduct of the celebrated John Hunniades, the common foldiers, feized with a panic, began to mutiny, and press Mohammed in a tumultuous manner to break up the siege; nay, they openly threatened him with b death, if he did not immediately abandon the enterprize, and retire from before the city, which they despaired of being able to reduce before the arrival of the supposed succours. Mobammed, tho' hitherto an utter stranger to sear, alarmed at the menaces of the incensed and ungovernable soldiery, was upon the point of yielding to the storm, and raising the siege, agreeable to the advice of the grand visier Haly, who favoured underhand the christians. But Zagan, a Turkish officer of great intrepidity, and an irreconcileable enemy to the christian name, having confirmed the fultan in his former resolution, advised him to give, without loss of time, a general affault; to which, he faid, the foldiery, however mutinous, would not be averse, provided he solemnly promised to abandon the city to be plundered by them. c As this advice best suited the humour of Mohammed, he readily embraced it, and caused a proclamation to be published throughout the camp, declaring, that he gave up to his foldiers all the wealth of that opulent city, and required nothing for his share but the empty houses. The desire of plunder, and the prospect of an immense booty, soon got the better of the fear, which had seized the army: they all demanded with one voice to be led immediately to the affault. Hereupon the prepares for a emperor was summoned for the last time to deliver up the city, with a promise of general florm. his life and liberty. To this summons the brave emperor answered, that he was unalterably determined either to defend the city, or fall with it. With this answer the messenger returned, and on the evening of the same day, which was Trinity funday, the twenty-feventh of May, the Turkish camp and fleet appeared illumi-d nated with an incredible number of lights fet up by the fultan's orders on every tent and vessel to admonish the whole army, that a solemn fast was to be observed the next, to implore the protection of heaven. Constantine, concluding from thence, as he had been privately informed beforehand by his friend Haly, that on the Tuesday following he should be attacked by sea and land, made the necessary preparations for sustaining the assault, his life, liberty, reputation, and whatever else was dear to him, lying at stake. He ordered in the first place a general procession, after which, in a pathetic and eloquent speech, he encouraged the nobility and citizens to exert themselves in the defence of the empire and the christian religion. He then retired to the church of St. Sopbia, attended by cardinal Isidore, and several e other prelates, who had conformed to the ceremonies of the Latins; and there, after assisting with exemplary piety at divine service, he received the holy eucharist. Zygomola, a modern writer, tells us, that Constantine, having first caused the empress and his children to receive the facrament, ordered immediately after their heads to be flruck off, to prevent their falling alive into the enemy's hands. But this we look upon as one of the many fables that are to be found in most of the modern Greek writers, it being manifest from Ducas, and other contemporary writers, that Theodora, Constantine's first wife, and Catharina Catalusa, his second, died long before, without his having children by them; and that the king of Georgia's daughter, who not long before had been betrothed to him, died before she came to Constantinople, f or was married to him. From the church Constantine repaired to the great palace, and there, after taking leave of his ministers, as if he were never to see them again, he ordered every man to his post, and, putting on his armour, marched in person at the head of a chosen body to the gate Karsia, where a considerable breach had been made by the piece of ordnance, which we have mentioned above. Here the emperor, and Justiniani his lieutenant-general, with 300 Genoese, and a select body of Greeks, lay all night on their arms, hearing a great noise in the Turkish camp, and expecting every moment to be attacked. Accordingly, at three in the morning, the attack was begun by fuch troops as the fultan least valued, and therefore, g deligning

The Turks begin the attack.

a defigning them for flaughter, had ordered them to march the first with no other view but to tire the christians, who, tho' few in number, made a dreadful havock of that disorderly multitude. After the carnage had lasted some hours, the janisfaries, and other fresh troops, advanced in good order, and renewed the attack with incredible vigour and sury. The christians, summoning all their courage and resolution, twice repulsed the enemy, but in the end being quite spent, and fresh troops pouring every moment in upon them, they were no longer able to flind their ground; so that the enemy in several places broke into the city. In the mean time, Justinian having received two wounds, one in the thigh, and the other in the hand, Justinian is he was so disheartened at the sight of his blood, that, abandoning his post, he caused mounded, and b himself to be conveyed to Galata, where he died soon after, not of his wounds, but of grief, in resecting on his cowardly and ignominious conduct. The Genoese and Greeks, who served under him, dismayed at the sudden retreat of their general, quitted their posts, and fled in the utmost consusion. However, the emperor, The emperor's attended by Theophilus Palæologus, Francis Comnenus, Demetrius Cantacuzenus, John gallant beha-of Dalmatia, and a few more of the most resolute among the nobility, itill k.pt

his post, striving with an unparallelled courage and intrepidity to oppose the inundation of the barbarians, who, like a violent ftorm, now broke in on all fides. Being in the end overpowered with numbers, and feeing all his friends lying dead on the ground around him, What! he cried aloud, is there no christian left alive to strike e off my bead? He had scarce uttered these words, when one of the enemy, not knowing him, gave him a deep cut cross the face with his sabre: at the same time dead on the ground. Thus died, in the forty-ninth year of his age, and tenth of his reign, Constantine XV. courageously defending that city which Constantine I. had founded. Some writers relate his death differently, and tell us, that being overpowered with numbers, and no longer able to stand his ground, he fled with the rest, and was stifled and pressed to death in the croud. But we have followed Ducas and Phranzes, of whom the latter was chancellor to Constantine, and in the city when it was taken; the former was in the neighbourhood during the whole d time of the siege, and, a few days after the city was taken, learnt both of the Turks and christians the particulars which he relates concerning that unhappy prince's death.

another coming behind him, with a blow on the back part of his head, laid him He is killed,

Ducas adds, that Mohammed, admiring his courage, commanded all the funeral honours to be paid him, that were due to an emperor . The emperor being thus flain, the few christians, who were left alive, betook themselves to slight, and the Turks, meeting with no further opposition, entered the city, and scouring the And the town streets, filled that once stately metropolis with blood and horror. They gave no taken and quarter, but put all they met to the fword, without distinction of fex, age, or con-plundered. dition. But of the unspeakable miseries the inhabitants suffered, during the three days which Mohammed had allowed his foldiers to plunder the city, the reader will find a minute and affecting account in Ducas, and other contemporary writers. Many thousands took refuge in the church of St. Sophia, but they were all massacred without pity in their afylum by the enraged barbarians, who, prompted by their natural cruelty, the desire of revenge, and the love of booty, spared no place nor person. Most of the nobility were by the sultan's orders cut off, and the rest reserved for purposes more grievous than death itself. However, many of the inhabitants, amongst whom were some men of great learning, found means to make their escape, while the Turks were busied in plundering the city. These embarquing on five ships then in the harbour, arrived fafe in Italy, where, with the study of the Greek tongue, they revived the liberal sciences, which had been long neglected in the west. When f the three days were expired, Mohammed commanded his soldiers, on pain of death, to forbear all further hostilities, and they put an end to the most cruel pillage and massacre mentioned in history. The next day he made his public and triumphal The total dissorting entry into the city; and chusing it for the seat of his empire, he solemnly promised Constanting. to take under his protection such of the inhabitants as should continue in it, or, being poliranRoman fled, should return to their ancient habitations, and even to allow them the free empire.

<sup>a</sup> Ducas, c. 39.

exercise of the christian religion. The death of the last Roman emperor, the loss of Constantinople, and the final diffolution of the Constantinopolitan Roman empire, happened on the twenty-ninth of May in the year of the Greeks 6961. of the Hegira 857.

and of the christian æra, according to the most probable opinion, 1453.

The downfal of a state, once so mighty and powerful, was not sudden, or unexpected, but brought on by degrees, and after a visible decay of several ages. To what causes that was owing, we have, on proper occasions, pointed out in the course of the present history; and therefore, not to trespass on the reader's patience with tedious repetitions, we shall only beg leave to remind him here, that we have all along confined ourselves to the immediate causes of so great a revolution, such as human policy may account for, not daring to pry into the decrees of Providence, nor ascribe, as some have done, the calamities that befal a nation, to the sins of those on whom they are insticted.

CHAP.

C H A P. XXXVII.

The history of the Carthaginians, to the destrution of Carthage by the Romans.

SECT. I.

A description of Carthage, and some account of the origin of that city.

WERE the materials afforded us by the antients for writing the history of Carthage, in any manner proportioned to the power and opulence of that famous republic, tew nations would make a greater figure in this work; but such has been the infelicity of this state, that notwithstanding the immense riches, the extended commerce, the consummate policy and military genius of its inhabitants, rendered it formidable to all its neighbours, and even enabled it to contend with Rome for the empire of the world, yet we have but very short and scanty memorials left us of the great transactions in which it was concerned. Scarce a fragment of any of its own historians has reached us: the principal actions in which it bore a part, that have escaped oblivion, have either been transmitted to posterity by its enemies, or such as b were favourably disposed towards them, and consequently many things omitted, which might have contributed towards giving us a juster idea of it. And yet, notwithstanding this, by collecting all the remarkable passages relating to it, scattered in the Greek and Roman authors; by comparing these together, and connecting them in a proper manner; and lastly, by making some observations of our own, in order to illustrate and explain them; we doubt not but to supply the defects of all former historians, and give the most complete, as well as the most entertaining, history of the Carthaginians, that has yet been offered to the public.

Carthage, the metropolis of Africa Propria for several centuries, was, according to Carthage, Velleius 2, built sixty-five years before Rome, the Trogus b and Justin will have it to when founded. c be seventy two years older than that mistress of the world. Livy c seems to place its foundation twenty years higher than these; and Solinus d exceeds him twenty-seven years. Timeus of Sicily intimates, that Carthage and Rome were sounded at the same time, viz. thirty-eight years before the first olympiad. Lastly, from Menander the Ephesian, as cited by Josephus (A), and the Tyrian annals, it appears to have preceded the Roman æra an hundred and forty years. We shall not take upon us to determine which of these is in the right, nor whether any of them deserves absolute credit; but only observe, that as Carthage & consisted of different parts, which were supposed to have been built at different times, it is no wonder, that the antients should

<sup>2</sup> Vell. Paterc. hist. Rom. I. i. <sup>b</sup> Just. hist. I. xviii. <sup>c</sup> Liv. hist. I. li. epit. <sup>d</sup> Solin. c. 29. <sup>e</sup> Timæus Sicul. apud Dionys. Halicatnas. I. i. <sup>f</sup> Menand. Ephes. apud Joeph. I. i. cont. Apion. <sup>g</sup> Petav. de doct. temp. I. ix. c. 69. & Boghart. de col. Phoen. I. i. c. 24.

(A) folephus, in his computation from Menander Ephefius (1), seems inconsistent with himself, or at least very inaccurate; but Peravius (2) has endeavoured to correct him, and makes him to fix Dislo's arrival in Africa an hundred and forty years before the foundation of Rome. Solinus (3) tallies very well with this account; for he tells us, that Carthage, at its final destruction by Scipio Africanus, had stood seven hundred and thirty-seven years. As therefore this destruction happened in the year of Rome six hundred and six, or six hundred and seven, it is evident, that, according to this author, Carthage was built an hundred and thirty, or an hundred and thirty-one years before Rome; and if, with Sir Isaac Newton (4) and Salmasius, we suppose Solinus intended the encania or dedication of the city for its beginning, and that it was nine years in building, Dido's arrival in Africa will be found to have happened an hundred and thirty-nine, or an hundred and forty years before the commencement of the Roman æra; which agreeing so well with Peravius, from whom it differs but two years, a triste in a point of so remote antiquity, we may justly look upon it as coming pretty near the truth.

(1) Menand. Ephef. apud Joseph. l. i. cont. Apion. (2) Dion. Petav. de doct. temp. l. ix. c. 69. (3) Solin. c. 27. (4) Salmaf. in Solin. c. 27. Newt. chronol. p. 65. Vol. VI. No. 9. 8 E hand hand down such a variety of accounts, nor that the moderns should disagree so a much amongst themselves in this affair. It is not very material to our present purpose, whether we can hit upon the precise year of this city's foundation, or not; and therefore we shall not be over solicitous about it. However, it may not be amiss to refer our curious readers to Petavius, who has been very particular on this subject. That learned man, after confidering the jarring opinions of the antients with great attention, endeavours to rectify their mistakes, and at last, with an appearance of exactness, fixes the time of Dido's beginning to build Carthage an hundred thirtyfeven years before the foundation of Rome, if, with Varro, we place this in the third year of the fixth olympiad, or an hundred forty-two, if, with archbishop Usher, we prefer the account of Fabius Pictor (B), who will have it to be near the beginning b of the eighth olympiad, and, for aught we know to the contrary, comes as near the truth as any other chronologer whatfoever.

The Carthagi-

But whatever difagreement may be found amongst historians and chronologers as nians descended to the exact year of the foundation of Carthage, yet it is agreed on all hands, that from the Phoe- the Phanicians were its founders. The Greek poet Nonnus, from some authors, whose works are now lost, affures us, that Cadmus made a very successful expedition into these parts. Eusebius m and Procopius are positive, that the Canaanites who sed from Joshua retired hither; and St. Austin would have it believed, that the Carthaginians were descended from these Canaanites. Philistus of Syracuse, a writer of good authority, who lived above three hundred and fifty years before Christ, relates, c that the first traces of Carthage were owing to Zorus and Charchedon, two Tyrians or Phanicians, thirty years before the destruction of Troy, according to Eusebius. Appian P, who undoubtedly received his notion from Philistus, attributes this event to Zorus and Charchedon, the two said Phanicians, fifty years before that period; and from him Scaliger 9 corrects Eusebius's numbers. In confirmation of which opinion, Virgil + feems to hint, that Dido was rather the finisher than founder of this city, by giving us to understand, that the ground on which it stood was, before her time, occupied by people who dwelt in huts or cottages, or, in other words, that a town stood upon it. What likewise renders the account of Philistus and Appian not a little probable, is, that the Greeks always called this city Charchedon, for which no reason so proper d can be affigned, as that the person who first settled with a colony on this spot of ground, was called by that name. Besides, something must have determined Dido to chuse this particular place for her Tyrians before any other s. Now, no more likely motive can be conceived, than that it had been inhabited for some time by the Phanicians, who were her countrymen, and from whom therefore she had reason to expect the kindest and most friendly reception. Add to this, that both the coast of Africa, and the coast of Spain' opposite to it, were known in very early ages to the Tyrians; since it is remarked by Velleius ", that they built the cities of Cadiz in Spain, and Utica in Africa, a little above eighty years after the Trojan war; and Strabo declares, that the Phanicians were possessed of the best parts of Spain and Africa a considerable time before the age of Homer: all which considerations strongly support the first Phanician settlement mentioned by Philistus and Appian. But as nothing can be laid down with certainty concerning the transactions of those very remote times, except what is deducible from the inspired writings of the old testament, and as nothing is less to be depended upon, than the relations we have of the origin of many antient cities, we leave it to our readers to believe as much or as little of this as they please.

How-

PETAV. ubi supra, & de doct. temp. l. xiii. p. 370. edit. Antwerp. 1703. & l. xiii. Petav. ration. tempor. l. ii. c. 13.

M. Onuph. Panvin. in ant. urb. imag. Uss. an. p. 87.

Nonn. in Dionys. l. xiii. M. Euseb. in chron. l. i. p. 11. Procop. de bell. Vand. l. ii. c. 10.

M. August. in exposit. epist. ad Rom. sub init. Philist. Syracusan. apud Euseb. in chron. ad ann. 804. Philist. Serv. in loc. sub init.

Gold Car. Rues not. in Virg. Æn. iv. sub init. Procop. ubi supra.

Total Car. Rues not. in Virg. Æn. iv. sub init. Procop. ubi supra.

Total Car. Rues not. in Paras l. i. c. 2 Vide etiam Car. Ruei not. in Virg. Æn. iv. sub init. edit. Casaub. 1587.

Vell. Paterc. l. i. c. 2. edit. Casaub. 1587.

(B) This Fabius Pictor was the most antient of the Roman historians (5), and a writer of very good authority. He is followed herein by Onuphrius Pan-vinius (6), as well as archbishop Usher. Several arguments might be offered in support of his authority, particularly with regard to the point under confideration; but we chuse to refer our readers to archbishop Usher (7), Vossius, &c. as not having room to recite them here.

<sup>(5)</sup> Liv. l. i. ii. &c. Dio. Hal. l. i. User. an. p. 60. ad ann. Jul. per. 3966. Voss. de hist. Grac. l. iv. c. 13. &c. (6) Onuph. Panvin. antiq. urb. imag. apud Gravium in thesaur. ant. Rom. tom. 3. p. 215. Petav. de dost. temp. l. ix. c. 51. (7) User. an. ubi supra. Voss. de hist. Grac. & Petav. ubi supra

However, if most of the events, mentioned by profane historians as happening Elifa either before the destruction of Troy, may seem liable to dispute to some persons of a critical founded or inexactness, it cannot well be denied, as being the concurrent voice of antiquity, that of Carthage. Elisa w, called also Dido, sister of Pygmalion king of Tyre, slying with her brother Barca, in the seventh year of the reign of that prince, from Tyre, fixed her residence at Cartbage, and either founded, or much inlarged, this noble city. Were there any beginnings of a town there before, yet it could not have been a place of very great confideration till her arrival. The wealth of her husband \* Sichaus, and the Tyrians the brought with her, who, at that time, were the y most polite and ingenious people in the world, enabled her to inlarge and beautify the place, if she did not lay the b foundations of it; to wall it round, and build a strong citadel in it; to lay the basis of a most sourishing and extensive commerce, for which the Tyrian nation was so renowned; and to introduce a form of government, which seemed, in Aristotle's 2 opinion, by his descanting so largely upon it, to have been one of the most perfect that ever was known in the world, at least, in his time. Dido's arrival in Africa, as we have observed, was an hundred thirty-seven years before the building of Rome, according to the Varronian account; an hundred forty-two, according to Fabius Pillor; an hundred and fourteen before the first olympiad; eight hundred eightynine, or eight hundred and ninety before the birth of Christ, and near three hundred after the destruction of Troy, unless, with Sir Isaac Newton, we will suppose the c antient chronologers to have anticipated that destruction near three hundred years. Virgil indeed seems to have allowed this supposition; for notwithstanding what has been advanced by feveral learned men b to excuse him on that head, had he been of the common opinion, the monstrous anathronism he makes, by bringing  $\cancel{E}$  neas and Didotogether as cotemporaries, would have been utterly inexcuseable. We shall hereafter give a full and ample account of the occasion and manner of Dido's slight from Tyre, of her putting into the island of Cyprus, and steering afterwards her course for the coasts of Africa, where she happily arrived; so that it will be intirely unnecesfary, even so much as to touch upon these particulars in this place .

How this city came to be called Carthage, authors are not fully agreed. Solinus d Name whence d tells us, that its true name was Carthada, which, in the Carthaginian language, figni-derived. fied the New City; and herein he is followed by Salmasiuse, Schindler, Bochart &, and others, who deduce it from the two Oriental words, Charta Hadatta, which are of the same import. But, besides that it is too far fetched and unnatural, these very authors themselves supply us with arguments to overthrow this etymon; for Schindler h derives Carthago from the Oriental word Charta, a city; and the other two i allow, that the city was founded long before Dido came into Africa, and that she only built that part of it called Byrsa, or the citadel. Dr. Hyde k derives it either from Chadre Hanacha, i. e. The chamber of rest, or place of repose, or from Card Haneca, the New City, as before, because Plautus in his Panulus intimates, that it was called by the e natives Chaedreanech; but these derivations likewise are too forced and unsatisfactory, and are besides overthrown by Bochart. Servius m therefore seems to come nearer the truth, when he fays, that, according to the Carthaginians themselves, who must be supposed to be the best acquainted with their own origin, it received its name from Charta, a town not far from Tyre, to which Dido bore a near relation; and this town is called by Cedrenus " Chartica, or Chartaca, i. e. Charta Aca, or Charta Aco, the city of Aca or Aco, a celebrated sea-port of Phanice (C), near Tyre and Sidon, in the territory of the tribe of Asher P, tho' possessed by the a Tyrians or Pha-

w Just. l. xviii. Virgil. Æn. i. & Ser.: in loc. Cedren. in hist. compend. p. 140. edit. Paris. 1647. Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 415, 416, &c. x Virg. Just. &c. ubi supra. y Newt. chron. p. 13. Boch, phal. & de col. Phoen. passim. 1 Kings, c. v. &c. 2 Arist. de rep. l. ii. c. 11. Newt. chron. p. 32, 65, &c. b Ludovic. de la Cerda, Car. Ruæus. Macrob. alique. Cunivers. hist. vol. i. p. 415, 416. d Solin. c. 27. c Salmas. in Solin. p. 322. f Schind. pentaglot. p. 1654. Bochart. de col. Phoen. l. i. c. 24. &c. b Schind. ubi supra. Salmas. & Bochart. ubi supra. P. 415, 416. d Solin. c. 27.

B Bochart. de col. Phœn. l. i. c. 24. &c.

B Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 1.

Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 1. * HYDE in not. ad Peritsol. p. 44.

BOCHART. Chan.l. i. c. 1.

* Serv. in Virg. Æn. i. ver. 37.

E Æn. iv. ver. 75.

CEDREN. hist. compend. p. 140. edit. Par. 1647.

Serv. in Virg. Æn. i. ver. 37.

sup>m</sup> Serv. in Virg. Æn. i. ver. 37.
Sehind. pentaglot. p. 1313.

(C) The place was, according to Cedrenus, a maritime city or sea-port, as will appear from a perusal of the passage referred to; which is an additional argument in savour of our notion. We find likewise a city, called Kartah, given to the Levites in this country, taken out of the territory of the tribe of Zebulun.

nicians.

nicians. In support of Servius and Cedrenus's authority, it may be observed, that the sidonians, Tyrians and Canaanites inhabiting that part of Phanice, frequently prefixed the word kiriath, cariath, or charta, i. e. city, to the proper names of towns, as Kiriath, or, according to St. Jerom, Cariath-Arba, Cariath-Baal, Cariath-Sanna, Cariath-Sepher, &c. tho' sometimes they styled them simply Cariath, or Charta, city, and, for the most part in writing, used their proper names alone; so that it is no wonder the town under consideration should be known by the names Charta, Aca, Aco, Chartica, Chartaca, Cartaco, &c. since this was perfectly agreeable to the genius of its inhabitants. Farther, tho' Dido's city was constantly called by the Latin writers Carthago, yet its true name amongst the antient Romans, who undoubtedly received it from the Carthaginians themselves, was Cartaco, as is evident from the coblumna rostrata (D) of Duilius. This, together with what has been wobserved in the first

<sup>1</sup> Jud. i. ver. 10. Josh. xviii. ver. 14. xv. ver. 15, 49. <sup>2</sup> Jerem. xlviii. ver. 24, 41. Am. xi. ver. 2. <sup>3</sup> Josh. xv. ver. 9, 60, &c. <sup>3</sup> Vide Pet. Clacconium in column. rostrat. Duil. apud Joan. Geor. Grav. in thesaur. antiquit. Roman. tom. iv. p. 1810. Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 415, 416.

(D) We have before given an English translation (8) of the old Latin inscription upon the basis of the columna rostrata of Duilius; but as it is a most curious and valuable monument of antiquity, we believe our learned and inquisitive readers would think us guilty of a great omission, were not the original itself inscreed immewhere in this work; especially as many fine conclusions relating to the Latin language may be drawn from it; and the surprising manner in which that language was polifhed and refined in lefs than two centuries, may be from thence discovered. In order therefore to render our history as complete as possible, and evince the point at present in view, we shall here present our readers with the inscription itself, and the chasms of it, as supplied by Lipsius and Ciaccenius, together with a version of it into the Latin of the Augustan age:

C. BILIOS. M. F. COS. ADVORSOM. CARTACINIENSEIS. EN. SICELIAD REM. CERENS. ECEST. ANO S. COCNATOS. POPLI. ROMANI. ARTISUMAD OBSEDEONED. XEMET. LECION. EIS. CARTACINIENSEIS. OMNEIS. MAXIMOSQUE. MACISTRATOS. LUGAES. BOVEBOS. RELICTEIS. NOVEM. CASTREIS. EXFOCIONT. MACELAM. MOENITAM. URBEM. PUGNANDOD. CEPET. EN QUE. EODEM. MACESTRATOD. PROSPERE REM. MAYEBOS. MARID. CONSOL. PRIMOS. CESET. RESMECOSQUE CLASESQUE. NAVALES. PRIMOS. ORNAVET. FARAVETQUE. DIEBOS. LX QUM QUE. EIS NAVAUS. CLASEIS. POENICAS. OMNIS. PARATASQUE. SUMAS. COPRAS. CARTACINIENSIS. PRESSINTED. MAXUMOD. DICTATORED. OLOROM. IN. ALTQD. MARID. PUGNANDOD. VICET XXXCUE. NAVEIS. CEPET. CUM. SOCIEIS. SEPTEMRESMOMQUE. DUCIS QUINRESMOSQUE. TRIRISMOSQUE. NAVEIS. XX. DEPRESET AURO M. CAPTOM. NUMBEI OCO DCC

ARCENTON, CAPTON, PRADA, NUMEL COCIDDO COCIDO PONDOD TRIOMPO O U.P. NAVALED, PREDAD. POFLOM. ROMANOM. DONAVET DAPTIVOS. CARTACINIENSEIS. INCERVOS. DUXET. ANTE. CUROM PRIMOS QUE. CONSOL. DE. SICELEIS. CLASEQUE. CARTACINIENSEOM TRIOMPAVET. EAROM. REROM. ERCO. S. P. Q. R. EL HANCE. COLUMNAM. P.

Caius Duilius Marci filius Consul adversus Carthaginienses in Sicilia rem gerens, Egestanos (socios atque) cognatos populi Romani artissima obsidione exemit. Legiones (enim) omnes Carthaginicnsum (qui Egestam obsidebant, & Amilcar) maximus (eorum) magistratus (sestinandi studio) elephansis relictis novem, castris essugerunt. Macellam (deiude) munitam (validam que) urbem pugnando cepit. Atque in eodem magistratu prospere rem navibus mari Consul primus gessit: remiges classesque navales primus ornavit atque paravit aiebus sexaginta. & cum his navibus, classes Punicas omnes, paratas (ornatas) que summas copias Carthaginiensium, trajente (Annibale) maximo dictatore illorum, in alto mari pugnando superavit; trigintaque naves cum sociis (hoc est cum ipsis hominibus) cepit, & septiremem pratoriam, quinqueremes (praterea) ac triremes naves xx depressit.

Aurum captum in prada nummi III. M. DCC.

Argentum captum in prada nummi c. M.

Æs grave captum vicies semel centena millia pondo, atque in triumpho navali predam (omnem in erarium) Popul. Rom. intulit.

captivos (etiam) Carthaginienses ingenuos (hoc est, nobiles aliquot) ante currum duxit:
primusque Consul, de Siculis, & classe Carthaginienssum triumphavit. Earum rerum ergo S.P. ② R. ei hancce columnam posuit.
vel
triumphavit. Earum rerum ergo Marti donum dedit atque dicavit (9).

Hence it is apparent, that, when this naval trophy was erected, the Carthaginians were called by the Romans CARTACINIENSEIS; and consequently the name of their city, then in use amongst the Romans, was CARTACO.

(8) Univers hist. vol. iv. p. 659, 660. in not. Grav. in thesaur. antiq. Rom. tom. iv. p. 1810.

(9) Vide Petr. Ciaccon. Tolet, in column, roft. Duil. apud

volu me

a volume of this history, seems to render the authority above-mentioned incontest:

THAT it was usual in those early ages to denominate some cities from others, as well as from their founders, is a truth well known to all perfons moderately versed in the knowledge of antiquity; and the city of Thebes in Baotia (E), so called from Thebes in Egypt; Pisa in Italy, from Pisa in Peloponnesus; Salamis in Cyprus, from Salamis in Attica, to omit several others that might be mentioned, are sufficient instances of it.

Salmafius will have the Greek name Charchedon to be derived from Solinus's Carthada; because the Sicilians now-and-then used the Greek letter chi for theta. But fure nothing can be more weak than this; besides, were it much more plausible, it b could not be admitted, because it clashes with the authority of Philistus (F), Appian, Eusebius, and St. Jerom. Herodotus, Menander Ephesius, Polybius, &c. the most antient Greek authors, mentioning the Carthaginians, likewife disprove it, because they were

THE Carthaginians were called by the Greeks, fometimes Libyans, on account of the country they possessed, and sometimes Phanicians, on account of the country from whence they were originally descended. The Romans also styled them Pani, or Phanicians, for the same reason; and every thing belonging to them, or their city, Punic or Panic, i. e. Phanician, or belonging to the Phanicians.

We must not omit observing, that, according to Stephanus Y and Eustathius, this Caccabethe c city was antiently named, in Punic, Caccabe, from a horse's head, which was found Carthage. by the Tyrians, whilst they were digging for the foundations of Byrsa. This was looked upon as a happy omen, portending the martial disposition of the inhabitants, and the future greatness of the city. Our readers will find the whole story in Virgil z and Justin, and to these authors we refer them. In the mean time we shall only remark, that the learned Bochart a has shewn the word Caccabe to have signified, in the Phanician language, the head of the animal above-mentioned; and that, upon account of this event, the Carthaginians b had frequently upon the reverses of their coins, either a horse's head, or the body of a horse dimidiated, or a horse intire, with Victory upon him. Most of these coins have likewise a Punic inscription upon d their said reverses, with several other symbols; as is evident from Agostini, Paruta, and others, as well as from the cabinets of the curious.

In order to avoid all future digressions on this head, we shall here give a faithful and particular account of the fituation, dimensions, different parts, and power of the city of Carthage, according to the condition it was in at the beginning of the third Punic war, extracted from Polybius c, Strabo, Diodorus, Appian, and other antient authors of the best reputation and authority.

Carthage stood at the bottom of a gulf, upon a peninsula three hundred and sixty Description of stadia, or forty-five miles, in circumference, the isthmus joining this peninsula to the Carthage. continent of Africa, being twenty-five stadia, or three miles and a furlong, in breadth.

e On the west side there projected from it a long tract of land, in shape resembling a tongue, half a stadium broad; which shooting out into the sea, separated it from a lake or morafs, and was strongly fortified on all sides by rocks, and a single wall. In the middle of the city stood the fortress or citadel, erected by Dido, called Byrsa, having on the top of it a temple facred to Æsculapius, seated on a very high hill, upon rocks, and to which the ascent was by fixty steps. This temple was rich, beautiful, and of a confiderable extent; fo that when Byrsa was taken by Scipio towards the close of the last siege of Carthage, nine hundred Roman deserters fortified them-

* Salmas ubi supra.

7 Steph. Byz. de urb. Eustath. in Dionys. Afr.

2 Virg. Æn. i.

Just. l. xviii. Serv. & Ludovic. de la Cerda in Æn. i. Coel. Rhodigin. l. xviii. c. 38.

Bochart.
de col. Phoen. l. i. c. 24.

Ant. August. dial. vi. ant.

C Polyb. l. i. c. 73.

Strab. l. xviii. p. 572. de col. Phœn. l. i. c. 24.

ANT. AUGUST. dial. vi. ant.

Polyb. l. i. c. 73. Strab Applan. in Libyc. p. 129.
Diodor. Sic. bibl. hift. l. iii. p. 178. Oros. l. iv. c. 22. p. 277.

(E) It is plain from feripture (9), that there was a town of this name likewise in Phanice, or the land of Canaan, not far from Shechem; so that whether we look upon Cadmus as a Phoenician or an Egyptian, it can scarce be doubted, but that Thebes in Baotia was so denominated from some more antient city.

(F) All these authors are clearly of opinion, that Carthage was built a confiderable time before Dido

came into Africa; and therefore, if their authority be of any weight, it is highly improbable, that from the citadel Byrsa only, the addition she made to the old city, the place was called Carthada, or the New city; and if this be allowed, it must likewife be admitted, that Salmafius endeavours abfurdly to deduce Carchedon from Carthada.

(9) Jud. c. ix. ver. 50, 53. 8 F

selves there. At last Asdrubal's wife setting fire to it, intirely consumed it, together a with herself, her children, and the said nine hundred deserters, to avoid falling into the hands of Scipio. On the fouth fide, towards the continent, where Byrsa had its fituation, the city was furrounded with a triple wall, thirty cubits high, abstracted from the parapets and towers, with which it was flanked all round at equal diffances, each interval being fourfcore fathoms, or four hundred and eighty foot. Every tower had its foundations funk thirty foot deep, and was four stories high, tho' the walls were but two; they were arched, and in the lower part, corresponding in depth with the foundations above-mentioned, were stalls, large enough to hold three hundred elephants, with their fodder, &c. Over these were stables for four thousand horses, and lofts for their food. There likewise was room enough to lodge twenty thousand b foot, and four thousand horse. Such a number of forces and beafts of war were contained within the walls, without in the least incommoding the inhabitants. The walls were weak and low in one part only, and that was an angle, which, from the first building of the city, had been neglected, beginning at the long tract of land advancing into the fea towards the western continent, before taken notice of, and extending as far as the harbours, which were on the same side. Of these there were two, which were disposed in such a manner, as to have a communication with one another, and had one common entrance, seventy foot broad, and shut up with chains. The first was appropriated to the merchants, and included in it a vast number of places of refreshment, and all kinds of accommodations for the seamen. The second, c or inner port, was, as well as the island called Cothon in the midst of it, lined with large keys, in which were distinct receptacles for securing and sheltering from the weather two hundred and twenty ships, it being designed chiefly for ships of war. Over these were magazines or store houses, wherein was lodged whatever is necessary for the arming and equipping of fleets. The entrance into each of these receptacles was adorned with two marble pillars of the Ionic order; fo that both the harbour and the island represented on each side two magnificent galleries. Upon the island was the admiral's palace, from whence orders were given, and proclamations issued out; and as it stood opposite to the mouth of the harbour, he could from thence discover whatever was doing at sea, tho' no one there could see what was transacting in d the inward part of the harbour; nay, the merchants themselves, when they entered into their port, had no prospect of the men of war, being separated from them by a double wall, and each port having its particular gate that led to the city, without paffing through the other.

Of how many parts the city consisted. Hence it is apparent, that the city confished of three parts, Byrsa, Megara (G), or Magaria, and Cothon. Byrsa, according to Servius 4, was twenty-two stadia, or near three English miles, in circumference; tho' Eutropius says, it did not much exceed two thousand paces, which is not quite two English miles. It was not so precisely in the middle of the city, but that it inclined to the fouth, or isthmus that joined Carthage to the continent, as is observed by Appian e. The word Byrsa is only a Greek e corruption of the true Punic or Phanician name Busra, Bosra, or Bossra, (for it may be pronounced all these ways) i. e. a fortress or citadel, as has been demonstrated by Scaliger s. Bochart, and others, versed in the oriental languages, and may be inferred from Strabo, Virgil, and Appian, the sable of the ox's hide having long since been exploded by the learned. This was justly looked upon as the interior part of Carthage, surrounded by the Megara e, or Magaria, i. e. the houses, or town, (for that the word imports in the Phanician tongue) its exterior part, according to Servius; so that together they formed a kind of double town. Strabo calls the small island in the midst of the second harbour, Cothon s; tho' Appian applies this name likewise to that port or harbour itself, which, if this writer is to be credited, was environed by a strong f wall, and had one of its parts round, but the other quadrangular. The word Cothon

d Serv. in Æn. i. ver. 320. Eutrop. & Bochart. ubi supra. e Appian. & Bochart. ubi supra. f Scalig. in not. ad Fest. Bochart. ubi supra. Salmas. in Solin. &c. s Serv. in Æn. i. & iv. b Strab. l. xvii. p. 572. i Appian. in Libyc. p. 129, &c.

(G) The true name of the exterior part of Carthage (or that which was, properly speaking, the town) was Megara or Magaria, not Magalia, as a is of oriental extraction, and fignifies a port not formed by nature 1, but the effect of labour and art; so that this seems to have been not a proper, but a common name amongst the Carthagirians, who undoubtedly pronounced it Kathum or Kathom; but the Greeks, adopting it into their own language, gave it a Greek termination, and expressing the Phanician A by their great O, (which may easily be conceived) thence came the name Cothon. The Carthaginians were so extremely active and indefatigable, that when Scipio m had blocked up the old port, or Cothon, they, in a very short time, built a new one, the traces of which, scarce an hundred yards square, are still to be seen a. This Cothon was perhaps the same that was called the Mandracium o in the time of Procopius.

<sup>(10)</sup> Appian. & Serv. ubi supra. Isidor, in orig. l. xiii. c. 12. Vide etiam Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24.

THE number of inhabitants this city contained at the beginning of the third Punic Number of inwar, was seven hundred thousand; a prodigious number, considering the many ter-habitants. rible blows the Carthaginians had received from the Romans during the course of the first and second Punic wars, as well as from their own mercenaries in the interval betwixt these wars, and the destructive broils they had been engaged in with Masinissa. The forces they could bring into the field, as well as their power by sea, when they had a mind to exert themselves in an extraordinary manner, were very formidable, as appears from the army commanded by Hamilear in his expedition against Gelon the tyrant of Syracule, which consisted of three hundred thousand men; and the fleet, forwarding the operations of the land forces, which was composed of more c than two thousand ships of war, and above three thousand transports. Their riches were likewise immense, as may be collected from what Scipio carried off at the final destruction of the town, after it had been thoroughly plundered, and, as was imagined, intirely exhausted and consumed, viz. near a million and a half sterling. All which may ferve to give us fome faint idea of what Carthage was, when in the height of its grandeur and magnificence.

As to the extent of the city, Livy informs us, that it was twenty-three ? miles round; The extent of and if what is related of it above be true, this is not improbable. Pliny q intimates, Carthage.

that Carthage, when in the hands of the Phanicians, was much larger than when it was a Roman colony; and Suidas affirms, that it was the greatest and most powerful d city in the world. The dominion of the sea, which it enjoyed for six hundred years, almost without interruption, together with the genius of its citizens for commerce, aggrandized it in a most prodigious manner; to which if we add its excellent form of government, which will be explained more fully hereafter, its extensive trade, the mines of Spain, &c. those inexhaustible sources of wealth; it can be no matter of wonder, that the Carthaginians should have arrived at such an exalted pitch of power. One particular edifice, hitherto omitted in our description of Caribage, it may not be improper to take notice of, viz. the temple of Apollo , flanding near the Cothon, wherein was a statue of that deity of massive gold, and whose inside was all covered with plates of the same metal, weighing a thousand talents s. But this was involved e in the common destruction of the city, being pillaged and destroyed by a party of Scipio's men, when the Cothon and adjacent part of the city were taken by that general.

It has been 'observed by a curious and learned modern traveller, who was him- Present reself upon the spot, that the greatest part of Carthage was built upon three hills, mains of ansomewhat inferior in elevation to those upon which Rome was erected. All the remains tient Carthage. of this once famous city are, according to this traveller, the area of a spacious room upon one of those hills, overlooking the fouth-east shore, with several smaller ones hard by it; the common fewers, which time hath not in the least injured or impaired; and the cifterns, which have very little submitted to the general ruins of the city. f The harbour is now stopped up, and, by the north-east winds with the (H) Mejerdab, made almost as far distant from the sea as Utica, tho' it is still called El-Mersa, or the port, lying to the north and north-west of the city, and formeth, with the lake of Tunis, the peninfula on which Carthage stood.

<sup>1</sup> Fest. in voc. cothones. Serv. in Æn. i. Bochart. ubi supra. Buxtorf. in voc. DDD &c. epit.

* Shaw's geographical observations relating to the kingdom of Tunis, p. 150, 151.

l. i. c. 20.

* P. Liv. I. li. epit.

 Liv. l. li. PROCOP. <sup>6</sup> Idem ibid. * Shaw ubi supra.

(H) This river, the Bagrada of the antients, will be described in the next chapter.

Vast extent of

Strabo " observes, that the Carthaginians possessed three hundred cities in Africa 2 the Carthaginian dominions. before the beginning of the third Punic war; which may easily be believed, if we consider, that the dominions of this state in Africa before that war, extended from the western confines of Cyrenaica w, to the pillars of Hercules, or streights of Gibraltar (I), a tract of land near fifteen hundred miles in length. When it was arrived at its last period of perfection, the best part of Spain, even as far as the Pyrenees, of Sicily, and all the islands in the Mediterranean to the west of this latter, were subject to it. How it came to make fuch large acquisitions, and by what steps it grew so formidable, as to dispute the empire of the world with Rome itself, will appear in the sequel of this history.

> " STRAB. 1. XVII. w SCYLAX CARYAND. Vide & BOCHART. ubi supra, &c.

(I) The distance betwixt the Philanorum Ara and pillars of Hercules, according to Polybius (11), was fixteen thousand stadia, or about two thousand miles. But from Dr. Shaw's most accurate observations, it appears to have been one thousand four hundred and twenty geographical miles, fixty of which make a degree of a great circle. The particulars of this computation may be feen in the following table:

	Miles.
From Tingi, or Tangier, to the river Malva, or Mullooiah -	200
To the eastern part of the river Chinalaph, or Shelliff	220
To the river Amplaga, or city of Cirta	165
To Laribus by Theveste, or Tiffesh	130
To Carthage — — — — —	70
To Kairwan, olim Vicus Augusti — — — — —	75
To Tacape in the Lesser Syrsis	110
To Tripolis — — — — —	135
To Leptis Magna, or Libda, in the Greater Syrtis	115
To the bottom of the Greater Syriis, now called the gulf of Seedra, where the Philenorum Are are supposed to have been situated	200
In all	1420

Hence it is evident, that Polybius makes this track to have been of a greater extent than it really was, tho', considering the largeness of the geographical miles above-mentioned, that author does not fo much exceed the truth, as may at first fight be imagined.

(11) Polyb. 1. iii.

SECT. II.

A description of Africa Propria, or the territory of Carthage.

Africa Propria. HAVING given our readers the best account of the origin and foundation of b Cartbage that can be drawn from antiquity, as likewise a small sketch of its power, wealth, magnitude, &c. which we shall expatiate more largely upon hereafter; before we proceed directly to the history of the Carthaginians, or describe the religion, government, genius, commerce, manners, arts, sciences, &c. of that people, it will be proper to give a description of the country wherein they were seated, and which was looked upon as the natural territory of their city; for with regard to the other dominions they, at certain intervals, possessed, or got a footing in, they were fometimes of a larger, and fometimes of a narrower extent; fometimes in their own hands, and sometimes in those of other states, according as success or misfortune attended them in the management of their affairs.

Its limits.

Mela a and Ptolemy will have Africa Propria to have contained all the countries fituate between the river Amp/aga and the borders of Cyrenaica, which, Pliny b tells us, were inhabited by twenty-fix different nations; but this gives it too great an extent, as making it to include Numidia, and the Regio Syrtica, which are countries distinct from the proper territory of Carthage. Its true limits seem c to have been the river Tusca on the west, or side of Numidia; the Mediterranean or African sea on the north; the frontiers of the Garamantes and defarts of Libya Interior on the fouth; and the Mediterranean, with the Leffer Syrtis, on the east. It d was divided into two pro-

* Pomp. Mela, l. i. c. 7. Ptol. l. iv. c. 3. Vide etiam Cellar, geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 4. b Plin. v. c. 4. cogr. l. iv. Scylax Caryand, in peripl. edit. Oxon. 1698. Ptol. edgr. l. iv. & Cellar, geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 4. d Plin. ubi supra. Strab. l. ii. l. v. c. 4. Idem ibid. Herodot. l. i geogr. l. iv. & Cellar. geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 4.

. * .

•

And the second s

a vinces, the Regio Zeugitana, and Byzacium, with which the kingdom of Tunis e, under Divison. its division into the summer and winter circuits, at present nearly corresponds. According to Dio f, this region was likewise called the old province, and Numidia the new one. Byzacium E, or at least the sea coast of that province, seems to be the Emporia of Livy and Polybius.

Ptolemy has placed Carthage, and all the neighbouring cities, four degrees too foutherly, which is not to be wondered at, confidering the inaccuracy of that geographer in ascertaining the latitudes of places. If we admit the position of Africa Propria to have been nearly the same with that of the kingdom of Tunis, as there is great reason to believe, it must have taken up almost four degrees of north b latitude, viz. from 33° 30' N. to 37° 12' N. and of longitude above three degrees, fince Sbekkab, the most advanced city of the kingdom of Tunis to the westward, is in 8°, and Clybea, the farthest to the east, in 11° 20 E. longitude from London. The spot of ground on which Carthage stood is, according to the latest observations k, about 10° 40' east of London, and in north latitude 36° 40'.

Zeugitana, or the Regio Zeugitana, was separated from Numidia by the river Zeugitana. Tusca, and extended as far as Adrumetum, which Pliny makes to be the first city of Byzacium. The summer circuit of the kingdom of Tunis m, including the fruitful country about Keff and Bai-jah, and several other districts, answers at present to this province, which was the Regio Carthaginiensium of Strabon, and the Africa Propria c of Pliny and Solinus. We shall not pretend here to give a minute and particular description of all the cities it contained, as being incongruous with our present design; but only touch upon some of the principal of them, which have been taken the most notice of by those writers who have treated of the Roman and Carthaginian affairs.

THE first place in Zeugitana worthy our notice, since Carthage has been already Utica. described, is Utica. In rank and dignity this city was next to Carthage itself, and even superior to it in point of antiquity. Aristotle P says it was built, according to the Phanician historians, two hundred and eighty-seven years before Carthage. Velleius 9, as has been above related, makes the Tyrians to have founded it a little more than eighty years after the destruction of Troy. Justin r intimates, that the Tyrians were d settled there a considerable time before Dido came into Africa; nay, that this settlement commenced upon their first arrival in that country: and with these two last authors Mela and Stephanus agree. From this great antiquity, Bochart thinks the Phanicians gave it the name Atica, the antient, i. e. city, rather, in our opinion, Etuca " or Ituca, i. e. the city of long standing, or the great city, the strong city, &c. which appellation it might have gone by amongst the Tyrians, even in Dido's time; and this notion receives a good degree of probability from Scylax and Polybius, the most antient authors mentioning it, who call it Ituce, or Ityce, to whom the other Greek authors, speaking of it, except Dio, who uses the Latin name, may be added. The gulph, on which both this city and Carthage stood, was formed by two promontories, e viz. the promontory of Mercury, and that of Apollo, under the last of which Utica was seated. Appian w says it was sixty stadia, or seven miles and a half to the westward of Carthage; but, according to the itinerary, these two cities were twenty-seven Roman miles diffant from each other z. Utica had a large and commodious harbour, and was famous on many accounts in the Roman history, but on none more than the death of the younger Cato, who was from thence called Cato Uticensis, or Cato of Utica. After Carthage was razed by the Romans, it had a grant made it of all the country lying between Carthage and Hippo, and was for a confiderable time the metropolis of Africa. An ingenious modern traveller y supposes this place to have stood where Boo-shatter does at present; the traces of buildings of great extent and magf nificence still visible there, and the distance from Carthage, perfectly agreeing with that of the itinerary, besides other circumstances, giving good grounds for such a fupposition.

THE next town in the neighbourhood of Carthage, but in a contrary direction to Tunes. the former, is Tunes or Tuneta, the Tunis of the moderns. This town is undoubtedly of great antiquity, being taken particular notice of by Polybiusz, Diodorus, Livy, a and others; nay, that it was of Phanician original, the name itself sufficiently implies: for we find in that part of the Lower Egypt, almost contiguous to the borders of Arabia Petræa and Phanice, a town called Tanes a, from whence the Tanitic nome, and Tanitic mouth of the Nile took their name. And 'tis well known, that this part of Egypt b was over-run by the Phanicians, either in the time of Joshua, or much earlier; and that these same Phanicians afterwards settled in Africa Propria, Numidia, and Mauritania. In confirmation of which fentiment, we find a river in Numidiac, not far from the Ampfaga, called Tanas; from whence we may infer, fince nothing is more common in the Oriental languages than a permutation of vowels, that Tunes is a Phanician name, and that the city itself is of Phanician extraction, b That it was a town of some note in very early ages, is evident from Livy d, Diodorus, and Strabo, who tell us, that there was a hot bath, and a famous quarry, not far from it; that it was fortified both by nature and art, and furrounded with a wall. It was feated on or near the mouth of the river Catada, fifteen Roman miles east of The city is more famous now, than it was even amongst the ancients, being the capital of a powerful kingdom. The greatest part of it is situate upon a rifing ground, along the western banks of the lake, which goes by the same name, and in a full prospect (as the ancients have described it) of the Guletta, Carthage, and the island Zowa-moore. Tunis some time since was noted for its corsairs, but of late the inhabitants have applied themseves wholly to trade, and are now become c the most civilized and polite people in Barbary (A).

Maxula, or, according to Ftolemy, Mazula f, is an ancient town of the state of Carthage, and, if Pliny 8 may be credited, pretty near that city, in a direction contrary to the promontory of Apollo and Utica. We find on the western banks of the Tigris a city in Arabic hamed Moful, or Mozul, which word is not remote from the Mazula of Ptolemy. 'Tis likewise evident from the authority of Scylax, who mentions it, that Mazula was of some repute in his time, and therefore of great antiquity; from which confiderations we may conclude it not improbable, as there is a very great affinity betwixt the Arabic and Phanician languages, that this town was built by the Phanicians. It stood on the eastern side of the Catada, now the Mili-d ana; and if the conjecture of the ingenious gentleman above-mentioned be true, viz. that Mo-raisab, two leagues to the north-east of Solyman, be the Maxula, or Mazula, of the antients, this town was about eight leagues, or twenty-four English

miles, fouth-east of Tunes (B).

Carpis, a city of this district, placed by Ptolemy k one third of a degree more northerly than Carthage. Pliny calls it Carpi. Our learned traveller | supposes the spot which this town occupied, to be that which Gurbos, or Hammam Gurbos, at present stands upon; and that the hot bath near it is the Aqua Calida of Livy. Though the polition Ptolemy affigns his Carpis does not agree with that of the modern Gurbos, this last lying above a degree more southerly than Cartbage, yet we doubt not but e the gentleman is in the right, this geographer being very inaccurate in his determination of the latitudes of places.

Polyb. l. i. Liv. l. XXX. Diodor. Sic. l. XIV. Strab. i. XVII. CC.

aliiq; Vide etiam Cellar. geog. ant. p. 785, 799. ed. Lipfiæ, 1732. b D. August. in exposit. epist.

ad 3 Rom. sub init. Procop. de bell. Vand. l. ii. c. 10. Euseb. chron. l. i. p. 11. Gemar. Hierosol. ad

Tit. Shebith, cap. 6. Manetho apud Joseph. cont. Apion. l. i. Nonnus in Dionysiac. l. Xiii. Newton's chronol. p. 198—202. Marsham's can. chron. Bp. Cumberland's treatise on Sanchoniatho's Phœn. hist.

Univ. Hist. Vol. I. Sal. in Jugurth. c. 95. Cellar. geog. ant. p. 913. d Liv. Diodor. & Strab.

ubi sup. & alibi. Shaw ubi sup. p. 155. f Ptol. geog. l. iv. SPLIN. l. v. c. 4. h Val.

Schind. pentaglot. Cellar. geog. ant. p. 623. i Shaw ubi sup. p. 57. h Plin. & Ptol. POLYB. l. i. LIV. l. XXX. DIODOR. SIC. l. XIV. STRAB. l. XVII. &c. · HEROD. STRAB. PLIN. PTOL. 3 SHAW ubi fup. p. 57.

(A) Somewhere near this place Adis or Adda is to be looked for, where Regulus gave the Carthaginians a memorable defeat, and forced their camp. It appears from Polybius (1), that this was a town of fome importance; but the antients being filent as to any farther particulars relating to it, fave only that it was fituated amongst rocks and hills, we shall think it sufficient just to have mentioned it.

(B) We find the Musulani, a people seated in the western part of Numidia, not far from the Amplaga, taken notice of by Tacitus (2); and a town and promontory of Eshiopia, famous for the cinamon they produced, near the confines of Nubia and Libya interior, named Mosylon or Mosulum, remembered by Pliny (3). Now as a Phoenician colony came very early into Numidia, and the Nubians and Ethiopians were the descendants of the Egyptians and Arabiaus, as will hereafter be proved, possibly some light may from hence be thrown upon what we have advanced concerning the origin of this town.

Maxula.

Carpis.

Misuam, or Nisua, a town taken notice of by Pliny and Ptolemy, between Carpis Misua. and Clypea. The ruins of this place are still to be seen at the sanctuary of Seedy Doud, in the kingdom of Tunis, five leagues to the E. N. E. of the promontory of

THE next place that occurs is the Aquilaria of Cafar o, where Curio landed his Aquilaria. troops from Sicily. Cafar tells us, it was a very convenient station in the summer feasion, and in the neighbourhood of two promontories. Of these, in all probability, that of Mercury (called by the Moors the Ras-adder, and by the Franks cape Bon) was one; fince this is about a league to the northward of Lowab-reab, supposed to be the ancient Aquilaria. Many fragments P of antiquities are still extant b here, but amongst them nothing remarkable.

Clypea 9, a city built upon the small promontory Tapbitis, five leagues south-east Clypea. of the promontory of Mercury, which being in the figure of a shield or hemisphere, gave occasion to the name. It is called by Livy, Mela, and Pliny, Clupea; by Polybius, Appian, and Agathemerus, Aspis, but by Solinus, and the itinerary, Clypea. A mile distant from the ground where the old city stood, is a collection of huts or cottages, called by the inhabitants Clybea. Ptolemy is guilty of a great mistake,

when he makes Afpis and Clypea two different cities.

Curubis, Curobis, and Curabis, a town, according to the itinerary, thirty-two Roman Curubis. miles distant from the former; but, according to the more accurate observations of c the moderns, feven leagues, or twenty-one miles, fouth-west and by west of it. It is styled by Pliny: the free city Curubis, and seems to have been a considerable place in former times; though the ruins of a large aqueduct, and of the cifterns which received the water, are the only antiquities it can boast of at present, if the modern Gurba answers to it, as both the name and situation sufficiently intimate.

Canthele, a Phanician city, not far from Curubis, according to Hecataus ". This Canthele. town feems to have received its appellation from the pagan deity Saturn; fince, according to Sanchoniatho w and Damascius, the word el in the Phanician tongue had a particular relation to that deity. In confirmation of which 'tis observed by Ponticus, in his life of St. Cyprian, that there was a town in that place called by the d Romans, vicus Saturni, the street or town of Saturn. This was not a place of figure, at least so low as the classic times, so that we take notice of it here purely on account of its antiquity.

Neapolis, a famous and ancient empory of the Carthaginians in the fouth-east part Neapolis. of Zeugitana, five leagues to the north-east of Curubis. Thucydides * says, that the passage from hence to Sicily was very short, as being performed in two days and a night. Scylax places it not far from the leffer Syrtis, and about a day and a half's journey from the promontory of Mercury. Nabal, a thriving and industrious modern town, is a furlong to the westward of the ancient Neapolis, which appears to have been a large city. Pliny styles this place, as well as Curubis, a free city. Here e is a great number of inscriptions upon stones of six foot in length, and three in breadth; but they are either so unfortunately defaced, or filled with rubbish and morter, that it is a difficult thing to copy them. Strabo and Hirtius agree with Scylax in fixing it pretty near the promontory of Mercury. Nabal y stands upon the gulph of Hamam-et in N. lat. 36° 8' two leagues from a little opulent town of the same name.

To these may be added Nepheris, a fortress lying a little to the eastward of Car- Nepheris. thage. It was a place of good confideration, being built upon a rock, and strongly fenced by nature on all sides. Asdrubal, with his whole army, was cut off near it by Scipio, who, after a fiege of two and twenty days, reduced the town; and this greatly contributed to the conquest of Caribage. Strabo, Appian, and the epitomizer of Livy,

f take particular notice of it. THE only city remaining in this province that merits any attention is Hippo, to-Hippo, wards the north-west borders of it, a fort of frontier town on the side of Numidia. From the navigable lake Hipponitis, on which it was built, and which served it as a natural fortification, it was denominated Hippo Diarrbytus, and Hippo Zarytus; tho', from the promontory near it the antients fometimes gave it the denomination of Acra, Hippuacra, and Hippagreta. Scylax calls it simply Hippo, notwithstanding it generally

m PLIN. & PTOL. ubi fup. n SHAW ubi fu fup. p. 158. 9 STRAB. lib. xvii. p. 573. 2 HECATEUS perieget. apud Steph. de urb. v & DAMASCIUS apud Photium in bibliothec. 242.

went

went by the names above-mentioned in the time of Polybius, Diodorus, Pliny, and Ap- 2 pian; and this in order to diffinguish it from Hippo Regius in Numidia. Appian x tells us, that it was a great city, had a port, a citadel, and repolitories for naval stores. The modern name is Bizerta, which is a corruption of the Hippo Zarytus of the ancients. It is pleafantly fituated upon a canal y, eight miles to the fouth and by west of cape Blanco, betwixt an extensive lake and the sea. It is at present about a mile in circuit, defended by feveral castles and batteries, the principal of which are towards the sea. The origin of it was Phanician, as has been fully proved by Bochartz, who derives the name Hippo from the Syriac or Phanician Ubbo or Uppo, a gulph, which perfectly well answers to the situation of the place. To which by way of corroboration, it may be observed, that the gulph, on which it was seated. b seems, in contradistinction to the city Hippo or Hippon, to be called Hippos by Plolemy, when he takes notice of the promontory of Hippos, or of the gulph close by it; and if so, this was only the Syriac or Phanician Ubbo (gulph) with a Greek termination superadded. This gulph is formed by the Promontorium Candidum and Promontorium Apollinis of the ancients, the Ras el abeadb and Ras Zibeeb of the present Tuniseens.

As for the inland towns of Zeugitana, Ulizibirra, Mediccara, Tucma, Cerbica, Sasura, Cilma, Vepillium, Vina, Valli, Cigisa, Musti, Membressa, Cilio, and others equally obscure, enumerated by Ptolemy, the itinerary, and Peutinger's table; they were for the most part, if not intirely, modern in comparison of the Carthaginian c times, and never considerable in any other. We shall therefore conclude what we have to say of this province with observing, that there seem to be some traces of Zeugis or Zeugitana in the present name of the city of Zowan or Zagwan, a small flourishing town built upon the north-east extremity of a conspicuous mountain of the same name, in the summer circuit of the kingdom of Tunis. This will appear extremely probable from what has been advanced by Solinus, compared with the observations of the learned traveller of often cited. The Zygantes of Herodotus seem likewise to have been placed in the neighbourhood of Zagwan, which is an additional argument in support of this notion.

Byzacium.

Byzacium, according to Pliny, was inhabited by the Libyphanicians, that is, by d a mixture of Aborigines, or native Africans, and Carthaginians. The same author tells us, it was about two hundred and fifty Roman miles in circumference, and of so great fertility, that the earth made a return of an hundred sold. The limits of this province seem impossible to be precisely defined, because the antients have passed over the interior part of it bordering upon Lybia in a very slight manner, and greatly mistaken the course, magnitude and source of the river Triton; only in general it may be proper to remark, that it is supposed not to have differed much in extent and situation from the present winter circuit of the Tuniseens. We have neither room nor opportunity to be very particular in our account of the towns it formerly contained, and therefore hope, that a brief description of some of the principal of them will suffice.

Adrumetum.

Adrumetum, or Hadrumetum, the capital of Byzacium, was a city of great antiquity, and of great note in the antient world. It had a variety of names, being called by Strabo and Stephanus, Adryme or Adrume, as also Adrymetus; by Plutarch and Ptolemy, Adrumetus or Adrumettus; by Appian, Adrymettus; and by Casar, Hirtius, and Pliny, Adrumetum; by Mela, Hadrumetum, or, according to Vossius, Hadrumentum; and lastly, in Peutinger's table, we find it named Hadrito. The city was large and spacious, built upon an hemispherical promontory, like Clypea, at the distance of two leagues to the south-east of the morass, the boundary, as hath been supposed, betwixt the Zeugitana and this province. According to the itinerary, it was eighteen Roman miles from Leptis Minor, though Peutinger's table makes the f distance greater. Adjacent to the city was a cothon, being either a port or little island, in imitation of that of Carthage so called. The city, according to the judgment that can be formed from the present situation, was something more than a mile in circuit; and from the remaining ruins c, feems rather to have been a place of importance than extent. That it was founded by the Phanicians, is evident from Sallust 4 and others; as likewise from the name itself, which Bochart, with a great appearance of truth, derives from two Syriac or Phanician words, importing, the land or country returning an hundred fold, i. e. of corn or grain. The extraordinary fertility,

* Appian. in Libyc.

* Shaw ubi fup.

* Bochart. de col. Phoen. l. i. c. 24.

* Shaw ubi fup.

* Sha

a not only of the province in general, but of Adrumetum, the metropolis of it in patticular, is confirmed by an infcription in Smetius, which gives a fanction to Bochart's authority, and sufficiently convinces us of the truth of what we find related concerning it by the Latin authors; though at this day f it is but a barren and uncultivated tract, being partly of a dry sandy nature, and partly incommoded with morasses and spibkabs (C) dispersed over it, especially in the winter season. If the Herkla of the Tuniseens, the Heraclea of the lower empire, be Adrumetum, as we see no reason to doubt, it must have been in N. lat. 35° 50°, though Ptolemy places it in N. lat. 32° 40°.

Ruspina, a town of Byzacium, betwixt Adrumetum and Leptis Minor, where Casar Ruspina.

b incamped in his wars with Scipio 8. The village of Sabaleel, a little above fix leagues from Herkla, and full a mile from the sea, has the fairest pretensions to Ruspina; since we are assured by Hirtius, that the port of Ruspina was not at a much greater distance from the town.

Leptis Minor, one of Pliny's free cities, eighteen Roman miles from Adrumetum, of Leptis Minor. Phanician extraction. It had the epithet minor commonly annexed to it, in order to distinguish it from Leptis Major, a city of the Regio Syrtica, which was built either by the Sidonians, as Salust seems to intimate; or the Tyrians, according to Pliny. Bochart deduces the name Leptis from the Phanician labt or lapt, denoting a port or station for vessels. Strabo and Stephanus say, that Lepethis, a city of Cyprus, was famous for its commodious station, and the same is said of Leptis Minor by Lucan. The city paid every day a talent to the Carthaginians by way of tribute; and all authors agree, that the circumjacent country was exceeding fruitful, which has induced Bochart to derive Emporia (its name in Livy and Polybius) from two Oriental words, importing the fruitful mother. The place is at present called Lempta; but there is nothing left besides a small part of the castle, with a low shelf of rocks, that probably made the northern mound of the Cothon.

Agar, a town taken notice of by Hirtius, a few miles to the westward of Leptis. Agar. The situation of this place is very rocky, and here is a great quantity of stones and ruins. The village, at present taking up the spot of ground on which Agar stood, d is called by the Arabs, Boo-Hadjar, i. e. the sather of a stone; which agrees in signification pretty well with the old name, and answers to the circumstances above-mentioned.

Thapfus, a maritime town of this province, seated, according to Dio P, upon a fort Thapfus. of isthmus, betwixt the sea and a lake. Peutinger's table makes it eight miles distant from Leptis to the south. The inhabitants of Thapfus were famous for their sidelity to Scipio, in his wars with Cæsar; but notwithstanding the strength of the place, they were obliged to submit to the latter, after he had deseated the sormer. Demass, the ancient Thapfus, is situated upon a low neck of land, three miles to the E. by S. of To-bulba, within half a league of which is the lake taken notice of by Hirtius. Here is still remaining q, in desiance of time and the sea, a great part of the cothon, built in frames; the composition whereof is made up of small pebbles and morter, which are so well cemented and knit together, that a solid rock could not be more hard and durable. The walls of Tlemsan very much resemble the remaining part of this cothon.

Acholla or Acilla, another free city, called by Appian r, Cholla. If the fite Ptolemy Acholla. affigns this city be allowed, Elalia, fix miles to the northward of She-ah, the antient Rujpa, upon the borders of a fertile plain, undoubtedly answers to it.

* SMETIUS in inscript. vol. & Vet. Inscript. apud Gruter. p. 362.

* Ibid. p. 190.

* Hirt. bell. Atric. sec. 9.

* SALLUST. in Jugurth. c. 22. & 80.

* PLIN. l. v. c. 19.

* Bochart. ubi sup.

* Lucan. bell. civ. l. ix. v. 951.

* Hirt. bell. Afric. sec. 68, 79.

* Shaw ubi sup. p. 191.

* Dio, l. xliii. p. 245.

* Shaw ubi sup.

* Appian. in Libyc.

(C) The word shibkah signifies in the Arabic language a saltish plat of ground; and denotes a spot generally overflowed in the winter, but dry all the summer (4). There are great numbers of these in the kingdoms of Tunis and Algiers, which appear like so many extensive lakes, and produce a considerable quantity of salt. In the summer they may be taken for bowling greens prepared for the turs.

Some of them have a hard and folid bottom, without the least mixture of gritty mould, retaining the falt that lieth crystallized upon them after rain; but others are of a more oozy absorbent nature, seldom preserving any saline incrustations upon the surface. The earth of them all is very pungent to the tongue, and, by a proper solution, would yield, no doubt, a copious portion of salt.

(4) Shaw in phys. and miscel. observ. p. 230.

Turris Hanni-

Turris Hannibalis t, the tower of Hannibal, was a fort, tower or country feat, be- a longing to Hannibal, betwixt Thapfus and Acilla, according to Livy. To this place Hannibal fled from Carthage, for fear of the Romans; and immediately, upon his arrival, imbarking in a vessel that waited for him, passed over to the island Cercina. Either El-Medea, five miles to the south of Demass, or Salecto', five miles to the S. by W. of El-Medea, in all probability, occupies the space on which this fort, tower or county feat, was erected.

Thena.

Thena or Thena, a town on the coast of the lesser Syrtis mentioned by Strabo, known at this time among the Tuniseens by the name Thainee. It was built upon a low and rocky piece of ground, near two miles in circuit. The adjacent country is dry and barren, without either fountain or rivulet to refresh it.

Macodana.

BETWIXT Thenæ and the mouth of the Triton, or the place where it discharges itself into the sea, Ptolemy places his Macodama, with which perhaps Maba-ressu, four leagues to the west of Thainee, corresponds. 'Tis a village samous for nothing, but several cisterns, with large areas to receive the rain-water.

Uzita.

Uzita, a town of some note near Tisdrus and Leptis Minor, mentioned by Hirtius, Ptolemy, and Dio. Bochart w derives the name from zaith or zait, an olive, or place where olives are produced; and, according to Hirtius, the neighbourhood of this city was famous for its production of olives, fince Cafar exacted yearly from the inhabitants of Leptis a vast quantity of oil by way of mulct or tribute. This gives great weight to Bochart's opinion, and proves the city to be Phanician.

Thala.

Thalax, a city of great extent, taken notice of by Sallust, fituated, like Capsa, in the midst of mountains and deserts, though there were some sountains without the city. All which particulars agree with the fituation of the modern Ferre-anab, in the fouth-west part of this province.

Capfa.

TWELVE leagues to the S. E. by E. of this place is Gafsa, the Capla of the antients, and one of the strong castles of Jugurtha v. It is built upon a rising ground, inclosed, almost in every direction, with mountains; and hath the like melancholy situation with Ferre-anab, only with this difference, that the landskip here is somewhat more gay and verdant by the prospect we have from it of the palm, olive, pistachio, and other fruit-trees. In the eastern languages the word signifies streightly environed, d and fo the place is on every fide by folitudes and deferts; which is a good proof that it was originally Phanician 2. There seem to have been two more cities of this name, the one in Numidia, the other in Libya Interior.

Suffetula, Turzo, Sarsura, Tisdra or Tisdrus, Caraga, Orbita, and other obscure towns of Byzacium, of which we know nothing but the bare names, either intirely depend upon the faith of Ptolemy, were always inconsiderable in themselves, or built below the classic period of time; and therefore, as they cannot have the least tendency to illustrate any part of the Carthaginian history, or supply us with the least hint or circumstance relative thereto, we shall pass them over in silence, and conclude our geographical remarks upon this country with a concife description of the most e celebrated lakes, rivers, and other principal curiofities of it, and a brief enumeration of the African nations, who in the remotest times possessed it.

Lakes.

THE chief lakes of this region taken notice of by the antients (belides the lake Hipponitis above-mentioned, and the Palus Sisara joined to it, of no great repute) were the Palus Tritonis or Tritonitis, the Palus Pallas, and the Palus Libya; all which, according to Ptolemy, had a communication with one another, by means of the river Triton, which ran thro' them into the sea. But herein that geographer was greatly deceived. The fource of the Triton is nearer the sea than these lakes, which are now known to be different parts or branches of the same lake, whose modern name is, the Shibkab El Lowdeab a, or lake of marks, so called from a number of trunks of palm-trees, that are f placed at proper distances, to direct the caravans in their marches over it. This lake extends itself near twenty leagues from east to west, and is interspersed with several dry spots, which appear like islands in it. To the eastward especially, in the same meridian with Telemeen, there is one, which, though uninhabited, is very large, and well stocked with date trees. This feems to be the Chersonesus of Diodorus b, and the Pbla of Herodotuse; and the date trees in it, according to a tradition of the Arabs,

F Liv. l. xxxiii. Just. l. xxxi. Shaw udi SHAW ubi fup. p. 192.

SALLUST. in Jugurth. t Strab. l. xvii. p. 572, 574. ugurth. T Idem ibid. Shaw ubi sup. p. 195. W Bochart, upi sup.

Vid. Bochart, ubi sup. & Cellar, in Geog. ant. p. 875, 913.

Herodot, l. iv. a Shaw ubi sup. p.211, 212.

a sprung originally from the stones of those dates which the Egyptians brought with them for provisions, many ages since s, when they invaded this part of Africa, and halted here. The Punic name perhaps was Tarit s, Terit, or Trit, i. e. pasturage, or pasture-ground; for, if we may believe Scylax and Herodotus, it served as a boundary to the Libyan Nomades, who abounded with slocks and herds, and whose country must of consequence have been of such a nature as the word tarit imports the ground bordering upon the lake and river Triton to have been. Scylax makes the lake to have been in his time about a thousand stadia in circumference, which agrees tolerably well with the best modern description we find given of it. Festus i tells us, that the goddes Minerva sirst appeared in the neighbourhood of this place.

THE most famous river of Africa Propria was the Bagradak, Bagadras, or Bragada, Rivers. for it went by all those names. On the banks of which, Regulus, in the first Punic war, by the help of his battering engines, killed a ferpent of a monstrous fize, being a hundred and twenty foot in length, whose skin and jaw-bones were preserved at Rome till the Numantine war. Ptolemy m derives this river from mount Mampsarus, The Bagrada. where he fixes its fource, making it bend its course almost directly from north to fouth; and herein he is followed by the late geographers: but this is a mistake a, its stream flowing in a direction almost from west to east. At this day it is called the Me-jerdab°, whose first and most distant branches are the small rivers Hameese and Myski-anab, in the district of the Hen-neisha; which, with the concurrent streams c of the Wed el Boule, Scilliana, and some other rivulets of the Frig-eah, render it as large as the Isis and Cherwell united. By running through a rich and fertile country, it becomes so well saturated with soil, that it is of the same complexion with the Nile, and appears to have no less the property of making encroachments upon the fea. Utica stood upon the western bank of the Bagrada, and Carthage on the other fide, but at some distance from it. Bochart will have the Phanicians to have pronounced the name Bragda P or Bractha, i. e. a pord, and produces feveral authorities, which give a great air of probability to his opinion.

The Catada of Ptolemy, now the Miliana, is famous for nothing but having Tunis The Catada feated upon the mouth of it; nor the Triton, now the Gabbs, but on account of the d lake of the fame name already described. However, it may not be improper to observe, that it has its source only about three or sour leagues to the S. S. W. of Gabbs, and becomes at once a considerable stream, near as big as the Cherwell.

Among the principal curiosities of this country are to be ranked the Hammam Curiosities. Leef (D), a noted hot bath, very much resorted to by the citizens of Tunis; the hot bath, with some ruins, at the creek of Gurbos, the Aquæ Calidæ of Livy; the salt lake near To-bulba, the Stagnum Salinarum of Hirtius; the Jibbel Had-deffa, an intire mountain of salt, situated near the eastern extremity of the lake of marks, whose salt is as hard and solid as stone, and of a reddish or purple colour; the lead-oars at Jibbel Ris-Jass, near Hammam Leef, which are very rich. To which many others might be added, did we not chuse to reserve them for a more proper place (E).

f Shaw ubi sup.

f Shaw ubi sup.

f Festus Pompeius, & Diodor. Sic. l. iii. p. 142.

bell. civil. p. 748. Silius Italicus, Lucan. &c.

Liv. epit. xviii. Val. Max. 1, 8, 19.

m Ptol. Geog. l. iv.

f Gellius, l. vi. c. 3.

g Cellius, l. vii. c. 3.

g Cellius, l. vii. c. 14.

g Cellius, l. vii. c. 3.

g Cellius, l. vii. c. 14.

g Cellius, l. vii. c. 3.

g Cellius, l.

(D) These hammams, or baths, are so called from the Hebrew or Chaldee verb DDD hammam, incaluis, their waters being hot, though not all in the same degree; perhaps the word hummums, which we have adopted into our language, of the same import, is to be deduced from the same original.

import, is to be deduced from the tame original.

(E) We shall beg leave in this note just to mention the principal islands on the coast of Africa Propria, taken notice of by the antients, which are the following:

1. Coffyra or Coffyrus, a small island in the African sea, which some authors refer to Sicily; but Strabo makes it part of the proper territory of Carthage. According to Ptolemy, it had a city of the same name, which, by reason of its vicinity to Carthage, was doubtless a place of some repute. Scylax tells us it was a day's fail only from the promontory Lilybaum in Sicily; and Strabo places it in the middle of the African sea, at an equal distance from Lilybaum and Clypea, a city of Africa Propria. From some antique coins, exhibited by Paruta and Lucas Holstenius, it appears, that Cossyra was the name of frequently used. According to Strabo, this island was an hundred and firty studia in circumserence (5).

2. The Tarichia of Strabo were certain minute islands very near the coast of Africa Propria, almost opposite to Leptis Minor. They are at present called the fouries, and lie over-against Lempta and Tobulba. Cafar seems to have looked upon them as posts of

(5) Peol. l. iv. c. 3. Scyl. Caryand, Strab. l. vi. Parut, apud Thesaur, ant, & hist. Sic. vol. viii. Luc. Helsten. in not, ad Steph. Byzant.

fome

Antient inhabit ants.

THE most antient inhabitants of this country were, according to Herodotus w, the a Auses, situated to the west of the river Triton, whose capital city was doubtless Auza or Auzate, said by Menander Ephesius to be built by Eth-baal or Ithobal, king of Tyre; the Maxyes, a Libyan nation; the Machlyes, another Libyan nation, near the lake Tritonis; the Zaueces; and the Zygantes, who took a particular delight in bees, and making of honey. These were, in all likelihood, a mixture of old Libyans or Africans, and Phanicians, a more distinct account of whom may be expected from us when we come to treat of the different nations of Libya.

As for the climate, modern state, and natural history of Africa Propria, both with regard to its animal, vegetable, and subterraneous productions, we shall defer what we have to fay on each of these heads, till, according to the method already pro- b posed to ourselves, we come to write the history of the states of Algiers, Tunis, and

Tripoli.

w HERODOT. l. iv.

fome importance, which is all that we have at prefent to fay of them (6).

3. Lopadusa, opposite to Thapsus above-mentioned, and six miles long, if we will believe Pliny. The same author affirms it to have been fifty miles distant from Cercina and Cercinitis, two small islands belonging to the Regio Syrtica (7).

4. Æthusa or Ægusa, another little island mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy, lying a little to the westward of the former (8).

5. The Larunesia, two small islands, according to the Palatine MS. of Ptolemy, that lay above Rus-țina (9).

6. The Insula Dracontia of Ptolemy, to the north of Hippo Diarrhytus. Two little flat contiguous islands called the Cani, not far from cape Blanco, seem at this day to bid fair for the fame fituation that Ptolemy affigns his Insula Dracontia (10).

7. Galata, a little island above Tabraca, three hundred stadia from the continent of Africa (11).

8. Ægimurus, a small island in the gulph of Carthage, about thirty miles from that capital. Pliny assures us, that there were two rocks near this island called the Ara Ægimuri or Ægimori, which, according to Servius, were the remains of an island, fome ages before his time absorpt by the sea. This author likewise informs us, that they were called Ara, because on them the Romans and Carthaginians concluded a treaty, and made them the limits of their respective dominions. The modern Zowa-moor, between cape Zibeeb and cape Bon or Rafaddar, the Zimbra of our fea charts, is undoubtedly the Agimurus of the antients (12).

(6) Strab. l. xvii. Hirt. de bel. Afric. §. 20. (7) Strab. l. xvii. Plin. l. v. c. 7. (8) Plin. (9) Cellar. geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 4. (10) Ptol. ubi sup. (11) Cellar. (12) Strab. l. xxii. p. 573. Liv. l. xxx. c. 24. Plin. l. v. c. 7. Virg. 1. iii. c. 8. Ptol. l. iv. c. 3. ex itinerario maritimo, sibi fup. An i. ver. 108. Serv. in loc. Steph. Byzant. &c.

SECT. III.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, customs, arts, learning, and trade, of the Carthaginians.

nians originally Phœnicians.

HE Carthaginians being originally Phanicians 2, were the descendants of the cold Canaanites b, and therefore could trace up their actions. Canaanites or the fon of Ham, the acknowledged progenitor of that people. All the Greek and Roman' writers, that make any mention of their affairs, are clear in this point, without the least variation. And that they themselves were of the same opinion, is evident from a tradition prevailing amongst their posterity so late as St. Austin's days; from the authority of Servius and Procepius e; and from the strong fattachment they always shewed to the customs and manners of that nation, from which these authors deduce them. One of the Punic names of Carthage, according to Plautus 8, was Chaedreanech, or Chadre-Anak, which Bocharth with great reason imagines to allude to their Canaanitish extraction; for Anak and his family, upon account of their ex-d traordinary fize of body, and distinguished valour, being esteemed both by sacred and profane writers as the most famous of the Canaanites or Phanicians, from him the whole nation, or at least that part of it bordering upon the sea coast near the * Philistus Syracusanus apud Eusebium in chron. ad an. 804. Appian in Libyc. sub init. Vell. Paterc. hist. Rom. Justin. l. xviii. &c.

* Univ. hist. vol. I. p. 415, 416. & vol. VI. p. 658.

* August. in exposit. epist. ad Rom. sub in.t.

* Servius in Æn. i. v. 37. & Æn. iv. v. 75. Procop. de bell. Vandal. l. ii. c. 10. Diodor. Sic. Q. Cort. Justin. Tertul. Minut. Fel. &c. passim. f HERODOT. POLYB. LIV. E PLAUT. in Poen. BOCH. Chan. l.i. c. 1.

a place of his residence, might probably receive a new denomination (A). This is to be understood of the most early Phanician colonies settled in Africa, and many of their descendants; for it is to be naturally supposed, that some of these mixed with the Aborigines, or native Africans, whom they found there upon their arrival, and with them, or at least a considerable body of them, formed one people. And for this reason it is, that the inhabitants of Byzacium, especially of the maritime parts of it, were sometimes called, by the Greeks and Romans, Libyphanicians, as consisting of both nations (B). But a fuller account of the name, as well as a more particular description of the people with whom the Phanicians were incorporated, will be found in a proper place.

Dr. Hyde, in his notes upon Peritfol, is of another opinion; but, in order to fupport it, he has recourse to hypotheses only, and those such as have but a stender foundation. On the contrary, Bochart k proves what he advances by unquestionable authorities, the only solid arguments in points of this nature, of which he produces such a train, as will not easily be overborn.

Some authors have imagined, that the Libyphanicians, or, as Strabo and most of Libyphanicians, the other Greek writers call them, the Libophanicians, were a nation distinct both from cians. the Africans or Libyans, and Carthaginians, and inhabited a different tract. It is certain the true or Asiatic Phanicians and Syrians, bordering upon their respective frontiers, were called Syrophanicians, upon account of their intermixing one with another, and by way of contradistinction from the people inhabiting the opposite Hype in Perits. p. 44.

k Bochart. ubi fupra.

1 Vide BOCHART. Chan. l. i. c. 25.

(A) To what has been already observed (1) of the Anakims, may be added, that profane authors themselves, as well as scripture, seem to have had fome knowledge of them. Pau/anias (2) tells us, that in the island Afteria near Miletus, the body of the hero Asterius, from whom the island received its name, was buried; that he was the fon of Anax, or Anak, who was the fon of the Earth; that his body was ten cubits long; and that the whole territory of the Milesians was antiently called Anadoria, from his father Anax, or Anak. Euflathius (3) and the epitomizer of Stephanus agree with Pausanias, in relation to the antient name of Miletus, with its district; and add, that this Anax was the son of Heaven and Earth. We are affured by scripture (4), that the Anakims, when driven out of their own country by foshua, fled to Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod, and there settled themselves. And it is likewise probable (5) from the Phanician history, that Gath, the metropolis of these Anakims, was subject to the kings or judges of Tyre, as early as the days of Pygmalion; fince it had revolted from the Tyrians fome time before the reign of Hezekiah king of Judah. From whence we may conclude, that some of this family might even attend Dido into Africa, though it is at the same time very likely, that many of them, after their chiefs had been cut off by David (6), might likewise retire to their countrymen, who had fixed their abode in Africa ever since the days of foshua (7). We must not omit, that the Dioscuri (8., who were Phanician gods, i. e. deified Phanicians of great distinction, were called Anakes, or Anakims, by the Greeks, on account, no doubt, of their superior stature and majesty. The word anax or anak (9) was a term of great honour amongst the most antient Greeks, being applied only to their kings and heroes. It has been imagined by some, that this is a common name, answering to the Latin Torquatus (10), and that the great men in the east were in the earliest times so called, on account of the rich collar or chain that they usually wore about their necks. Benjamin of Tudela (11) afferts, that he saw a human rib hanging up in a palace at Damascus, which was nine Spanish palms long, and two broad; and that, from an inscription upon the tomb-stone, it appeared, that one of the Anakims was buried there, whose name was Abchamaz, and who was said to have reigned over the whole world, i. e. over a good part of the east, or all the countries in that neighbourhood. But whether this inscription ought to be looked upon as genuine, or of a late date in comparison of the age of the Anakims, and sounded only upon some Oriental tradition, is what we shall not take upon us to determine.

(B) The Byzacium of Pliny (12) feems to be the Byzacis of Polybius, if we will give credit to Salma-fius's emendation of a passing in Stephanus, where he quotes the twelfth book of that historian. A strong presumption in savour of this is, that both Pliny and Polybius's provinces have the same extent, the same situation, and their names are pretty much alike (13). Byzacium, according to the Greek and Roman authors, consisted of two parts, the maritime or exterior, and the mediterranean or interior (14), both which were inhabited by the Libyphanicians. Bochart derives the name from the oriental word biza (15), a teat, and thinks it was so denominated from its surprising fertility, of which that was a symbol amongst most nations. So Virgil, Terra antiqua potens armis, atq; ubere gleba. Æn. 1.

Et fertilis ubere campus. Grorg.l. ii.

----- stap apápis.

Il. 1.

Which, according to the scholiast, signifies a most fertile and beautiful part of the country. The Mamma of Procopius (16) in this province, a word of the same import with Biza, greatly strengthens this derivation.

(1) Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 133, 134—157. (2) Pausan in Attic. & Achaiac. (3) Eustath. in Hom. iliad. A, p. 16. & Steph. epit. sub voc. Miantos. (4) fos. xi. 22. (5) Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 416. (6) 2 Sam. xxi. 16—22. 1 Chron. xx. 4—8. (7) Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 333. (8) Cic. de nat. deor. l. iii. (9) Hom. iliad. A, & alibi passim. (10) Bochart. ubi supra. & Val. Schind. pentaglot. sub voc. Dy (11) Benj. Tudel. itiner. p. 56. (12) Vide Salmas. in Steph. sub voc. Ridaxis. (13) Conf. Steph. ubi supra. Plin. l. v. c. 4. & Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 1. (14) Cellar. geog. ant. l. iv. e. 4. Bochart. ubi supra. (15) Bochart. ubi supra. (16) Procop. de bell. Vand. l. ii.

VOL. VI. Nº 9.

BOOK III.

parts of those two regions, who were known by their proper names, Syrians and Pha- a nicians. In conformity to our notion of the people we are here discoursing of, Livy " styles them mistum Punicum Afris genus; and Diodorus a speaks of them to the same

The form of government at Carthage.

The suffetes.

THE first government settled at Carthage o was probably monarchical; but this feems to have been but of short continuance, as expiring with Dido herself, or rather in her life-time, when it was changed into a republic. As to the particular form of this republic, authors differ. Aristotle tells us, that it was partly aristocratical P, and partly (as he terms it) political, i. e. democratical (C). According to Polybius 9, monarchy, aristocracy and democracy, all centred in it. And lastly, Isocrates r makes the civil government to have been oligarchical, and the military monarchical. b In the forming of it, the Carthaginians undoubtedly borrowed many things from their ancestors the Tyrians, who, for several ages, made a great figure in the world, and were in high efteem on account of their wisdom, riches and power. Aristotle s intimates, that the Cretan, Lacedamonian and Carthaginian republics were the most perfect and best modelled of any in the world; and that these in many particulars agreed; tho', in several respects, he gives the preference to the Carthaginian. The consummate wisdom of those maxims and institutions, upon which this last was formed, appeared to him from hence, that notwithstanding the great sway the people bore in Carthage, there had been no instance, from the foundation of the city to his time, of any popular commotions capable of diffurbing the public tranquillity, nor of any c tyrant, who had been able, at the expence of liberty, to introduce oppression. This was a plain proof, that the three principal powers, of which the constitution of Carthage was composed, were of such a nature, as to counterpoise one another, and, by their mutual harmony, to preserve and promote the public selicity (D). These were the fuffetes, the fenate, and the people, who, whilst they kept within their proper bounds, were a check upon one another, and jointly concurred to render their republic of all others the most sourishing; but when, as Polybius observes, by an unaccountable fluctuation of power, the people got the ascendant over the senate, prudence was banished their counsels, nothing but cabals and sactions took place; and in consequence of this, such precipitate steps were taken, as first rendered this for- d midable state weak and contemptible, and soon after completed its destruction.

In order to give our readers some idea of the Carthaginian government, though the antients afford us little light on this head, we shall give a brief account of the three principal powers above-mentioned.

THE fuffetes " were two in number, of equal power and dignity, and the chief magistrates of Carthage w. They answered to the two kings of Lacedamon, as well as to the Roman confuls; for which reason we find them styled in different authors both kings and confuls . However, these did not in all things correspond; for the Spartan DIODOR. Sic. l. xx. O UBBO EMMIUS de stat. & rep. Carthag. sub init. Christ. HENDREICH. in Carthag. l. ii. sect. t. c. 15. p. 307. Just. l. i. alique mult. P Arist. de re Ubbo Emm. ubi supra. Polyb. l. vi. Isocrat. in Nicocl. Aristot. ubi supra. P Arist. de rep. l. ii. c. 11. UBBO EMM. ubi supra. Polyb. l. vi. Isocrat. in Nicocl. Aristot. ubi supra. bibid. Corn. Nep. in Annib. Arist. ubi supra, & l. vi. c. 49.

Ralibi passim. Diod. Sic. l. xiv. &c. WARIST. ubi supra. Liv. l. xxx. Corn. Nep. ubi supra. Just. l. xxxi. Calid. apud Festum, &c. Hendreich. & Ubbo Emm. abi supra.

(C) Horreia (polity or policy) taken in a geneform of government, where the laws had their due force and efficacy. In a more confined fense it was, among the antient Greeks before Aristotle's time, frequently synonymous to Inuasparia (18), (demonstruction of the state of cracy) as may be proved from Æschines, and others. But when Aristosie comes to distinguish more subtilly (19), he tells us, that there were two mixed forms of government, each of which was a com-position of oligarchy and democracy. That which participated most of oligarchy, was called aristocracy; but that which inclined most to democracy, went by the name of policy or policy. Both of these, in some respects (20), prevailed in the state of Carthage, as we shall see hereaster, when we come to confider the defects of it; for which reason Aristotle tells us, it was composed of both. In short, polity or policy regarded men as rich and poor(21), aristocracy as rich, poor, and virtuous; both which considerations had their influence in the Carthaginian commonwealth.

(D) The legislator of the Carthaginians was undoubtedly a person of great political wisdom; yet Aristotle himself finds some desects in his institutions (22), and, notwithflanding the beautiful draught he has exhibited of this republic, intimates, that the uninterrupted tranquillity it enjoyed, was, in some measure, owing to chance (13).

(17) Ariflot. de rep. l. iv. (20) Ariflot. ibid. l. ii. c. 11. (18) Idem ibid. c. 3. (19) Idem ibid. c. 7, 8, &c. Æschin. in Ctesiph. (21) Idom, l. iv. c. 8. (22) Idem, l. ii. c. 11. (23) Idem ibid. sub fin.

kings

a kings were perpetual, had an hereditary right of succession y, and the state was supplied with them from two families only 2; whereas the Carthaginian suffects were annually elected out of all the noblest families, and were always such persons as most attracted the public regard by their virtue and great talents, as well as their wealth, which enabled them to support their high station with a becoming grandeur and dignity; for which reason Aristotle prefers the supreme magistrates of Carthage to those of Lacedamon (E). As for the Roman confuls, they had not only a chief hand in the administration of civil, but likewise in the conducting of military affairs; whereas it is very probable, that the suffetes were, generally speaking, confined to the former (F). Their province was to affemble the senate, in which they presided a, to propose subb jects for deliberation there, to tell the voices, and to prefide likewife in all emergent and decilive debates. It does not appear by whose suffrages the suffetes were elected, but most likely b either by those of the centumvirate, or the people. According to fome authors, they had the power of life and death, and of punishing all crimes whatsoever. Their concurrence in dall points with the senate was necessary, in order to prevent any debate from coming before the people. It is remarkable, that most, if not all the cities of note in the Carthaginian dominions , had their suffetes or chief magistrates, as well as the metropolis.

THE senate was a most august assembly, composed of persons venerable for their The senate.

age and experience, as well as illustrious ton account of their birth, their riches, and, c above all, their merit. They arrived at this honour by election, as we are informed by Aristotle 8, when he makes a comparison betwixt the Spartan and Carthaginian senates; but who were their electors, is not known. Their number likewise we are ignorant of, the' from Justin we may infer, that it greatly exceeded that of either the Spartan or Roman senators; for, according to this author, an hundred were selected from it, and appointed as judges to inquire into the conduct of their generals; and if this number was thought requilite to inspect into this single article, how many must have been deemed necessary to superintend, and, in concert with the suffetes, manage every branch of the administration? Besides, it is natural to suppose, that there was a great affinity betwirt the customs and manners of the Sicilians and those of the Card thaginians, fince these last may be justly looked upon as some of the antient inhabitants of Sicily i. Now, in the time of Agathocles, the senate of Syracuse consisted of fix hundred of the k principal citizens; no wonder then if that of Carthage was equal, if not much more numerous. In this grand 1 council, every thing relating to peace and war, to negotiations and alliances, to trade and navigation; in short, to all affairs of consequence, whether foreign or domestic, were debated, and for the most part determined m; so that the whole machine of government was animated and kept in motion by it; life and spirit were from thence diffused over all the public deliberations. When the votes n of the senate were unanimous, they had the force of laws, and from hence there lay no appeal; but when there was either a division or a disae greement with the suffeces, the affair in o question was referred to the people, who, in such a case, had the liberty of offering their sentiments freely, and even of contradicting the other parts of the legislature; and not only so, but what was thus offered,

<sup>2</sup> CORN. NEP. ubi supra. Liv. l. xxx. Zonar. tom. ii. Arist. ubi 7 Arist. de rep. l. ii. c. 11. OLYB. L. iii. BUBBO EMM. & FIENDR. L. XV. LIV.

d UBBO EMM. & ARIST. ubi fupra. Polyb. L. XV. LIV.

f UBBO EMM. HENDR. & * Liv. ubi supra, & l. xxxiv. Polyb. l. iii. l. xxxiii. Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24. SELDEN. de diis Syris in prolegom. c. 2. & Boch. Chan. ubi fupra.

* Ubbo Emm. Hendr. & bi fupra.

* Arist. ubi fupra.

* Justin. l. xix.

* Univers. bift. vol. iii. p. 12.

* B1.

* Ubbo Emm. ubi fupra.

* Polyb. l. iii. c. 15.

* Appian. in Libyc. Diod. Sic. l. xiv.

* Hendr.

* Hendr Arist. ubi fupra.

k Ibid. p. 81. т Uвво Емм. ubi fuprа. Liv. & Polys. paff. ubi fupra, p. 323. PolyB. l. xv.

(E) He prefers the suffetes to the Lacedamonian kings, not because the Carthaginians had some regard to wealth in their election of them (for this he abfolutely condemns, as will be elsewhere observed); but because they chose them out of all the best families in Carthage, and esteemed great abilities in them as an essential qualification; which was contrary to the practice of the Lacedamonians (24).

(F) This appears not only from Livy, Polybins, and other antient authors, but likewise from the judicious observations of Ubbo Emmins (25). However, it must be allowed, that we have several instances of the suffeces commanding Carthaginian armies. Hamsibal, who commanded the auxiliaries sent to the relief of the Ægestans, or Segestans; Himileo, who was general in the second expedition against Dionysius; and Mago, under whose conduct many thousand men were transported to Sicily and Isaly, fet this point beyond dispute (26).

lom ibid, sub mis. (25) Ubbo Emm. de stat. & repub. Carthag. apud Gronov. ans. Grac. vol. iv. (26) Diod. Sic. l. xiii. xiv. xv. &c. Hendr. mbi supra, p. 315. (24) Idem ibid, sub inis.

passed into a law, the people, in all emergencies of this nature, being the dernier a resort of power. However, as Aristotle P observes, this was a slaw in the constitution, and was at last attended with satal effects; for during the second and third Punic wars, the populace at Carthage prevailed over the senate, whilst the senatorial authority at Rome was in its sull bloom and vigour; and this, if we may give credit to Polybius q, was the principal cause of the rise of the one, and sall of the other. We must not romit, that none but persons of the most distinguished merit were ever elected senators, nor that their office and dignity were perpetual (G).

Power of the people at Carthage.

WHAT sway the people had in Carthage, whilst the different parts of which the constitution was framed were duly proportioned to one another, and each of them enjoyed its natural share of power, does not appear from any antient author, though b it can scarce be doubted, but so accurate a writer as Polybius must have taken notice of it somewhere in his writings. It is slikely they had a vote at the election of magistrates, at the enacting of laws, particularly those in which they were more immediately concerned; and, in short, in every thing that bore any relation to them. In Aristotle's days, the commonwealth seems to have deviated from its original perfection, having too strong a tendency to popular government, which was censured as a defect in it by that philosopher. However, the fenate still kept up a good degree of authority, and the power of the people was far from being uncontrolable; but in Hannibal's time u, about an hundred years after, there was reason to apprehend a total subversion of the constitution; the senate had little regard or attention paid to it; the c people arrogated to themselves almost the whole power, and of course every thing which might have promoted the public welfare, was obstructed by a few ambitious and implacable demagogues. From this period the most famous and potent state of Carthage began to decline, and, in the course of a few years, lost not only its liberty, but its very being.

Establishments, civil officers, &c. at Carthage.

HAVING thus laid down a general sketch or plan of the Carthaginian government, we shall mention some of their principal establishments, civil officers, &c. as taken notice of by the antients, who, it must be owned, have been extremely deficient in all their memoirs relating to this republic; for which reason the loss of those excellent pieces of Polybius, that, through the injuries of time, have not reached us, is the demore to be regretted.

The centumvirate and quinquevirate,

The centumvirate, or tribunal of the hundred, consisted of an hundred and sour persons, not simply of an hundred, as the name seems to imply, receiving its denomination from the greater number w. According to Aristotle, who is the only author that has given us any description of it x, the power it enjoyed was very extensive, tho' confined chiefly to things of a judicial nature y. Out of this tribunal were selected five judges, whose jurisdiction was superior to that of the rest, to whom we may, with propriety enough, give the name of quinquevirs, or the quinquevirate. They had the power not only of filling up all vacancies in their own body, but likewise of chusing those persons who composed the tribunal of the hundred z; were, under the suffectes, e at the head of this tribunal; and had, in a great measure, the lives, fortunes, reputations, &c. of all the citizens depending upon them. Aristotle z informs us, that the Carthaginian centumvirate answered in several respects to the ephori at Sparta; but,

P Arist. ubi fupra. 9 Polyb. l. vi. г Arist. ubi fupra. Ub. Emm. Hendr. Polyb. Liv. Just. &c. pafi. в Ub. Емм. & Hendr. ubi fupra. г Arist. ubi fupra. п Polyb. l. vi. w Justin. l. xix. Arist. ubi fupra. х Idem ibid. з Idem ibid. з Idem ibid.

(G) According to Livy (27), there was a council formed of such ienators, as were the most venerable and eminent for their wisdom, who were called feniores, seniorum principes, or simply, as Justin (28) intimates, principes. This council was in the highest repute at Carthage, on account of the vast influence it had over the senate (29). Recourse was therefore had to it in all cases of an extraordinary nature. It is not improbable, that this council was Aristotle's centumvirate, as being invested with great authority, and consisting of a pretty large number of members. Livy tells us (30), that thirty of these were deputed to wait upon Scipio, and fue to him in the most submissive terms for a peace with Rome. Polybius likewise makes a distinct on between these and the other senators; for he says, that among the prisoners taken at New Carthage by Scipio, there were two [ex this yegarias] belonging to the assembly of old men, and fisteen [ex this oulsahits] of the senate (31). In other authors, the senate, or at least this most venerable part of it, went by appellations equivalent to the optimates and patres conscripts of the Romans (32).

(27) Liv. l. xxx. (28) Just. l. xi. c. 31. (29) Liv. ubi supra. (30) Idem ibid. Vide & Q. Curt. l. iv. c. 3. edit. Amst. 1677. (31) Polyb. l. x. (32) Appian. in Libyc. Died. Sic. l. xx.

a with submission to this philosopher, we think the quinquevirate should be substituted in its room, as having a better title to the comparison: for b with regard to the ephori, first, they were the most despotic magistrates in Sparta, their authority being, in a manner, boundless, and the lives, fortunes, &c. of all the Lacedamonians almost intirely depending upon their will and pleasure; which may be e said of the quinquevirate in Carthage, with more reason than of the centumvirate. Secondly, the centumvirate was perpetual 4; but whether the quinquevirate was so or not, is uncertain-Now, the ephori were elected annually . Thirdly, the ephori were five in number f, and so were the quinquevirs. Fourthly, an universal administration of justice, with regard to individuals, was the province of the quinquevirate at Carthage 8, as it was b of the ephori at Lacedamon; whereas the inflitution of the centumvirate was intended only at first as a curb to the authority of their generals h, by calling them to an account for their conduct on their return from the campaign, tho' afterwards it extended to many branches of civil affairs. From which considerations it is probable, that the council of five in Carthage, rather than the tribunal of the hundred, resembled the Lacedamonian ephori. The great authority annexed to the quinquevirate, gave the Carthaginian state i the appearance of an oligarchy, tho, as the members of this council discharged the duties of their function without any salary or reward, and were elected freely by suffrages, not by lot (H), it had likewise the resemblance of an aristocracy k. Ubbo Emmius 1 thinks, that the suffetes presided in this council, and e the centumvirate, as well as in the senate, being the chief magistrates concerned in the administration of justice. If so, their office was, in all probability, perpetual, till the time of Hannibal ", by whose influence a law passed, whereby it was enacted, that all the judges should be chosen annually; with a clause, that none should continue in office beyond that term. This last observation will point out to us the reason why the supreme magistrates at Carthage were called suffetes, and enable us to trace up that institution to its first source (I).

THE

b Univ. hist. vol. ii. p. 574. CARIST. ubi supra. Vide etiam Ub. Emm. & Hendr. ubi supra. Arist. ubi supra. Liv. l. xxxiii. Vide etiam Rollin. in hist. anc. des Carthag. sect. 3. Univers. hist. vol. ii. p. 574. Univers. hist. & Arist. ubi supra. Univers. hist. Ub. Emm. & Aristot. ubi supra. Us. Emm. & Hendr. ubi supra. Arist. ubi supra. Idem ibid. Ub. Emm. ubi supra. Idem ibid.

(H) The Carthaginian republic, in this respect, followed the Lacedamonian, in which the senate, ephori, &c. were elected by suffrages or votes (33). On the contrary, at Athens the senate, prytanes, &c. were all chosen by lot. This last method of electing was peculiar to the democratical form of government, as the former was to the aristocratical. The manner in which the Athenians chose their magistrates and rulers by lot, has been already described in the former part of this history (34); and the Lacedamonian election of civil officers has been fully handled by Cragius. It may not be improper here to repeat, that Solon was the Athenian legislator, and Lycurgus the Lacedamonian.

(1) Scaliger, in his notes upon Festus, derives this word from the verb TDY tzaphah, he looked from on high, or, he overlooked others, and so makes it agree in fignification with the Greek equest, existing, existing, &c. (35). But this, notwithstanding it has some appearance of truth, is not so easy and grammatical as Bochart's etymon. That learned man, after the great Selden, will have suffectes to be the same word with DIDIW sophetim, or so setting, judges, magistrates, &c. which notion is absolutely confirmed, not only by what we have advanced, but likewise by Paulus, Calidius, and Festus (36). If this be allowed, it cannot well be denied, that the Carthaginian suffectes resembled very much the old judges of the Israelises, who governed that nation from the death of Joshus to the election of Saul, the first king of Israel. We say, this cannot well be denied; for these old judges were called in Historew sophesium, or sofesium, for which reason the Historews always styled the book of judges sophesium; and this very government stourished in the neighbourhood of Tyre, the mother of Carthage. We may therefore reasonably presume, that the Carthage may therefore reasonably presume, that the Carthage inimals borrowed their suffectes either from Tyre, or immediately from the Israelites themselves, by whom some of their ancestors the Canaanises were at first expelled their country in the time of Joshus, and others in the time of David, after they had, for a considerable period, been contiguous to them. If the Carthaginians derived this institution from the Tyrians, these last probably received it from the Israelites their neighbours. However this may be, it is certain such magistrates as these were in Tyre after the destruction of the old city by Nebuchadnezzar; for Josephus, in his treatise against Apien, has given us a series of them (37). It ought to be observed, that but one person was invested with the supreme authority amongst the Hebrews during the government of the sophetim, which was likewise the custom at Tyre; and therefore it is natural to suppose, that it was so originally at Carthage also (38). The Romans had very inadequate ideas of the Carthaginian government in general, and of their magistrates in particular; and therefore we cannot absolutely depend upon their accounts of them. Yet even from some of these it seems not (33) Aristot de repub. & Nic. Cragius de rep. Lacedam. l. ii. c. 1. (34) Univers. bist. vol. ii. p. 440. Car. Sigon. de rep. Athen. l. ii. c. 3. & Nic. Crag. ubi supra. (35) Scalig. in Fest. sub. voc. susces. (36) Seld. de diis Syris, in prolegem. c. 2. Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 24. Paulus & Calid. apud Fest. sub voc. susces. (37) Joseph. cons. Apion. l. i. (38) Jud. ii. 18, 19. & iii, iv, vii, &c. Joseph. ubi supra.

Civil officers at Carthage.

THE principal, if not only, civil officers established at Carthage (besides the a suffectes) that have been remembered by the antients, were the prætor, the quæstor, and the censor.

The prator.

THE great Hannibal, who, by reason of his glorious atchievements, as well as noble extraction, was the most illustrious of the Carthaginians, had the prætorship a conferred upon him in the fifth year after the conclusion of the second Punic war; from whence it is evident, that this must have been one of the first imployments in The person invested with this high dignity had a vast influence, not only the state. in passing, but likewise in repealing of laws, as may be inferred from Hannibal's impeaching the whole bench of judges, and carrying his point against them, during his continuance o in this office. He moreover p received the tribute paid by the dif- b ferent nations under the Carthaginian power; collected the yearly taxes and subsidies levied upon the citizens, and had the care of every thing relating to the public reve-It is remarkable, that a transition 9 from the office of sufferes (after it became annual) to the prætorship, was not uncommon in Carthage; of which Hannibal and Mago, not to mention other instances that might be produced, supply us with abundant proof. Whether there were more prætors than one in this republic, or whether any branches of business, besides those above-mentioned, pertained to the office, are points that, for want of sufficient light from antiquity, cannot be determined.

The quaffor.

The quæstor was an officer belonging to the bench of judges, who, tho' subordinate to them, had a very considerable degree of power. He' likewise collected c and managed the public money, under the prætor; which induced Livy to give him the name of quæstor. This officer, in his double capacity, seems to have answered to the old Roman quæstors, who were introduced under the regal government, as well as those who were appointed in the time of the commonwealth. He was sometimes at least, if not of course, admitted into the bench of judges, at the expiration of his office. This, and the other particulars, we learn from Livy and Polybius; but as to any thing further, either concerning him or his function, we are intirely in the dark

The censor.

We find another civil officer established at Carthage, whose business it was to inspect into the manners of the citizens; on which account he is styled by Cornelius d Nepos w, the præsect of manners, or the censor. Hamilcar x, the father of Hannibal, tho' the first man in the republic, could not escape this inspection; for the censor took from him a beautiful youth, named Asarbal, on a report that he was more familiar with this youth than was consistent with modesty; from whence we may conclude,

n Idem ibid. & UB. Emm. ubi sup. Liv. ubi sup. P Idem ibid. UB. Emm. & Hendr. ubi sup. Hendr. ubi sup. Idem ibid. UB. Emm. & Hendr. ubi sup. Hendr. ubi sup. Idem ibid. Ub. Emm. & Hendr. ubi sup. Idem ibid. Ubivers. hist. vol. iv.p. 473. in not. W. Corn. Nep. in vit. Hamile. Idem ibid.

improbable, that one of the suffetes, even towards the decline of Carthage, had a greater share of power than the other; which is a fort of proof, that at first the power of the suffetes was lodged in a single hand. Fustin calls Hanno the prince, or principal person, of Carthage. Cornelius Nepos gives Hannibal the name of prætor; Livy and Gellius of dictator. 'Tis plain Hannibal was by far the greatest man in the city, because he over-ruled all the other magistrates, when he limited the power of the whole bench of judges. Festus says the sufes (or, according to the Carthaginian pronunciation, sufet, as appears from the genitive case sufetis) was the supreme magistrate of Carthage. And lastly, from some inscriptions in Gruter, it is clear, that several cities in the suprementations in Gruter, it is clear, that several cities in the suprementations in Gruter, it is clear, that several cities in the suprementations in Gruter, it is clear, that several cities in the suprementation of the suprem Africa had each of them a sufes (39). The old Archontic government, that took place at Athens after the death of Codrus, seems likewise to have been of this form. We find fome little variation in the Carthaginian word suffetes from the Hebrew sophetim, which is owing partly to the Latin termination, and partly to the affinity betwixt the Punic language and the Syriac. That ES is a Latin plural termination, needs no proof; and that the Punic language was near akin to the Syriac, though it borrowed most of its words from the Hebrew, is evident, not only from the nature of the thing, but likewise from the authority of St. Ferom, St. Augustin (40), and Prifcian. What therefore the Hebrews wrote fophetim, the Carthaginians, in all probability, wrote suphetin, or emphatically suphete (NDDIW) & or E being the emphatical masculine plural termination in Syriac, as P or IN was the absolute one. The Hebrew vau cholem, or O, answered to the Syriac and Punic V (41); and though the MSS of Livy and Nepos have Suffeses with a double F, yet, from the authority of Festus, Calidius, and the above-mentioned inscriptions, they ought to be corrected, the true reading being undoubtedly sufetes with a single F. We have been a little more prolix than usual in this note, because we take the subject of it to be of a very curious nature, and fuch a one as may lead us to farther discoveries both in sacred and profane history.

(39) Justin. l. xxi. Corn. Nep. in Hannib. Liv. l. xxiii. & l. xxxiii. A. Gell. l. x. c. 52. Fest. sub voc. suites. Gruver. p. 470. inscript. 1, 2. edit. Grev. Amst. 1707. (40) D. Hieron. com. ad Jerem. v. D. Aug. l. iii. cont. lit. Petil. Donat. & Priscian. l. v. (41) Vide Boch. Chan. l. i. c. 24. & fos. Scalig. in Fest. sub voc. suites.

a that the power of this magistrate extended to every subject of the state, even those of the greatest figure and distinction.

As for the Carthaginian laws, our readers must not expect any regular system of The Carthagithem. The utmost we can pretend to is, to give them a few fragments, or rather manlaws. traces of an inconfiderable part of these laws. They have all long since been buried in oblivion; nor have even the titles of any of them, but what we here produce, escaped the general wreck of time.

1. THERE was a law of very long standing amongst the Carthaginians v, by which Children of the they were injoined to facrifice to Saturn only children nobly born. This, not being best families complied with for a certain period, grew into disuse, the children of slaves and facrificed to b foreigners being substituted in the room of the others. But when Agathocles 2 reduced Saturn. Carthage almost to the last extremity, it was revived, the inhabitants imputing all their misfortunes to the anger of Saturn, who, as they imagined, was offended at the non-observance of this law. However, to arone for this crime, two hundred children of the best families in the city were offered up to that deity.

2. By another law, Ceres and Proferpina were admitted into the number of the Ceres and Pro-Carthaginian deities 2. Magnificent statues were erected in their honour; priests were serpina admitfelected from amongst the most distinguished families of the city for their service; and ted into the number of the facrifices, after the Greek manner, were offered up to them. This happened during Carthaginian the consternation the people of Carthage were thrown into by the African insur-deities.

c rection, and the ill fuccess that attended them in their war with Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse. It was done in order to appease the anger of these goddesses, whose farther referement they feared, because Himilco, the Carthaginian general in Sicily, had plundered their temples in the fuburb of Acradina.

3. ABOUT this time likewise a law was enacted at Carthage b, by which all the Greek laninhabitants were prohibited learning either to write or speak the Greek language. It sunge forbidwas hoped by this means to prevent for the future all treasonable correspondence with thage. The law was occasioned by a Carthaginian traitor, who, writing in Greek to Dionysius, had given him intelligence of the motions of the army, and particularly of its departure from the city (K). But this law was afterwards either repealed, d' or totally neglected; for we find, that the d great Hannibal himself understood this language so well, that he composed in it a history of the actions of Manlius Vulso during the time of his proconful ship in Asia e, having been taught it by Sosilus the Lacedæmonian (L).

4. It has been lately hinted, that a council was formed at Carthage f, confifting The centumviof an hundred persons taken out of the senate, whose province it was to inquire into rate instituted the conduct of their generals at the end of the campaign. Now, it cannot be supposed, to restrain the that this could any otherwise have been effected, than by a law passed for that pur-Carthaginian pose. The ends proposed by this law were, to reduce the exorbitant power of Mago's generals. family within proper bounds, which, by ingroffing all the best imployments, was e become too overgrown for the state; and to secure the republic against the great authority of its generals in all succeeding ages, who, whilst in the field, were quite despotic. It is generally believed, that this council was the same with the centumvirate, or g tribunal of the hundred, which has been already described.

5. A fort of sumptuary law was made by the Carthaginian senate, to restrain all Expences at kinds of excesses at marriages. This was occasioned by a design of Hanno, the prin-marriages limited.

y Diodor. Sic. l. xx. Plut. de superstit. & de ser. vindic. deor. Herodot. l. vii. 2 I ubi sup. Pescen. Fest. apud Lactant. inst. l. i. c. 1. 2 Diod. Sic. l. xiv. 5 Just. l. xx. ibid. 4 Corn. Nep. in vit. Hannib. 4 Idem ibid. & Plut. in Scip. 5 Just. l. xix. DIODOR. Sic. ibid. & UB. EMM. ubi fup.

(K) This traitor's name was Suniator, Suniates, or Suniatus, a protessed enemy to Hanno the Carthaginian general, and who, in order to hurt him, did not scruple an attempt to facrifice his country. He was a citizen of the first rank, and wrote to Dionyfrus in Greek, giving him advice of the military preparations making against him, as weil as the inca-pacity of Hanno for the post he was in; but his letter being intercepted, he received the punishment due to his crime (42).

(L) This Sofilus, with Philenius or Silenus, another Lacedamonian, attended Hannibal in all his expeditions. That general fpoke Greek with a tolerable fluency, and is faid to have written other books in this language, besides the work here mentioned. Sosilus and Silenus undertook to write the history of their hero; but whether or no they executed that defign, is not known. If they did, we are never the better for it; fince not a fragment of either of their pieces has come down to us (43).

(43) Vide Corn. Nep. in vit. Hannib. (42) Justin. l. xx. Ubb. Emm. ubi sup. apud Gronov. p. 511. (43) Vide Corn. Nep. in vit. Hanniedit. Lugd. Bat. 1734. p. 604. not. c. Cie. de divin. l. xxiv. Liv. l. xxvi. Voss. de hist. Grac. l. iii. p. 413.

ripal person in the city, to make himself master of the commonwealth upon the day a of his daughter's marriage. In order to this, his intention was to keep open house for the populace that day, and to regale the senate in a most magnificent manner. All the members of this last were to have been taken off by poison at this entertainment, which would have enabled him to feize upon the government without oppo-Hanno, upon account of his great wealth and power, had such an influence in the city, that the senate, upon the discovery of this plot, did not think proper to punish him for it; but contented themselves with passing the law here mentioned b.

Defects in the Carthaginian constitution.

BEFORE we conclude our account of the political state of Carthage, it may not be amis to take notice of a few defects in that constitution, as Aristotle himself has pointed them out to us (M).

FIRST, The philosopher looked upon it as an imperfection in this commonwealth, that when the members of the fenate were not unanimous in their voices, the power of deciding thereby devolved on the people; for this he intimates to be contrary to the maxims of all well regulated states, as tending too much to popular government.

SECONDLY, He will have it, that the quinquevirate, or, as he terms it, the pentarchy, enjoyed a degree of power inconfishent with the nature of a true aristocracy, which either originally was, or at least was intended to have been, a principal ingredient in the Carthaginian constitution.

THIRDLY, He reckons it an evil, that merit and a conspicuous birth, without riches, were not sufficient qualifications for a man to fill the first posts; for this, in c his opinion, does not only oftentimes exclude persons of the most exalted merit from having any share in the government, but likewise opens a door to avarice, and all kinds of corruption, which, in the end, must ruin any state. The experience of after-ages shewed this reflection of his not to have been ill-grounded; for the Barcan faction, by the omnipotence of money, carried their point on all occasions for a confiderable time; others after them did the like, which at last proved the republic's

FOURTHLY, He will by no means allow, that the same person should assume to himself several imployments; than which no practice was more common at Carthage. The reasons he assigns for this are, that a man possessed but of one office, is much d more capable of acquitting himself well in the execution of it; that public affairs are managed with more spirit and expedition, when the different branches of business are lodged in different hands; that different imployments frequently clash with one another; and lastly, that the welfare of every state is highly promoted by an equal distribution of its places amongst its members. All which reasons are indisputably just, especially the last; since nothing more strongly excites an emulation amongst men of merit, than an impartial disposal of the preferments in a state amongst them, nor more effectually prevents all those inconveniencies which must be the necessary consequence of one man's monopolizing the whole administration.

FIFTHLY, He blames the Carthaginian constitution in general, for not having a e fufficient provision made in it against all popular commotions, or acts of violence, that at any time might happen. Should a majority of the citizens at any time have

b Justin. l. xxi.

ARISTOT. ubi fupra.

(M) Since we follow Ariflotle here in reciting the defects of this state, it will be but just, by way of contrast, to touch upon two things, which may be confidered as excellencies in it.

1. The Carthaginians had public meals or enter-tainments, which feem to have been appointed at first in imitation of the Lacedamonian phiditia, and in order to serve the same ends (44). The phiditia were one of the most useful institutions of Lycurgus, which, 'tis imagined, he received from Crete, cause they went at first by the Cretan name Andria. They were intended to repress all kinds of luxury; to form the minds of the Lacedamonian youth, by inspiring them with virtuous sentiments; and to excite a noble emulation amongst them. At these meals young people were instructed by their seniors in the art of conversation, heard the most useful topics frequently discussed, and had always before them shining examples of wisdom and virtue. But it is sufficient just to have hinted this here, since an ample account of the institution itself has been given in its proper place (45).

2. The Carthaginians had a laudable custom amongst them, of sending colonies from time to time into different parts of their dominions (46). This procured a decent settlement for several citizens, for whom there was no room in the state; provided for the necessities of the poor; and carried off great numbers of people, who were always prepared for innovations. All which falutary precautions must not a little contribute to the preservation of the public tranquillity.

(44) Aristot. de repub. l. ii, c. 11. (45) Univers. hist. vol. ii, p. 562. Vide etiam foan. Meurs. miscel. Laconic. l. i. Plut. in Lycurg. Strab. l. x. Arist. ubi supra, c. 9, 10. Porphyr. de abst. l. iv. Macrob. sas. c. vii. c. 3. & Dicaarch. apud Athen. deipnosoph. l. iv. (46) Aristot. ubi sup. c. 11. sub sin.

a taken it into their heads to revolt, or be angry with their governors, the laws (N), according to him, could not have afforded a fufficient relief on fuch an occasion. This constitution, indeed, as we have already observed from him, was at first excellently calculated to prevent or avoid all intestine disorders; but it was not so well contrived, at least in his time, to allay any heats that might break out in it. He therefore feems justly to conclude, that the tranquility and repose of the subjects of Carthage were not then settled upon a solid foundation.

THE Carthaginians being descended from the Tyrians, their religious worship must Religion of the of course have agreed in all points at first with that of the Phanicians, which has been Carthaginians.

already in some measure described k. In process of time, by their intercourse with the b Greeks, especially those of Sicily, they came to take a liking to the superstition of that nation, adopted several new deities before to them unknown, and intermixed some of the Greek religious ceremonies with the Tyrian m. But in this they copied after their ancestors the Phanicians, who gradually imbibed many superstitious notions prevailing amongst the greater states ", by reason of their vicinity to, and correspondence with them; and afterwards, upon their subjection to those states, had great alterations made in the whole system of their religion. The Carthaginians likewise, by reason of their extended commerce, must have been in some fort acquainted with the different kinds of superstition established in most nations, with which doubtless they tinctured their own; so that from hence, as well as from other considerac tions, it may appear, that the religion of Carthage was a very gross and multifarious idolatry.

THE knowledge we have of the Cartbaginian manner of worship, as well as the objects of that worship, is derived from the Greek and Roman writers, who have affixed the names of their own gods ot those of the Carthaginians. This has rendered their accounts and observations on this head more imperfect and less valuable; for though we are well affured, that the Egyptian, Phanician, Greek, Roman, and Carthaginian deities did in the main agree, yet we are as well affured, that each of those nations had not only some particular modes of worship, but likewise some particular deities peculiar to itself. Tis impossible therefore to come to an exact knowd ledge of the Carthaginian gods from what is delivered of them by the Greek and Roman authors. All that we can do is, to consider their different attributes, and the circumstances attending that adoration their votaries paid them, as given us by the aforesaid authors. By comparing these with what we find related in holy writ of the idols of the Canaanites, and neighbouring nations, as well as the religious customs and manners of those nations, we may, perhaps, give our readers a tolerable account of the religion of the Carthaginians.

Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the Carthaginians, in a particular manner, adored Saturn the Chronus P; who, according to Quintus Curtius q, and an infinity of other authors, principal deity, was the Saturn of the Latins. The facrifices offered up to him were children of the e most distinguished families, as has been above observed. Upon the signal defeat of the Carthaginian army by Agathocles, three hundred citizens voluntarily sacrificed themselves, in order to render him more propitious to their country. Diodorus sarther fays, that they had a brazen statue or colossus of him, the hands of which were

m Idem ibid.

P Diodor. Sic. th Univ. hift. vol. i. p. 397—404.

DIODOR. SIC. I. XIV. AA. CO.

HEROD. POLYB. DIOD. SIC. LIV. QUINT. CURT. aliiq; mult. l. xx. & alibi paff. Q. CURT. l. iv. c. 3. PESCENNIUS FESTUS apud LACTANT. divin. instit. i. c. 21. aliig; multi.

(N) In this respect it seems to have been the same form of government as that introduced by Phaleas Chalcedonius, which has induced a learned man to believe, that he was the legislator of the Carthaginians (47). When he lived, Aristotle (48), Carthaginians (+7). who mentions both him and his republic, informs us not; but he must have been much later than the first formation of the Carthaginian republic; for Chalcedon itself was built near three hundred years after Carthage. However, there feems to be some foundation for the above-mentioned conjecture, as will appear from comparing Hendreich with Ariflotle

(49). It is therefore probable, that the first commonwealth settled at Carthage, which took place immediately after the abolition of monarchy, was of a different form from that which existed in Aristotle's time. This, in all likelihood, nearly resembled (if it was not exactly upon the same model) the antient Tyrian or Hebrew republic, wherein one fupreme magistrate presided. What we have adsupreme magistrate presided. vanced in a former note (50) will strengthen this supposition, and likewise itself receive additional force from it.

(47) Hendr. in Carthag. p. 329. Vid. etiam Reineccii hist. Jul. in Carthag. t. ii. p. 460. p. l. ii. c. 7. (49) Hendr. uhi sup. Arist. uhi sup. & c. 2. (50) Vid. not. (I). (48) Arist. de Vol. VI. Nº 9. extended extended in act to receive, and bent downwards in such a manner, as that a the child laid thereon immediately dropped into a hollow, where was a fiery surnace r.

The same author adds, that this inhuman practice seemed to him to confirm a tradition handed down to the Greeks from very early antiquity, viz. that Chronus devoured his own children. But in this we cannot agree with him; for it can scarce be doubted but that the sable itself owes its origin to this most execrable superstition, especially as the knowledge of it could not be hid from the antient Greeks, who received both their religion and theology from the Egyptians and Phanicians (O).

But though the Carthaginian god, to whom human victims were so agreeable, had the name of Chronus given him by Diodorus, yet we cannot certainly infer from be hence, that he was the same deity; because his Punic name is unknown, and therefore 'tis impossible to determine whether it was of the same import with Chronus, or no. However, we shall endeavour to supply this defect, by offering some reasons, which, if they will not absolutely evince the point in view, will yet render it highly probable.

1. In the first place, the Carthaginian custom of giving up their offspring as an expiatory facrifice to this god, bears a great analogy to the Greek tradition concerning Chronus, viz. that he devoured his own children. This seems to have been a great inducement to Diodorus himself to conclude, that he and Chronus were the same t.

2. BOTH the oblations offered to this Carthaginian deity, and the manner of offering them, as likewise the brazen statue mentioned by Dioderus, plainly enough shew, that he was Moloch or Milchom, the famous idol of the Ammonites, Canaanites, and neighbouring nations. The description already given of this false divinity, in conjunction with scripture, will remove all doubts as to this point. Now that Moloch or Milchom was the Chronus of Dioderus, seems clear from the following confiderations (P).

Chronns

T Diodor. Sic. ubi fup.

1 Idem ibid.

1 Idem ibid.

1 Idem ibid.

2 Univ. bift. vol. i. p. 293, 294. &c.

Lev. xviii, 21. xx, 2, 3, 4.

2 Kings, xxiii. 20.

Pfal. cvi. 37, &c.

Vid. etiam Grot. in Levit. Voss. de idololat. Le Clerk com. in Levit. Saurin's diffeourfe, and Calmer's differention on that fubject.

(O) Bishop Cumberland proves from several authors, that human sacrifices were offered to the Cabini($1); and Sanchoniatho asserts($2), that Chranus or Saturn sacrificed his son to the manes of his father, whom he had before inhumanly murdered. From which source the learned bishop derives the unnatural practice here mentioned, which prevailed for many, ages over a great part both of the eastern and western world. But the fragment of Sanchoniatho, preserved by Philo Byhlius and Eusebius, notwithstanding all the learned bishop's endeavours, as well as those of M. Founnous, to reader it intelligible, is so dark and intricate, especially in this particular, that we cannot intirely depend upon it.

(P) Nothing can be more evident than that Moloch, Milcom, Baal, Bel, Chronus, &cc. are all words of the same signification. They denote a king or prince. Chronus, in particular, does so. The word IP keren or kren properly imports a horn, which was an emblem of power and dominion amongst the eastern nations. From theore undoubtedly our English word crown is to be deduced, or at least the Lasis cerona, if it should be thought more proper to derive the English word from this. It might likewise, for aught we know to the contrary, anticuly have signified a crown, since all the eastern princes were, from the earliest antiquity, adorned with that entign of royalty; and Tertullian (53) tells us, that Chronus was the first who wore it. Eupelsmus, as preserved to us by Alexander Polybistor in Eusebius, Theophilus Antiochenus, and Da-mascius, compared with seripture, render it incontestably clear, that Chromus, Maloch, and Baal, were the same person (54). We shall beg leave here to consider a difficult passage of scripture, which is not at all foreign to our present subject (55). In the original it is; mid that we will not not a the series of the series of the series of the series of the series of the series of the series of the series of the series of the series of the series of the series of the letter, is; But ye have born the tabernacle of your (god) Moloch, and (yo have likewise born) Chiun your likewesses, the slav of your god, which ye made to yourselves (56), St. Luke's (or rather the Septuagint) version of this into Greek, is; Kai dyelasses with year of your to make to be thus rendered; Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and Remphan the slave hat tabernacle of Moloch, and Remphan the slave to worship them. Our readers will observe, that this is different from the common English translation, which has it; Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, signess which ye made to worship them. Now surely no, one can helitate a moment in determining which of these is the most eligible. The first, in agreement with the original Hebrew, makes St. Luke to drelare, that Remphan is the name of the sar, not of the god. The second, in contradiction to the Hebrew, will have him to assert, that Remphan or Chium is the name of the star; which is itself a sufficient reason for our rejection of (51) Cumberland in append. de Cabir. (52) Idem ibid. & in Sanchoniath. p. 134—157. (53) Tertul. de corona. (54) Apud Buseb. de prap. Evang. l. ix. Theoph. Antiochen. ad Antolyc. l. iii. Danascius in vit. Isidor. fer. vii. 31. & xix. 5. Isii. xxxvi. 19. & xxxvii. 12 & alibi. pass. (55) Amoi. v. 26. (56) Afb. vii. 43.

2 Chronus w had, for a considerable period, even amongst the old inhabitants of Latium, human victims offered up to him, as Moloch had in Palestine.

w Macrob. Saturn. I. i. c. 7. Ovid. in fast. Lactant. de sals. relig. k i; Seld. de diis Syt. Syntag. t. c. 6. Daw. Clasenius in theol. gent. I. iii. c. 4. Scherlog. antiq. bibl. de Moloch. Geus. de victim. human. p. m. 64. Ravanell. biblioth. sact. Buxtorf. lex. p. m. 108. Fag. annot. in targ. Onkel. Lev. xviii. 21. B. Salom. Glass. phil. s. p. m. 1617. Athanas. Kirch. in Oedip. Ægypt. I. i. s. 4. c. 15. p. 328. & in prod. Copt. c. 5. p. 147.

Besides, the common translation infinuates, that Moloch and Remphan, or Chiun, were different deities: whereas, according to ours, they were the same; fince it makes Chiun and Remphan the names of that star, which the Arabians and Egyptians appropriated to the falle deity, called by the Ammo size, Canaanites, &c. by way of eminence, Moloch. And how confonant this is to the general voice of antiquity, may be seen from the plan we are now upon. The fun, moon and stars were the first objects of false worship; afterwards the deification of dead men took place (57). The Egyptians and Arabians adhered to the former species of false worship longer than the Canaanises and Phamicians. However, all those nations agreed in this, that, from very early antiquity, they formed a mixed kind of idolatry, made up of the worship of the stars and dead men. In consequence of which, they assigned a planet to each of the chief of their deified worthies, thinking this the greatest honour they could do them. highest and most remote of the planets is known to be Sasurn, whom the old Egyptians called either Remphan, Raphan, Ramphan, Rephan, Rempha or Repha; but the Arabians, Civan or Ciwan, (from whence the Habrew Chian) as the Turks, Arabs, and Persians, do at this day. The Ammonites, Idumaans, and Canaanies, though they had a knowledge of this planer, and confidered him as conjoined with a deified prince, yet they adored this prince under a bodily representation; whereas the Arabians and Egyptians paid divine honours to the star, with which they imagined him conjoined. Hence it came to pais, that the former addressed themselves to an image or flatue, and the latter to a flar, tho' they all of them intentionally pointed at the fame object. Now the If nelises had learned the Egyptian isolatry during their shode in Egyps, and that of the Arabinas while they were in Arabia Persas, or at least its neighbourhood, where they worshipped the false god at present under consideration; and so at the same time they were upon the borders of the Camanine, with whom doubless they had forme hind of intercourfe, 'tis natural to suppose, that shoy were likewise mitiated in their form of superthing. This will account for their having with them the Camanitife image of Molech, in a small portable temple, or tabornacle, carried either on mens shoulders, or by cosen; and a star painted on the inside of this tabernacle, or upon the idol itself, in compliance with the Egyptian and Arabian custom.

Mircher tells us, that the name of Saturn amongst the modern Copas in Rophun; from whence Bochura infexs, that the Septuagine rendered Chins by Rephan, because they made their vertica in Egypt, where this would denoted the fame planet that Chins did in Arabis and Phomice (98). The same author likewife informs us, that Moloch fignified in the old Egypthen language Mars (59). But as Melech was a making, not an Egyptim word; as he proves his affertion only from a modern Copro-Arabi hay MS. purchased at Alexandria by Sig. Pietro della Walls in the year 1619, and by affirming, that the Egypsian Murs, Ofris, Typhon, the Persian Mithras, Stc. were the same deity, which is a palpable abfurdity, we think little regard in this last point is to be paid to him. Some will have the god of the Syrians, called by the Septengins and the Masorets, Rimmon, according to the Syriac form Remvan, to have been the Remphan of St. Luke, as well as the Rephan of the Septuagint (60). Now Saturn is the highest of the planets, as the name seems to import, and therefore might be Rimmon or Remvan.
This god was moreover, without dispute, the Moloch and Baal of the Ammonites, Canaanites, &cc. the Bel of the Babylonians, the Chronus of the Greeks, &c. and a deity very well known in the countries where both the Septuagint and St. Lake wrote. Bishop Cumberland imagines Saturn to have been called Rephas or Rephan, because he was of a healthful constitution, long life, large stature, and great strength, all which the Hebrew word MD7 includes in the idea it conveys to us (61). He farther observes, that all his descendants, who resembled him herein, were denominated Rephaim; which the Septuagint in fome measure confirm, by rendering Rephaim, vivailes, giants, alluding to the superiority of strength and constitution they enjoyed. We must not omit remarking, that, in conformity to our translation of the Greek passage in the Sepanagins and St Szephen's speech, the Syriac version in Ames v. 26. makes Moloch and Chinn to be the same; nor that Jonathan's targum expressy calls Chine a star. Some critics have derived China and Rephan or Remphan from two Orlental roots implying the fame thing, i. e. the great principle of life and exiftence; which is not very different from the notion of Sasura to be found in the verses of Orphens. Others have believed, that I'D before the time of the Majorites was read Chivan, and that the foot of the initial letter soph being defaced, it appeared to the LXX elders like refle, who therefore promounced it Rephan (62). But this is too bold a criticism, especially as St. Lake has so closely followed this aforesaid elders, and as Diodorne Sicusius mentions a most opulent king of Egypt named Bemphis, who Sourished in very early times (63). This last is a full proof, that Remphis or Remphis was an Egyptian proper name of very high antiquity; if not, that this king was the Egyptian Saturn, or at least was worshipped under the form of the planet so called. It likewise proves, that St. Luke's Rempha or Rem can is preferable to the Ropha of Rephan of the LXX. as alfo, that the modern Copis have borrowed their Rophan from the latter, since they have not the true Egyptian name, but one that is a corruption of it, taken from forme corrupted copy, which can be no other than one of the LXX. whose original reading, we doubt not, was Rempha or Remphan. Neither is it at all improbable, that the fame people have taken the name Moloch (a Phoenician or Hebren word) from the same passage of this version, and, through ignorance, applied is to the planet Mars. What gives great weight to this conjecture is, that the notion itself is intirely repagnant to the whole stream of antiquity; and that Vettius Valens Artio-chome and Julius Firmiens politicly declare, that the Egyptian or Coptic names of the planet Mars were Artes and Pyrois (64).

(57) Herod. Diod. Sic. Plata, Chron. Alex. Plut. Maimonides, Hyde, Prideaux, aliq; multi. (58) Athan.
Rircher in prod. Copt. c. 5. p. 140. & in Oedip. Ægyptiac. tom. i. 6. 4. v. 25. Boch. phal. l. i. o. 15. (59) Ideau ibid. (60) Vid. synops. Criticor. in Am. v. 26. & Act. vii. 43. ut & Dan, Clasen. in theol. gent. l. ii. c. 4. (61) Cumberland on Sanchoniach. rem. 2. (62) Synops. criticor. abi sup. (63) Diod Sie. l. i. (64) Vertins, Valens Antioch. apud Seld; de dits Syr. syntag. 1. & Jul. Firmic. ibidem.

THE Cretans *, in antient times, facrificed children to Chronus, as the Canaan- a ites and Phanicians did to Moloch.

Molocby was the principal god of the country in which his worship prevailed, as appears from his name, which implies fovereignty in it, from his having fuch particular notice taken of him in scripture, and from the intimation given in holy writ, that he was the great god of the Ammonites. Now Chronus was the chief object of adoration in Italy, Crete, Cyprus, Rhodes, and all other countries where divine honours were paid him (Q).

LASTLY, to omit many other arguments that might be produced, both Moloch and Chronus were indisputably the great Baal, Bel a or Belus of the Sidonians, Babylonians, and Assyrians, and consequently the same individual deity.

3. Baal b, Belus, Bal or Bel, (for he was known by all these names) was the great god of the Carthaginians. As it is therefore apparent from scripture', that he was delighted with human facrifices, and as he was the Chronus of the Greeks, 'tis evident from hence, that the Carthaginian divinity Diodorus had in view must have been really Chronus.

4. From feveral traces to be found in the proper names of Carthage, we may discover, that the deity under confideration was known there by the two appellations Baal and Moloch, as in the east. Hanni-bal, Asdru-bal, Maber-bal, &c. point out Baal or Bal; as Hi-milce, Hi-milco, Ha-milcar, Melicus e, Malchus f, &c. do Moloch or Mil-These therefore being different names of the same deity, who was the Chronus c of the Greeks, it must be allowed, that Chronus or Saturn was not only worshipped, but likewise looked upon as the principal god at Carthage (R).

The

y Univ. hist. vol. i. p. 293. * Istrus in collect. sacrific. & DAN. CLASENIUS ubi sup. * Vossius de idololat. Ovid. Macrob. Istr. Porphyr. Seld. Clasen. &c. ubi fup. a Jer. xix. 5. & alibi. Seld. de dis Syr. ubi fup. Vossius ubi fup. l. ii. c. 5. Vid. etiam Lud. Viv. ad D. August. de civ. Dei. l. vii. c. 9. Cumberland on Sanchoniath. p. 152. Suid. subvoc. Beél. hathor. supra laudat. & Serv. in Æn. i. Isidor. origin. l. viii. &c. g. Jer. xix. 5. & alibi. d. Vid. author. supra laudat. & Cumberland on Sanchoniath. Seld. de diis Syr. &c. Vid. & ipsum Sanchoniath. apud Euseb. de præp. Evang. l. i. c. 10, &c. SIL. Italic. l. 3. f. Gronov. thesaur. ant. Græc. tom. ii.

(Q) A strong argument in favour of what is here advanced may likewise be drawn from the general homage paid to Saturn, as the principal of the gods in most countries. He seems to have been known to the Gauls, Scythians, Celtes, Africans, and even the most barbarous nations. Human sacrifices were offered up to him where-ever his worship took place, tho' this did not continue long amongst the Greeks and Romans, whose natural sentiments of humanity and compassion soon became too strong to permit them to tolerate so infernal a practice. The solemnities observed at the offering up of human victims to the Carthaginian god (whose name we may reafonably suppose was either Baal or Moloch, or both) answered pretty nearly to those observed by the Canamites on the like dire occasion, as we learn from Plutarch (64). This is a further presumption, that the Phænician Moloch, and this deity, were the same. 'Tis an ingenious conjecture of Banier (65), that the Ammonises worshipped the seven planets in the idol of Moloch jointly, as well as Saturn, his proper star, and the fun fingly.

(R) It is believed by some, that Saturn or Baal was the fun, Baaltis or Astarte the moon, and that these were the only deities of the eastern nations. But this we cannot allow; for notwithstanding the fun and moon were two of the most noted objects of false worship, and possibly the first, yet we think it undeniable, that the Orientals had other false gods, in very antient times. From scripture we learn, that the nations bordering upon God's people worshipped the sun, moon, and other planets, in very early ages (66). Philip's treaty with the Carthaginians, a copy of which is preserved to us by Polybius (67), renders it indisputable that this people had other deities besides the two luminaries above-mentioned, some of which were planets distinct from them. But we shall endeavour to trace up this planetary worship to its first source, or as near it as possible. God created the world, or this system, in fix days, and rested the seventh (68). This was the foundation of the Antediluvian as well as the Hebrem week; and seems to be the reason that the number feven was so remarkable both amongst the Antediluvians and the Hebrews. Vengeance seven-fold was denounced against any person that should slay Cain (69); Noah was commanded to take unto him the clean beafts by fevens (70); the fowls of the air also by fevens (71); God foretold to him the beginning of the deluge (72) feven days before it happened; the same patriarch sent a dove out of the ark a second time to explore feven days after the first (73), and a third time feven days after this; Abimelech received feven ewe-lambs of Abraham, as a testimony that a well belonged to him (74); Jacob served Laban for Rachel seven years (75); Pharach in his dream saw seven fat and seven lean kine come out of the river, portending (76) so many years of plenty and famine; Elijah fent his fervant feven times towards the fea, to discover the cloud that was forming itself for rain (77); his successor Elisha ordered Naaman the Syrian to wash himself seven times in the river fordan, in order to be cured of his leprosy (78), Oc. Now 'tis observable, that there is a surprising analogy betwirt the days of the original week, and the system then created.

(64) Plutarch de superstit. Seld. ubi sup. & Scalig. in epist. ad Casaub. (65) Vid. Fourmont ref. crit. $\tilde{t}$ i $\tilde{t}$ 357. & Banier in mythol. $\tilde{t}$, vii. $\tilde{c}$. (66) 2 Kings xxiii. $\tilde{s}$. (67) Polyb. $\tilde{t}$, vii. (68) Gen. i. ii. &c. (69) Gen. iv. 15. (70) Gen. vii. 2. (71) Gen. viii. 3. (72) Gen. vii. 4. (73) Gen. viii. 10, 12. (74) Gen. xxii. 28, 29, 30. (75) Gen. xxix. 18, 27. (76) Gen. xli. 2, 3. (77) 1 Kings xviii. 43. (78) 2 Kings v. 10, 14. (65) Vid. Fourmont ref. crit. (68) Gen.

THE goddes Calestis or Urania was held in the highest veneration by the Car- The goddess thaginians. The prophet Jeremiah & calls her Baaleth Shemain the queen of heaven, Shipped at Care i. e. Juno Olympia; Megasthenes, in Eusebius, Beltis of queen Beltis; Sanchoniatho, thage.

h MEGASTHENES & ABYDENUS apud Euseb. in chron. * Jer. vii. 18. xliv. 17. & alibi. SANCHO-MIATH. & PHILO BYBL. apud Eusen. de præp. evang. 1. i.

The fix primary planets, for the moon is the fatellite of the earth, move round the fun, which is fixed, or at rest, and together they are in number feven; this answers exactly to the six days of work or motion, and one of rest, in all seven, of which the original week did consist. Thus the Mosaic account of the creation is a symbolical description of the world or system created; and such descriptions as these were perfectly agreeable to the genius of the Grientals, especially the Egyptians, in the sirst ages, and particularly in that wherein Moses lived, as might be proved by an induction of particulars, were it in any manner necessary. Hence we have the greatest reason to imagine, that the Antediluvian as well as the Postdiluvian patriarchs, the first Egyp-sians, Chaldeans, &c. famed for their knowledge in aftronomy and aftrology, knew the number of the planets, and had names for them. Moses likewise, being learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, had undoubtedly a great share of knowledge in the celestial sciences (79). That the Egyptians had magicians and wife men, or aftrologers, amongst them a considerable, if not a long time before 'foseph's arrival in Egypt, appears from scripture, since it was a common practice in that country then to confult such persons (80) upon any extraordinary occafion; and the number feven feems likewise to have been fymbolical; from whence we may infer, that none of the planets were unknown to them, even from the first formation of their monarchy. The Chaldees or Chaldeans, Syrians, &c. agreed with the family of Abraham or Heber in the most early ages, in their computation of time by weeks, or periods of feven days (81), as well as in shewing regard to the number seven; they were likewise famed for their early application to the study of the celestial sciences, which is a good proof that they must have been acquainted with the seven planets, even from the beginning. According to Iamblichus and Syncellus, Pythagorus was taken prisoner by Cambyles in Egypt, in the first year of the fixty-fourth olympiad, i. e. about five hundred and twenty-four years before the birth of Christ. Now the learned are universally agreed, that this philosopher brought with him home from Egypt that antient system of the world which bears his name (82), and is generally believed to be the true one, and that he received this from the pillars of the first Hermes, who was almost as antient as the beginning of the Egyptian monarchy, and a most celebrated adept in the knowledge of the heavenly bodies. We must therefore allow it probable, that these bodies, and the true system of the world, were known even from the first origin of things. In order to support farther what is here advanced, it may not be improper to observe, that from the most early antiquity the planets were imagined to bear a near relation to the days of the week, fince the custom of calling the latter by the names of the former is so antient, that the beginning of it cannot be discovered. 'Tis undoubtedly as antient as the division of the day into twenty-four hours, fince the great regard paid to the planets, from a notion of their influence over all terrestrial bodies, was the cause of that division. as that division was of the order in which they succeeded one another in their government of the days of the week (83), which does not agree with their situation in our system. The case therefore feems to have been thus: There was a great ana'ogy between the days of the first, or original week, and the feven principal parts of the system then created; the former feem to have been a symbolical description of the latter. This occationed the number feven, common to both of them, to be taken great notice of by all the first inhabitants of the world. The knowledge of the planets, which was coeval with Adam, at first afforded many pleasing speculations to mankind; but afterwards became a fnare to them, and insensibly led them on to the worship of these heavenly bodies. After this took place, the same, if not a greater, regard was paid to the number feven, out of the high veneration the planets were held in amongst them. They allotted every particular hour, every particular day of the week, to the government of some one of them; and, in consequence of this, gave the name of the planet governing to the day governed. This we take to be the origin of the custom of denominating the days of the week after the planets; and confequently believe, that it was coeval, or nearly fo, with the first origin of idolatry. Alexander Aphrodiscensis affirms, that the number feven is perfect in its own nature, because God governs the earth by the feven planets (84); Pythagoras, according to Apulsius, revered it in an extraordinary manner (85), looking upon it as a number facred to religion, and pointing (86) out particularly to the feven planets; Apuleius judged it necessary, before he addressed himfelf to his most powerful god, to be immersed feven times in falt water (87), in conformity, no doubt, to the Pythagorean, i. e. the most antient Chalaean, Egyptian, &c. superstition; Aristotle infinuites, that feven is the number (88) of which the world, i. e. this system, is composed; Photius, Macrobius (89), and others, likewise declare, that seven is a religious number. From which testimonies, as well as an infinite number more that might be produced, it is abundantly evident, that the effects the antient pagan world shewed for the number seven was owing originally to the planets, and that these were adored from very remote antiquity.

As infinite power cannot be confined in its productions to any particular part of duration, and as the manner of every one of the divine operations must be calculated to serve some wise end, we may presume, that there was some final cause why the world, or this system, was created in precisely six days, which, in conjunction with a feventh, formed the first period of time. Now it will not be easy to assign a more rational one than we have hinted above, viz. that this was done with a defign to point out to the first inhabitants of the earth the principal parts of which the system then created did coulist; as likewise to remind them in a partiin Philo Byblius, Dione and Baaltis; Hesychiusk, Belthes. According to this last author, the word was applied both to Juno and Venus; and indeed in the Phanician theology, we scarce find any distinction betwirt these two deities. St. Augustin says, that Carthage was the place where Venus had established her reign ; and Virgil informs us, that Juno preferred that spot to all others, even to Samos usels m. As therefore both the Greeks and Romans had, generally speaking, one single chief divinity to preside over every particular city, country, and district, this double one must have been owing to the Phanician or Punic word above-mentioned, which included both of the aforesaid goddesses. Ashteroth and Astarte were synonymous to Urania and Baaltis, and denoted the moon as well as Venus and Juno, who was invoked in great calamities, particularly in droughts to obtain rain. The antient Greeks b frequently confound Juno, Venus, and Diana, or the moon, which is to be attributed to the Egyptians and Phænicians, from whom they received their system of religion, who seem in the most antient times to have had but one name for them all. In fuch a perplexed point as this, we shall expatiate no farther, fince it would be both fruitless and unnecessary; besides, it would carry us from our subject. Our readers will find as distinct and particular an account of the goddess or goddesses here mentioned, as they can with reason expect, in the first volume of this history. To that part therefore we refer them (S).

(81) Gen. xxix. 27. (82) Univ. hift (84) Alexander Aphrodif. in Ariflot. probl. l. 11. (82) Univ. hift. vol. i. p. 212. (80) Gen. xli. 8. (79) Att. 22. (83) Idem, p. 730. note (L). (84) Alexander Aphrodif. in Ariflot. probl. l. ii. (85) Apul. Milef. 11. (86) Vid. Joan. Meurf. Denar. Pythagor. c. 9. (87) Apul. ubi fup. (88) Ariflot. maj. me:aphyf. c. 7. & Alex. Aphrodif. in loc. (89) Photius in excerpt. e Nicom. Macrob. in fomn Scip. li. c. 6. Etymolog. magn. &c. Vide etiam Procl. in Time. l. iii. Plutarch. sympof. l. viii. c. 1. & l. ix. c. 4. Diog. Laert. in Platon. l. iii. & Jof. Laurent. de fift. & tintinnab. c. 3. apud Gronov. thef. ant. Grac. c. viii. p. 1467. Vol. VI. Nº 9.

Many deities wens antiently by the name of Belus. Besides the first Belus already taken notice of, there were several others of a later date in great repute amongst the Phanicians, particularly those of Tyre, and c of course amongst the Carthaginians. Jupiter, Mars, Bacchus, Apollo, or the sun, &c. were all of them so styled, according to the most celebrated authors who have treated of this subject. That Jupiter was worshipped by this people under the denomination of Belus or Baal, is notorious from Polybius, Menander Ephesius, and Dius P. To him they addressed their oaths, and placed him, as there is reason to believe, for the most part, at the head of their treaties. For which reason some have not scrupled to affirm, that he was the Baal Berith of Phanice; but we are rather inclined to suppose, with bishop Cumberland, that this last deity was Chronus. Mars, according to the chronicon Alexandrinum, compared with Homer and Hestiaus, an antient author cited by Eusebius; was dignified with the title of Belus by the Persians, Assyrians, and doubtless by the Carthaginians also, since he was a favourite divinity in their state, especially amongst their generals. Bacchus was called Belus by the poet Nonnus w, * Hesych. sub voc. Βήλθης. 1 D. August. in psal. xcviii. ** Virg. Æn. i. ** Tertul. ápolog. c. 23. ° Univ. hist. vol. i. p. 397—404. P Polyb. l. vii. & alibi pas. Menander Ephesius & Dius apud Joseph. antiq. l. viii. c. 2. ** M. Banier. in mythol. vol. i. ** Cumberland on Sanchoniath. p. 152. ** Homer. pas. Hestlæus apud Euseb. de præp. evang. l. ix. & apud Joseph. antiq. l. i. c. 6. Vid. etiam Selden. de diis Syr. syntag. 2. ** Polyb. ubi sup. & alibi pas. Sillatatic. l. i. ** Nonnus in Dionysiac. apud Seld. de diis Syr. synt. 2.

cular manner every feventh day, that these feven heavenly bodies were created by God, intirely dependent upon him, and therefore ought not to be esteemed as objects of adoration. The great propensity of mankind in after-ages, particularly the Hebrews, God's own people, to this species of false worship, adds no small weight to our hypothes... That the primitive week, long before the law was in being, consisted of feven days, is clear from scripture (90); as likewise, that every one of those days, in the symbolical language of the most early ages, shood for a year (91). We could pursue this point much farther, would the subject we are upon permit; but as it will not, we hope to be able to give our readers a full discussion of it in some surure part of this work; and in the mean time shall content ourselves with having suggested a sew remarkable hints in this place.

(S) Urania, Baaltis, Aflarte, &c. is by some taken to be the Isis (92) of the Egyptians; as Baal, Belus,

&c. their Osiris. The Carthaginian Juno, according to Virgil (93), had armour and a chariot, though of what form he tells us not. Servius says (94) she had a buckler as well as a chariot, and was invoked by the name of Juno Curulis. Plutarch feems to give her a spear, since he calls her Juno Curitis, curis in the Sabine language fignifying that weapon. Some are of opinion, that her chariot was a small portable tabernacle, in which her image was carried either from place to place, or in procession. 'Tis certain such tabernacles as these were in use amongst the Carthaginians. As for the etymon of Ashtaroth, Ashtoreth, or Astarte, we must refer our readers to the Phænician history (95). According to Scaliger (96), Juno was represented at Carthage sitting upon a lion, with thunder in her right hand, and a sceptre in her left. No wonder she should have been so much revered by the Carthaginians, fince she was in a particular manner the goddess of the Sidonians, their ancestors (97).

(90) Gen. xxix. 27. (91) Ibid. (92) Bishop Cumberland on Sanchoniath. & in orig. gent. ant. See also the first vol. of this hist. p. 205, 398, &c. (93) Virg. An. i. (94) Serv. in An. i. (95) Univ. hist. vol. i. p. 398. (96) Fos. Scalig. de emend. temp. (97) Univ. hist. ubi sup. Vid. etiam Apul. metam. vi. Cyprian. in lib. de idol. Solin. c. 20. Tertul. apol. c. 24. Sil. Ital. l. i. Herodian. l. v. Vost. theol. gent. l. ii. c. 21. August. in Judic. c. 7. Vost. abi sup. c. 25, 26, &c. Francisc. Florid. Sabin. in lect. subsc. l. ii. c. 7. & Herodot. l. iv.

4

d d

d

لنز

Tö

7.0

وفر

ich ich

par

部語

ΩÌ

and no wonder, since he is often taken to be the same with Jupiler (T). The nation we are discoursing of had, in all probability, some knowledge of him. Apollo, or the sun, went frequently either by this name simply, or by others, in which this made one part of the composition. Though sometimes the people of Carthage reposed great considence in him, yet we find their ancestors, the Tyrians, in a case of extremity, were dubious of him; for being apprehensive, that he intended to forsake them, and go over to Alexander, then vigorously pushing on the siege of their city, they sastened his statue with golden chains to the altar of Hercules. Neptune was likewise one of the Dis majorum gentium, or gods of the first class, of the Carthaginians. It cannot well be doubted, but that he was the Baal of Sidon, called Thablassius, or the Sea Baal, taken notice of in a former part of this history b.

THE

* Compare Nonnus, Seld. & Bochart. with Sir Isaac Newton in his chronol. p. 23, 24, 97, 98, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, &c.

* Polyb. l. vii. Diod. Sic. l. xiii.

* Univ. hift. vol. i. p. 397.

(T) In a former part of this work we observed, that Pezron derived Jupiter from the Celtic Jou, young, because the deity so called was supposed to have been the youngest son of Saturn (98). But the regard we bear to truth obliges us now to declare, that we dissent from that learned man in this particular, as well as in all the points depending upon it. We are fully satisfied, that this name is formed of the word pater, father, in conjunction with the Tetragrammaton or Jehovah, as will most evidently appear from the sollowing observations.

1. There can scarce an instance be found in all antiquity of any prince's receiving his true and proper name from so slight a circumstance as that mentioned by Pezron. That Jupiter therefore, who was so potent a prince, or rather so celebrated a deity; that he who was so frequently styled by the most antient writers the father of gods and men, should be so called, because he was his father's youngest son, is utterly improbable (99). We may therefore, after the best writers, venture to affert, that the antient Latins either took Jupiter to be a term equivalent to Baal, Deus, &c. i. e. God, Lord, &c. as Neptune was the sea Jupiter, Pluto the infernal Jupiter, &c. or by it understood the great governor of the universe himself, as the wisest of them most certainly did (100). In either of which cases it can satisfactorily be derived from no other source than the Tetragrammaton.

2. Diodorus Siculus, a very good author, where he does not too closely copy after Ctesias, as he cannot in the point before us, calls the God of Moses, the legislator of the Jews, Iao(1). This is a clear proof, that the God of Moses, or Jehova, was known to the Greeks by the name Iao, which was their pronunciation, though a corrupt one, of the Tetragrammaton. Add to this pater or father, a word which both the Greeks and Lasins affixed to Zeus and Jovis (2), and it becomes Iao-pater, which is evidently the Jupiter of the Latins. As therefore the Iao of Diodorus cannot be derived from the Celtic word Jon, so neither can Iao-pater, Iaopiter, or Jupiter, as Pezron thinks; being made up of pater and Iao, that is, of pater and the Tetragrammaton.

3. We are told by Macrobius (3), that the oracle of Apollo Clarius affirmed Iao to be the greatest of the gods, or rather the supreme God. Now this oracle was of a very high antiquity, as we learn from Strabo (4), who makes Mopsus, a samous soothsayer in the time of the Trojan war, to have lived within the verge of it. Nay, it may be collected from Macrobius (5), that it was superior in point of antiquity to Orpheus himself, which will carry us a vast way back into the mythic period of time. Æschylus also intimates, that there was a Zeus (6), or fupiter Clavius, which must undoubtedly have been the great God Iao above-mentioned. Since therefore Zeus and Iao are terms synonymous, as we have before proved Iao and Jupiter to be; this is a further argument, that these all must have had the same original, and consequently that Jupiter is not of Celtic extraction.

4. In a fragment of Philo Byblius taken from Sanchoniatho, and handed down to us by Eusebius (7), mention is made of the God levo, and of his priest ferombalus, which can have no manner of relation to the Celtic fou, because Sanchoniatho was a Phonician. Irenaus, Clemens of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Epiphanius, also evince, that the Tetragrammaton or Jehovah was written in Greek Iaou or Iau (8). Drusius moreover remarks from Porphyry, that the Ieuo of Sanchoniatho was Iao or Jehovah (9). From all which authors it appears, that the Greeks, in all probability, received this great Name from the Phonicians. As therefore the Phonician Ievo, the Greek Zeus, the Latin Jupiter, were all the same with Iao, that is, the Tetragrammaton, it can by no means be admitted, that the name Jupiter is to be deduced from the Celtic.

But it is urged in defence of this notion, that Thursday, or the day of Jove, is still called in the remains of the Celtic language Diz-Jov (10). Be it so; yet this will not come up to the point. For Diz-Jov is so very near the Lasin Dies Jovis, that every one will be apt to believe the former to have been taken from the latter, and not the latter from the former. And why may not this be the case? If the Romans made it a maxim to propagate their language where-ever they came, and even tinctured with it the languages of most countries they obliged to submit to their arms, why should it appear incredible, that several, nay, many Roman terms should have been transplanted into the old British and Armorican tongues, since the Romans were masters of the countries where they were used for several centuries, and some of their emperors were either born, resided, or died in these parts of their dominions? This is by no means improbable; especially as the word Jon in Diz-Jon bears not the least resemblance to the name of that day in the Hibernian dialect of the Celtic (11), which was unknown

(98) Univ. hift. vol. ii. p. 261. (99) Hesiod. theogon. Hom. in Iliad. pas. (100) Virg. Hor. Senec. aliiq; (1) Diod. Sic. hibliothec. hift. l. i. c. 7. (2) Homer. & Hesiod. ubi sup. & Aul. Gell. l. v. c. 12. (3) Macrob. Saturn. l. i. cap. 18. (4) Strab. l. xiii. (5) Macrob. ubi sup. (6) Æschylus in supplic. (7) Sanchoniatho apud Euseb. de prap. evang. l. i. (8) Iren. l. i. Epiphan. hares. 26. Euseb. de prap. evang. l. iv. Clem. Alexandr. strom. 5. (9) Drussus in lib. de Tetragram. Vid. & Theodoret. quast. 15. in Exod. (10) Pezron ant. nat. Celt. c. 12. (11) Lhuyd in primar. Britan. & Hibern. ling. harmonic. p. 54.

THE word Baal, in itself an appellative, at first served to denote the true God, & Baal, at first a among those who adhered to the true religion; though afterwards, when it became true God.

> to the Romans. The argument therefore would have been but of little force, even supposing the opposite opinion had been supported by no reasons at all; but as the reverse is true, as moreover we find not the least intimation of any divinity going by the name fon in any of those authors who have treated of the Druidical religion, which prevailed amongst the Celtes, it scarce deserves to be mentioned. But to proceed:

5. According to Plato, the Greek name Zens imported properly the same thing that Jehovah did, i.e. the Being of Beings, the principle of life and existence (12). This is a farther proof, nay, a most strong presumption, that these two names were originally applied to the same being.

6. Gellius affirms, that the antient Latin name of Jupiter was Jovis (13), which, supposing is to be a Latin termination, as it really is, comes very near the Tetragrammaton. This will appear to be exactly true from what follows.

7. The old Etruscans (14), who were the descendants of the most antient Pelasgi, Phanicians, and Lydians (15), called Jupiter Juve or Jove. All the earliest literary monuments of this nation now remaining have their letters drawn from the righthand to the left, after the Oriental manner (16), which is a convincing evidence of their high antiquity. Every thing considered, we look upon this as a decilive argument in favour of our opinion; and not only so, but are fully persuaded, that the true pronunciation of the Tetragammaton is hereby The Majoretical pronunciation indeed discovered. differs something from it; but undoubtedly the Etruscan Juve or Jove is many centuries older that the very being of the Masorets. Besides, as the Phænician U answered to the Hebrew O, and the Masoretical scheva is a vowel of a most rapid pronunciation, we may take for granted, that Juve or Jove, and Jehovah, are the same.

8. Seneca affures us, that the Etruscan Juve or Fove was the cause of causes, the great governor and director of the world, the principle of life and motion, and, in thort, the Deity himself (17); and that the Etruscans themselves considered him in all these views. After this, what can be offered further in support of what we advance? or indeed, what can be required of us further to offer?

But notwithstanding Jupiter was the same with the Etruscan Juve or Jehovah, and even at first, as the word (18) itself implies, the name of the supreme God in most nations; yet we pretend not to deny, that there was a king of Crete, who being, by reason of his heroic actions, deified after his death, received this name as a title the most illustrious of any that could be conferred upon him. This notion, and what we have advanced, are by no means incompatible. But still we must insist, that it ought to be considered as a title only, and not as his proper name, of which we are intirely ignorant. 'Tis evident to all persons who have made any researches into antiquity, that the neighbouring idolatrous nations did not only imitate the Hebrews in those rites which were originally of divine institution, but likewife gave several appellations to their fictitious deities, which the Hebrews, and even they themselves, whilst they remained in the true religion, appro-priated to the true God. Of this El, Baal, Adonai, and even fehovah itself, are pregnant instances. One of their false gods the Greeks called Zens, and the Latins Jupiter, whose worship was established at Carthage by Dido herself, as Justin relates (19); for which end the carried one of his priefts with her from Cyprus to Africa. Under what form the Carthaginians exhibited Saturn and Jupiter to public adoration, is no-where faid; but the manner in which Baal was represented in the east, has been already touched upon (20).

Mars, called by the Sabines Mamers, was the god of war, and, according to Vossius (21), of Oriental extraction. Sir Isaac Newton says matters (12) of ma-fors was a Phrygian word, fignifying valiant. It appears from Silius, that the Carthaginians (23) addressed their oaths to Mars as well as to Jupiter. Hannibal facrificed to this god with great folemnity, before he fet out upon the Italian expedition (24); from whence we may infer, that he was greatly reverenced by the Carthaginian generals.

Bacchus was undoubtedly in Africa, and, without question, known in Carthage; but as he was more famous in Libys, we shall deter what we have to fay of him, 'till we come to the history of that Bochart feems to think, that Apollo was originally an African deity (25). He takes him to have been the Phut of Moses, known among the Greeks by the name Pythius. The Carthaginians, when they took the city of Gela in Sicily, found a statue of Apollo of an extraordinary size (26), which they sent to their mother city Tyre; and this was the statue which the Tyrians fastened with golden chains to the altar of Hercules, when they were under an apprehenfion, that he was going over to Alexander, then besseging their city. Besides this, there was another at Carthage of an immense value, taken by Scipio at the conclution of the last siege, and, as Plutarch (27) intimates, sent to Rome. The temple of Apollo, as described by Appian, was the richest and most superbedifice at Carthage, of which we have given an account above. count above. It was placed in the forum. Valerius Maximus relates, that the hand of one who came to strip him of his golden garments was found amongst the pieces of gold cut off from him, which he mentions as an instance of his resenting sacrilege in a high manner (28). If we consider him as the fun, he was the Osiris of the Egyptians, and the Mithras of the Persians (19), and consequently the great god of all the east. The Apollo Libyous (30) will be fully confidered in a proper place.

Neptune some take to have been Japhet, the king of the isles (31), as they think appears not only from the office antiquity affigned him, but likewise from his name. He presided over earthquakes, plagues, and inundations (32); and, in order to render him propitious, the Carthaginians threw victims

(12) Conf. Hieron. Column. & G. J. Vossii not. in Enn. p. 289. ed. Hesselii Amst. 1707. cum Plat. in Cratylo. (13) Aul. Gell. l.v. c. 12. (14) Vid. suite de l'extrait de l'histoire diclomatique de M. Massei, in bibliotheque Italique, tom. troissem. art. 1. à Geneve, 1728. (15) Tab. Euzubin. 5. l. v. & alib. Vid. & tab. Eugubin. 6. apud Dempst. de Etrur. regal. tom. i. (16) Vid. moniment. & inscript. Etrusc. apud Dempst. de Etrur. regal. & P. Bonarota additament. ed. Florent. 1716. (17) Senec. natural. quest. l. ii. c. 45, 46. (18) Shuckford's connect. of the facr. and prof. bist. (19) Justin 1. xviii. (20) Univ. hist. vol. i. p. 398. not. (E). (21) Vossius in theol. gent. (22) Sir Isac Newton chronol. p. 23. (23) Sil. Italic. l. i. (24) Idem ibid. (25) Both. Phal. l. i. c. 2. (26) Univ. hist. vol. i. p. 429. (27) Plutar: h. in Flamin. (28) Val. Max (20) Strab. Suid. Hesch. Univ. hist. (20) Univ. hift. vol. i. p. 298. not. (E). (21) Vossius in theol. gent. (22) Sir Isac Newton chronol. p. 23. (23) Sil. Italic. l.i. (24) Idem ibid. (25) Boch. Phal. l.i. c. 2. (26) Univ. hift. vol. i. p. 420. (27) Plutarch. in Flamin. (28) Val. Max. (29) Strab. Suid. Helych. Univ. hift. vol. i. p. 204, 205. vol. ii. p. 291. (30) Vid. Lucium Ampelium apud Bochart, ubi sup. (31) Boch. Phal. l.i. c. 1. (32) Diod. Sic. l. xv. c. 6.

a common amongst the idolatrous nations, and they, as well as his own people, applied it to their respective idols, he rejected it b. The sale god to whom they first appropriated it, was Chronus or Saturn, as intimated above. In process of time it became a title, or mark of distinction, prefixed to the names of many others. Hence the Baal-Peor, Baal-Zebub, Baal-Moloch, &c. of the Syrians and Phanicians . The term imported god or lord amongst the Orientals, as zeus did amongst the Greeks d. The plural Baalim in scripture fignifies gods, lords, masters, sovereigns, &c. correspondent to the sense of Bel in the Chaldee tongue. According to Servius e, who is followed by Vossius herein, Bal in the Punic language had two significations; it either specified Saturn, or was equivalent to the Latin deus, or god. Xenophon finsinuates, that, in b the earliest times, every head of one of the most illustrious families in all countries was called Chronus or Saturn; every first-born fon or daughter of such families Jupiter or Juno; and the most valiant of their offspring Hercules. Theodoret seems to apply this to the Phanicians in particular 8; adding, that such noble personages were deified, on account of some signal service they did to their country. As we have made Baal and Zeus or Jupiter words of the same import in different languages, we may say of the former what Varro in Tertullian says of the latter, viz. that the number of those so styled amounted to three hundred. Notwithstanding which, some will have it, that there were originally but two gods of the Phanicians, and confequently of the Carthaginians, or, what is the same thing, that all the other deities were resolvable into c these two, viz. Baal and Ashtoreth, or Belus and Astarte.

Baalfamen, or, as the Hebrews would have written it, Baal shemaim, i. e. the lord The sun worof heaven, seems to have been the sun, as Belisama, or the queen of heaven, above-shipped at Carmentioned, the moon. According to St. Austin, he had religious honours paid him thage.
by the Carthaginians. It is probable they had no representation of him at all, because they could not forbear beholding him daily in all his glory. Damaseius calls him El, Bolathes, &c. and makes him to have been the same with Saturn k.

THE Carthaginians introduced Ceres and Proferpina as Greek deities, when ill suc-As likewife cess attended their arms in the war with Dionysius of Syracuse. This Diodorus tells us. Ceres and But Virgil afferts, that Dido herself sacrificed to Ceres m. The poet here, we think, Proserpina.

d ought to give way to the historian; for it is much more probable, that the Carthaginians should receive a Greek or Roman deity from the Greeks or Romans, than from the Phanicians. The statues of these two goddesses stood in the temple of Dido, who was likewise deisted by those idolaters, together with her sister Anna. We find on the reverses of several Carthaginian coins an ear or ears of corn, either in allusion to the goddess Ceres, or as a symbol of the fruitfulness of the country.

As the Carthaginians were a people who supported themselves chiefly by com-And Mercury. merce, it cannot be supposed that they neglected the worship of the god of genius, industry, and traffic. Mercury the antients allotted this province to; and accordingly we find the Carthaginians paid divine honours to him, under the name of Asumes or e Asoumes 1 (U).

NoTHING

b Seld. de dis Syr. c. 1. sub init. & Hos. ii. 16, 17. Seld. ubi supra. d Idem ibid. Serv. in Æn. 1. Voss. theol. gent. l. ii c. 4. f Xenoph. in æquiv. E Theodoret. de Græc. affect. l. iii. h Seld. de dis Syr. synt. 2. c. 2. p. 145. Shuckford in his connect. b.v. l August. in Jud. quæst. 16. k Damasc. in vit. Isidor. l Diod. Sic. l. xiv. c. 7. m Virg. Æn. 4. ver. 58. Plin. nat. hist. l. xxv. c. 5. & Bochart. ex auctario Dioscorid. Chan. l. ii. c. 15.

into the sea as offerings to him. Of this we have a remarkable instance during Hannibal's siege of Agrigentum (33), when a number of priests were in this manner offered. The antients attributed to him every thing that related to the management of horses; and from the rock out of which the first horse is supposed to have sprung, he had the denomination of Scyphius given him (34), scyph in Punic signifying a rock or slone. Bochart makes his name Posidon to be a Punic term, importing broad or expanded (35). His name Neptune shall be accounted for, when we come to visit Libya; for, according to Herodotus, he was originally a Libyan (36).

Our readers will not be surprised, that we have passed over in silence the Carthaginian images or representations of these sour last deities, since we are intirely in the dark as to the manner in which they were sigured at Carthage. Possibly in the main the Carthaginians might agree with the Greeks and Romans in this particular; and if so, no piece so proper can be recommended to the perusal of the curious, as that of Albricus upon this subject (37).

(U) Mercury was the minister of the gods, and presided over the roads or highways, as well as traffic and commerce (38). The old Etruscans named him Camillus, Casmillus, or Cadmilus, i. e. a servant

(33) Idem, l. Xiii. c. 12. (34) Pind. scholiast. in Pyth. od. 4. (35) Bochart. ubi surra. (36) He rodot. in Euterp. (37) Albric. de deor. imag. Bas. 1570. (38) Voss. theol. gent. l. ii. c. 32.

Vol. VI. Nº 9.

8 N

Ωī

30 jer

MS.

rail.

Ti l

lolaus.

Divine honours

NOTHING is more celebrated in antient history than the Tyrian Hercules, whose a paid also there worship was brought to Carthage by Dido, and diffused itself afterwards over all the coasts of Africa, and as far as Gades or Cadiz, where he had a magnificent temple. The reason of his name Melcartus has been already assigned . The Tyrians and Carthaginians supposed him to preside over gold, silver, and all forts of treasures; on which account he was held in high veneration in the island of Thasus P, where a Phx-nician colony being planted, discovered some gold mines. The Thasians adored him with the same solemnity as the people of Tyre, and had a brazen statue of him ten cubits high, with a club in the right hand, and a bow in the left; in which manner they undoubtedly represented him both at Tyre and Carthage 9. The Pelasgir, originally Phanicians, vowed him the tenths of every thing they had, on account of b a great scarcity of grain they once laboured under. The Carthaginians for a considerable time never failed sending to Tyre the first fruits of their revenues, nor the tithe of the spoils taken from their enemies, as offerings to Hercules, the protector of Tyre and Carthage'. Public diversions were instituted in honour of him at Tyre, which they celebrated every four years ". At Carthage, no doubt, the same custom prevailed, as likewise that of offering wannually human victims up to him. Varro mentions forty-five heroes who bore this appellation; but the oldest of them seems to have been the Tyrian or Carthaginian Hercules (W).

Iolaus comes next to Hercules, as being either related to him, or one that introduced some of his relations into the island of Sardinia x. The natives of that island, c at his arrival, were Tyrrhenians or Etruscans v. Those people inhabiting the mountainous parts of Sardinia, received from him the appellation of Iolaenses; and even the most fruitful provinces had the name of campi Iolei, the Iolean or Iolaan fields z. Hercules and Iolaus, according to Vossius a, had jointly divine honours paid them here, either because he was Hercules's near relation, or affisted him in destroying the Hydra,

P Vide Wolfgang. Lazium in Græc. ant. l. i. c. 2. O Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 400. not. (P). ibid. & Bunchard. Niderst. Melita vetus & nov. l. ii. c. 6. F STRAB. HERODOT. DIONYS. Halicarn. EPIPHAN. BOCH. SALMAS. GROT. & Univers. hist. vol. ii. p. 345. not. (D). Dion. Halicarn. l. i. t Polyb. in excerpt. legat.
l. xxxvi. c. 6. * STRAB. l. v. Maccab. & Theodorer. lib. semest. serm. iii. c. 2. 2 DIOD. SIC. & STRAB. ubi fupra. * Idem ibid. theol. gent. l. i. c. 40.

or minister of the gods (39); and the Carthaginians Asumes or Hassumes, which imports a servant (40). Bochart thinks he was Canaan, because that word properly denotes a merchant, and in some respect aniwers to the name Mercury (41); which conjecture he farther confirms by observing, that, in consomity to Mercury's office, Noah predicted, that Canaan should ferve his brethren (42). His pileus and caduceus being winged, feem to allude to the fails of ships, and remotely to the long voyages the Phænicians made, and the farthest parts of the world they were acquainted with, as doth likewise his government Bochart and of the highways above-mentioned.

Vossisian Hercules, as well as the Theban, i.e. the Phanician, were worshipped in the same temple at Gadira or Gades; that there were no statues erected to either of them there; that the temple was adorned with the twelve labours of Hercules finely wrought; which must naturally have pointed at both of them; that the golden olive of Pygma-lion king of Tyre (a Phomician) bearing smaragdine fruit, of wonderous workmanship, was kept in this temple. Bishop Cumberland proves (45), that the Phoenician Hercules was a Phoenician king in Egypt; that he found out the purple dye, which is of Phanician extraction; and that he built the temple on the island near the Streights, to which he gave the Phoenician name Gadira. Lastly, Sir Isaac Nemton makes it evident (46), that the Hercules called Mel-cartus, who was king of Carteia, had the temple at Gades consecrated to him, as Philostratus intimates the Egyptian Hercules had (47); and that this Hercules was a Phoenician. From whence it may rationally be supposed, that the Phanician Hercules and that of Egypt were the same.

The word itself is to be sought for from the east, undoubtedly y yercol of ercol, fignifying swift and smeary, or strong, was the original. This Hercules was likewise upon the coast of Africa, and, according to Orosius, built Caps there (48). Bishop Cumberland in the coast of the coast of Africa, and according to Orosius, built Caps there (48). Bishop Cumberland in the coast of Aziz, i. e. the strong, as well as Ercol or Hercules (49).

Africanus and Eusebius give him the name of Archles (50). It is probable he was elected king or general of the Phoenicians, on account of the great glory he had acquired (51). Some believe, that he, in a manner, traversed the then known world; but the relations given us of his atchievements are fo interlarded with fable, that we know not well what to make of them.

(39) Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 12, 33, & alib. (40) Idem ibid. l. ii. c. 15. (41) Boch. Phal. l. i. (42) Gen. ix. 25, 26. Vide esiam Var. Plut. in num. Fest. & vet. auth. apud Phavorin. &c. (43) Voss. & Bochart. ubi supra. Vide Isai. xviii. (44) Philost. in vit. Apollon. Tyan. l. v. c. 1. p. 211. (45) Cumberland on Sanchoniath. p. 159, 160. in orig. p. 113, 114, &c. Vide Palaphatum Egyptium apud chron. Alex. & Maneth. apud Euseb. in chronic. p. 352. (46) Newton's chronol. p. 111, 112, 113, 114, &c. (47) Philostrat. ubi supra. (48) Oros. l. v. c. 15. Flor. l. iii. c. 1. Sallust. in Jugurth. (49) Cumberland. in orig. p. 113. & Maneth. apud Joseph. cont. Apion. (50) African. & Euseb. in chronic. Herodot. in Euterp. &c. (51) Newton's chronol. p. 111.

a which he did by drying up the gore with a red hot iron, when any of the heads was cut off, to prevent others from sprouting out in its room. Ovid b pretends, that, at the intercession of Hercules, Hebe restored him to his youth, when he was grown extremely decrepit. As the Carthaginians had this island in possession a considerable time, it is supposed they borrowed him from the Sardi; for that he was one of their principal deities, we are given to understand by Polybius c. The rites and ceremonies observed at his public worship are fully described by Vossius out of Pausanias d.

Hendreich intimates, that the Dea Syria, or Syrian godde/s, was a deity of the Car- Dea Syria. thaginians e; but who she was, authors are not agreed. By the description of her temple already given f, and the statue in it, she must either have been Juno, or a b group of all the goddesses; which last opinion seems most probable. The curious may find further satisfaction on this head, by consulting Tertullian and Lipsius, as well as the first volume of this history 5.

THE people of Carthage likewise addressed themselves to Æsculapius, whom Servius Æsculapius. calls Panigena, because he supposes his mother to have been a Carthaginian. The place more particularly facred to him was Byrsa, or rather the top of that fortress, famous for his spacious temple there situated i. We have already observed, that Asdrubal's wife, at the final destruction of Carthage, burnt this edifice, together with hertelf, her family, and nine hundred Roman deserters. Considerable quantities of vervain, a herb facred to him, were preserved in this place. The best authors take him c to have been originally a Messenian, or an Egyptian; yet, according to Vossius, the Carthaginians received him immediately from the Tyrians, to whom either the Syro-Macedonians or Egyptians & communicated him. Alexander took Tyre in the first year of the hundred and twelfth olympiad; and Carthage was finally destroyed by Scipio in the third year of the hundred and fifty-eighth; in the interval betwixt which two periods the worship of Æsculapius passed from the Syro-Macedonians or Egyptians to the Tyrians, and from them to the Carthaginians. Toforthrus, or Seforthrus, a king of Memphis, and the second of the third dynasty of Manethe, for his great skill in the art of physic, is generally allowed to have been the first Esculapius. He preceded many ages the Messenian 1.

Herebus, another Carthaginian deity mentioned by Silius and Polybius, seems to Herebus. have been Pluto, or Dis. We know nothing farther of him, than that he was invoked as the god of hell, and represented under a human shape, with long loose hair. Vossius and Hendreich both take notice of him m.

Triton, the sea god, had a place amongst the deities of Carthage, as we learn from Triton. the treaty concluded betwixt Philip the fon of Demetrius king of Macedon, and the Carthaginians . Some authors have told us, that he was so called from Terra, a Greek word, fignifying a wave o. It appears from Virgil, that the province of Triton and Cymothoë was to release or heave off vessels run aground, and to clear them from the rocks. The antient mythologists make the nymph Cymothoë to have been the daughter of Nereus and Doris; but Triton the son of Neptune and Amphitrite P.

Mopfus, a famous augur or foothfayer, after his death, became a fort of oracle 9 at Mopfus. Carthage. The memory of this deified fage has been transmitted down to posterity by Luctatius Placidus and Apuleius. Strabe takes notice of one Mopsus the son of Manto the daughter of Tiresias. But, according to Vossius, this was the son of Ampyous an Argonaut, mentioned by Apollonius and Valerius Flacous. All that can be added concerning him is, that temples were erected to him by this nation, from whence responses were given, as from so many oracles.

RIVERS, meads, waters, &c. or rather the supposed genii of all these inanimate Rivers, meads, parts of the creation, were a esteemed as objects of adoration. This humour likewise maters, &c. prevailed amongst the Greeks, Romans, and most other nations, from very antient gods. times. No one has handled this subject better than Vossius w, whose writings our learned readers will peruse with great pleasure. Some maintain, that the worship of

POLYB. l. vii.

d Voss. ubi supra.

e Hendr. l. ii. sect. 1. c. 4.

22, 373.

B Tertul. apol. c. 24. Lips. elect. l. ii. c. 21. epist. quæst.

ubi supra.

h Serv. in Æn. 7.

Appian. in Libyc.

h Voss. ubi

Jnivers. hist. vol. i. p. 218.

B Sil. Ital. l. i. Polyb. l. vii. Voss. theol.

d Hend. ubi supra.

P Virg. Æn. 1.

T Sil. Plac. in Stat. Thebaid. iii.

Apul.

 Ovid. met. ix. C Polyb...

f Univers. hist. vol. i. p. 372, 373.
l. ii. c. 22. & Univers. hist. ubi supra.

b Serv. in Æn. 7.
b Serv. in Æn. 7.
c Appian. in Polyb. l. vii.
c 32.
c Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
c Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
c Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
c Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
c Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
c Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
c Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
c Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
c Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii.
d Hend. ubi supra.
d Polyb. l. vii. l. ii. c. 22. & DEIVEL.

fupra, l. i. c. 32.

1 Univers. hist. vol. i.
gent. l. ii. c. 60. & Hendr. ubi supra.

1 Polyb. l. vii.
ver. 148.

1 Apul. de deo Socrat. & Hendr. ubi supra.
ver. 148.

1 Apul. de deo Socrat. & Hendr. ubi supra.
ver. 148.

1 Apul. de deo Socrat. & Hendr. ubi supra.
ver. 148.

1 Apul. de deo Socrat. & Hendr. ubi supra.
ver. 148.
viii.
vol. ii. Stat. The ubi supra.
vol. ii. stat. The ubi supra.
vol. viii.
vol. ii. stat. The ubi supra.
vol. ii. stat. The ubi supra.
vol. ii. stat. The ubi supra.
vol. ii. stat. The ubi supra.
vol. ii. stat. The ubi supra.
vol. ii. stat. The ubi supra.
vol. ii. stat. The ubi supra.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. iii.
vol. " SIL. ITAL. I. i.

24 10

Ţ. (Miles

di il e gr

but

: 10

rh¥

Ų. 静山

4

70

the elements was prior to all others in the pagan world; but we must beg leave to a diffent from their opinion.

As likewise fire.

Scaliger x the elder acquaints us, that the old Africans paid a religious homage to fire, which was perhaps likewise the custom at Carthage. This sentiment he seems to have taken from Leo Africanus y, an author whom we shall have occasion to consult hereafter.

As also the air and winds.

WITH this 2 the air and winds also shared divine honours, which was probably derived from the Affyrians. The air to this nation appeared to be superior to the other elements, and to have them, as it were, under its government and direction 1; for which reason it was honoured with adoration. We read in Sanchoniatho b, that Usous consecrated two rude stones or pillars to fire and wind; to which we may add, b that the worship of the air and winds was not unknown to the Greeks and Persians c.

Anna Perenna worshipped at Carthage.

THE Carthaginians sometimes swore by the Manes of Dido, as Silius relates d. Anna her fister passed for a goddess, under the name of Anna Perenna e, according to some. It is imagined, tho' with no great appearance of truth, that she sled with Eneas, and was drowned by Lavinia in the river Numicus f; from whence the was called Nympha Numicia. It is certain the Romans, as well as the Carthaginians 8, paid her divine honours. Ceres and Proserpina were ranked with Dido b, as being all in the same temple. Ceres was either calestis, i. e. the moon, or subcalestis, i. e. the fruitful earth. She answered to the Egyptian Isis. These two last are amply treated of by various authors *.

And Sich xus during Dido's life-time. And Tellus.

THE honour that Dido herself received from the people of Carthage after her death, she, according to Ovid 1, had in her life time conferred upon her husband Sichaus m.

Tellus, or the Earth, was worshipped by the Carthaginians, as appears from the treaty of peace with Philip, mentioned by Polybius. For a further account of this deity, our readers may have recourse to Vossius ..

As likewise Hamilcar.

" Hamilcar o, fays Herodotus, by his father's fide a Carthaginian, but by his " mother's a Syracusian, was, by reason of his virtue and superior abilities, elected "king of the Carthaginians. The fame day that the battle of Salamis was fought, " being defeated by Gelon and (his father-in-law) Theron near Himera, he vanished, " and could never after be found, tho' Gelon caused the strictest search to be made for d The Carthaginians, who have his image in high veneration, fay, that during the engagement between the barbarians and the Greeks, which continued from morning till evening without intermission, Hamilear staid in the camp sacrificing, " and throwing intire victims upon a flaming pile; but that seeing his troops put to "the rout, he himself rushed into the fire, and being consumed, was never more " feen. Whether he disappeared in the manner as related by the Phanicians, or as the " Carthoginians affert, it is certain, that they offer facrifices to him, and have erected "monuments to his memory in all the cities they have founded, tho' the most me-" morable are in Carthage." So far Herodotus. It is not unlikely that the Carthaginians adopted other favourite generals into the number of their gods; nay, we are affured by Silius, that, notwithstanding the infamous treatment he met with from his countrymen at last, Hannibal was adored in his life-time p. These deities seem to have been of the same kind with the dii indigetes of the Latins.

And the Phi-

THE Carthaginians also ranked among their gods the two Philani. These brothers, having been fent by their countrymen to accommodate some differences with the Cyreneans, and, in conjunction with the commissaries appointed by that people, to fettle the limits of their respective dominions, by fraud extended their own frontiers, to the prejudice of the others. The Cyreneans, incensed at this, would not cede the tract demanded, unless the Philani would suffer themselves to be buried alive in the place which they had pitched upon for their boundary. To this they instantly agreed, I and had afterwards two altars erected there to their memory; which served as a landmark or limit to the Carthaginian territories on the fide of Cyrenaica for many suc-

JOAN. LEO AFRICAN. de prife. Afr. fid. & relig. 1. i. 2 Jul. 1. ubi fupra. 5 SANCHONIATH. apud Euseb. præp. evang. 1. i. 1. ii. 6 HENDR. ubi fupra. 6 Ovid. fast. 1. iii. Sil. Ital. FIRMIC. Profan, relig. lib.

4 Hendr. udi au
Sil. Ital. l. i. * Jul. Cas. Scalig. exercit. 258. Hendr. ubi supra. b Sanchon. ** HENDR. ubi supra. d Sil. Ital. l. i. e Hendr. ubi supra. f Ovid. sast. l. iii. Sil. Ital. l. viii. Voss. theol. gent. l. i. c. 12. & instit. orat. l. i. c. 6. sex. 8. Vide etiam Volater. l. xxxiii. void. ubi supra. h Sil. Ital. l. i. l. Voss. ubi sup. l. ii. c. 59. k Lipsius de cruc. l. i. c. 5. Pompon. Sabin. in Æn. 4. Varro apud Voss. ubi sup. P. Nannius in misc. l. vii. c. 10. alique multi. l. Ovid. heroid. 7. m Polyb. l. vii. n Voss. ubi sup. c. 9, 51, &c. e Herodor. P Sil. Ital. l. xvii. & Barthius in advers. p. 801.

101

3

¢

14:

11

13

į,

4

1

7.

á

Œ

¢

1

e e

a ceeding ages. Sullust, Mela, and Valerius Maximus, give all the particulars of this

Sr. Austin tells us, that some of the Carthaginian divinities had the name of Abad- Abaddires and dires, and their priests that of Eucaddires. This class, in all probability, was derived Eucaddires from the stone which Jacob anointed with oil, after it had served him for a pillow Carthaginian the night he had his vision; for in the morning he called the name of the place where he lay Betbel. Now, it is no wonder this should have been esteemed as sacred, since God himself says, he was the God of Bethel, the place where Jacob anointed the pillar'. From Bethel came the Batylus of Damascius, which we find called Abadd r by Priscians. This Abaddir is the Phanician Aban-Dir, i. e. the spherical stone, exactly answering to b the description of the Bætylus a given us by Damascius, and others. The case seems to have been this: The Canaanites of the neighbourhood first worshipped the individual stone itself, upon which Jacob had poured oil; afterwards they consecrated others of that form, and worshipped them; which false worship was perpetuated even to the time of St. Austin w. Abaddir may likewise be understood to mean Ab-Addir, i.e. the magnificent father, a title given to the true God himself; but afterwards applied to those, who by nature were no gods x. That Addir was an epithet joined to the names of false gods in the east, may, in some measure, appear from Addir-Dag, the magnificent fish, i. e. Adergatis, Atergatis, &c. y. Abaddires therefore was an appellation belonging to some Punic deities, as Eucaddires, i. e. Enucaddires, persons initiated c in the sacred mysteries of the Addires or Abaddires, was a term appropriated to their priefts (X).

WE must not omit, that the Carthaginians carried about with them some small Portable temimages, representing certain gods, in covered chariots. Eustathius a calls these valis amongst the ζευγηρορειβοίσε, portable temples, or temples carried by oxen. They were a fort of Carthagintans. oracle, and their responses were understood by the motions impressed upon the vehicle. This was likewise an Egyptian and Libyan custom. The antient Germans also had something like it, as we learn from Tacitus . Philo Byblius relates, that Agrotes c, or at least his image, was carried about in procession in this manner. The tabernacle of Moloch above-mentioned, we take to have been a machine of this kind.

IT is remarkable, that, in the treaty with Philip so often cited, mention is made The Genius of of the Dæmon or Genius of Carthage. Who this might be, we shall not take upon Carthage. us to determine; but only in general observe, that the pagan world looked upon these Damons as intelligences of a middle nature betwixt the gods and men, as beings who had, in a great measure, the administration of the world committed to them. Hence it is no wonder they should have received religious honours; for when once mankind were possessed with the opinion, that they were the ministers of the gods, and trusted with the dispensation of their favours, as well as the infliction of their punishments, it is natural to suppose, that they would be desirous of making their

9 Sallust. Jugurth. c. 79. Pomp. Mela, l. i. c. 7. Valer. Max. l. v. c. 6. Vide Polyb. l. iii. Strab. l. iii. Plin. l. v. c. 4. Solin. c. 30. & Cellar. geog. ant. l. iv. c. 3. August. epift. Max. Madaur. 44. Gen. xxxi. 13. Priscian. grammat. Hesych. in voc. Βαίτυλος. Damasc. apud Phot. Damasc. ubi fup. & Bochart. Chan. l. ii. c. 2. W August. ubi fup. Pfal. viii. 1, 9. & lxxvi. 5. & xciii. 4. Ifai. xxxiii. 21. 1 Sam. iv. 8. Drus. in loc. Vide Bochart. ubi fupra. Y Idem ibid. Leustath in Iliad. A. Serv. ad Æn. vi. Tacit. Phil. Bybl. apud Eufeb. de præp. evang. l. i. Polyb. l. vii.

(X) The Batyli were stones that were believed to be animated, and were confulted by some fanatics as oracles. These stones were round, and of such a fize, that some of them might be carried about by their votaries, either by hanging at the neck, or in some other way (52).

Isidorus tells us, they were of different forts; and that some of them were consecrated to Saturn, others to Jupiter, others to the Sun, &cc. (53).

Their origin was very antient, if any credit may be given to Sanchoniatho, who makes Ouranus the inventor of them. Bochart proves, that Philo Byblius has wrongly translated Sanchoniasho's words animated stones; and that it ought to have been anointed Stones (54).

The antient Greeks and Latins, who have taken any notice of the Batyli, hardly afford any other notion of them, but as the stone which Saturn swallowed in the place of Jupiter (55). The scholiast upon Hesiod relates, upon the authority of Agathocles, a Babylonish author, that Rhea had taken that stone from the island of Proconesa; and Stephanus adds, that Saturn swallowed it upon mount Thaumasius. M. Falconet has published a differtation upon this subject, which, together with what M. Fourmont has offered, will, according to the abbe Banier, abundantly satisfy the curious (56).

(52) Banier in mythol. l. i. c. 1. (53) Damasc. in vit. Isidor. apud Photium. apud Euseb. prap. evang. l. i. Bochart. Chan. l. ii. c. 2. Banier ubi sup. (55) ibid. (54) Sanchoniath. (55) Idem ibid. (56) Idem

8 0

Vot. VI. Nog.

addresses

the elements was prior to all others in the pagan world; but we must beg leave to a diffent from their opinion.

As likewise fire.

Scaliger x the elder acquaints us, that the old Africans paid a religious homage to fire, which was perhaps likewise the custom at Carthage. This sentiment he seems to have taken from Leo Africanus Y, an author whom we shall have occasion to confult hereafter.

As also the air and winds.

WITH this 2 the air and winds also shared divine honours, which was probably derived from the Affyrians. The air to this nation appeared to be superior to the other elements, and to have them, as it were, under its government and direction 1; for which reason it was honoured with adoration. We read in Sanchoniatho b, that Usous consecrated two rude stones or pillars to fire and wind; to which we may add, b that the worship of the air and winds was not unknown to the Greeks and Persians c.

Anna Perenna worshipped at Carthage.

THE Carthaginians sometimes swore by the Manes of Dido, as Silius relates d. Anna her fister passed for a goddess, under the name of Anna Perenna c, according to some. It is imagined, tho' with no great appearance of truth, that she sled with Æneas, and was drowned by Lavinia in the river Numicus f; from whence the was called Nympha Numicia. It is certain the Romans, as well as the Carthaginians 8, paid her divine honours. Ceres and Proserpina were ranked with Dido h, as being all in the same temple. Ceres was either calestis, i. e. the moon, or subcalestis, i. e. the fruitful earth. She answered to the Egyptian Isis. These two last are amply treated of by various authors k.

And Sichaus during Dido's life-time. And Tellus.

THE honour that Dido herself received from the people of Carthage after her death, she, according to Ovid, had in her life time conferred upon her husband Sichaus m.

Tellus, or the Earth, was worshipped by the Carthaginians, as appears from the treaty of peace with Philip, mentioned by Polybius. For a further account of this deity, our readers may have recourse to Vossius .

As likewise Hamilcar.

" Hamilcar o, says Herodotus, by his father's side a Carthaginian, but by his "mother's a Syracusian, was, by reason of his virtue and superior abilities, elected king of the Carthaginians. The same day that the battle of Salamis was sought, " being defeated by Gelon and (his father-in-law) Theron near Himera, he vanished, " and could never after be found, tho' Gelon caused the strictest search to be made for d "him. The Carthaginians, who have his image in high veneration, fay, that dur-" ing the engagement between the barbarians and the Greeks, which continued from

" morning till evening without intermission, Hamilcar staid in the camp sacrificing, " and throwing intire victims upon a flaming pile; but that feeing his troops put to "the rout, he himself rushed into the fire, and being consumed, was never more " seen. Whether he disappeared in the manner as related by the Phanicians, or as the " Carthaginians affert, it is certain, that they offer facrifices to him, and have erected

"monuments to his memory in all the cities they have founded, tho' the most me-" morable are in Carthage." So far Herodotus. It is not unlikely that the Carthaginians adopted other favourite generals into the number of their gods; nay, we are affured by Silius, that, notwithstanding the infamous treatment he met with from his countrymen at last, Hannibal was adored in his life-time p. These deities seem to have been of the same kind with the dii indigetes of the Latins.

And the Philæni.

THE Carthaginians also ranked among their gods the two Philani. These brothers, having been fent by their countrymen to accommodate fome differences with the Cyreneans, and, in conjunction with the commissaries appointed by that people, to fettle the limits of their respective dominions, by fraud extended their own frontiers, to the prejudice of the others. The Cyreneans, incenfed at this, would not cede the tract demanded, unless the Philani would suffer themselves to be buried alive in the place which they had pitched upon for their boundary. To this they instantly agreed, I and had afterwards two altars erected there to their memory; which served as a landmark or limit to the Carthaginian territories on the fide of Cyrenaica for many suc-

y Joan. Leo African. de prisc. Afr. fid. & relig. l. i. 2 Jul. R. ubi supra. 5 Sanchoniath. apud Euseb. præp. evang. l. i. l. i. 6 Hendr. ubi supra. 6 Ovid. fast. l. iii. Stl. Ital. FIRMIC. profan. relig. lib.

SIL. ITAL. I. i. HENDR. ubi supra.

d Sil. Ital. l. i. Hendr. ubi supra.

l. viii. Voss. theol. gent. l. i. c. 12. & instit. orat. l. i. c. 6. sec. 8. Vide etiam Volater. l. xxxiii.

voyid. ubi supra.

b Sil. Ital. l. i.

Voss. ubi sup. l. ii. c. 59.

k Lapsius de cruc. l. i.

Voss. ubi sup. P. Nannius in misc. l. vii. c. 10. alique C. S. POMPON. SABIN. in Æn. 4. VARRO apud Voss. ubi sup. P. NANNIUS in misc. 1. vii. c. 10. altique multi.

1 Ovid. heroid. 7.

1 Polyb. 1. vii.

1 Voss, ubi sup. c. 9, 51, &c.

1 Herodot. P SIL. ITAL. I. xvii. & BARTHIUS in advers. p. 801.

ľ

a ceeding ages. Sullust, Mela, and Valerius Maximus, give all the particulars of this ftory 9.

Sr. Austin tells us, that some of the Carthaginian divinities had the name of Abad- Abaddires and dires, and their priests that of Eucaddires. This class, in all probability, was derived Eucaddires. from the stone which Jacob anointed with oil, after it had served him for a pillow Carthaginian the night he had his vision; for in the morning he called the name of the place where he lay Betbel. Now, it is no wonder this should have been esteemed as sacred, since God himself says, he was the God of Bethel, the place where Jacob anointed the pillar. From Bethel came the Batylus of Damascius, which we find called Abaddr by Priscians. This Abaddir is the Phanician Aban-Dir, i. e. the spherical stone, exactly answering to b the description of the Batylus " given us by Damascius, and others. The case seems to have been this: The Canaanites of the neighbourhood first worshipped the individual stone itself, upon which Jacob had poured oil; afterwards they consecrated others of that form, and worshipped them; which false worship was perpetuated even to the time of St. Austin w. Abaddir may likewise be understood to mean Ab-Addir, i.e. the magnificent father, a title given to the true God himself; but afterwards applied to those, who by nature were no gods x. That Addir was an epithet joined to the names of false gods in the east, may, in some measure, appear from Addir-Dag, the magnificent fish, i. e. Adergatis, Atergatis, &c. v. Abaddires therefore was an appellation belonging to some Punic deities, as Eucaddires, i. e. Enucaddires, persons initiated c in the sacred mysteries of the Addires or Abaddires t, was a term appropriated to their priests (X).

We must not omit, that the Carthaginians carried about with them some small Portable teminages, representing certain gods, in covered chariots. Eustathius a calls these vais ples in we among it the Cenyngoges/Apies, portable temples, or temples carried by oxen. They were a fort of Carthaginians. oracle, and their responses were understood by the motions impressed upon the vehicle. This was likewise an Egyptian and Libyan custom. The antient Germans also had something like it, as we learn from Tacitus b. Philo Byblius relates, that Agrotes c, or at least his image, was carried about in procession in this manner. The tabernacle of Moloch above-mentioned, we take to have been a machine of this kind.

It is remarkable, that, in the treaty with Philip so often cited, mention is made The Genius of of the Dæmon or Genius of Carthage. Who this might be, we shall not take upon Carthage. us to determine; but only in general observe, that the pagan world looked upon these Damons as intelligences of a middle nature betwixt the gods and men, as beings who had, in a great measure, the administration of the world committed to them. Hence it is no wonder they should have received religious honours; for when once mankind were possessed with the opinion, that they were the ministers of the gods, and trusted with the dispensation of their favours, as well as the insliction of their punishments, it is natural to suppose, that they would be desirous of making their

9 SALLUST. Jugurth. c. 79. Pomp. Mela, l. i. c. 7. Valer. Max. l. v. c. 6. Vide Polyb. l. iii. Strab. l. iii. Plin. l. v. c. 4. Solin. c. 30. & Cellar geog. ant. l. iv. c. 3. August. epift. Max. Madaur. 44. Gen. xxxi. 13. Priscian. grammat. Hesych. in voc. Bxitulos. Damasc. apud Phot. Damasc. ubi fup. & Bochart. Chan. l. ii. c. 2. Waugust. ubi fup. Pfal. viii. 1, 9. & Ixxvi. 5. & xciii. 4. Ifai. xxxiii. 21. 1 Sam. iv. 8. Drus. in loc. Vide Bochart. ubi fupra. Y Idem ibid. Bust. apud Eufeb. de præp. evang. l. i. Polyb. l. vii.

(X) The Batyli were stones that were believed to be animated, and were confulted by some fanatics as oracles. These stones were round, and of such a fize, that some of them might be carried about by their votaries, either by hanging at the neck, or in some other way (52).

Isidorus tells us, they were of different sorts; and that some of them were consecrated to Saturn, others to fupiter, others to the Sun, Scc. (53).

Their origin was very antient, if any credit may be given to Sanchoniatho, who makes Ouranus the inventor of them. Bochart proves, that Philo Byblius has wrongly translated Sanchoniatho's words animated flones; and that it ought to have been anointed flones (54).

The antient Greeks and Latins, who have taken any notice of the Batyli, hardly afford any other notion of them, but as the stone which Saturn swallowed in the place of Jupiter (55). The scholiast upon Hesiod relates, upon the authority of Agathocles, a Babylonish author, that Rhea had taken that stone from the island of Proconesa; and Stephanus adds, that Saturn swallowed it upon mount Thaumasius. M. Falconet has published a differtation upon this subject, which, together with what M. Fourmont has offered, will, according to the abbe Banier, abundantly fatisfy the curious (56).

(52) Banier in myshol. l. i. c. 1. (53) Damasc. in vit. Isidor. apud Photium. apud Euseb. prap. evang. l. i. Bochart. Chan. l. ii. c. 2. Banier ubi sup. (55) ibid. (54) Sanchoniath. (55) Idem ibid. (56) Idem

Vor. VI. Nº 9.

8 O

addresses

addresses to them. We hope to give our readers a full and particular account of these a inferior deities, when we come to the Arabic history.

The Cabiri adored there. So full an account has already been given of the Cabiri, that there is neither room nor occasion to be prolix here. To what has been already said we shall however add, that the Pelasgi introduced the worship of these gods into Samothrace, Greece, and all other countries where they seated themselves; that men and all animals, without diltinction, nay, even all kinds of inanimate facrifices, were offered up to them; that they had at first no proper names, but were worshipped under the general denomination of gods; that the word Cabiri either fignified certain anonymous divinities, or their priests, known by the name Corybantes; that from an antient inscription mentioned by Astorius, it is manifest the Cabiri were likewise called Dioscuri; that b the Phanicians first paid them divine honours, afterwards the Egyptians, who built them a magnificent temple at Memphis in the earliest ages, which continued to the time of Achilles Tatius; that the Syrians, Egyptians, Greeks, Cypriots, Phrygians, Elruscans, Latins, Carthaginians, and almost all the antient pagans, had the most profound reverence for the Cabiric or Samothracian mysteries; that the vulgar believed all initiated into these mysteries could not fail of being happy both here and hereaster; that, according to Sanchoniatho, the Dii Cabiri were eight in number, being the fons of Sydik; that the inhabitants of Samothrace, facrificed dogs to Hecate in the cave Zerintbus, sacred to the Cabiri; that the Pelasgi, Samothracians, &c. celebrated the Cabiric mysteries in the night-time, with great indecency; and that this was the prin- c cipal motive with the antients not to transmit them down in writing to posterity. Bishop Cumberland, the abbé Banier, and Astorius, have, in a manner, exhausted this subject. A catalogue of the authors who have supplied them with materials, our readers • will find here inserted, to whom they may have recourse at their leisure (Y).

And the Ana-

THE Anaces, Anactes, or Dioscuri, are by some thought to have been the same with ces or Anactes, the Cabiri, by others different from them. However this may be, they were undoubtedly descended from the Anakims of Moses. It can scarce be questioned but Inachus himself was of this race, as his name plainly imports f. Some believe, that the word Anastes was a title given to those princes of Inachus's line, who had distinguished themselves by their heroic actions; which evidently alludes to the name of & that family, so eminent in scripture for its gigantic stature 8; and we own ourselves inclinable to fall in with this sentiment. Pausanias, Pliny, Philostratus, and Julius Pollux, not to mention many other authors that occur, render it probable, that h in antient times there were not wanting instances of persons of a monstrous size of body.

> Cumberland in append. de Cabir. Herodot, in Euterp. Dionys. Halicar. l. i. Lucian, de des Syr. Pausan, in Bosotic, Heliac. & alib. Achilles Tatius apud Cumberland, in append. de Cabir. Sancho-PAUSAN. in Boedic. Heliac. & alib. Achilles Tatius apud Cumberland. in append. de Cadir. Sanchoniath. apud Euseb. ubi supra. Damasc. apud Phot. Pherecyd. Syr. Nonnus, & Herodot. 12ss. Acesilaus Arg. apud Stradon. l. x. Var. de ling. Lat. l. iv. Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 12. & aiib. pass. Tertula de spect. Orpheus. in Hym. Curet. Seld. de diis Syr. synt. ii. c. 4. Horn. hist. Phil. l. ii. c. 4. Schol. vet. in Apollon. Arg. l. i. Dionysiod. apud eund. Strab. l. x. & alib. Diod. Sic. l. v. & alib. Plut. in Alexandr. & alib. Suid. &c. Macrob. Plat. Dion. Chrysost. Procl. Clem. Alexand. Lycophre. Stephan. Hesych. Cic. Lactant. Arnob. Firmic. Meurs. aliiq; pass. Vide Joan. Astor dissert. de Cadir. Banier. in mythol. l. vii. c. 8, &c.
>
> **Cumberland. in append. de Cadir. & Banier. ubi supra. **Pausan. in At. Plin. l. vii. c. 16. Philost. Heroic. Jul. The Cadir. Accord. Pausan. in At. Plin. l. vii. c. 16. Philost. Heroic. Jul. Pol. in Onomast.

(Y) Reland, who has favoured the learned world with a differtation upon the Cabiri, concludes, that they were the gods of the dead; that Ceres was the earth which received them; Pluto and Proferpina the infernal regions where they came to dwell; and Ca. millus or Meercury the god who conducted them thither (57).

The mysterious names Axieros, Axiokersa, Axiokersos, and Casmilos, Bochare has happily interpreted, and proved, that, in the Phoenician language, they denoted Ceres, Proferpina, Pluto, and Mercury. Princes, and persons of the first distinction, were ambitious of being initiated into the awful mysteries of these great gods, upon account of the high reputation they were in. Vossius thinks, that we are to understand by the name Cabiri only the ministers of the gods, as the Curetes and Dallyli of Crete, and the Corybantes of Phrygia; but this, as running counter to all antiquity, can by no means be admitted (58).

Arnobius afferts, that, in the celebration of those mysteries, they slew one of the initiated, and is followed herein by Firmicus; but this feems rather to refer to an accident that once happened, than to prove, that such a practice was authorized by cuftom (59).

The priests of the Cabiri, according to Helychius, were called Coes, a word manifestly derived from the Hebrew cohen, i.e. a priest; a further proof this, that the old obselete language used by the priests in their ceremonies, was the Hebrew or Phani-cian (60).

(57) Reland. in disser. miscel. (58) Boch. Chan. l. i. c. 12. Diodor. Sicul. l. v. Apollon. Arg. Plus: in Alexand. Suid. &c. (59) Arneb. I. v. Jul. Firmie, de cor. prof. rel. (60) Hefych, in voce Kons.

a However, many of these relations, particularly those of Phlegon, Abydenus, Solinus, and others, must be allowed to be fabulous (Z).

To what has been observed of the Pataici, or Patæci, in the first volume of this And Pataici or history, we shall only subjoin, that the statues of these gods, of the Cabiri, and of the Patzen. Egyptian Vulcan, had a great refemblance to one another; that therefore, fince Vulcan was esteemed the most antient of the gods, the Patæci must have been of great antiquity; that, in after-ages, the Penates had the same respect paid them by the Romans, as these received from their votaries the Phanicians and Carthaginians; and lastly, that the word, according to Scaliger, is to be deduced from the Hebrew satach, be engraved, or, as Bochart will have it, from batach, be confided in; either of which b etymologies very well quadrates with the use the Phanicians, and after them the Greeks, made of the gods, Patæci k.

As the Palici were Sicilian deities 1, of eastern extraction, it is reasonable to sup- The Palici. pase, that they owed their origin in Sicily to the Carthaginians, who got a sooting in that island in very antient times, and therefore may justly be looked upon as some of its most antient inhabitants. This, we say, is probable; but as there is not the express testimony of any good author to support it, we shall drop all further particulars concerning them; and conclude here what we have to fay of the gods of the Carthaginians.

THE barbarous custom of offering up human sacrifices did not expire with the city The custom of c of Carthage, but continued amongst the Africans, even till the time of Tiberius. That facrificing men prince, tho' none of the most humane and compassionate, was so shocked at the unna- Africa till the tural practice of offering up children to Saturn, that, in his proconfulfhip, according time of Tibeto Tertullian m, he ordered the priests concerned in that horrid impiety to be hanged, rius. and committed the care of the execution to the African militia. This practice had been retained, with little or no intermission, from the foundation of the city; for notwithstanding the Carthaginians, to avoid drawing upon themselves the indignation of Darius Hystaspis a, might, for a few years, suspend it, or at least pretend so to do, yet it is certain, that, in his successor Xerxes's time, they had resumed it. This appears from history; for Gelon, after he had vanquished them in the reign of that d prince, concluded a treaty of peace with them, of which this was one article, that no more buman facrifices should be offered to Saturn o; nay, to such a pitch of frenzy, or rather savage barbarity, were they come, that mothers, who are naturally the most fusceptible of tender impressions, made it a merit to view their own offspring thrown into the devouring slames, without so much as a groan? They even, by kisses and embraces, hushed the cries of their children, before they were cast into the slaming statue of Saturn above-mentioned, imagining the efficacy of the facrifice would have been intirely lost, if any thing that might have been interpreted as a mark of the least

PHLEG. TRAL. de mir. c. 14. ABYDEN. & EUPOLEM. apud Eufeb. Solin. Beros. Plut. &c. ** Æschylus, Callias, Polemon, & Xenaguras apud Macrob. Satura. l. v. c. 19. Sil. Italic. Diodor. Sic. l. ii. Ovid, metam. l. v. Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 28. ** Bochart. ubi fupra. *** Tertul. apolog. c. 9. ** Just. l. xix. ** Diodor. Sic. l. xi. Plut. de fer. vind. deor. *** Plut. de fuperft.

(Z) Vossius is of opinion, that the name of the gods Anactes was originally from Phanice; but he thinks it had been brought into the west by Cadmus, or by the Canaanites, whom Joshua, by his conquests, had obliged to quit Phanice, and who had retired into Greece. He farther thinks, that the Sparane who called themselves allies of Israel as we cans, who called themselves allies of Israel, as we learn from Josephus, were a colony of the Canaanites, who were mostly descended from Abraham by Hagar and Keturah; and this is the reason why the most famous of the Greek Anastes were Castor and Pollux, natives of Sparra, the Lacedamonians having given them that name to honour the memory of Anak's defcendants, of whom they had heard so many wonderful flories. We shall only add, that it was a common thing with the Greeks to call those persons the fons of the Earth, who were so antient, that they had but a very imperfect account of their original; for this reason they called Anax or Anak the son of the Earth, as we have observed above from Pan-

Pausanias infinuates, that the Dioscuri were to be distinguished from the Cabiri; but that the Anades were the same with them (61). His words are to this effect: "With regard to the Anactes, men are " divided in their sentiments about them; some will "have them to be the same with the Dioscuri;
"others with the Curetes; but the most intelligent persons take them to be the Cabiri." Suidas intitimates, that the word was applied both to kings and gods (62). Pindar, Cicero, and Tzetzes all take particular notice of them (63).

The account published by Sir Hans Sloane in the philosophical transactions, of the fossil teeth and the bones of elephants, which falls in with this subject, is very well worth the perulal of our curious readers (64),

(63) Cic. de nat. deor. l. iii. Pind. Pyth. (61) Pausan. in Phocic. (62) Suid. in voc. Avanos. ii. epod. ult. Tzetzes in Lycophron. (64) Philosophical transact. numb. 403, 404.

reluctancy or regret had been shewn q. They used a drum or a tabret, among other a instruments, to drown the shrieks and outcries of the unhappy victims. Some authors believe, that the Phanicians, from whom the Carthaginians derived this detestable custom, contented themselves with making their children pass through the fire, without burning them; but Selden, and others, evince this to be a mistakes. Plutarch tells us, that the mothers were, in some measure, obliged to stand by as unconcerned spectators; since a groan or tear falling from them would have been punished by a fine, and still the child must have been sacrificed. In times of pestilence, or other public calamities, the Carthaginians endeavoured to appease their offended gods by vast numbers of such oblations; of which we have given an instance or two above a (A).

The Carthaginians exrremely addicted to superslition. FROM many authors it appears, that the Carthaginians were extremely addicted to superstition. They had however, in general, some good notions: they addressed themselves to the gods, before they attempted to put in execution any enterprize by them formed; and after any advantage gained, they were not slack in making proper returns w to the powers above for it. Temples very magnificent they abounded with at Carthage, and took care to have no deficiency of them in any part of the Carthaginian dominions. One samous temple, sacred to Baal or Balis, in a city of that name on the borders of Cyrenaica, we find taken notice of by Stephanus, who intimates, that the city received its appellation from that deity. There is great reason to believe, that El, Il, Bel, Bal, Baal, Belus, Balis, Helius, &c. were different names c of the same pagan divinity.

Carthaginian women profittute themselves for gain in the temple of Assatte.

We have already described the manner in which the Babylonian women prostituted themselves y to strangers at the temple of Mylitta, as likewise the same custom prevailing amongst the Phanicians 2, whose women, for this end, repaired to the great temple of Astarte at Byblus. We have now to add, that the same thing, in all respects, was practised at Carthage; excepting that the money got by this insamous commerce amongst the Babylonians and Phanicians was presented to Mylitta or Astarte, i. e. Venus, whereas the Carthaginian women applied the wages of their prostitution to their own use 2. This indeed savoured something more of the common harlot than the other; but all these nations were arrived at such a height of insatuation and impiety, on account do their gross idolatry, and variety of pollutions attending it, that it is hard to say which of them was the worst (B).

T Idem ibid. & Tertul. in apol.

* Plut. ubi sup.

* Plut. ubi sup.

* Vide etiam Diodor. Sic l. xx.

w Liv. l. xxi, xxiii, &c.

* Stephan. περί εθνικών.

* Univ. hist. vol. i. p. 918.

* Idem ibid. p. 401, 402.

* Vide

Valer. Max. l. ii. & Hendr. ubi supra.

(A) Those persons who are not disposed to give over-much credit to the fragment of Sanchoniatho's history still extant, think human facrifices can be traced up no higher than Abraham. The Canaanises and Phanicians (65), in whose country that patriarch attempted to offer up his son Isaac, in obedience to the divine command, imitated the fews in many particulars, and derived many of their in-flitutions from those of that nation, which were of divine origin, as has been before observed. It is probable therefore, that they might reason with themselves after this manner: "If God was so " highly pleased with Abraham's bare intention of " offering up his fon Isaac, that he showered down " bleflings upon his posterity in a most extraordi-" nary manner, what marks of the divine favour " may not those persons expect, who actually do sacrifice their children?" Thus the highest instance of obedience upon record might, through the depraved imaginations, and blinded understandings, of a great part of mankind, together with the sugge-ftions of their grand enemy, become the accidental cause of one of the most enormous and unnatural kinds of wickedness that could be committed.

(B) Canaan's posterity were a most profligate and abandoned race of men, addicted to all, even the most unnatural, kinds of lust, as the scripture gives us good reason to apprehend. Now, it is worthy admiration, that Noah cursed Canaan only of Ham's fons (66), on account of Ham's breach of modelty in expoling his father's nakedness, which was both unchaste and unnatural. This is a strong intimation, that Canaan only was an accomplice of his father Ham in this wickedness, which was an evident token of a most dissolute and vitious turn of mind. This vile disposition exerted itself in his posterity, and vastly contributed towards drawing down those heavy divine judgments, which, in process of time, fell upon them. Hence it appears, that, in conformity to the patriarch's prediction, Canaan's descendants were subject to the posterity of Shem, i. e. the Jews; and that this very judgment was, in a great measure, occasioned by the effects of that vile disposition inherent in them, which so eminently displayed itself in Ham, and, as is probable, in Canaan also, and which immediately drew upon them all the curse of their great ancestor Noah. So true is that observation of the pfalmist, Righteons are thou, O Lord, and upright are thy judgments (67).

(65) Vide Bochars, in Phal. & Chan. Hyde de relig. vet. Perf. aliosq, scriptor, quamplurim. (66) Gen. ix. 22, 25, 26, 27. (67) Psal. cxix. 137.

A very learned author of our own nation imagines, that some traces of the Suc-Some traces of coth Benoth b, mentioned in scripture; may be found in Sicca Venerea, the name of a Succoth Becity in Numidia, not far from the borders of Africa Propria. The name itself bears found in Sicca a near allusion to the obscene custom above taken notice of, and seems to have been venerea. transported from Phanice. This cannot well be disputed, when we consider, that in this very city there was a temple, where women were obliged to purchase their marriage-money by the profitution of their bodies. The author of the itinerary fometimes calls it fimply Sicca, and Solinus Venerea. Sicca fignifies a tabernacle, as well as Succa; and therefore probably this was what it imported in the Punic tongue. Proceedius, Victor Uticensis, and others, in conjunction with our author, render this b opinion almost incontestable 4.

Ir any points of consequence relating to the worship of the people at present under consideration should have hitherto escaped us, they will be occasionally touched upon hereafter, as they offer themselves in the course of this history.

THE Hebrew and Phanician languages were in a manner the same, as has been Punic torque observed in several places of this history; and is apparent, not only from the nature at first the of the thing, but from the concurrent testimony of learned men, who, generally same with the speaking, agree in this particular. The Pani or Carthaginians therefore having been proceed to the process of the process of the particular of the partic speaking, agree in this particular. The Pani or Carthaginians therefore having been originally Phanicians, 'tis undeniable, that their language must at first have been the Phanician. However, Scaliger f believes, that the Punic, (he must mean that of afterc ages) in some respects, deviated from the Hebrew and Phanician, which, considering how distant the Carthaginians were from their mother-country Phanice, and the people they were incorporated with, is not to be wondered at. 'Tis much more wonderful, that they should have retained so much, nay, in a manner the whole of their original tongue; for that they did fo, after what has been advanced by Scaliger, Petit, Bochart, and others, will scarce admit of a dispute.

OUR great Selden, next to Scaliger 8, seems to have been the first who endeavoured This fully in earnest to settle this point; which, from the authority of St. Jerom, St. Austin, proved by Sca-and many other writers, he likewise seems to have done effectually. He has more-petit, and over given us a specimen of an interpretation of the remains of the Punic language Bochart. d to be found in Plautush. Petit and Bochart have been much more copious on this head; but what they have advanced has not met with universal applause, which the last of these seems to have been beforehand apprehensive of k; in short, there is room enough left for any learned man to exercise his wit and talents on this subject. Bochart has produced a vast collection of Punic words from different authors, and Agreed in subtraced them all up to the Hebrew or Phanician: all which will ferve as so many proofs, flance with the that the Carthaginian language agreed in the main with these; that, notwithstanding the small variations from them discernable in it; it ever continued to be the same in lubstance with them. FROM what has been offered in the first section of the history we are now upon, Hebrew, Phoee it appears m, that the word Carthago or Cartaco itself was of Hebrew or Phanician nician and Puextraction. As therefore an affinity of proper names implies an affinity of the lan-names nearly guages to which they belong, the following short catalogue of Hebrew or Phanician the same. and Punic proper names, by demonstrating the harmony betwirt these languages, will not a little contribute to confirm the fentiment which we, in common with fo many others, have espoused.

HEBREW OF PHOENICIAN.	Punic.
Zachæus.	Sichæus.
Michæas.	Machæus.
Amalec.	{ Amilco, or Himilco.
Melchior.	Amilcar
Jesche, or	Gifgo, or
Jesse.	Gesco.

b Selden. de diis Syr. fyntag. ii. c. 6. C Val. Max. l. ii. Univ. hift. vol. i. p. 918. Decop. Vict. Uticens. Athanas. &c. apud Seld. ubi fup. Vid. & Cellar. geogr. ant. l. iv. c. 5. Univ. hift. vol. i. p. 129—717. Vid. & Seld. de diis Syr. prolegom. c. 2. Scalig. ad Ubert. p. 362. S Seld. ubi fup. Dechart. in Chan. l. ii. c. 6. Bochart. ubi fup. Bochart. in Phal. & Chan. paffim. See before, fect. 1.

Vol. VI. Nº 9.

河 ¢Œ

Ţ,

HEBREW

-
b

SOME of these names we have been supplied with by Reineccius ; but the sollowing we remember not to have seen compared by any author whatsoever.

Punic.
} Anna.	c
} Jachon.
Adberbal.
Bal.
Muthumbal.
Maberbal.
) .	4
1
Sappho.
1
J
	Anna.  Jachon.  Adherbal.  Bal.  Muthumbal.

We have chosen to compare the Punic proper names in this place with the Hebrew or Phanician, to which they undoubtedly answer, rather than produce their etymons, as Bochart does; fince in our opinion this more clearly exhibits the very great agreement betwixt them, and renders the near relation they bore to one another obvious to all capacities.

Punic tongue Chaldee or Syriac.

THE Punic tongue had likewise a tincture of the Chaldee and Syriac, as we learn tinged with the from Prijcian and St. Austin. But as this is chiefly to be understood of it in the latter ages, when it was in its decline, particularly those that immediately preceded St. Austin, or even that in which he lived; and as the Chaldee and Syriac languages themselves were, in all probability, nearly allied to the Hebrew, nay, almost the fame with it, in early times, we shall infer nothing from this observation, but leave it to our readers to make what use of it they please.

to Saimalius.

According to Salmasius P there have been some persons who have believed, the old Egyptian, were the same; but as neither argutian, according ments nor sufficient authorities are produced to support this hypothesis, we shall f make no scruple to reject it.

Some remains of it to be found in the present Miltele language.

M. Maius, professor of the Greek and Oriental languages in the Ludovician university of Giesson, published a small piece in the year 1718, wherein he proves, that the present language of the Maltese contains a great deal of the old Punic in it. The materials of which this tract confifts, he was supplied with by one father James Stanislaus John Baptist Ribier de Gattis, a missionary Jesuit, and native of Malta, * Reineccii hist. Jul. in rep. Carth. vol. ii. p. 464. ed. Helm. 1595. P SALMASIUS in Tertul. de Pal. fuper Joan, tract. 15. tom. ix. ipecim. ling. Punic. in hodiern. Melitent. Superst. Marpurg. 1718.

O PRISCIAN. I. V. P. 123. AUGUST. 9 JOANNES HENRICUS MATUS IG

who very well understood the language (C) of the Maltese, having resided many years amongst them. The piece is very curious, containing proofs that this island was, for a considerable period of time, subject to the Carthaginians; and that the Punic tongue was planted and continued in it, as likewise a large collection of Maltese words more remote from the Arabic than from the Phanician, Chaldee, or Syriac. We cannot pretend to transcribe the whole treatise, though it is but a short one; but as the Maltese names of the cardinal numbers differ pretty much from those of other living languages, except the Arabic; as they come nearer the terms expressing those numbers in the Phanician or Chaldee, than any other tongue; and consequently furnish us with a strong argument, that the Maltese tongue has much of the old Punic b in it; and at the same time improve our idea of this last; we think we cannot do our curious readers a greater pleasure than by inserting them.

	MALTESE.	CHALDEE.		English.
	Huebet.	חר	Heb. nnn	One.	ı.
	Tnei.	תרין תרי	Heb. שני	Two.	2.
	Tlieta.	תלתא	,,,	Tbree.	3.
	Herbba.	ארבעא		Four.	4.
	Chamsa.	חמשא		Five.
	Sitta.	שחש		Six.	5. 6.
C	Seba.	שבעא		Seven.	7.
	Imiena.	תמניא		Eight.	8.
	Disha.	משעא		Nine.	9.
	Hashra.	עסרא		Ten.	10.
	Chaddas.	חד עסר	•	Eleven.	II.
	Tnàs.	חרי עסר		Twelve.	12.
	Tlittàs.	תלתא עסר		Thirteen.	13.
	Herbahtas, or } Erbatas.	ארבעא עסר		Fourteen.	14.
	Chmistàs.	חמשא עסר		Fisteen.	15.
d	Sittàs.	שתא עסר		Sixteen.	16.
_	Sebatàs.	שבעא עסר		Seventeen.	17.
	Imientàs.	תמני עסר		Eighteen.	18.
	Dschiatàs.	תשעא עסר		Nineteen.	19.
	Hashrin.	עסרין		Twenty.	20.
	Tlietin.	תלתין		Thirty.	30.
	Erbbin.	ארבעיז		Forty.	40.
	Chamsin.	חמשין		Fifty.	50.
	Sittin.	שתין		Sixty.	60.
	Sebibin.	שבעין		Seventy.	70.
c	Imienin.	תמנין		Eighty.	80.
	Dischin.	תשעין		Ninety.	90.
	Mia.	מאה		An bundred.	100.
	Elf.	אלפא	Heb. אלפ	A thousand.	1000.
	Elfein.	תרין אלפין		Two thousand.	2000.
	Tlietelef.	חלתא אלפין		Three thousand.	30004
	Erbatelef.	ארבעא אלפין		Four thousand.	4000.
	•	1 -2 -1 -17	•	•	•

1. Our readers will at first sight discover, that the Maltese words in general here are almost the same with the Chaldee; which seems to be a confirmation of what f Priscian and St. Austin affert, viz. that about their time the Punic language, notwithstanding it agreed in the main with the Hebrew, was tinged with the Chaldee.

(C) One of the authors of this history was very well acquainted with this father Ribier, or, as he called himself, Riviere, at Oxford, where he died in the year 1736. He confirmed to this person by word of mouth every particular he had communicated to M. Maiss, and added some others; viz. that he had carefully examined most of the Oriental words in the Maltese tongue, and sound they approached much nearer the Hebrew and Chaldee than the Arabic; that the natives had a fort of tradition, that they were descended from the Carthaginians, &c. He was a very good Orientalist, and had his education, as he related, in the Jesuits college at Ingoldsiat in Bavaria. Some small MSS. pieces he left in the hands of the person above-mentioned.

PRISCIAN. & D. AUGUST. ubi sup.

2. It ought to be observed, that thei two borrows that from the Chaldee, and a nun from the Hebrew; that huebet, one, and elf, a thousand, are the Hebrew number and Din; that the numerals from ten to twenty end in as, like the Greek words, duas, reads, reads, teres, Sc. and that the rest are Punic or Phanician (D).

3. From the numerals ending in in from twenty to an hundred, and those ending in a from two to eleven, 'tis evident, that the language of Malta even still follows the Chaldee and Syriac form; and that the Punic did so in St. Austin's time, and much higher, is plain from several Punic words that might be produced, though 'tis probable, that in very early times it nearly resembled the Hebrew or Phanician.

4. In support of what has been advanced by Maius, it may be surther considered, that Joannes Quintinus Heduus, an author who lived in Malta about the middle of be the sixteenth century, was of the same opinion, affirming, that the island of Malta was formerly subject to the Carthaginians; that the African, i. e. Punic, tongue was spoken there in his time; that there were then extant some pillars in the island, that had Punic inscriptions upon them; and that the Punic words to be found in Plautus, Avicenna, &c. were perfectly understood by the Maltese' (which he urges as an argument, that the old Punic tongue was not even then much corrupted). All which is consirmed by Fazellus' in his curious history of Sicily; and this gives a great sanction to the other's authority.

5. According to father Ribier de Gattis", the Maltese have the following proverb amongst them at this day: Il stus iffitiech pest; thei attieb, li iehdoc inkella, i.e. the plague wants a piece of money; give it two, if it will withdraw itself from you. Now this very proverb was a Punic one in St. Austin's days, as he himself assures us. This greatly contributes to evince what M. Maius had in view.

From the whole we may conclude, that Postellus, Schindler, and Drusius, have not that soundation for maintaining the Arabic and Punic tongues to have been the same, as Selden, Scaliger, Bochart, Reinesius, and others, have for supposing, that the Hebrew, Chaldee, Phanician, and Punic, were always most nearly related, and even originally the same (E).

Punic letters originally the fame with the Phoenician.

The Punic letters, as well as language, at first must certainly have been the Phanician, for the reason above assigned; and though they were considerably altered by dength of time, yet 'tis certain they always retained a great similitude to their originals, as will appear from a nice inspection into the characters upon the most elegant Phanician and Punic coins. The character however upon the Punic coins is various, many of those found in Spain, as well as Sicily, having letters intirely rude and barbarous, whilst the better sort exhibit a character resembling the Phanician, and even

5 JOANNES QUINTINUS HEDUUS in epift. ad Soph, in thefaur, ant. & hist. Sic. vol. iv. Lugd. Bat. 1723. Gattis agud Joan. Henr. Maium, ubi sup.

Tho. Fazel. de reb. Sic. pri. decad. sub init.

P. Stanisl. Jac. Joan. Bapt. Ribier de

(D) And so are those that end in as, which is evidently the first syllable of TWY afar, the Hebrew numeral; if so, the numbers from ten to twenty are nearer the Hebrew than the Chaldee. Perhaps the Greek words here mentioned ending in as derive that termination from the same original.

(E) In Arnobius's time the Punic language (4) was still spoken in that part of the country bordering upon the Garamantes; but more northerly the Latin tongue was used: besides these, in the Mediterranean parts, no less than twenty-two languages, or rather dialects, prevailed. Bochare thinks (5), that the six last verses of the unknown language in Plautus were Libyan, because they are intirely different from the other. 'Tis certain the Carthaginians spoke both Punic and Libyan; for which reason they were called Migdilybes, Bilingues, and Bisuscilingues (6).

Lastanosa (7), a curious Spanish author, affirms many of those coins that Aldrese, and others, took to be Carthaginian, to have been old Spanish medals.

He afferts further, that the character on these coins is different from the Carthaginian. This he in some measure proves by observing, that the characters on the pieces dug up about Cadiz and in Andalusia, with which parts the Carthaginians had a more immediate communication, were very different from those sound on others discovered in places not so well known to that people. "Tis certain one of the Spanish medals given us by Aldrete(8), as well as the greatest part of those collected by this author, has characters upon it bearing little or no resemblance to the Punic. This author's work was printed at Huesea in 1645, and contains a handsome collection of Spanish medals, which we may possibly have occasion to consider more fully when we come to the history of Spain. Aldrete, and others, believe many Punic pieces had Libyan letters upon them; which may possibly be true; but that it really is so, we must not presume to affert.

(4) Arnob. in Pfal. civ. (5) Bochart. l. ii. c. 6. (6) Plaut. in Pan. Virg. En. 1. Sil. Italic. l. ii. 16. (7) Don Vincencio Juan de Lastanosa en Museo de las Medullas desconocidas Españolas, p. 15, 16. This piece was dedicated to Don Bern. Fernandez de Velasco, constable of Cassille, and is now extremely scarce, though very curious. (8) Bern. Aldret. varias antiguedad. de Espana, l. ii. c. 1. en Ambr. 1614.

a the Affyrian or Hebrew letters. Two questions here arise, which we shall beg leave to confider.

FIRST, whether the Samaritan character, which is by many persons believed, be the same with the antient Phanician? And SECONDLY, whether the Samaritan or the Affyrian, commonly called the square letters, were the antient character of the Hebrews?

As to the first, in order to determine the point couched in it, we must diligently Samaritan compare the letters of the Samaritan Pentateuch with those of the legends found upon characters dif-the Samaritan and Phanician coins. This has been done with the utmost accuracy ferent from that on the by Reland and Loescher w; from whom it appears, that there is a very considerable Phoenician b discrepancy betwixt them; almost, if not intirely, as considerable as that betwixt coins. the old Affyrian, or Hebrew alphabet, and the character found on these coins. This is rendered evident beyond dispute by the two learned men aforesaid, who have obliged the world with an exact and just delineation of all the principal Samaritan and Phanician coins. From whence we cannot but infer, that the antient Phanician character was different from the present Samaritan.

WITH regard to the second question, it must be owned, that the greatest part of Most of the the learned world, for above a century, have held it in the affirmative. But it learned imamust likewise be owned, that no number of great names can give a fanction to gine the Samaerror, and that this point has not been considered thoroughly till of late. The to have been c main argument all along infifted upon in defence of this opinion has been taken prior to the

from the legends found upon some coins, said to have been dug up in Judæa; Assyrian. wherein are discovered these words, Jerusalem the boly, and the shekel of Israel. The letters of these legends are afferted to be the Samaritan; and since neither the Samaritans, by reason of their known aversion to the Jews, nor the ten tribes after their separation from the other two, because from that period they had nothing to do at Jerusalem, could possibly have struck these pieces, 'tis from hence inferred, that they must have belonged to the Jews before the captivity, or even to the Israelites, before the separation of the ten tribes x; and consequently, that the Samaritan letters, supposed to be the same with those on these coins, were the Hebrew chad racter in the most early times, and that in which the facred books of the old testament were originally written.

This is the argument which has all along been deemed sufficient to overthrow Chief arguall the facts, reasonings, and authorities, that can be produced on the other side of ment in favour all the facts, reasonings, and authorities, that can be produced on the other fide of this taken the question; and which the learned Dr. Prideaux y has not scrupled to pronounce from some unanswerable. But whether or no it really is so, we shall be the better able to judge, coins with Sawhen we have maturely weighed the following confiderations: 1. M. Ottius, who applied himself closely to the study of these coins, intimates, upon them.

that those which are genuine 2, if any such there be, bear a small proportion to the This examined. number of the counterfeits; and that he found it a difficult matter to meet with any e of them. How then can we be affured, that those mentioned by bishop Walton and Dr. Prideaux are genuine? 'Tis not sufficient to say, there were some of them in Rabbi Moses Ben Nachman's days, above five hundred years ago; for how can we be affured, that any of those now extant were then in being? or if we could, what. is this to the purpose, since his age is modern, in comparison of the supposed anti-quity of these coins? But, (F)

2. Admitting them all to be genuine, yet the letters on them are most certainly not the same with those of the Samaritan Pentateuch. This clearly appears from Reland and Loescher above-mentioned, who have given us an accurate plate of all these pieces, as well as a complete alphabet of the letters they exhibit. Nay, f 'tis evident from them, that these letters resemble the old Assyrian or Hebrew almost as much as they do the Samaritan b.

W ADRIAN. RELAND. de vet. Hebræor. num. dissert. pass. & Val. Ern. Loescher. de causis ling. Hebr. p. 201, 224. ed. Francos. & Lipsiæ, 1706. * Walton. in prolegom. 3. Prideaux in connect. l. v. Prideaux ubi sup. * Jo. Bapt. Ottis epist. apud Adr. Reland. de vet. Hebr. num. dissert. 3. Adr. Reland. & Val. Ern. Loescher, ubi sup. * Idem ibid.

(F) There is great reason to believe, that not one good as confess it; and from what Spanhelm has the Samarican coins is genuine, at least not one declared on this head, we may find, that he was in of the Samaritan coins is genuine, at least not one declared on this head, we may of them is indisputably so. Reland and Ottins as a very great doubt about it (9).

(9) To Bapt. Ottius apud Adr. Re'and. de vet. Hebr. num. differt. 3. Adr. Reland. ubi sup. dissert. 9. Ez. Spanhem. ubi sup. Vol. VI. Nº 9. 8 Q_ 3. SUP-

3. Supposing the character on these shekels had been the Samaritan, yet nothing a could have been from thence collected in favour of so remote an antiquity of this character as they are brought to prove. For 'tis now univerfally received amongst the learned, and the dates on the pieces themselves clearly evince it, that the oldest of these coins, with legends upon them, do not precede the settlement of the highpriesthood in the Asmonean family, which happened not much above a hundred and fifty years before the christian æra, and some of them are much later . This single observation, which is supported by the strongest proofs, seems to render all conclusions, drawn from the supposed high antiquity of these coins, perfectly chime-

THE main difficulty being thus removed, the arguments offered in favour of the b contrary opinion cannot fail of having great weight with all persons of penetration and impartiality. The principal of them are the following:

Arguments in contrary opinion.

- 1. THERE cannot be conceived a greater antipathy between any two nations, than favour of the that which subsisted between the Jews and Chaldwans or Babylonians, especially after the captivity. The former had the latter, and every thing belonging to them, in the utmost abhorrence and detestation. 'Tis morally impossible therefore, that they should have forsaken their own character, after their return from Babylon, to adopt that of the others.
  - 2. THE Phanicians received their alphabet from the d Affyrians; of course, therefore, the Assyrian letters must have been prior to the Phanician. If, therefore, the c Affyrian and Phanician alphabets were different, the square or Chaldee letters are prior to the Phanician; if the fame, as we are inclined to believe, the square or Chaldee letters are the true old Hebrew character, and the original letters of the east.
  - 3. FROM a diligent comparison of the Phanician, Samaritan, Syriac, old Arabic or Cupbic, &c. with the antient Affyrian or Hebrew letters, it will appear, that all the others were derived from the Affyrian. The ducts of these letters are plain, easy, and simple, such as 'tis natural to suppose the first letters were; the letters on the Phanician coins are the next to these in plainness, ease, and simplicity, and bear a great analogy to them; and lastly, the Samaritan letters are the others, with some additional strokes and lines intermixed, which, at first sight, carry with them the d air of novelty in respect of the Assyrian. This has been set in so strong a light by two or three eminent hands, that it will be a great pleasure to our learned readers to confult them .
  - 4. THE Septuagint version is of higher antiquity than any of those coins, which are supposed to have the Samaritan character upon them. Now 'tis certain the authors of this version have frequently differed from the Hebrew, by their mistaking one similar Assyrian letter for another f. This is an undeniable argument, that the individual Hebrew copy they translated was written, not in the Samaritan, but the Affyrian character; and consequently, that the Hebrew text of the old testament was written in that character, before any of those shekels brought to prove the antiquity e of the Samaritan letters were in being.
  - 5. THE Samaritan Pentateuch itself differs in several places from the Hebrew. Many of these differences arise & from a confusion of similar letters, not Samaritan, but Affyrian; as namely, the with the , the with the , the with the , the n with the n, the w with the y, &c. This must be owned to be the strongest proof imaginable, that the Samaritan was posterior to, and even taken from the Pentateuch written in the Affyrian character; and of course bids fair to put an end to this famous dispute (G).
  - * Idem ibid. Ez. Spannem. de ul. & præst. num. ant. dissert. 2. & Conringius de num. Hebrzor. Plin. l.vii. c. 56.
    * Spannem. & Loesch. ubi sup. Schultens. in institut. ad sund. ling. Hebr. p. 20. PLIN, I.vii. c. 56. SPANHEM. & LOESCH. ubi sup. Schultens. in institut. ad fund. ling. Hebr. p. 20. & alibi.

    Engelbert. Engels. Marcod. Juliacems. in præfat. ad Val. Schind. peniaglot. Hanov. 1612. Val. Ern. Loescher. p. 217, 218. Steph. Morin. de ling. prim. exercit. 2. c. 7. p. 199. Sq. Jo. Got. Carpzovius in crit. sacr. vet. test. Lipsiz, 1728. p. 229, 230, 231.
  - (G) The learned baron Spanheim, Dr. Alax, Conringius, and others, have intirely overthrown the common opinion of the antiquity of the Samaritan letters, from several topics not mentioned by us here. But this is the most effectually done by the famous Dr. Carpzon of Leipsick, in his defence of the Hebrew text of the old testament against Mr. Whiston. In relation to the last argument here offered, no turther satisfaction can be either given or required by the most curious reader, than what may be met with from him (10).

Father Soncies indeed intimates, that the Sama-

(10) Allixius apud Spanhem. ubi sup. Conring. de num. Hebraor. pass. Fo. Got. Carpzov. ubi sup. Vid. etiam Hottinge. Villalpand. Cellar. hist. Samarit. aliosq; plurimos.

WE cannot recollect, that any person has hitherto tried to explain the legends on any of the Punic coins, notwithstanding the letters on many of them seem to be nearly related, partly to the Hebrew, partly to the Syriac, and partly to the Phanician.

However, in order to excite others, who have more leifure, and greater abilities, An attempt to fome attempts of this kind, we shall here endeavour at an explication of those explain the upon two Siculo-Punic medals; hoping that our readers will consider the subject as two Siculo-it really is, dark and intricate, and therefore make all favourable allowances for Punic coins.

whatever mistakes may be discovered in our conjectures.

I. The first which is here exhibited is taken from Paruta, who ranks it amongst b the coins belonging to the city of Panormus, now known by the name of Palermo h. Upon the reverse is a horse in full speed, with these two Punic letters + H, which we think ought to be read bbet or bbit, and, in our opinion, stands for bbittin or bbitte, i. e. of the Carthaginians. That the two letters are bbeth and tau', appears from Spanbeim, Reland, Loescher, and others; and that the names of cities, or rather their inhabitants, especially Greek cities, are frequently found upon the reverses of coins belonging to them, is too obvious to need any proof. Panormus therefore being the metropolis of the Carthaginian part of Sicily, and in the neighbourhood of the Greeks, if not itself filled with them, 'tis no wonder the Carthaginians there should in this respect imitate the people with whom they lived. What may serve to confirm this is, that we find several Greek coins of the Panormitansk, done in the manner abovementioned, of as high antiquity as these; and there are even instances of Sicilian coins with both the Greek and Punic characters upon them. That the Carthaginians should be called Hbittin or Hhitte, i. e. Hittites, we are not to think strange; since Anak m and his family, from whom Cartbage was called Chaedre-Anech or Chaedre-Anak, were Hittites, and consequently that people were the most eminent of the Phanicians, from whom the Carthaginians deduced their original. As for the name being abbreviated, this is no uncommon thing. The word ETPA for ETPAKOSION is frequently found on the medals of the Syracusians, not to mention many other instances which might easily be produced. For a farther illustration of this point, 4 see the following note (H).

II. The

<sup>h</sup> Ракит. apud thesaur. ant. & hist. Sic. vol. viii. tab. 14. num. 140.

Браннем. de us. & præst. num. diss.

Vid. Ракит. ubi sup.

Parut. apud script. Sic. vol. viii. tab. 13. num. 123, 124. tab. 14. num. 136, 137.

Bochart. Phal. l. iv. c 36.

Parut. ubi sup. vol. viii. Lugd. Bat. 1723. tab. 33. num. 2. tab. 38. num. 12.

ritan character was restored by Simon. But first, this is a direct begging of the question; for it ought to be proved, that it was antiently in use as to facred matters amongst the Hepreys, before it should be afferted, that it was restored by Simon. And secondly, supposing this fact, which there is great reason to presume it is not, that the old testament was ordered to be written in the Samaritan character, either by Simon, or any other of the Asmonean family, is an affertion utterly destitute of the least shadow of reason or authority, either Jewish or christian, to support it (11).

(H) The Hittites (1,2) were the primary nation of Canaan, and seem to have been more famous than any of the others. They were not intirely reduced 'till the time of Solomon, being intermixed with the Israelites, and living in the neighbourhoood of the Sidonians and Tyrians. Hence we may conclude, that not only great numbers of them settled in Africa after their expulsion by Fosma, but likewise, that even some of their descendants might attend Dido into the same country. They were so formidable to their neighbours, that from them the word in bittah seems to have signified fear, and a sudden confermation (13). That this Punic word is to be read and interpreted in the manner we propose, will farther appear from hence, that the letter H is found upon the reverses of several other Panermitan (14) coins, which evidently allude to the state of Carthage, and must have been struck when the Carthaginians were masters of that place (15). Tis also worthy were masters of that place (15). Tis also worthy observation, that the Greek mark or abbreviation on the reverses of these medals, peculiar to the Panormitans confidered as Greeks, was IVP, INP or P, i.e. HANP for (16) HANOPMITAN. We may therefore reasonably imagine, that the Carthaginians had likewise an abbreviation in their own language and character, viz. | or + |, i.e. letters were an abbreviation, is so apparent, that Havercamp (17) pronounces them the mark of Panormus; though he abfurdly confounds them with the Greek MP, whereas they are intirely different from it, and indisputably the Phænician bheth and tau. It must be owned indeed Havercamp will not allow these coins to be Punic (18); but the Carthaginian horse on ours, as well as the palm-tree and

(11) E. Souciet recueil de dissertat. critiq. sur les endroit. & sur de matier. qui ont rapporta l'ecriture.
(12) Univ. hist. vol. i. p. 322, 323, 329, 335, 337.
(13) Bochart. Phal. l. iv. c. 36. sub init.
(14) Parut.
ubi sup. tab. 14. num. 134. & tab. 17. num. 166. &c.
(15) This appears from the symbols upon them, and from their being found near this metropolis of the Carthaginians in Sicily.
(16) Vid. num. Panorm. apud Parut. ubi sup. pas.
(17) Sigebert. Havercamp. comment. in Parut. num.
Panormitan. p. 61, 62.
(18) Idem ibid.

II. The second coin we are supplied with by Haym, who, sollowing other antiquaries, supposes the hero there represented to be Hannibal. The Punic legend is 14445, every one of which letters we shall endeavour to decipher o.

THE first | is evidently the same with the old Oriental aleph given us by Lasscher, as well as the Syriac olaph. It likewise in figure approaches near the Phanician aleph or alpha, (†) as found on coins, wanting only the transverse line at the top, which, by length of time, might easily have grown into disuse amongst the Carthaginians. We may therefore esteem it as equivalent to A P.

THE second 4 is apparently the Phanician Y, which letter we see upon several Phanician coins in Spanheim. The Etruscan V likewise comes near it. We may b therefore affert 44 to be NN i.

The third letter is the Phanician jud (N) inverted (N). The inversion of letters is a thing that frequently happens; but at present we shall content ourselves with naming one instance only. From the Phanician w is formed the Greek: Y or Z. The Punic W is therefore of the same power with I.

THE last letter 1 is a more rude and simple kind of betb; for it differs only from the Phanician (49) and Hebrew ( ) beth in this s, that it is destitute of the transverse line at the bottom, and has the vertical angle more acute than that of the Hebrew, and the line parallel to the transverse one at the bottom of the Pbanician beth defaced. In fine, as there is no other letter of the Phanician alphabet, to which this approaches so near as it does to betb, we may conclude, that they were the fame; and therefore we must look upon 1 as B.

Thus we find, that 14/44 p expressed in Latin letters is ANNIB, in conformity to the fentiments of Haym', and other antiquaries. And we can affure our readers, that the Punic characters here do not differ so much from the Phanician, with which we have compared them, as the various forms of the same Phanician letters found on different medals do from one another u.

IT has been observed above, that the suffetes of Carthage were called kings by d the Greeks; that one of these, at least, was possessed of a vast degree of power; that Hannibal was, for some time, the supreme magistrate of Carthage; that he acted in that city in a manner without controul; and in fine, that he was deified there in his life-time. After this, who can be surprised, that he should have had his name and effigies upon coins? For our part, we think nothing more probable, and, without the additional proof of this medal, should not have scrupled to have affirmed it (I).

As to the progress of the liberal arts and sciences amongst the Carthaginians, and the degree of perfection they arrived at in them, we have not much to fay. If Carthage could ever have boasted of any famous productions of this kind, they are all now lost; though for our parts we are inclined to believe, that this people gave e themselves up so intirely to commerce, that they paid little or no regard to any branch of literature. Military skill some of their generals were most eminently famous for, though even in this they feem to have been very deficient, till put into a right method by Xantippus the Lacedæmonian; but philosophy, we have reason horse on the others, together with the authority of the learned Inveges (19), and the Punic characters on them all, not only refute what he has faid, but obviate every thing else that can be offered to the contrary.

· HAYM in tesor. Britan. P LOESCH. p. 224. Et Ezech. Spannem. de ul. & præft. numism. dis-9 SPANHEM. ubi fup. & PHIL. BONAROT. in additament. op. Dempst. Florent. 1726. HEM. ubi sup. Montfauc. in dissert. de vet. Græc. & Lat. lit. ad fin. palæogr. Græc. Par. 1708. t HAYM del tesor. Britan. p. 143. SPANH. & MONTFAUC. ubi fup. 4 Vid. ADRIAN. RELAND. VAL. LOESCHER, ubi fup. aliofq; plurim.

That this is a Punic abbreviation, in imitation of the Greek manner, is also probable, because every thing on this medal is either Greek workmanship, or an imitation of it. Other Panormitan coins have on their reverses IIA(20), which greatly strengthens what has been advanced. If we suppose hheth here to be of the same organ with koph, as it sometimes is, being by some pronounced cheth, then this abbreviation may be chat or chart, i. c. of the Cartha-ginians. Perhaps this conjecture will please some of our readers better than the other.

(1) Havercamp afferts, that the Carthaginians firuck medals in honour of their generals, with their effigies upon them; this is likewise allowed by that learned Sicilian antiquary Inveges (21).

(19) August Inweg. Carth. Sic. p. 323. & alib. (21) Inveg. & Havercamp. ubi sup. p. 84.

(20) Parut. ubi sup. tab. 10. num. 99, 100, &c.

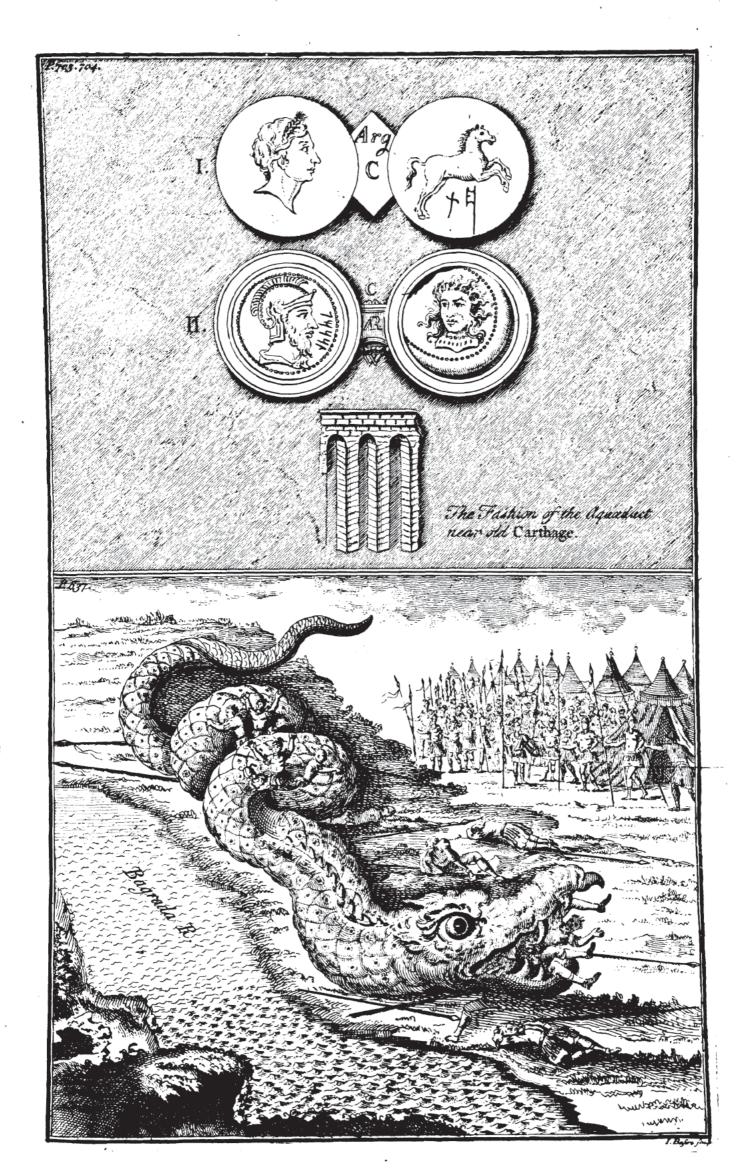

to

Liberal arts and sciences at a low ebb in Carthage.

Hannibal's

coin.

effigies on a Carthaginian

• : to apprehend, was always at a low ebb amongst them. As they undoubtedly therefore applied themselves chiefly to trade and navigation, as also to the military art, that they might be the better enabled thereby to enjoy in security their immense wealth and possessions, their arts and learning will not be a very copious topic; and even this we must for a moment suspend, in order to give our readers a short sketch of some of their principal customs.

THEY suffered no private injury offered by any person whatsoever to another, to Customs of the go unpunished. This maxim of equity they received from their first ancestors, and Carthaginians.

were very ftrict on all occasions in the observance of it w.

No one was permitted to carry the news of any near relation's death to another, but some person convicted of a capital crime, for which he was soon to suffer. They thought the messengers of such tragical events ought soon to die, or at least never more to appear before the persons to whom they brought the melancholy advice.

It any remarkable misfortune happened to the city, the walls were all hung with black. This was done after the destruction of their fleet by Agathocles; after the loss of their army under Himileo's conduct in Sicily by the plague, and upon other such dismal occasions, as we are informed by various authors.

THEY used dog's slesh for food till the time of Darius Hystaspis; but upon that prince's conceiving some disgust at this practice, they lest it off, at least for a certain period of time 2.

THE foldiers were prohibited, under the severest punishment, whilst in the field, to taste wine; a laudable instance this of their temperance and sobriety.

EVERY foldier, at least every officer, wore a number of rings answering to the number of campaigns he had made. This doubtless was intended to excite a noble spirit of emulation amongst them, inspire them with a thirst after military glory, and consequently lead them on to the greatest atchievements.

THEIR generals, though perfectly innocent, upon any disafter, were frequently put to death. This probably was designed to oblige them to make use of all their skill, address, and vigilance; tho', after all, it was a most barbarous and imprudent custom. This wild maxim prevails amongst the Turks, who are justly looked upon as barbarians for it, at this day's.

THE populace and the senators had distinct baths appointed them. This in general we are told by Valerius Maximus; but what gave occasion to this, he says not,

nor gives us any further particulars concerning it d.

IT was usual with many of them to have statues or busts of their lovers or intimate friends in their bed-chambers, that they might, in some measure, see and converse with them when absent. This appears from Silius, in his account of Dido after Æneas's departure from her .

DIGNITY and power in this state could not screen any great offender from condign punishment. Of which Machaus, Hanno, Bomilear, and others, that we shall meet

e with in the course of this history, are pregnant instances f.

THEIR anniversary sestivals were observed with great solemnity, particularly the day on which the Tyrians, under the conduct of Dido, began to lay the soundations of Carthage. This, according to Silius, seems to have been celebrated yearly, even till the destruction of the city, with the utmost splendor and magnificence s.

There were no public inns amongst them. They entertained strangers as friends in their own private bouses. This was likewise a custom amongst other nations, particularly the Greeks and Romans. Hence it came to pass, that the same word frequently signified friendship and hospitality. The manner of receiving guests or strangers was thus: A dye or token was divided into two parts; one of these was given to the guest, and upon his producing it to the master of the house, he was received by him, and ever afterwards entertained as a friend. This token was transmitted down to posterity, and kept in the samily as a mark of friendship with the person or his samily to whom it related h. Hence those who violated the laws of hospitality were said tesseram bospitalem frangere. The deity presiding over these laws

Henor. ubi supra, in cap. de leg. & considered.

Sic. Liv. Oros. 1. iv. e. 6. Sec.

Just. hik. 1. xix.

Plat. de legib. & Henur. ubi sup.

Plat. Barts. advers. 1. iv. c. 22.

Vide Liv. Diodor. Sic. Sil. Italic. & c. 4.

Vide Liv. Diodor. Sic. Sil. Italic. & c. 5.

Vide Liv. Diodor. Sic. Sil. Italic. & c. 5.

Plat. Doror. Sic. Just. Oros. & c.

Sil. Italic. & c. 5.

Budæus in pandect. Taubman. ad Plaut. loc. citat. Scholiast. Euripid. in Hippol. Joan. Hargung. in docur. locos. memor. c. 8. l. 39. Sil. Ital. l. xvii.

was invoked by the name of Jupiter Xenius, as the god of friendship was called Jupiter a Philius, and that of society or goodfellowship Jupiter Hetærius.

It was a custom with the Carthaginians to consult their augurs and vates upon all emergencies, and before any enterprize of importance was undertaken. Thus Hamilear, at the siege of Syracuse, consulting one of his vates, was told by him, that the next night he should sup in that city; and, to wave all other instances, Pygmalion, upon his intention to pursue his sister Dido, was assured by the inspired college of vates, that he should feel the resentment of the gods, if he offered, in any manner, to obstruct the great design she was gone upon; nay, according to St. Austin, these vates were in great repute about those parts long after the destruction of Carthage, since one of them, named Albicerius, was very samous there in his time for the responses be he gave h.

THE magistrates, during the exercise of their power, were to obliged to abstain from wine, though that this institution was observed always to the expiration of the commonwealth, we cannot politively affirm.

The Phanicians are said to have represented their gods as carrying large bags or sacks sull of money; because gold amongst them was the emblem of power, and symbol of dominion. Perhaps the Carthaginians represented theirs in the same manner, which, together with the vast quantities of treasure continually rolling into their coffers, and the great variety of the most precious commodities brought from all parts of the world in their ships, might occasion that insatiable avariee they were so famous cofor.

SEVERAL other customs might here be mentioned; but as they may be more properly referred to the manners and disposition of the Carthaginians in general, we shall comprise them all in the following short character of that people.

Character of the Carthaginians.

THEIR minds were intirely fet upon amassing of wealth, being mean-spirited, groveling and fordid to an incredible degree k. In order to this, they fluck at no low, not to say infamous, arts. This must be understood of the Carthaginians in the later periods, and towards the decline of their state; for it is not to be questioned but that they were of a better turn of mind in the earliest ages, and that, even to the last, they had many generous and heroic fouls among st them. The ardor and public spirit d the women themselves shewed just before the last siege of Carthage, as well as during that fiege!, fufficiently prove this. In short, we find such a contrast of good and bad qualities in this people, that it is almost impossible to determine which of them were predominant. It must only be observed, that the nearer we approach the destruction of their city, the worse we find them. However, as the characters we have of the Carthaginians come handed down to us chiefly from the Romans, their implacable enemies, we must not pay too great a regard to them. The Romans took care to destroy, not only their archives, which, by the way, shews, that that nation ought to be reckoned amongst those where barbarism prevailed, but almost every thing they wrote, that had any appearance of literature or true history.

Polybius makes it his complaint, that both Philinus and Fabius Pictor, the Carthaginian and Roman historians, were so partial in their relations, that no great credit could be given to either of them, when treating of the Carthaginian affairs. Of their perfidiousness and black ingratitude, history supplies us with abundant proof, which will hereafter be produced. According to Plutarch, they were of a morose, saturnine and savage disposition (K), utterly averse to every thing that had but the leaft appearance

a republic as Carthage. Tho' several smart turns, that have been attributed to him by the antients, might be produced, yet we shall content ourselves here with one out of Macrobius (22): Antiochus, valuing himself upon the rich armour and splendid accoutrements of his troops, asked Hannibal at a review, Whether he thought they were sufficient for the Romans, meaning to cope with them? Hannibal, far from being dazzled with the pompous appearance

&lt;sup>h</sup> Virg. Æo. 4. Sil. Italic de bell. Pun. l. i. Diodor. Sic. Just. l. xviii. August. l. i. cont. academ.

<sup>l</sup> Alex. ab Alex.

<sup>l</sup> Polyb. l. i. Diod. Sic. l. ii. App. in Lybic. Vide etiam Frontin. & Veget.

<sup>m</sup> Polyb. l. i.

<sup>n</sup> Plut. in præc. de get. rep. c. 5.

(K) The great Hannibal was an exception to this general character of the Carthaginians given by Plusarch. Though that renowned general was, for many years, so much employed in military labours, he yet found means to cultivate the muses. Some of his repartees, that have been transmitted down to us, plainly shew, that he had a great fund of natural wit. This he improved by the most polite education that could be bestowed at that time, and in such a appearance of wit or raillery, not being able to bear a joke, in which they were diametrically opposite to the genius of the Athenians and Lacedamonians. Some of them were likewise acted by an intolerable spirit of arrogance, and most vitious ambition, by which they were prompted to desire divine honours. Of this Hanno affords us a flagrant instance, who, as we are told by Ælian, taught birds to say, Hanno is a god; though this did not answer his end, since, after their slight from him, they returned to their former notes again (L).

<sup>(22)</sup> Macrob. saturn. l. ii. c. 2. p. 225. Vide etiam Corn. Nep. in vit. Hannib. Liv. l. xxxv. Plut. in vit. Flamin. & in Pyrrho, p. 687.

Com-

• ÆLIAN. var. hift. l. xiv. c. 30.

they made, replied, That the Romans were indeed very avaricious; but that however, he thought, these were abundantly sufficient for them, i.e. that the plunder accruing to the Romans from them was enough to satisfy that rapacious people. This was a proper rebuke to Antiochus for his preposterous notion of military bravery, and at the same a specimen of brilliant and slowing wit in Hannibal.

(L) The Carthaginians were extremely addicted to corruption, to which their confitution itself had a natural tendency, as Aristole (23) has rightly observed. Their chiefs frequently made use of this with good success, when all other expedients failed them. The Barchine section supported themselves a long time by the venality of their fellow citizens; and others after them pursued the same method of acting, which ended in the total ruin of the commonwealth. In consequence of this mean disposition, in prosperity they were elevated to a pitch inconsistent with the maxims of prudence and moderation, and in adversity as much depressed. Of this we shall meet with various examples hereafter (24).

At their weddings they entertained their friends with the tunny fish; another remarkable custom that deserves mentioning.

The Carthaginians paid the greatest descrence to their nobility, who held a most distinguished rank amongst them. Some persons were reputed nobles, or at least upon a level with them, on account of their riches; for Arisorle intimates, that wealth had a vast influence at Carthage, as well as nobility of bitth; and that great regard was had to both in silling the high posts of the state, when vacant. Others received the title of nobles, as a mark of distinction due to them for their superior virtue and merit. And lastly, others derived their nobility from a long train of noble ancestors. These were the proper nobility; of whose samilies, in order to render this history the more complete, we shall be gleave to present our readers with the following genealogical table, though it must be owned to be a very impersect one:

1. The family of MACHAUS.

Machaus.
Carthala.

3. The family of MAGO I.

3. The family of MAGOII.

Mago II. | Mago. 4. The family of BOMILCAR the tyrant.

Brothers

Hamiltar. An anonymous one.

Bomiltar.

f. The family of HANNO.

Hamo.

Asdrubal.

6. The family of HAMILCAR.

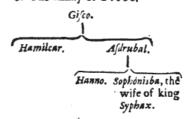

Hamilcar.

Hannibal. Hanno.

7. The family of HIMILCO.

Himilco.

8. The family of Gisco.

9. The family of Bomilear, the king or fufes.

Bomileur.

Hanno.

Hanno the Great.

(23) Aristot. de repub. ubi supra. (24) Vide Liv. Polyb. Just. Corn. Nep. Plus. Gros. plurimosque alios bistoric. pass.

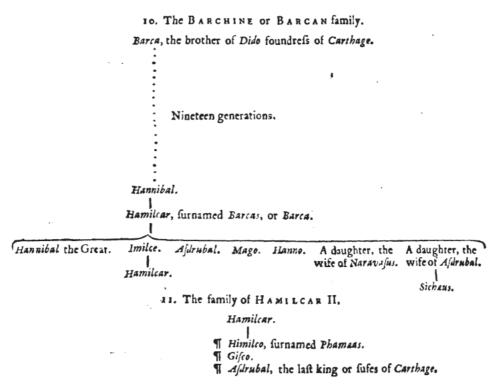

to. The

Commerce, the army, and the marine, chiefly regarded at Carthage.

COMMERCE, the army, and the marine, were the principal, if not fole, objects a of public attention at Carthage. These so intirely engrossed the minds of all people there, that they had no inclination to purfue, nor indeed any great tafte for, the liberal arts and sciences. However, they must have known something at least of the rudiments of aftronomy, fince, without this, they could not have been tolerably versed in the art of navigation. Besides, the Edomites and Phanicians were famous for being the greatest adepts, with the Egyptians, in the celestial sciences, of all other nations. The Cartbaginians therefore, their descendants, could not have been void of a competent knowledge herein. That they had fome notion likewise of sculpture and painting, tho' the degree of perfection they arrived at in them we cannot pretend to afcertain, is plain from the Dii Pataci they carried along with them in their voyages, as b likewise from the pictures with which their ships of war, and other vessels, were adorned. As a fea-faring and mercantile people are always ingenious in contriving a variety of commodities to supply the necessities or luxury of other nations with, it is also probable, that they were very well acquainted with the inferior mechanical arts. The Sidonians and Tyrians were certainly celebrated above other nations for their mechanical skill in very early ages, as we learn from scripture; consequently the Carthaginians, one branch of their posterity, must have been so likewise. But the superb temples, magnificent palaces, rich furniture in their houses, great variety of arms, &c. in Carthage, put this point beyond dispute (M).

Few persons of learning amongst the Carthaginians.

AFTER what has been faid, our readers will not expect to meet with many perfons c of erudition amongst the Carthaginians, though, without doubt, they had more than their enemies have informed us of. The Romans, as has been just observed, made great havock both amongst their public and private writings, and this out of a principle of envy and malice prepense. However, the names of some of their writers have been transmitted down to posterity, the principal of which are the following:

For a more particular account of these families, our readers may consult Reineccius, Ubbo Emmius, and Christopher Hendreich, so often quoted, at their leisure (24).

(M) So famous was Carthage for its artificers, that any fingular invention or exquisite piece of workmanship seems to have been called, even by the Romans, their implacable enemies, Panic. Thus the Punic beds or couches, the Punic windows, the Punic wine-prefices, the Punic lanterns, &c. were of all others effected the most neat and elegant for their workmanship by that people. This is an undeniable proof, that the Carthaginians had not only good mechanical heads and hands, but likewise excelled all other nations, their original ancestors excepted, in every thing of that kind (25).

(24) Ariflot. do rop. ubi supr. Christ. Hendr. Ubb. Emm. Reinec. in hist. Jul. vol. ii. Lucius Ampelius lib. memor. p. 191. edit. Cantab. 1680. Justin. b. xix. Liv. Died. Sic. Polyb. &c. (25) Valer. Max. Case de re rust, Ovid el. vi. Rlant. Aulul.

Hannibal, the most renowned general Carthage ever produced, was well versed in Carthaginian the Greek language. According to Cornelius Nepos and Plutarch, he wrote feveral miters. Hanpieces in it, particularly the history of Manlius Vulso's proconsulship in Asia P.

Mago, another celebrated general of the Carthaginians, acquired as much glory to Migo. his country by his writings, as his military atchievements. He wrote twenty-eight volumes upon husbandry, which the Roman senate had in such esteem, that, after the taking of Carthage, when they presented the African princes with the libraries sounded there, they ordered these books to be translated into Latin, though Cato had before written copiously on that subject. The libraries above-mentioned are a further proof, that learning was not intirely banished Carthage 9.

Philinus, though a Sicilian, being born at Agrigentum, is esteemed by Polybius as a Philinus. Cartbaginian historian. He wrote a history of the wars betwixt the Romans and the state of Carthage; but difguised sacts so palpably in favour of the latter, that, were his performance still extant, it would not be held in any great repute, especially after the Aigma Polybius has fixed upon it. Fabius Pistor, though in the main a good historian, yet, in most points relating to the Carthaginians, was guilty of as great partiality on the Roman side. This we learn from Polybius, who, in order to arrive at truth, has steered the middle course betwixt them both ".

Himilco, a sea-officer, was sent by the senate of Carthage to discover the western Himilco. shores and ports of Europe. This he did, and wrote a journal of his voyage, togec ther with an account of his discoveries, which were inserted in the Punic annals. Festus Avienus ' has intirely followed this author in his description of the western coasts of the world; and intimates, that he saw the original journal itself in the annals aforesaid. Nay, from Festus it appears, that the Carthaginians were acquainted with the Britan-nic islands, which he calls Oestrymnides.

Hanno, another Carthaginian general, by order of the fenate, failed with a confi-Hanno. derable fleet tround Africa. He entered the ocean by the streights of Gibraltar, made many important discoveries, and had continued his navigation, if provisions had not failed him. He wrote a relation of his voyage, an extract from, or rather a frag-ment of a Greek version of which, is still remaining. He is said to have hung up in d Juno's temple some skins of several savage women, whom he ordered to be slead. Isaac Vossius, in opposition to his father, supposes him to have been older than either Homer or Hefiod; but the great Mr. Dodwell folidly and learnedly refutes this notion. If Pliny is to be credited, Hanno and Himileo above-mentioned were cotemporaries. It is certain there were two Carthaginian generals of these names in the time of Agathocles. Whilft Himilco steered towards the west, in order to discover new countries, Hanno took his course from Gades or Cadiz to the farthest parts of Arabia. Mr. Dodwell thinks, that the piece going now under the name of Hanno's periplus, is not his, but was written by a Sicilian Greek. However, it cannot be denied, that he penned a relation of his voyage, fince this is often quoted by the antients. This most learned e gentleman has, with the greatest appearance of truth, fixed his time somewhere betwixt the ninety-fecond and the hundred and twenty-ninth olympiad ".

Silenus was an historian, who wrote of the Carthaginian affairs in the Greek language; Sleous. from whence it should appear, that he was a Greek. Some authors take him to have been the same with Philinus above mentioned; but of this we have no sufficient proof, and therefore we must look upon them as two distinct writers w.

Clitomachus, called in the Punic language Asdrubal, was a great philosopher. He Clitomachus. succeeded the famous Carneades, whose disciple he had been, and maintained in Athens the honour of the academic fect. Cicero fays, that he was a more fensible man, and fonder of study, than the Carthaginians generally were. He composed several books, f in one of which he drew a piece to console the unhappy citizens of Carthage, who, by the ruin of their city, were reduced to slavery. By this it is manifest, that he lived after the destruction of that city by Scipio x.

Now we are upon the arts and learning of the Carthaginians, it will not be foreign Hanno, the to our subject to mention what Pliny tells us of Hanno, viz. that he was the first man first who tamed

P Corn. Nep. in Hannib. Plut. in Scip.

P Ciu l. i. de orat. n. 249. Plin. l. xviii. c. 3.

P Polyb. l. i.

F Festus Avienus in or. marit. p. 290. Vide & Bochart. Chan. l. i. c. 35, 39, &c.

P Plin. l. ii. c. 67. & l. v. c. i. Athen. deipnosoph. l. iii. p. 83. Pomp. Mel. l. iii. c. 9. p. 63. edit. Ifaaci Vossi. de histor. Græc. p. 514.

B Dodwel. differt. de peripl. Hannon. ætat. in lim. geogrevet. script. Græc. min. tom. i. edit. Oxon. 1698. Aristor. in lib. de admirand. audit. Justin. l. xxii. &c.

W Cic. de divinat. l. i.

P Plut. de fort. Alex. p. 328. Diog. Laert. in Clitom. Cic. in academ. w Cic. de divinst. l. i. * PLUT. de for quest. l. iv. n. 98. Tusc. quest. l. iii. n. 54. Vol. VI. Nº 9.

who dared to touch, and could tame, a lion. The same author adds, that he was a condemned, which must either imply in it death or banishment, upon account of this art; since his countrymen could not be persuaded, but that he who had the power of foftening the fiercest of beasts, must likewise be capable of influencing the minds of his fellow-citizens in such a manner, as to become master of their freedom?. This is related to us by Pliny, and it is either an argument of their extreme weakness, or his extreme credulity. Some believe this person to have been the writer Hanno abovementioned (N).

The Carthaginians inventors

AMONGST other inventions this nation was famous for, we must not forget that of of the quadriremes, or four-oared galleys, which the antients attributed to the Carthaginians. It is moreover probable, that they were the first who made cable-ropes for b large veffels of the shrub spartum, which was a fort of broom; at least, that they were the first who communicated this invention to the Romans. But this perhaps more properly belongs to the navigation and trade of the Carthaginians, which we shall now endeavour to give our readers a succinct idea of z.

The trade and navigation of the Carthagi-

WITH regard to trade and navigation, (for we shall consider them jointly) no nation was ever more famous for these, nor enjoyed them in a larger extent, than they The Mediterranean, and all the ports in it, they were perfectly acquainted with. In the eastern parts they pushed their discoveries and commerce as far as any nation whatfoever, and to the westward, in all probability, farther. Britain and the Canaries were known to them; nay, according to some, America itself; but this seems to c be a conjecture without sufficient soundation. The formidable sleets they fitted out on many occasions, the vast quantity of shipping they kept in continual employ, the honour they had for a long period of time of being almost universally acknowledged as masters of the sea, to omit many others, are most glaring proofs of the sourishing condition of their trade and navigation. Neither is this without the best authority to support it; for, to wave many other authors of unquestionable reputation that occur, y PLIN, ubi fup. P. HARDUIN apud Bayl. voc. Hanno, vol. iii. p. 1579. not. (D). Lond. 1710. LIV. l. XXI. POLYB. l. i. Cæl. CALCAGNINUS de re nautic. comment. c. 1. XENOPH, de re venator.

(N) In one respect we may rank the celebrated Terence amongst the writers of this country, fince, according to Donatus, he was born at Carthage (26). Being taken captive when very young, either by Scipio at the conclusion of the second Punic war, as some will have it, or, as others fay, by the Numidians, in one of their incursions into the Carthaginian territories some time after that war, he became the property of Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator. Terentius, being much taken with the fine disposition of his flave, not only gave him an excellent education, but likewise enfranchised him, and called him after his own name, as was the prevailing custom of those times. In the consultaip of T. Manlius Torquatus and Cn. Oclavius Nepos, this famous dramatic poet was in his highest reputation (27). Tho' an African born, yet his diction is most pure, elegant, and police; insomuch that some have not icrupled to affirm, that he received confiderable affiftance in the comedies ascribed to him from Scibio and his friend Lalius. It is certain, that either to please these great men, who were not unwilling to be thought concerned with him in those performances, or because it was true, he himself countenanced this notion (28). Six of those comedies only are now extant, all of which were highly esteemed at Rome, and met with prodigious applause when acted there. Fenestella makes him to have been older than (29) Scipio and Lalius; but Cornelius Nepos is more to be credited, who afferts them all to have been cotemporaries. Suetonius fays (30), that, in his return from Greece, he loft an hundred and eight comedies translated from Menander, of whom he was a great admirer, and could not furvive an accident which afflicted him in a most sensible manner. However this be, he died in the confulship of Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Fulvius, aged thirtyfive years. He is said to have been of a middle stature, slender, and of a swarthy complexion. He had a daughter who furvived him, and was married to a Roman knight.

Under this note we shall likewise beg leave to observe, that it is intimated by Plutarch (3:), that this Hanno made use of lions as beasts of burden; which is confirmed by Ovid and Silius (32). If we will believe Ælian (33), there were lions in the temple of Adonis so tame, that they fawned upon persons at their entering in, came to the table there when called, and, after taking what was given them, modeftly retired. The same author tells us, that the Indians (34) had so tamed their lions, that with them they hunted bulls, wild asses, and all other savage animals. John II. king of Portugal is reported to have had a lion always following him like a dog (35); and, according to Paulus Jovius, the king of France gave such a one as this to the car-dinal de Medicis. What has been said of the Indians, Paulus Venerus likewise relates of the Tartars (36).

Silenus was an historian mentioned by Cicero, and, as is probable, by Nepos (37). The former of these affures us, that he wrote a history in Greek, with great care and accuracy, of Hannibal's expeditions; and that Calius in some points followed him.

P. Terent. vit. (27) Idem ibid. Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 748, 765, 775. (29) Fenestella apud Æl. Donat. ubi sup. (30) Sueton in vit. Terent. (32) Ovid. trist. iv. el. 6. Sil. Ital. l. i. (33) Ælian. de a (26) Al. Donat. P. Terent. vit. (28) Æl. Donat. ubi sup. (31) Plut. tal. l. i. (33) Ælian. de animal. l. xii. (36) Paulus Vener. l. vii. c. 17. (37) Cic. de pracep. ger. re (34) Idem ibid. l. xvii. (35) Petr. Messas, l. ii. c. 3. (36) Paulus Venet. l. vii. c. 17. (37) Cic. de divinat. l. i. Vost. de hist. Grac. l. iii. p. 413. Vide Bossum, & not. in Corn, Nep. de Hannib. p. 604. Lugd. Baf. 1734

a it appears from Herodotus and Thucydides, that scarce any people made so great a figure by sea as the Carthaginians, which was the natural effect, not only of their genius for naval affairs, but also of the flourishing and extensive commerce they were in possession of. The basis of this selicity was owing to the Tyrians, from whom they brought the disposition they were so eminent for into Africa. But in process of time they eclipsed the glory of even their ancestors themselves; insomuch that Pliny derives the origin of trade, not from the Phanicians, but the Pani or Carthaginians. The natural fertility of its soil, the surprising skill of its artificers, together with its happy situation, rendered Carthage the center of traffic, the great mart, not only of the Mediterranean, but even of the most remote nations 2.

THE commodities they supplied other countries with in great abundance, seem to Their commohave been corn and fruits of all kinds; divers forts of provisions, and high sauces; divers wax, honey, oil, the skins of wild beasts, &c. all the natural produce of their own territories. Their staple manufactures were utensils, toys, cables, all kinds of naval stores, and the colour from them called Punic, the preparation of which seems to have been peculiar to them. From Egypt they fetched fine flax, paper, &c. From the coasts of the Red-Sea, spices, frankincense, perfumes, gold, pearls, and precious stones. From Tyre and Phanice, purple, scarlet, rich stuffs, tapestry, costly furniture, &c. From the western parts of the world, in return for the commodities carried thither, they brought back iron, tin, lead, copper, &c. In fine, they purchased c the superfluities of all nations at an easy price; and by knowing the necessities of them all, and the particular branch of trade adapted to each of them, they sold these at their own rates; which brought immense treasure daily to Carthage, rendered this republic terrible to all her neighbours, and even enabled her to contend so long with Rome for the empire of the world itself b.

HAVING thus given our readers a general idea of the extensive trade this mighty The most value republic was mistress of, which was the great source of all her wealth and power; able branch of we must now beg leave to remark in particular, that no branch of their commerce man that carfeems to have been more beneficial to the Carthaginians, than that they carried on ried on with the with the Persians, Garamantes, and Ethiopians. These remote nations, besides other Garamantes, Persians, and d rich commodities, brought with them carbuncles, of almost inestimable value, Perlians, and Ethiopians. to Carthage; to which place they yearly reforted, as is most likely, in cara-These gems, from the plenty of them at Carthage, were called by the antients Charchedonian or Carthaginian, as Pliny relates. From Polybius it appears probable, that the Carthaginian merchants, at the fale of their wares, had a crier and fecretary, or clerk, to attend them. No profession was reckoned more honourable than that of the merchant in the dominions of this state; which is not to be wondered at, confidering the vast advantage accruing from thence to all orders and degrees of men therein. After this, it will be needless to observe, that the most considerable personages of the city were not ashamed to apply themselves to it.

We shall close this section with taking notice of a remarkable custom observed by the Carthaginians, and the Libyans bordering on the sea-coasts, in their trafficking with each other, as Herodotus himself has related it d.

"THE Carthaginians, says this historian, failing beyond the streights, or pillars of Hercules, traded with the Libyans of those parts in the following manner: " After they had got into some creek, they landed their goods; and leaving them " exposed on some point of land, returned again on board their ships. They then caused a great smoak to be raised, at the sight of which the Libyans immedies ately came to the place where the wares had been left; and laying down a " certain quantity of gold, retired at a good distance from them. Upon this the f "Carthaginians went on shore a second time; and if upon viewing the gold it ap-" peared to them sufficient, they carried it off, and sailed without delay; if not,

FEST. AVIEN. ubi sup. Posid. & Arst. de mem. Claud. l. 3. Strab. Apollon. Philost. l. ii. c. 14. l. 5. Pindar. &c. Christ. Hendr. Catth. l. ii. s. 1. c. 8. p. 262, 263, &c. Herodot. l. i. Thucydid. l. i. sub init. Plin. nat. hist. l. vii. c. 56. Liv. Polyb. Diodor. Sic. Justin. Oros. aliiq. pass. Christ. Hendr. ubi sup. Plin. l. xxxi. c. 8. Athen. deipsonoph. l. ii. Jul. Pollux, l. vi. Istdor. orig. l. xx. c. 3. A. Schotti observ. l. iii. c. 7. Hieron. Magius in miscel. l. ii. c. 9. Hadr. Jun. animadv. l. vi. c. 17. Turneb. advers l. x. c. 12. Catellianus Cotta in memorab. Varro, l. iv. c. 23. de LL. Tibul. l. ii. eleg. &c ad eum Passeratius, l. iii. iv. Joh. Brodæus in miscel. l. vi. c. 24. &c l. i. c. 8. Alex. Vanegas, I. ii. c. 2. &c Menaseh Ben Israel en esper. de Isr. p. 18, 19, &c. En Amsterdam en la Imprension de Semuel Ben Israel Soeiro, A. M. 5410.

Plin. nat. hist. l. xxxviii. c. 7. & Dalecamp. in loc. Patron, in satiric. Polyb. l. iii.

